PREFACE

THIS volume, entitled 'The Historic Note-Book,' is the third and last of a series. The first was the 'Dictionary of Phrase and Fable,' the object of which was to explain the meaning of words and expressions in which an allusion is made to some fable, custom, or character, more or less familiarly known.

The 'Reader's Handbook,' the second of the series, undertook to unfold in a few lines the tale of the best known epic poems of ancient and modern times, the plots of novels and plays, ballads and romances, and to give short biographical sketches of their respective authors.

The present book does for history what the first of the series did for phraseology, and the latter did for poetry and romance. It is purely historical, and explains with the utmost possible brevity allusions to historical events, acts of parliament, treaties, and customs, terms and phrases, made in books, speeches, and familiar conversation.

Probably no one could turn over a couple of pages of this book and not find some item which he would be at a loss to explain or to find in any book near at hand. It may be hidden in some corner of history, some modern or ancient encyclopædia, some law dictionary, periodical, or book of antiquities; but, being neither tabulated nor inserted in the index, would be as hard to find upon as the proverbial grain of wheat in a bushel of chaff. It might require hours, perhaps days, of research to bring out, and the handling of many books. This is the sort of [illegible] down. Some items have been kept by the author in the form of queries for many years waiting for solution, and these solutions have been ultimately found in most unexpected places.

I have been an author for sixty years, have written many books, and of course have been a very miscellaneous reader. In my long experience I have remarked how little the range of 'literary' reading has varied, and how doubt still centres on matters which were cruces in my early years. So that a work of this kind is of as much usefulness in 1893 as it would have been in 1833. I always read with a slip of paper and a pencil at my side, to jot down whatever I think may be useful to me, and these jottings I keep sorted in different lockers. This has been a life-habit with me, and the compiling of them into a subjective volume consists chiefly in selecting, sorting, explaining, correcting, and bringing down to date. What I myself have wanted to know, I presume others younger than I am may wish to know also; and what I have found difficult to discover, I presume others with fewer books may find difficult also. I know that many a time and oft I should have been most thankful if I could have laid my hand on a book, and found, without much tedious research, the explanation of some item in this book as then unknown to me; and I judge others by myself. This very unsatisfactory way of looking at a big book has been the secret of my success as an author. It was begun at the age of eighteen, and my first book of note was the 'Guide to Science,' the sale of which has been almost fabulous. The 'Dictionary of Phrase and Fable' was more than twenty years in hand, and has had a very wide circulation; the present book cannot fail to be equally useful, and I hope will not be less acceptable to the general public.

In these 'Historic Notes' I have had the advantage of two proof-readers of unusual learning, judgment, and wide reading—one in London and one in Philadelphia. With a diligence and discrimination beyond all praise, they have called attention to every doubtful statement, date, or proper name, and much of the accuracy of the book is undoubtedly due to their painstaking co-operation. For myself I am under unbounded obligation to them, and hope they will accept my thanks thus publicly acknowledged and without stint.

Little more need be said. The arrangement is somewhat different to that usually followed in Historical Dictionaries. The items are not set under the ruling word, but generally under the first noun or adjective of the phrase. Thus under 'Massacre' will be found all articles of that category, massed together, and not distributed under the name of the place where the deed of blood was committed. This has been done to bring the subject together in a compact form. Similarly with Church Councils, Literary Forgeries, and so on. When this allocation has been found impracticable, as in 'Irish Associations,' 'Monastic Orders,' 'Sunday Fête Days,' and so on, then under the general heading will be found an alphabetical list of all the articles in the book on the subject, which may be turned to if required.

Some antiquated customs have been pointed out, and a suggestion has been occasionally made which may possibly direct attention to what appears to the author of these 'Notes' a national want or national defect. See p. 697, article POETS' CORNER, and p. 115, article BORROMEO.

In one instance, that of 'Abigail,' in which a word has an ancient and modern history, the recent revival of the word in the reign of Queen Anne has been thought more consistent with the scope of this book than the well-known tale in the life of David. Those, however, who prefer the older story may, if they think proper, consult the 'Dictionary of Phrase and Fable.'

Finally the book here offered to the public is not a 'Book of Dates,' [illegible] added whenever required. Inventions and discoveries, the great staple of a book of dates, find no place here; and hundreds of the articles here inserted are wholly independent of dates.

Similarly, the book is not an 'Historic Dictionary,' but a dictionary of historic terms and phrases, jottings of odds and ends of history, which historians leave in the cold or only incidentally mention in the course of their narratives. If I might borrow the motto of 'Notes and Queries,' 'When found make a note of,' it would most aptly describe the end and object of these 'Historic Notes.'

THE AUTHOR.

If I might make the suggestion without being impertinent, I think the book would be admirably adapted to the upper forms of Ladies' Schools, and to those in private life who seek to extend their general knowledge, after having laid aside their elementary books. Of course, these Historic Notes are mainly designed and were specially written for the general public, and this, their educational use, is a mere afterthought.

HISTORIC NOTE-BOOK

A Etre marqué à l'A, of first-class quality. A is the distinctive mark of money minted in Paris, which is purer and more free from alloy than any other money in the French dominions. For A 1 see Dict. of Phrase and Fable, p. 1.

Aarau (Peace of), 8, 9, 11 Aug., 1712. This treaty concluded the war of Toggenburg.

Aaron's Breastplate, 4 rows.

1. Reuben, sardius; Simeon, topaz; Levi, carbuncle.
2. Judah, emerald; Dan, jacinth; Naphtali, agate.
3. Gad, amethyst; Asher, beryl; Issachar, sapphire.
4. Zebulon, diamond; Joseph, onyx; Benjamin, jaspar.

Abbasides (3 syl.). Califs of Bagdad, so called from Abul Abbas (Abdallah ben Mohammed), who defeated Mervan II., and became calif, 18 Feb., A.D. 750; ceased 1258, by the overthrow of Mostasem, put to death by Hulakou or Houlagou, a Mogul prince. The Abbasides succeeded the Ommiades.

The Abbaside califs were, Aboul-Abbas (750); Abou Giafar Abdumsor (754); Mohammed Mahdi 775; Hadi (785); Haroun al Raschid (789); Amyn (809); Al Mamoun (813), and 30 more.

Abbate (2 syl.). A young Italian clergyman who has received the tonsure, but has not taken full orders.

Abbates Milites, or Abba-comités. 10th cent. Lay abbots, who deputed deans or priors to the spiritual oversight of their abbeys.

Pronounce Ab'-a-tees Mil'-i-tees.

Abbaye de Monte à Regret. The guillotine. What is now the Rue des Bourses, in Paris, was formerly the Monte à Regret, the place for public executions.

Pronounce Ab-bay-d' Mönt ah Ra-gra'.

Abbés Commendataires. The 225 abbots appointed by the king of France. The office was a perfect sinecure, but the abbé commendataire drew one-third of the revenues of his convent. Many of these abbots were laymen, but generally they were literary men, often noblemen's sons included under laymen.

Pronounce Ab-bay Com-men-da-tares.

Abbey. In Scotland, a sanctuary for debtors against legal process afforded by the abbey of Holyrood.

Abbots in commendam. Abbots commended to hold an abbey and its dignity in charge till a regular abbot has been appointed. In the Reformation several abbots and other ecclesiastics were allowed to [illegible] their livings for life, or for a time. By 6, 7 Will. IV. c. 77, s. 1[illegible], no ecclesiastical dignity, office, or benefice, after the living possessors, was allowed to be held in commendam.

Abbeys and other Catholic livings held in commendam were mere sinecures for life.

Abbotsford Club (The). A literary club founded in Edinburgh (1835) for the publication of works belonging to Scotch history, literature, and antiquities. Above 80 quarto volumes were published. The club no longer exists.

Abbott Scholarships. I. In the University of Cambridge: two for classics and mathematics, for undergraduates in their first year. Value about 60*l.* a year, tenable for three years; founded by John Abbott of Halifax, Yorkshire, 1871.

II. In the University of Oxford: three for the sons of poor clergymen; founded the same year by the same founder.

Abdicated Monarchs. The following monarchs of Europe have abdicated:

Amadeus I. (duke of Aosta) Spain	—	—	1873
Charles IV. of Spain (forced) ...	—	—	1808
Charles V. of Spain and Germany	—	—	1556
Charles X. of France (forced) ...	—	—	1830
Charles Albert of Sardinia (forced)	—	—	1849
Charles Emmanuel of Sardinia ...	—	—	1802
Christina of Sweden	—	—	1654
Diocletian and Maximian ...	—	—	305, 308
Felipe V. of Spain ...	—	—	1724
Francis II. of the Two Sicilies (forced)	—	—	1860
James II. of England (forced) ...	—	—	1688
Louis Bonaparte of Holland	—	—	1810
Louis Philippe of France (forced)	—	—	1848
Ludwig of Bavaria (forced)	—	—	1848
Matilda (Lady of England)	—	—	1154
Milan of Servia	—	—	1889
Napoleon I. of France (forced) ...	—	—	1814
Napoleon III. of France (forced)...	—	—	1870
Otho of Greece (forced) ...	—	—	1862
Pedro II. of Brazil (forced) ...	—	—	1889
Poniatowski of Poland (forced)	—	—	1795
Richard II. of England (forced)	—	—	1399
Stanislaus Leczinski (forced)	—	—	1795
Victor Amadeus of Sardinia ...	—	—	1730
Victor Emmanuel	—	—	1819

Several dethroned without even the mocking show of abdication, like Edward II. of England (1327); Henry VI. of England (1471); &c.

Abeceda'rians. Anabaptists who set their faces against all human learning, lest it should impede the progress of the soul in its apprehension of Divine truth. The Catholics at one time opposed all learning except what they called sacred literature, such as the lives of the saints, and other religious books.

Abel'ians or Abelo'nians. A sect of the ancient Christian Church which married, but lived in continence, as they assumed Abel did (4th cent.).

Abenzerraghes. A wealthy and powerful family of Spanish Moors, descended from Yusef ben-Zerragh. The word divided is A-ben-Zerragh[es], and is pronounced Ah'-ven-zerark'-ey. Their struggles with the family of Zegris, and destruction in the palace of the Alhambra, in Granada (fifteenth century), have furnished the subject of a charming Spanish romance, 'The History of the Civil Wars of Granada.' Chateaubriand made it the subject of his 'Adventures of the Last Abenzerraghe,' and it furnishes the text of one of Cherubini's operas. The feud began 1474.

Often written Abencerrages.

Ab'erdeen' (University of), 1500; founded by James IV. It was originally founded in 1494, by W. Elphinstone, bishop of Aberdeen, and called King's College. In 1858 Marischal College (q.v.) was united to the University of Aberdeen. (21, 22 Vict. c. 83).

Aberdeen man's privilege (An). To alter or change one's mind on second thoughts.

These good folks, Alan, make no allowance for what your good father calls the Aberdeen man's privilege, of 'taking his word again,' or what the wise call 'second thoughts.'—Sir W. Scott, Red-gauntlet, Letter 7.

Ab'garus, king of Edessa (A.D. 13–50). Is said by Eusebius to have written a letter to Christ asking Him to cure his disease, pronounced by his physicians to be incurable. Christ replied, after His ascension, that one of His disciples should be sent to effect the cure. Thaddeus was the apostle selected, and Abgărus was restored to perfect health. Of course this is only tradition. (Euseb. i. 13.)

Abhorrers. A political party in England, in the winter 1679–1680. They looked with 'abhorrence' on Lord Shaftesbury's proposal to set aside not only James, who was a Roman Catholic, but also his daughter Mary, who was a Protestant, married to the Prince of Orange. See 'Petitioners,' &c.

Macaulay says, they were a church and state party which declared their abhorrence of those who sought to dictate to the king (Charles II.) as to the routine of the new parliament in 1680.

Ab'igail (An). A woman of low degree and intriguing character, so called from Abigail Hill, a niece of Sarah, Duchess of Marlborough, introduced into the court of Queen Anne as a bedchamber woman. Abigail took the fancy of the queen, became prime favourite, and ousted the duchess from her high position in 1707. Harley was Abigail's uncle, as the duchess was her aunt, and Abigail had been privately married to Mr. Masham, groom of the bedchamber of George, prince of Denmark, the queen's consort. (See 1 Sam. xxv. 3).

Her (the Duchess of Marlborough) indignant mind instantly attributed this concession to the contrary advice of the queen's Abigail, and . . . she broke loose on Anne without regard to the presence of the public.—Howitt, Hist. of Eng. (Anne, 261).

Ab'igail Earwig (Mrs.). Mrs. Masham, the favourite of Queen Anne, on the downfall of the Duchess of Marlborough.

Abingdon Hospital, 1689; founded by John Mason of Abingdon, for the infirm, aged, and indigent.

Abingdon Law. First hang the offender, then try him. So called from Major Brown of Abingdon, an officer in the parliamentary army.

Abjuration Bill (The), 1690. A bill which required of everyone who took any public office or trust to swear by oath to recognise the right of the reigning sovereign to the crown under the Act of Settlement, promising to disclose any traitorous conspiracy, and abjuring the right of the Pretender. Enforced 1701, altered in the reigns of Anne, George I., and George III.; and repealed in 1858.

Abjuration Oath (The). Formerly there were three oaths required of all persons before admission to any public office, viz. The Oath of Allegiance, The Oath of Supremacy, and The Abjuration Oath. The Abjuration Oath is that no foreign prince, state, or potentate, hath or ought to have any jurisdiction, power, superiority, or authority, ecclesiastical or civil, within the British realm. Enforced by Act 13 Will. III. c. 6 (1701). The three oaths amalgamated into a declaration by Act 21, 22 Vict. c. 48 (July 18, 1858).

Abjuration of Henri IV., 1593. The renunciation of Protestantism by Henri IV., for the purpose of securing the crown of France, and putting an end to civil war.

Abo. I. (Peace of), 17, 18 Aug., 1743, between Sweden and Russia, effected by the mediation of England.

II. (The Treaty of), 28 Aug., 1812, between Bernadotte, king of Sweden, and Alexander, the czar of Russia; effected by a personal conference of the two sovereigns.

Abraham's Call. His first call was out of Haran, which, according to Clinton, was in the autumn B.C. 2093. His second call was 4 May, B.C. 2055 (Gen. xii. 1). The reason why Abraham was called by God to leave Chaldea was because that country was greatly polluted with idolatry, which was less prevalent at the time in Egypt. See 'Era of Abraham.'

Abrahamites (4 syl.). I. A sect which, in the 9th cent., sprang up in the East, and revived at Antioch the tenets of the Paulicians. The founder was Ibraim or Abraham of Antioch. Cyriacus opposed the heretics while Charlemagne was in power.

Pronounce A'-bram-mites.

II. Bohemian deists (1782), who professed to be followers of John Huss, but reduced their religion to what they supposed was that of Abraham before his circumcision. The only part of the Bible which they retained was the Lord's Prayer. They were banished from Bohemia in 1783, and were scattered abroad in various parts of Hungary, Transylvania, and Slavonia. See above.

Abraham-men. A class of sturdy beggars who simulated lunacy, and wandered about the country extorting money by working on the compassion or fears of those who passed by. A 'Tom o' Bedlam' was an Abraham-man or 'Abram Cove.' So called from the Abraham ward in the Bethlehem Hospital.

Pronounce A'-brum-men.

Abrantes (Treaty of), 6 June, 1801, between Spain and Portugal. Signed at Abrantes, Estremadura, in Portugal.

Absolute Loyalists. In the middle of the 17th cent. meant the friends and followers of the Duke of Montrose. The Engagers (q.v.) and the Whiggamors (q.v) were also in a measure supporters of the king; but there was no possibility of united action between them, and they only weakened the royal cause.

Absolute Wisdom, 1821. Alderman Wood was so called. He was a staunch supporter of Queen Caroline, and being charged with having ill-advised the queen, he admitted that his advice might not be 'absolute wisdom,' and he was jocularly called 'Absolute Wisdom Wood.'

Absolution Thursday. In French 'Jeudi Absolu,' the day before Good Friday, when the priest recites the seven penitential psalms, gives a sermon, and then pronounces the 'Misereatur' and the 'Indulgentiam.'

Absolutists (The), 1819. The monarchical party of Spain, opposed to the radical 'Exaltados' (q.v.). They wished to restore the absolute power of the king, and consisted of the nobility in general, the clergy, and, what seems somewhat inconsistent, the lower orders. Of course the Absolutists wanted to abrogate the Constitution of 1812.

Abstainers. Teetotalers, or those who abstain from alcoholic drinks. Abstinence societies are now generally called temperance societies. Established in America, at Boston, in 1826; in London (The British and Foreign Temperance Society) 1831; the National, in London, 1842.

Abyssin'ian War (The). Between the British and Theodore, king of Abyssinia. This expedition (for the release of missionaries, Capt. Crawford and others) was under Sir R. Napier, who joined the army at Senafé, Jan. 1868. Col. Phayre defeated Theodore at Magdala 10 April, which was bombarded and taken on 13 April. The return of the British army commenced 18 April, 1868.

Academic School of Philosophers (The). Founded by Plato the Athenian (B.C. 429–347), who taught in the Academy, a garden about a quarter of a mile from the city, in the north-western suburb. It belonged originally to Acadēmos, and was adorned by Cimon, son of Miltiādēs, the great general. Plato's disciples were called the Academ'ics, or Garden sect. Plato was the disciple of Socrătēs.

Academ'ics (The). One of the Grecian sects in the early ages of Christianity. They maintained the total uncertainty of all sensuous impressions, and, therefore, the impossibility of man's knowing anything for certain. They doubted the existence of a God, they doubted the immortality of the soul, and doubted whether virtue was better than vice, or vice better than virtue.

Academy (The). A London weekly journal, chiefly of reviews, commenced 9 Oct., 1869.

Ac'amoth Plero'ma. With the ancient Gnostics, plerōma meant the fulness of knowledge, and acamoth, inferior wisdom.

Accord' (The). So the Treaty of Edinburgh is called. This treaty was between Queen Elizabeth and the Scots for the evacuation of Scotland by the French; concluded 6 July, 1560.

Accusative (The). John Calvin was so called by his companions (1509–1564). Also 'The pope of Geneva.'

Acemetes (The), or 'Accœmeti' (i.e. Watchers), 5th cent. A religious order founded by St. Alexander, an Asiatic (died 430). So called because one of them was always to be on the 'watch.' That is, one of the three classes was to be in rotation performing service all day and all night (Greek, a-koimētos, sleepless).

Pronounce As-se-me'-tees.

Aceph'ali (The), 482. A faction among the Eutychians—heretics who denied the true manhood of Christ. Their founder was Peter Mongus, bishop of Alexandria, who renounced his error, and then his followers were 'without a head' (Greek, a-kephalē, headless). They were reconciled by Mark I. in 799.

Subsequently those Christians who belonged to no special church, and acknowledged no ordained chief, like the Vaudois, were called Acephali (men without a head to their church).

Pronounce A-sef'-fa-le (see below).

Acephalites (The). Certain levellers in the reign of Henry I., who acknowledged no leader (see above).

Pronounce A-sef'-fa-lites.

Achæ'an League (The). A confederacy of the twelve towns of Achæa. It was dissolved by Alexander the Great, but reorganised B.C. 280, and again dissolved B.C. 147. The second of these leagues, founded at Megalopŏlis, contained all the chief cities of Peloponnesus. It contended with the Macedonians and the Romans for the liberty of Greece; but, being beaten at Scarphēa by Metellus, and at Leucopetra by Mummius, it caved in soon after the taking of Corinth.

The twelve cities of Achæa, in Ionia, were founded by the Heraclidæ.

Achæ'an War (The). Roman ambassadors at Corinth enjoin the dismemberment of the Achæan League and are insulted (B.C. 147). Kritolāos, general of the league, at once besieged Heraclein (B.C. 146), but was defeated at Scarphēa by Metellus, and slew himself. Diæos, successor of Kritolaos, was defeated at Leucopētra by Mummius (B.C. 146); Corinth was then destroyed; and all Greece was erected into a Roman province, Sept. 146.

Achæmenides (The), also called Kai-anians, the sixth dynasty of Persia. The first four were fabulous, the fifth or Pishdadian dynasty was mythic, the sixth is semi-historic. It gave fourteen sovereigns, and lasted 329 years (B.C. 660–331), when Persia fell under the Greeks. Seat of government Ispahan.

Kai-anians. Kai (mighty) called by the Greeks Kur[os], and by the Latins Cyr·us, grandson of Achæmenēs. The founder was Kai-Kobad or Cyrus I.

Pronounce Ak-ke-men'-e-deez.

Achilles (The English). John Talbot, first Earl of Shrewsbury, 1373–1453.

The Duke of Wellington is represented by a statue of Achilles of gigantic size once in Hyde Park, London, close to Apsley House (1769–1852).

Achilles (The Second). Dentātus, the Roman tribune. It is said that he slew at different times 300 of the enemy; and when treacherously set upon by twenty-five of his countrymen, although, at the time, he was more than sixty years of age, he killed fourteen of them before he was slain.

Achilles of Germany (The). Albrecht, elector of Brandenburg (1470–1487), was called the Achilles and also the Ulysses of Germany. He was the third son of Friedrich I., elector of Brandenburg.

Achilles of Rome (The). Sicinius Dentātus (put to death B.C. 450).

Achiropoetos. A picture of Christ and the Virgin made without human hands, i.e. miraculously (Greek, a-cheiro-poiētos). One of the best known is the picture of Christ preserved in the church of St. John of Lateran, at Rome. This picture is said to have been begun by St. Luke, and finished by angels; a Catholic tradition.

Pronounce A-kī'-ro-po-e'-tos.

Acil'ian Law (The). I. B.C. 197, by C. Acilius, tribune of the people, about planting colonies on the coast.

II. B.C. 101, by the tribune M. Acilius Glabrio, respecting extortion.

Acolytes. Their original duties were to help the deacons or sub-deacons at the altar service, to prepare the wine and water for the communion, to light the lamps, to hold the candles, and to carry from place to place the consecrated elements. The word meant followers or attendants. These duties are now for the most part assigned to the sacristans.

Acre-fight (An). A sort of duel by single combatants (English and Scotch) between the frontiers of the two kingdoms. (Cowell, 'Institutiones &c.')

Act for Uniformity (The), 1549 (2, 3 Edw. VI. c. 1), meaning 'uniformity of public worship.' It commanded the adoption of the new Liturgy throughout the kingdom, in place of the Latin Mass Book. Those who neglected to comply were liable to imprisonment for six months for the first offence, loss of their benefices for the second offence, and imprisonment for life for the third offence.

Other Acts of Uniformity are 5, 6 Edw. VI. c. 1; 1 Eliz. c. 2; 13, 14 Car. II. c. 4.

Act in pais. A thing done out of court, and not a matter of record. (Pais is the French word 'pays,' meaning in old law où l'on suit le droit.)

Act of Cura'tory (in Scotch law). Extracted by the clerk upon anyone's acceptance of being curator.

Act of Explanation (The), 1664. For the removal or modification of some of the most obnoxious clauses of the Act of Settlement in Ireland (q.v.). See 'Magna Charta of the Protestants of Ireland.'

Act of Grace (The), 1696. Provides maintenance for debtors imprisoned by their creditors (Scotch law).

In England it is usually applied to insolvent acts and general pardons at the beginning of a new reign, or on some very special occasion.

Act of Oblivion (The). I. In 1653 procured by Cromwell himself, abolishing the memory of all offences committed before the battle of Worcester. This act relieved the minds of royalists from the fear of further forfeitures. After the conspiracies of 1654 all who had ever borne arms for the king were decimated —that is, were fined one-tenth of all the estates then in their possession the fine to be spent in recouping the state the expenses it had been put to by the royalist rebellions.

II. In 1660 (12 Car. II. c. 11). Indemnity for treason and state offences committed between 1 January, 1637, and 24 June, 1660.

Act of Safety (The), 1789, in Swedish history. When Gustavus III. was abandoned by his nobles and chief military officers, he threw in his lot with the other three orders. These orders passed the Act of Safety, which conferred on the King of Sweden the same powers which are enjoyed by the English crown, viz. that of making peace and war. At the same time they granted him liberal supplies, and raised the army to 50,000 men.

Act of Security (The), 1704. Passed by the Scotch parliament in the reign of Queen Anne, to the effect that 'unless a satisfactory settlement of the rights, liberties, and independence of Scotland should be obtained in the course of the present reign, the Scotch parliament would, on the queen's decease, meet and name a successor different from the person who succeeded to the English throne.' This led to the Act of National Union, which was ultimately carried 16 Jan., 1707. The first united parliament 23 Oct., 1707.

Act of Separation (The), 1843. A voluntary resignation of livings and professorships signed by 470 of the Scotch presbyters, who protested against any interference with the free choice of ministers by their respective congregations. See 'Free Church of Scotland.'

Act of Settlement (The). I. In 1653 an Act for the settlement of Irish confiscated estates. All Irish landowners charged with participation in the massacre of 1641 (q.v.) were absolutely deprived of all their lands. Those who had taken part with Charles in the civil war were deprived of two-thirds of their estates. The rest was partitioned among three classes of claimants, viz. the soldiers who had been in service before Cromwell arrived—the adventurers who had advanced money on the understanding that they were to be repaid in Irish land—and Cromwell's own army. A portion of Wicklow and its vicinity was assigned to the first of these, nine counties were divided between the other two classes of claimants. Connaught was reserved for the Irish. The counties of Dublin, Kildare, Carlow, and Cork, with the lands of bishops, deans, and chapters, were kept at the disposal of parliament. One county was set aside for Cromwell himself.

II. In 1662 passed by the Irish parliament. First, all the confiscated lands of Ireland were vested in the hands of King Charles II., and were then confirmed to the adventurers and soldiers to whom they had been granted. All officers in the king's service before 1649 were to receive their arrears in land at the rate of 12*s.* 6*d.* in the pound. Protestants and innocent Papists, whose estates had been given to adventurers, were to have those estates restored, and the present holders were to be granted lands elsewhere of equal value. Those who had joined the king in exile were in like manner to be restored to their estates, and the present holders were to be 'reprised' by other holdings. See 'Settlement, Act of.'

When James II. landed in Ireland, one of his first acts was to abolish this Act of Settlement so as to displace the Protestant holders in favour of the Catholic claimants, 1689.

Act of Succession (The). I. A.D. 1534 (25 Hen. VIII. c. 22), ordaining that the succession should descend with the issue of Anne Boleyn; thus setting aside Mary, the daughter of Katharine.

II. In 1537 (28 Hen. VIII. c. 7), by which both the preceding marriages of the king were declared void, and both Mary and Elizabeth were illegitimatised, the succession being fixed on the issue of Jane Seymour.

III. In 1701, whereby it was enacted that no Catholic should reign in England; and the succession was settled in the House of Hanover.

Act of Uniformity (The), 1661. An Act passed in the reign of Charles II. obliging all clergymen to subscribe to the Thirty-nine Articles, in order to secure uniformity of doctrine and discipline in the national religion. Upwards of 2,000 persons who had been ministers during the Commonwealth refused to subscribe, and either threw up their 'livings' or were ejected from them.

Act of Union (The), 1648. French history. An agreement of all the parlements of France to stand fast by each other, and not suffer one parlement to be favoured more than the others. This Act was made by the lawyers because Mazarin had proposed to keep back, for four years, the salaries of all the parlements except that of Paris. The object of Mazarin was to sow discord among the lawyers and then strip them of their prerogatives. This Act and the 'Arrêt' (q.v.) led to the Fronde war.

Act of 1870 (The). On the education of the children of the labouring classes. This was the first legislative provision for public elementary education in England and Wales. The Act of 1876 made it compulsory for every child to receive elementary education.

Acts of 1848 (The). In Hungarian history. The Acts passed into law the Hungarian ideas of liberty, fraternity, and equality. They passed the Diet without opposition, and were proclaimed at Presburg, April 11, amidst the wildest enthusiasm, in the presence of Kaiser Ferdinand V.

By these laws the privileges of the nobility were abolished, the soil was declared free, the right of free worship was accorded to all, liberty of the press was granted, and Transylvania was declared a part of the mother-country.

Acts and Opponencies abolished in the University of Cambridge, 1839. They used to be held in Latin, and in syllogistic form. A proposition was stated, as a major premise; a minor was added; and an inference drawn. The respondent denied one of the three. The opponent supported his proposition, which was again denied. This went on, say five times, and then the respondent stated the reasons of his denial. If satisfactory, the moderator complimented him with 'bene disputasti,' or 'optime disputasti,' or 'optime quidem disputasti.' If he argued badly or failed altogether, the moderator said 'descendas,' and no degree was conferred on him.

Acts of the Apostles. A book of the New Testament containing a record of what was done by the apostles between the ascension of Christ and the first imprisonment at Rome of the apostle Paul. A part of it is supposed to have been written by Luke, the evangelist, and all of it to have been edited by him. Rosenmüller says it was written about A.D. 65.

Acts of the Lords of the Council. Acts of committees of the Privy Council. If the sovereign is present the acts are called 'Orders in Council.'

Acta, in ancient Rome, were public registers kept by actuaries. In these registers were officially entered the acts of the public assemblies; the acts of the senate; the judgments of the law courts; the births, deaths, marriages, and divorces. Each register had its distinctive name, as Acta Populi, Acta Senatus, Acta Urbāna, and so on.

Acta Diur'na. A gazette published daily in ancient Rome, both under the republic and the empire, containing an abstract of the proceedings of public assemblies and law courts, the punishment of offenders, public works, births, deaths, and marriages, and so on. Julius Cæsar, B.C. 59, had the proceedings of the senate published in the Acta Diurna, but Augustus repealed this rule. It was not finally discontinued till A.D. 328. The 'Blue Book' of old Rome has been appealed to by historians as of the highest authority (Suetonius, In Cæsarem, XX.).

Acta Pilati. An apocryphal report of the crucifixion, said to have been sent by Pilate to Tiberius. See 'Forgeries.'

Acta Sancto'rum. Many folio vols., containing, in Latin, the lives of Christian saints, and based on the Acta Sincēra of Héribert Rosweyde, on which he had laboured for twenty years. He died 1629, before it was printed. Father John Bolland (1596–1665) was entrusted with Rosweyde's collection, and associated with himself ten others, who brought down the work to 1753, in 32 folio vols. This ended series 1.

In 1789 John Limpen and six others carried the work down to 1782, closing series 2.

A 3rd series was begun after the dispersion of the Jesuits, and five new vols. were added by John Baptist Fonson with four assistants, bringing down the hagiography to the year 1826, and completing the 53rd vol.

In 1837 a new society of Bollandists was organised under the sanction of the Belgian government, who brought the work down to 1855. In 1875 the 61st vol. was published and others have been added since.

There is a French hagiography, called Les Petits Bollandistes, in 17 large octavos, edited by Mgr. Paul Guérin, chamberlain to Leo XIII. The 7th edition was published in 1880. This compilation contains hundreds of lives not in the Latin books.

Acte Additionnel. See 'Additional Act,' 1815.

Pronounce Act Ad-dis'-se-o-nel.

Acte Constitutionnel (L'), June 24, 1793. Presented to the French nation by the Convention, and based on the 'sovereignty of the people and indivisibility of the Republic.'

Pronounce Act Con-sti-tu'-se-o-nel.

Ac'tiac War (The). This arose out of the rupture between Octavian and Antony, two of the Triumvirs (B.C. 33). Octavian declared war against Cleopatra, queen of Egypt, and defeated Antony at Actium, 2 Sept., B.C. 31. Both Cleopatra and Antony killed themselves. Alexandria was taken by Octavian Aug. 30 (B.C. 33), and Egypt was made a Roman province B.C. 30.

Ac'tian Years. Years in which the games at Actium were celebrated. These games were held by the Romans once in five years, and were instituted B.C. 30 by Augustus.

Actiat'ic Era (The). This era begins from the battle of Actium, between Antony and Octavianus. The defeat of Antony made Octavian master of the Roman empire, 2 Sept., B.C. 31.

The era of Augustus was later by four years than the Actiatic era. It began B.C. 27.

Acton Burnel (The Statute of), 12 Oct., 1283. So called from the place of its enactment. It gave creditors their remedy by what is called 'Statute-merchant,' i.e. a bond of record under the hand and seal of the debtor, authenticated by the king's seal. If the debtor failed to pay on the date assigned, execution was summarily awarded. This was called Pocket Judgment (2 Edw. I.).

The Statute of Acton Burnel is sometimes called the Statute of Merchants (Statutum Mercatorum).

Adaman'tius. So Origen was called on account of his great perseverance and persistency (185–253).

Ad'amites (8 syl.), or Adam'ians. A fanatical sect of the second century, which wanted to revert to the life of Adam and Eve before the Fall. They rejected marriage and went about naked.

Ad'amites (The), or 'Brethren of the Free Spirit,' 15th and 16th cent. A religious sect that imitated Adam's nakedness before the fall, asserting that their redemption by Christ had restored their innocence. They met together quite naked to pray and preach, both men and women. This sect was propagated at Antwerp by one Tandemi, who drew after him 3000 followers; and in Bohemia by one Picard (St. Augustine, De Hæres. et Isidor. book viii. c. 5).

In Notes and Queries, Jan. 10, 1885, is given an extract of a Camisard prophetess, who, on Nov. 16 (no year stated, but about 1707), did strip quite naked, and after the ceremony of the mass, ran to the High Altar of Lincoln's Inn Fields, and in 'several strange and indecent postures . . . did hold forth in a powerful manner,' for about a quarter of an hour.

Adams Prize (The). For pure mathematics, astronomy, &c. Value 80*l.*; for any graduate of the University of Cambridge; awarded every two years. Founded from a fund raised by members of St. John's College in honour of Mr. Adams, who first discovered the planet Neptune, in 1848. See 'Regius Professor of Divinity.'

Ad'amus Magis'ter, Adam of Bremen, died 1076. He wrote a 'History of the Churches of Hamburg and Bremen' (from 788 to 1072).

Addenbrooke's Hospital. 120 beds and a children's ward. Founded, in Cambridge, by John Addenbrooke, M.D., fellow of Catharine Hall, 1766, and further endowed in 1813.

Addison (The American), Joseph Dennie (1768–1812).

Addison (The Spanish), Benedict Jerome Feyjoo (1701–1764).

Addison of the North, Henry Mackenzie, author of the 'Man of Feeling' (1745–1831).

Addison's Disease. A bronzing of the skin which goes on till the patient assumes the appearance of a mulatto. It was first described by Dr. Thomas Addison of Guy's Hospital.

Additional Act (An), 1815. So Napoleon called his new constitution, granting freedom of election for the representatives, who were to be elected every five years, and to be paid stipends: it also provided for juries, for the right of petition, for freedom of worship, and for the inviolability of property.

Published April 25, 1815, and accepted at the Champ de Mai, May 31, 1815.

Addle Parliament (The). 5 April to 7 June, 1614. So called because it displayed a great spirit, pregnant with most momentous consequences, but did not pass one single bill. Its eggs were addled and produced no living creature. See 'Parliament.'

It remonstrated, for example, with the king (James I.) on his levying 'benevolences,' but passed no act to restrain or prevent the imposition in future.

Addressers, 1759. A knot of Irish commercial men who addressed the British Government for Catholic relief. The 'Address' was drawn up by Charles O'Conor, signed by 400 citizens of Dublin, and presented to the Speaker. The Speaker took the Address in silence, and the deputation retired. The Viceroy published it in the Dublin Gazette, the deputation was sent for again, and the Speaker thanked them for their Address. This being the first recognition of the Catholics, forms a political epoch in the history of Ireland.

In 1760 the Catholics drew up an 'Address' to King George III on his accession to the crown, praying for Catholic relief; and in 1793 the Catholic Relief Bill received the royal assent.

Adelantados Mayores, 1230. A new order of nobility created by Fernando III. of Castile and Leon, for the provinces of Spain, instead of counts and governors.

Pronounce Ad'-e-lan-tah'-dose May-or'-ress.

Adel'phi (The). A secret society of Piedmont, sprung out of the Carbonari, after the unsuccessful outbreak of 24 June, 1817.

Adiaphoristic Controversy (The), 1548. By what is called the 'Interim' (q.v.), Karl V. allowed the cup to the laity, and the clergy to marry. The Protestant party called a conference at Leipsic to consider this concession, and voted that it might serve its purpose in things indifferent, but did not touch upon points which were really essential. This decision caused a split in the Lutheran party, and the disputation which ensued between them was called the Adiaphoristic Controversy, or the controversy upon what the Leipsic conference called matters of indifference or of no moment. Vestments formed part of the controversy, and the famous Hooper lifted up his voice against 'Aaronical habits.'

Greek, adiaphoros, indifferent.

Ad'jutant-General. A military officer on the staff of the commander-in-chief, charged with all matters relating to the discipline and drill of the army.

Adju'tators, or 'Council of Adjutators,' 28 April, 1647. Two delegates from each of the eleven parliamentary regiments, summoned to a meeting at Triploe Heath, in lieu of the Council of Officers. This Council of Adjutators settled all questions of pay, disbanding, officers, and so on. It was also called the 'Council of Assistors;' and after their petition to Parliament (soon after the battle of Naseby), that Cromwell and his army should not be sent to Ireland, the Presbyterians called them the 'Council of Agitators,' which name they readily adopted. Charles I. addressed Cornet Joyce as 'Mr. Agitator Joyce,' when he came to remove him (the king) from Holmby House.

Ad'mirable (The), James Crichton, a Scotchman (1561–1582).

Admirable Doctor (The), or 'The Wonderful Doctor,' Roger Bacon, frequently called 'Friar Bacon,' born near Ilchester, in Somersetshire. He was a Franciscan, and one of the most learned men that ever lived. So great his knowledge, so numerous his discoveries, so wonderful his philosophical experiments, that he was condemned for necromancy by the Franciscan Council of Paris during his sojourn in France, and Pope Nicholas IV. commanded that he should be imprisoned. He was accordingly incarcerated at Paris from 1278 to 1289. Being released he returned to Oxford, where he died. (1214–1294.)

He has left several works behind him, which show a considerable acquaintance with the laws of mechanics, statics, optics, and the chemical properties of bodies. He was a good mathematician, and knew both Greek and Hebrew.

Admiral. The title of the highest class of British naval officer. Called a 'flag officer' from being entitled to fly a flag when in command of a squadron. Admirals formerly were distinguished by the colour of their flag, whether red, white, or blue, but these distinctions were abolished in 1864, and the ensign of all admirals is now white. There are, however, three grades, called admiral, vice-admiral, and rear-admiral. Admirals and vice-admirals must retire at the age of 65, and rear-admirals at 60.

The retiring pay of an admiral is 850*l.* per annum (30 years' service); half pay, 2*l.* 2*s.* a day.
The retiring pay of a vice-admiral is 725*l.* per annum (29 years' service); half pay, 1*l.* 12*s.* 6*d.* a day.
The retiring pay of a rear-admiral is 600*l.* per annum (27 years' service); half pay 1*l.* 5*s.* a day.
N.B.—Admirals of the fleet retire at the age of 70, and their half pay is 3*l.* 7*s.* a day.

Admiralty Court (The), or 'High Court of Admiralty.' Erected by Edward III. about 1350. Held before the Lord High Admiral or his deputy. There used to be two courts, viz., the Instance Court, and the Prize Court. The former was a municipal tribunal for the determination of private injuries or private rights arising at sea, or intimately connected with maritime subjects. The latter decided all matters of capture, prizes, reprisals, and so on, which were all submitted to the Admiralty laws and the law of nations. The prize court was virtually abolished by 3, 4 Vict. c. 65, s. 22 (1840), and great changes were made in 1861 and 1875.

Admiralty Droits. Derelict ships and other property picked up at sea by British vessels, if not claimed. These perquisites were formerly claimed by the Lord High Admiral; but by the Merchant Shipping Act (1854) are now placed under the control of the Board of Trade, by which all the proceeds are now paid into the public exchequer.

Seizures of property belonging to an enemy in time of war are deemed droits of Admiralty.

Admiralty Office (The), 1512. Instituted by Henry VIII.; business regulated by 2 Will. IV. c. 40 (1832).

Admonition of Parliament (The), or 'The Admonition to the Parliament,' 1571, by certain puritans in the reign of Queen Elizabeth, condemning everything in the Church of England not in accordance with Calvinism. This admonition condemned every rite and ceremony not expressly commanded in Scripture, and set at naught all general rules and church canons.

The two fundamental principles of the Admonition were these: (1) We ought to have the same kind of church government as that of the Apostolic times, to be gathered from Scripture, and Scripture only. (2) Nothing used in the Church of Rome may in any wise be continued. Wilcox and Field, the supposed authors, were imprisoned. A second Admonition by Carter called forth a reply by Archbishop Whitgift.

Admonitionists (The), 1571. Certain puritans in the reign of Queen Elizabeth, authors of the 'Admonition of Parliament' (q.v.).

Pronounce Ad-mo-nish'-shun-ists.

Adop'tian Controversy (The). A controversy which arose in Spain in the 8th cent., whether Jesus Christ was the Son of God by generation, or by adoption only. Elipand archbishop of Toledo, and Felix bishop of Urgel, maintained that Jesus Christ had two distinct natures, one divine and the other human. In his divine nature he is the Son of God by generation, the 'only begotten of the Father;' but in his human nature he is the Son of God by adoption only (Rom. viii. 29). Alcuin took the orthodox side. Two synods were convened on the subject: one at Ratisbon in 792, and the other at Frankfort in 794, in which Adoptianism was pronounced heretical. Duns Scotus and Durandus were Adoptianists.

Adop'tianists (The). 'Adoptians,' or 'Adoptiani,' 8th cent. Spanish heretics who maintained that Christ was the Son of God only by adoption. This heresy was condemned at the Synod held at Frankfort in A.D. 794.

Ador'ni and Frego'si Contests (The). In Genoa, 1360–1527, contests between the two powerful families of Gabriele Adorno and Domenico da Fregoso, who contended for the chief magistracy. Adorno was appointed doge and deposed, then Fregoso was appointed doge and deposed, and so it went on till 12 Sept. 1527, when Andrea Doria gave Genoa a new constitution.

Adrianites (4 syl.). Followers of Adrian Hamstedius (16th cent.). They held that the body of Christ was formed entirely of the substance of the Virgin mother.

The followers of Simon Magus are also called Adrianites.

Pronounce A'-dre-an-ites.

Adrianople, Peace of (The), Sept. 14, 1829. A treaty between Russia and Turkey. The war preceding this treaty was the most disastrous in which Turkey had ever been engaged, and the treaty added large territories to Russia. It acquired Anãpa and Poti, with a considerable extent of coast on the Black Sea, a portion of the pashalik of Akhilska, with the two fortresses of Akhilska and Akhilkillak, and in many other ways greatly weakened Turkey. As Lord Aberdeen said in his despatch, it gave Russia the control of Asia Minor, and the keys to the Persian and Turkish provinces whenever she may choose to extend her conquests to Teheran (Ta-rain) or to Constantinople.

Advent Sundays. Instituted 567, by the Council of Tours, to commemorate the four Advents of Christ—

1. His advent to Bethlehem, where He was born.
2. His advent to Jerusalem, where He was crucified.
3. His advent into man's heart when he believes and receives Him as a Saviour.
4. His advent in the clouds when He comes to judge the world. See 'Sundays.'

Adventure Bay (S.E. of Tasmania). So called by Captain Furneaux, from the ship Adventure in which he sailed, 1773.

Adventurers. I. 1641–1650, persons who had adventured money for the reduction of Ireland during the rebellion. Those who adventured 200*l.* were to have 1,000 acres in Ulster. Those who adventured 300*l.* were to have 1,000 acres in Connaught. Those who subscribed 450*l.* were to have 1,000 acres in Munster, and those who subscribed 600*l.* were to have 1,000 acres in Leinster.

II. 1652, those soldiers who had served in Ireland since the landing of Cromwell in 1649, and were entitled to a share of the lands in lieu of their arrears of pay.

Adversity Hume. Joseph Hume, M.P. (1777–1855). So called because he was for ever presaging the ruin of Great Britain. 'Prosperity' Robinson, M.P., just before the commercial crisis of 1825, boasted that the country was never in a more prosperous condition. Cobbett gave Robinson his sobriquet, and that of Hume followed naturally.

Advocate (Lord). About 1500, the principal public prosecutor in Scotland. He is assisted by a solicitor-general and four junior counsel (termed 'advocates depute'). Virtually he is secretary of state for Scotland.

Pronounce Ad'-vo-kate.

Advocates' Library (The), Edinburgh, 1682. By the copyright law of 1709 it obtained the privilege of receiving gratuitously a copy of every new book. This magnificent library belongs to the Faculty of Advocates (q.v.), and was established by Sir George Mackenzie.

It contains about 170,000 books, and of course the number increases every year.

Advoca'tus Diab'oli. One appointed to advance every conceivable reason why a person whose name is submitted for canonisation should not be admitted into the calendar of the saints.

Advowson ('Advocatio'). The right of presentation to a living. Advowsons were originally vested in those laymen who were founders or benefactors of livings; but at the dissolution of the monasteries in the reign of Henry VIII. livings were given to laymen who took the tithes and appointed vicars to represent the patrons. These vicars were paid stipends, generally 'the small tithes.' By sales the right of presentation to livings has passed into private hands.

Ægine'tan Standard (The). That is, the standard of weights and measures used in the island of Ægina, and introduced into Greece by Periander of Corinth (B.C. 665, 625–585).

A, E, I, O, U. The five vowels, adopted by Friedrich III., second of the Habsburg dynasty, for the imperial device: Austria Est Imperare Orbi Universo (or Imperatura). In German: Alles Erdreich Ist Oesterreich Unterthan.

In 1866, after the seven-weeks' war with Prussia, Austria was denuded of Germany, and in 1870 the king of Prussia became the emperor of Germany. Then the famous anagram might have been inscribed on the conqueror's banners, Austria's Empire Is Overthrown Utterly.

Æ'lian and Fuf'ian Law (The), B.C. 156, in ancient Rome, empowering magistrates to prevent or dissolve comitia when the auspices were unpropitious.

Æ'lian Sen'tian Law (The), B.C. 8, regulating the manumission of slaves.

Æmil'ian Laws (The). These were (1) the law by Mamercus Æmilius, dictator of Rome, to shorten the censors' term of office, B.C. 434.

And (2) the sumptuary laws of Marcus Æmilius (Scaurus), relative to the kind and quantity of food to be set on table at entertainments, B.C. 115.

Æmil'ian Road (The), between Bononia (Bologna) and Placentia; made by Marcus Æmilius Lepidus, the consul, B.C. 187. It was a continuation of the Flaminian Way.

Æolian Poets. See 'Lesbian Poets.'

Æo'lians (The) had for their possession the plain land of Thessaly, with Phocis, Bœotia, part of Peloponnesus (i.e. Arcadia and the parts near), and their colony in Asia Minor.

In Asia Minor they founded Lesbos, Smyrna, and Ellis.

Æol'ic Migration (The). In the mythic period of Greek history. According to mythic history, Æŏlos was the eldest son of Hellen and grandson of Deucălion. He spread his ancestral name through the greater part of northern Greece and along the western coast of the peninsula. In the 11th cent. B.C. some of them migrated to Asia Minor, where they founded, on the north-west coast, above thirty cities. They were ultimately absorbed in the Roman Empire.

Æra or A.E.R.A, Annus Erat (or Est) Regni Augusti. The Spaniards began their dates from the advent of the reign of Augustus, the Roman Emperor. See 'Era.'

Ae'rians or 'Aeria'ni.' A religious sect, founded by Aërius, a priest, in the 4th cent. In doctrine they corresponded with the Arians, but they also maintained that all priests are bishops. Their great 'heresy,' however, was forbidding masses for the dead.

Pronounce A-ē-ri-ah'-ne.

Aeroliths or Aerolites.

Pronounce Air'-ro-liths.

B.C. 654, a shower of stones fell on the Alban Mount (Livy).

B.C. 467, a great stone fell at Ægospotămi, on the Hellespont (Parian Chronicle). Pliny says it was about the size of a waggon.

A.D. 1492, Nov. 7, a ponderous stone, weighing 260 lbs., fell from the sky near the town of Ensisheim, in Upper Alsace. A part of it is still preserved in the parish church. The Emperor Maximilian witnessed the fall of this meteor, and had the stone placed in the church to prove that 'God insisted on a crusade against the Turks.'

A.D. 1510 there was a great fall of meteors in Lombardy, some 60 lbs. in weight, and some as much as 120 lbs. They were of a rusty colour.

A.D. 1627, Nov. 27, a stone weighing 59 lbs. fell on Mount Vassier, in Provence. This is attested by Gassendi.

A.D. 1751, May 26. Two masses fell at Agram, in Sclavonia, one weighing 16 lbs. and the other 71 lbs. The analysis of these stones by Klaproth is preserved in the Vienna museum (95 parts are iron, 4 nickel).

A.D. 1803, April 26. A shower of stones fell near L'Aigle. M. Biot was deputed by the French Government to repair to the spot and report on the phenomenon. Between 2,000 and 3,000 stones had fallen, the largest being 17 lbs. in weight.

A.D. 1807, March 13. A stone fell at Smolensk, in Russia, weighing 160 lbs. It was black and shiny.

A.D. 1813, Sept. 10. A stone, weighing 17 lbs., fell in the county of Limerick, at 10 o'clock in the morning.

A.D. 1815, Feb. 15. A stone weighing 26 lbs. fell in the town of Dooralla, in British India. The Indians consecrated it in a temple, and approach it with reverence and clasped hands.

A.D. 1822, June 2, Sunday, 3 o'clock p.m. I myself saw an aërolith fall at Gislingham, Suffolk. It made a deep hole in the earth about 3 yards from a wheat stack. It then bounded off in an opposite direction to the stack and burst. It fell with a tremendous noise, like crashing thunder. I was too young at the time to search for pieces, and not a little terrified. The window I was sitting at was some 20 yards off.

In the Imperial Museum of St. Petersburg is an immense mass. The fall was witnessed by Pallas in Siberia.

The largest aërolith known is one which fell in Brazil. It is estimated to weigh 14,000 lbs.

A.D. 1857. An aërolith fell near St. Joseph, in the West Indies. It weighs 2 tons (i.e. 2,240 lbs.), and buried itself in the earth between 15 and 18 feet.

J. Norman Lockyer says, the number of meteors which fall daily to the earth 'exceeds twenty-one millions.'—Nineteenth Century (Nov. 1889, p. 787).

Æschylos (The French). Prosper de Crébillon (1674–1762), noted for his power in depicting rage and terror. His plays are 'Xerxes,' 'Semiramis,' 'Electra,' 'Pyrrhus,' and 'Catiline.'

Pronounce Esse'-ki-lus.

Ætol'ian Confederacy (The), B.C. 323, called into existence by the Lamian war (q.v.). The states used to assemble annually in the autumn at Thermum, and the assembly was called the Panætolicon. B.C. 189 the Ætolian States were subjected to the Romans.

The object of the Lamian war was (on the death of Alexander the Great) to liberate Greece from Macedonia. The Athenians were the principal insurgents, but were defeated in 322 at Cranon, by Antipater.

Ætol'ian League (The). Ætolia joined the Greek confederates in the Lamian War B.C. 313, but the Ætolian League rose into no great prominence till the Macedonian War (B.C. 214), when Sparta joined it, and it became the antagonist of the Achæan League, which sided with Philip V. of Macedon. It was the unwise policy of the Ætolian League which made Rome master of Greece.

The Ætolian Confederacy included Ætolia, Acarnania, part of Thessaly, Locris, and the island of Cephalonia.

Affshars (The). An eastern tribe known by the celebrated Nadir-shah, who received the crown of Persia on condition that he would compel the people to abandon the doctrines of the Sophi, and receive those of the Sonnee. After a reign of 11 years he was assassinated.

Afghan (Treaty of), 1881. A secret treaty between Russia and the amîr of Afghanistan. Russia on her side engaged to be the perpetual friend of the amîr, to recognise the successor appointed by the amîr, and to assist the amîr against any of his foes, if such assistance was required (the English were meant). The amîr, on his part, engaged not to wage any war without permission from Russia, and to keep Russia well informed of whatever took place within the kingdom of Afghanistan.

Afghan War (The). A diplomatic contest between France and Russia induced Dost Mohammed of Cabul to invite the friendship of Great Britain in 1836. This led to a diplomatic contest between Great Britain and Russia respecting Afghanistan. Dost Mohammed joined Persia, and war was proclaimed against him at Simla by Lord Auckland, governor-general of India, 1 Oct., 1838. Dost Mohammed gave himself up at Cabul to Sir W. MacNaghten, 3 Nov., 1840; but his son Akbar Khan completely outwitted General Elphinstone and the envoy, Sir William MacNaghten, both of whom were treacherously put to death. Negotiations for quitting Cabul were purposely delayed till winter had set in; and then the whole British force, which, with women and children, amounted to 20,000 souls, were as treacherously destroyed in the Khyber Pass, 1842.

No event in British history is more deplorable than this. The total incompetency of such men as General Elphinstone and Sir William MacNaghten so demoralised the soldiers under them, that every Englishman is ashamed of the miserable fiasco in which was not one single redeeming trait. Dost Mohammed and Akbar Khan, no doubt, were villains, but our 'leaders' actually invited treasonable dealings.

African Methodist Episcopal Church (The), 1816, seceded in Philadelphia under Richard Allen. They are coloured Methodists.

African Paris (The). Algiers.

African War (The). The first African war was undertaken by the Romans for the restoration of Hiempsal to the throne of Numantia. Ahenobarbus, the leader of the Marian party in Africa, had dethroned him, but Cneius Pompey slew Ahenobarbus, and restored Hiempsal B.C. 81.

The second African war was between Cæsar and Scipio, B.C. 46. Cæsar defeated the party of Pompey at Thapsus, in Africa, and thus put an end to the civil war.

The third African war was undertaken by the Romans against Tacfarinas, a Numidian, in the reign of Tiberius. Tacfarinas, having collected a large gang of freebooters, defied for some years the Roman arms in Numidia, but was ultimately overthrown and slain by Dolabella, A.D. 17–24.

The fourth African war was between the Romans and Vandals in Africa. The Vandals under Genseric took possession of the Roman dominions in Africa, and continued masters for 105 years (A.D. 429–534). Belisarius was sent into Africa by the emperor Justinian to win back the African dominions, and he utterly overthrew the Vandals, took Carthage in 533, and returned to Rome in triumph in the autumn of the year following, A.D. 534.

Africa'nus. Three of the Scipios were so called from their African conquests: (1) Publius Cornelius Scipio Africanus Major, B.C. 234–183; (2) Publius Cornelius Scipio Africanus, his elder son; and (3) Lucius Cornelius Scipio Africanus, younger brother of No. 2.

Africa'nus (The Arabian). Akbar Khan (7th cent.).

Africa'nus of New Rome (The). Belisarius, Roman general in the reign of Justinian (505–565). He is called 'The Third Africanus.'

If the three Scipios were all called Africanus, Belisarius was the fourth, not the third.

Aftas'ides (3 syl.). A dynasty founded by Abdallah ben al Aftas about 1030; overthrown 26 Feb., 1094.

Agamemnon, Menela'os. Atreus had two sons—Plisthenês and Thyestês. (Thyestês usurped the throne of Argos).

Plisthenês had two sons—Agamemnon and Menelaos.

Agamemnon married Clytemnestra, daughter of Tyndâros.
Menelaos married Helen, sister of Clytemnestra.

The two brothers married two sisters. Both the wives were false. Clytemnestra became the mistress of the regent Ægisthos, and Helen eloped with Paris, son of Priam king of Troy.

Ag'apæ. Originally love feasts, in which contributions for the poor brethren were made. These feasts were held after the communion service. Afterwards, they were degraded into wakes, took the place of the heathen Parentalia, and were held at the tombs of relatives or 'saints.' Great efforts were made to abolish these unseemly gatherings, but they continued even into the 13th cent.

Enjoined by the council of Gangra, A.D. 340; forbidden by the council of Laodicea in 366; by the council of Carthage in 397; by the council of Orleans in 533; and by the council of Aix-la-Chapelle in 816. The last mention of them is in 1250.

Agapem'one (The abode of love), in Somersetshire, 1848. Founded by Henry James Prince and a Mr. Starkey, and hence the members are called Princeites, Starkeyites, and Agapemonians. The object of this abode is perpetual joy. Pain and grief, sorrow and sickness should be banished from the abode. The Princeites are taught perfect resignation, and Prince himself tells us, 'He has no wish, no desire, no will of his own at all.' See 'Princeites.'

Agapemo'nians (The); Agapemo'nianism. The Agapemonians are those who dwell in Agapemonê, and Agapemonianism is their special views, social, moral, and religious.

Agape'tæ, 3rd cent. Certain ascetics who lived together as man and wife, but preserved a life of celibacy. St. Cyprian (200–258) condemned the practice, and the church generally did the same, though several of these Agapetæ are enrolled among the saints, as Cecilia and Valerian, Gombert and Bertha, Injurieux and Scholastica, Jeanne Marie de Maillé and Robert de Sillery, Julian and Basilissa, Thierry and his wife, &c.

Du Cange says (vol. i. p. 129, col. 1): So called, 'quod cum mulieribus ac virginibus, quas domi sub agapetarum seu dilectarum appellatione detinebant, prava commercia habere dicerentur.'

Age of Leo X. (The), 1513–1521. A proverbial phrase for magnificence and high art. Leo X. was a great patron of learning and art, and his court was magnificent in the highest degree.

Agents of Captain Right. See under 'Whiteboys.'

Ages. The Golden Age, a mythical period when the earth brought forth spontaneously, and the gods held converse with men.

The Silver Age, the second period, when the gods taught men the useful arts.

The Age of Bronze, the third or transition period, semi-historical. The age of heroes. It followed the 'Stone Age' (q.v.).

The Iron Age, the historic period, when wars abound, and man earns his food by labour.

The Wire Age, the present age of telegraphs and telephones.

Aggregate Bodies, 1785. Irish volunteers in favour of free trade, and the extension of the franchise to the people at large. Some of them adopted the American fashion of tarring and feathering their victims; and some, calling themselves 'houghers,' deliberately maimed their victims, especially the soldiers. The introduction of the question of Catholic disabilities broke up the associations. As Plowden says, 'at night they existed with all their attributes of power . . . but on the following day the room of their assembly was shut, their colours waved no more, their uniform was no longer seen in the streets, and the body was disbanded.' See 'Irish Associations.'

Ag'idæ (Dynasty of the), B.C. 1058–219. One of the dynasties of Sparta; the other was the dynasty of the Proclidæ. They were contemporaneous. The former was founded by Agis, son of Eurysthenês; and the latter by Proclês, son of Aristodêmos. These dynastic kings were followed in B.C. 219 by the 'Tyrants,' viz.—Lycurgos, 219; Machanîdas, 210; and Nabis, 216.

Agiosemandrum. A wooden instrument used in Christian churches in Turkey instead of a bell; because the use of bells in Turkey is forbidden.

Greek agios semaino, meaning the holy (service) caller. Incorrectly, but generally spelt sy.
Pronounce Ag'gi-os'sy-man'-drum.

Agitator (The). Daniel O'Connell (1775–1847). He began agitating for the Repeal of the Union in 1842, and the 'Monster Meeting' was held in 1843. He was arrested for sedition and convicted, but the judgment was reversed by the House of Lords (1844).

Agitators (The). The committee appointed in 1647 to manage the affairs of the army when it formed a separate body in the state. The committee consisted of two of the superior officers of each of the eleven parliamentary regiments. The secret object of the council was to get possession of the person of the king (Charles I.), and withdraw him from the power of the Parliament. Cornet Joyce was one of these agitators, and, at the head of fifty horse, actually took possession of the king at Holmby House. The real appellation of this committee was the Council of Adjutators or Assistors, but the Presbyterians nicknamed them the Council of Agitators, which they readily adopted.

Ag'labites (3 syl.). Califs of Kairwan, so called from Ibrahim ibn el Aglab, who was invested with the government by Harun al Raschid, A.D. 800. He made himself independent in 802, and founded the dynasty of the Aglabites.

Succeeded by Abu l'Abbas (811); Ziadet Allah (815); Abu Akkal (837); Abdul Abbas (837); Abu Ishak Ibrahim (874); Abd ul Abbas II., murdered by his son and successor, Ziadet Allah (903); dynasty overthrown A.D. 909.

Ag'noites or 'Agnoitæ' (3 syl.). I. A.D. 370, followers of Theophronius the Cappadocian, who denied the omniscience of God.

II. A.D. 535, followers of Themistius, deacon of Alexandria, who denied that Christ knew the time of the day of judgment. 'Of that day and that hour knoweth no man, no, not the angels which are in heaven, neither the Son, but the Father [only].' (Mark xiii. 32.) They die out before 700.

Du Cange says (vol. 1. p. 187, col. 1) 'quod novissimam horam Christo, etiam quoad divinam ejus naturam, ignotam esse arbitrarentur.'

Agnos'tic (An), 1885. One who maintains that there are subjects wholly beyond the scope of human thought; not subjects now unknown, but subjects actually unknowable. On the other hand, an agnostic repudiates the belief that there are propositions which men ought to believe without such logical evidence.

Agnosticism. The faith of an agnostic. The refusal to say that we know or believe what we have no scientific or experimental grounds for professing to believe or know.

Agnostics are not atheists, because they believe the question of God's existence unfathomable, and the question of his non-existence equally so. Man, they say, has no means of knowing either the one or the other. Human knowledge cannot go beyond human observation and experience. The term 'agnostic' was introduced by Professor Huxley in 1869 at a private meeting preliminary to the formation of the Metaphysical Society. Plato said, 'Speculations about the gods are speculations of man respecting the gods.'

Agonalia. A Roman festival held several times a year in honour of the guardian deities of the state. So called from Agonius, the god who presided over business. (Ovid, Fasti i. 331.)

Agrarian Agitation, B.C. 480. The great Roman agrarian agitation was set on foot by Spurius Cassius, who had been three times consul. To win popular favour, he told the people that the senate ought to give an account of the land taken from the Volsci, which ought to have been equally divided amongst the whole people irrespective of rank. The senate, to allay the popular clamour, promised to give the matter their best consideration, but arrested Cassius and hurled him from the Tarpeian rock. Things went on till B.C. 464, when Herdonius the Sabine got possession of the Capitol. Then the senate promised to pass an agrarian law, if the people would eject the invaders. The invaders were expelled, but it was not till B.C. 365 that Licinius Stolo, the plebeian tribune, got a law passed making it penal for anyone to hold more than 500 acres of the public lands.

Agreement of the People (The), 1647. A paper drawn up by the Levellers and presented to the Council of Agitators or Adjutators, for the abolition of kings and lords; biennial parliaments with six-monthly sessions; a widely-extended franchise, and a more equal distribution of representation. See 'Lilburne.'

'Biennial parliaments with six-monthly sessions' means the parliament was to meet for six months every two years, the other eighteen months were to be wholly under the control of the Executive Council. In 1649 Colonel John Lilburne objected to this clause, and said it was not agreed to by the people at all.

Agriculture.

The Board of Agriculture was incorporated in 1793, and dissolved in 1816.

The Report of Children's Employment Commission on Agricultural Gangs was published in 1867, and their employment was regulated by Act of Parliament the same year.

The Royal Agricultural College at Cirencester was chartered in 1845, and opened in 1846.
The Royal Agricultural Society was incorporated by charter in 1840.
The Scotch Society, called 'Improvers of Agriculture in Scotland,' was established in 1723.
Minister of Agriculture appointed 1889.

Agricultural Protection Society of Great Britain (The), 17 Feb., 1844. Founded in opposition to the Anti-Corn-Law League to advocate protection in opposition to free trade.

Agrippa. Son of Aristobūlus, who was the son of Herod the Great and his second wife Mariamne the Asmonēan. It was this grandson of Herod the Great who was made king by Caligula. He slew James the apostle. His son, also named Agrippa, went with his sister Berenīcē to hear Paul's defence.

Ahab of the Nation (The). Charles I. was so called by the Levellers.

Aids. Sums to be paid by the tenant to ransom his lord if taken prisoner, or to make his lord's eldest son a knight, or to dower at marriage the lord's eldest daughter. Subsequently aids were exacted to pay a lord's debts, or to enable a lord to pay aids to his own superior lord. Of course, those who held immediately of the king could never be called upon for this last-named contribution. Introduced by William the Conqueror, and abolished by 12 Car. II. c. 24.

Ainaly-Cavak (Treaty of), Jan. 8, 1784, between Turkey and Russia, whereby the Ottoman Porte abandoned the Crimēa and Kuban to Russia.

Ainslie's Supper, 1566. A supper given at Ainslie's tavern in Edinburgh by the Earl of Bothwell, at the rising of parliament, to its leading members. After the banquet Bothwell informed his guests that he was about to marry the widowed Queen Mary; and drawing forth a bond, he induced them to sign their full and entire approval of the alliance, although at the time he was married to Jane Gordon.

The tavern itself was afterwards called 'Ainslie's Supper.'

Aix-la-Chapelle (Congress of), from 14 Feb. to 24 Nov., 1818. To settle the affairs of Europe after the restoration of the Bourbons.

Aix-la-Chapelle (Convention of), 30 Nov., 1818. For the evacuation of France by the Allies. It was signed by the plenipotentiaries Oct. 9, and ratified by France Oct. 18.

Aix-la-Chapelle (Peace of), 2 May, 1668. Between Louis XIV. and Carlos II. respecting the Spanish Netherlands.

Aix-la-Chapelle (Treaty of), 1748. Between George II., Louis XV., Maria Theresa of Austria, Ferdinand VI., Charles Emmanuel III., the Republic of Genoa, and the United Provinces. Signed by England, France, and the United Provinces, 18 Oct.; by Spain, 20 Oct.; by Austria, 23 Oct.; by Modēna, 25 Oct.; by Genōa, 28 Oct.; by Sardinia 7 Nov. (1748). It was a mere truce forced on the signatories by sheer exhaustion. France still contemplated the humiliation of England; the 'Family Compact' was still maintained; Maria Theresa had still designs on Silesia. In 1755 a league was secretly formed between Russia, Spain, Austria, and France for the renewal of war on the first favourable occasion; and, in 1756, the 'Seven Years War' began.

Ajax of the East (The). Leo, appointed by the eunuch Eutropius to the command of the Asiatic army; called the Ajax of the East from the bulk of his body and the dulness of his mind. He was originally a wool-comber.

Akerman, in Bessarabia (Treaty of), 26 Oct. (4 Sept.), 1826. Between Russia and Turkey, placing Moldavia, Valachia, and Servia under the protection of Russia. This was to secure the fulfilment of the treaty of Bucharest.

Akh'shidites (3 syl.). An Egyptian dynasty, generally called 'The dynasty of the Ikhshidites,' founded by Abu Bekr Mohammed Akhshid, or Ikhshid, A.D. 936. The dynasty was overthrown in 970 by the Fatimite general Goher.

Alabama. An American state, so named, in 1817, from its principal river. The river was so called by the Indians in allusion to the well-stocked hunting-grounds. The name is properly that of an Indian band, or tribe, of the Muscogee stock.

Pronounce Al'-a-bah'-mah.

Alaba'ma (The). A vessel built by Messrs. Laird of Birkenhead, and known as 'No. 290.' On 31 July, 1862, it sailed surreptitiously from the Mersey and proceeded to Terceira, one of the Western Islands, where she was supplied with guns, coals, and stores by a vessel sent from London for the purpose. Captain Semmes then took charge of her, named her the 'Alabama,' and hoisted the Confederate flag. She committed great damage to the American shipping, capturing 65 vessels, and destroying property to the amount of four million dollars; but in June 1864 she was sunk near Cherbourg by the United States steamer 'Kearsage.' In 1871 it was agreed to refer the question to five arbitrators, who were to decide if the English Government were responsible, and if so, what fine was to be paid by England for the damage done to the United States of North America.

Alaba'ma Claims (The), 1868. A money demand made by the United States of America on Great Britain for damage done by a corvette named the 'Alabama,' and built at Birkenhead for the Confederates, who were at war with the United States. The British Government, which had declared itself a neutral power, had forbidden the corvette to leave the docks; but, notwithstanding this prohibition, it put to sea, displaying a British flag, and succeeded in destroying 65 of the United States vessels; but in 1864 it encountered the 'Kearsage' off Cherbourg, and was sunk. After the war, the United States demanded compensation, and five arbitrators met at Geneva to consider the question in 1872. The sentence of these arbitrators was to award damages to the amount of 3,250,000*l.*, with interest in settlement of the American claims. The money was duly paid, and a large surplus remained in the hands of the American Government after all recognised claims had been paid in full. See 'Alexandra.'

The arbitrators were the king of Italy, the President of the Swiss Confederation, the Emperor of Brazil, a representative of Great Britain, and another of the United States.

Alba Comiti'va. A free company of English, also called 'Les Tards Venus,' q.v.

Alban Hall (St.), Oxford, 1549; founded by Robert de St. Alban. The head of the Hall is called the principal.

Al'bany or Albyn. The ancient name of Scotland; a corrupt spelling of Albanigh, connected with the word Alps, and meaning hilly or mountainous. The Romans called the south part Caledonia. The west, now called Argyllshire, was colonised by the Scoti of Ulster, and these Irish Scots, in the time of their chief, Kenneth Macalpine, having conquered the Picts who occupied the eastern parts, added that portion to his dominion, and called the two Scot-land (q.v.).

Al'bany, New York, North America. So called in honour of James, duke of York and Albany (afterwards James II.), to whom Charles II. gave the proprietorship of the colony.

Alba'ti (The), 1399. A class of hermits who dressed in white linen. Pope Boniface IX. fancied their leader aimed at his deposition, and put him to death.

Albe or Albane'ser. Lord Byron was so called. A correspondent in 'Notes and Queries' (March 28, 1887, p. 425) says: 'Madame Cottin wrote a romance entitled "Claire d'Albé." This romance was well known to Shelley, who induced his first wife to translate it into English.' May not the intimacy between Claire and Byron have suggested the application of Albé to Lord Byron?

Mr. Forman suggests L-B (Lord Byron). Others fancy it is a contraction of Albe-marle (Street), the place of business of Murray, his lordship's publisher.

Albert I. (Albrecht I.). One of the promiscuous kings of Germany (1248, 1298–1308), son of Rudolf I. of Habsburg. In this reign is placed the tale of William Tell.

Albert (Albrecht) II. Founder of the present line of Austrian emperors and first of the House of Habsburg (1394, 1438–1439), son of Albert IV., duke of Austria, and son-in-law of Siegmund, the preceding kaiser-king. He was surnamed 'the Illustrious,' 'the Magnanimous,' and 'the Grave,' but reigned only about a year and a half. Like his next two successors, Frederick III. and Maximilian, he died of dysentery brought on by eating too freely of melon.

Albert (Albrecht) the Bear, so called because his cognisance was a bear. He was a fine tall fellow with a quick eye, and so well featured that he was familiarly called 'the handsome.' He was the first margrave of Brandenburg (1106–1170).

Albert the Bear died the same year as Thomas Becket did.

Albertus Magnus (1193–1280), bishop of Ratisbon. A marvellous man, whose literary works cover 21 folio volumes. Thomas Aquinas was his pupil. He made a speaking head of brass, and his knowledge of chemistry was ascribed to the black art. He was the founder of the Second Age of Scholastic Philosophy, or the Aristotelian school.

Albigen'ses (The), 11th and 12th cent. Reformers or 'heretics' of mid-France, so called from Albi or Albigia, where their tenets were first condemned, in 1176. They were defended by Count Raymond of Toulouse, Roger viscount of Beziers, and the Counts of Foix and of Béarn. Alexander III. excommunicated them in 1179, and Innocent III. organised a crusade against them in 1204. It is said that 60,000 were massacred in 1209. Another crusade against them was set on foot in 1219.

The Waldenses should not be confounded with the Albigenses, although many of their religious views were the same; but the Waldenses rose in the 9th cent. under the teaching of Claudius of Turin. The peculiar faith of the Albigenses was that God the Father created the first matter; but the Evil Principle arranged it and stamped every created thing with all their present forms and attributes.

Albigen'ses (Wars with the). The first, 1209–1229, set on foot by Philippe Auguste of France. The second, 1226, prompted by Pope Honorius III. and set on foot by Louis VIII., called the Lion. The third, 1545–1547, set on foot by François I. of France. In the last war John, baron of Oppido, cut them off root and branch.

Alcacebas (Treaty of). Between Isabella of Castile and Alfonso V. of Portugal; signed at Alcacebas, in Estremadura, Sept. 24, 1479.

Alcan'tara (Knights of), 1212. A Spanish order, so called by Alfonso IX., king of Castile, from the city of Alcantara. It was founded in 1156 by Don Suarez and Don Gomez, but called by them 'Knights of the Pear-tree'; which was changed in 1176 by San Julian del Pereyro into 'Knights of San Julian.'

Alcibi'ades of Germany (The). Albrecht, margraf of Baireuth (1522–1555).

Aldermen. Since the Municipal Corporations Act (q.v.) in 1835, one third of the councillors are elected aldermen, but they are not eligible for the offices of coroner or recorder, and are exempted from serving on juries. They hold office for six years, one-half going out every three years.

Since 1889 aldermen are chosen by the new organisation called the County Council (q.v.), and hold office for six years in the Council. The councillors are in office for three years only, and are elected like members of parliament.

Aldine Editions. A series of books published by Aldo Manuzio (Aldus Manutius) between 1490 and 1597. During this period 908 books, chiefly Greek and Latin classics, with carefully corrected texts of Boccaccio, Dante, Petrarch, and other Italian authors, were issued. Aldo was the first to use the Italian type. His mark is an anchor entwined by a dolphin. Pickering, a London publisher, published an edition of the British poets, which he called the Aldine (2 syl.).

Aldrich'ian Professorships (The). One for anatomy, one for the practice of medicine, and one for chemistry, in the University of Oxford, founded by George Aldrich, M.D., in 1798.

That for anatomy is now annexed to the Linacre professorship of physiology; that for the practice of medicine is attached to the Regius professorship of medicine; and that of chemistry is incorporated with the Waynflete professorship of chemistry.

Ale-conner. A judge of ale, an annual office of great antiquity, appointed in the court leet of each manor. His duty was to taste the ale and beer, and decide if they were wholesome, sound, and sold at a proper price. Ale-conners were called Gustatores cervisiæ.

Alexander (The English). Henry V. (1388, 1413–1422). He resembled Alexander in the shortness and glory of his reign, his princely liberality, his enjoyment of life, his great military talents, and his wonderful hold on the hearts of the people over whom he reigned or whom as a general he commanded. Captain Fluellen would put it thus: Alexander was born at Macedon and Henry V. was born at Monmouth, and both begin with M.

Alexander (The Second). Sandjar or Mog-Eddyn-Sandjar, third son of Malek Shah, king of Persia (1118–1175). He was called Sandjar from the place of his birth, but his proper name was Abou'l Hareth Moez Eddyn.

Alexander-Newski (Knights of), 1725. A Russian military order. Cordon, a flame or poppy colour.

Alexander's Wine. A celebrated poison, so called from Rodriguez Borgia, historically known as Pope Alexander VI., traditionally said to have been killed by drinking one of the Borgia poisons, in a bowl of wine intended for another person.

Alexandra (The). A screw-steamer seized, 1863, by the government at Liverpool, during the civil war of America, under suspicion of its being a Confederate vessel (England had declared itself neutral in the war). The case was tried in the Court of Exchequer, and judgment given against the government. An appeal was made to the House of Lords, and the previous judgment being confirmed, the vessel was restored to the owners in April 1864. See 'Alabama.'

Alexan'drian Codex. A manuscript in Greek of the entire Bible written on parchment, and now in the British Museum. It is in uncial letters, without accents, and without spaces between the words. The probable date is about A.D. 500, or a little before. It belonged (in 1098) to the patriarch of Alexandria, and in 1621 was taken to Constantinople by Cyrillus Lucāris, the patriarch. The patriarch gave it to Charles I., king of England, in 1628, and it was placed in the Royal Library. It was transferred to the British Museum in 1753. See 'Bibles.'

There are two other Greek MSS., one the Codex Vaticanus, in Rome, and the other an imperfect copy called the Sinaitic Codex, in St. Petersburg. The Alexandrian Codex contains the epistles of Clemens Romānus, a third and fourth book of the Maccabees, the epistle of Athanasius to Marcellinus, a hymn to the Virgin, &c.

Alexan'drian Era (The). Dates creation Aug. 29, B.C. 5502.

This must not be confounded with the Era of Alexander, Nov. 12, 324. See under 'Era.'

Alexan'drian Library (The). This magnificent museum and library was begun, B.C. 204, by Ptolemy Soter, and completed by his son, Ptolemy Philadelphus. It was in the quarter of Alexandria called Bruchīon, and contained 700,000 volumes. It was burnt in the siege of Alexandria by Julius Cæsar, but partially restored and again destroyed by Theophilus, a fanatical Christian bishop, by order of the Emperor Theodosius. We are told that the library contained a copy of every known literary work in the civilised world, whether Egyptian, Jewish, Greek, Latin, Phœnician, Punic, Chaldee, Syriac, or Persian.

According to Abdallatif (1230), Amrou, A.D. 640, burnt the library, saying: 'If the books contain truth, they are needless, being mere repetitions of the blessed Koran; if not, they are mischievous, and better destroyed.'

Alexan'drian Massacre (The), A.D. 215. When Caracalla, the Roman emperor, visited Alexandria, the people made some allusion to his flagitious crimes and to those of his mother; upon which he ordered a general massacre of all the inhabitants. Many, especially of the Christians, escaped by flight, but the slaughter was immense, especially of young men of military age. See 'Massacres.'

Alexan'drian School (The). It may be divided into two periods: The first, or Ptolemæan period (from B.C. 323–30), was given to mathematics and poetry; the former unrivalled, the latter little better than mathematical verse, perfect in anatomy, but without a living soul. The second period (from B.C. 30 to A.D. 640, the fall of the Ptolemæan dynasty to the irruption of the Arabs) was the philosophic period. The introduction of Christianity produced the systems of Neo-Platonism and Gnosticism. The former was a fusion of Christian doctrines and dogmas with the ideas of Plato, the chief exponent of which was Philo the Jew; the Gnostic school dipped into the religious tenets of Origen and other fathers of the Church. The dogmas of the Logos and the Trinity are ascribed by many to Alexandrian influence.

Alexan'drine MS. (The) of the Bible. See 'Codex Alexandrīnus.'

Alexan'drine Platonism. The philosophic system of Plato applied to the Christian system. Platonism led to mysticism, the Aristotelian philosophy led to sophistry and disputation. In the middle ages the Alexandrine Platonism matured in Asia, adopted in the Greek Church, and afterwards introduced into the Western Church, produced much mischief. Joannes Scotus, surnamed 'Erigĕna,' was the reviver of mystic theology.

Erigena divides nature into four classes: (1) that which creates and is not created; (2) that which is created and creates; (3) that which is created and does not create; and (4) that which neither creates nor is created.

Alexan'drine War (The). The war between Cæsar and Pompey, from August, B.C. 48 to January, B.C. 47. After the defeat of Pompey at Pharsalia, Cesar pursued him into Egypt, where Pompey was assassinated. Cesar then placed Cleopatra and her younger brother on the throne of Egypt, and the war was over.

Alexan'drists. Disciples of Alexander of Aphrodisia, a peripatetic philosopher (2nd cent. B.C.). He was an exponent of Aristotle, and has left comments on nearly all Aristotle's works. The Alexandrists in the 12th Christian century were combated by the Averroists (q.v.), and for a time there were two antagonistic and concurrent sects called the Alexandrists and the Averroists.

Alex'ians, or 'Brethren and Sisters of Alexius.' Lollards, who rose at Antwerp, about 1300, and were admitted by Sixtus IV. among the religious orders in 1472. Also called Cellites (q.v.), and Matemans. Recognised by Pius IX. in 1870. See 'Monastic . . . Orders.'

Alfonsi'nas. The Alfon'sine tables of astronomy (1252), in which Alfonso X., 'the Astronomer,' corrected some of the errors of the Ptolemaic system. The king was assisted in this work by Isaac Hazan, a Jewish rabbi. It would be more correct to say that these tables were constructed by the order and under the patronage of Alfonso by Isaac Hazan, assisted by Christian and Arabian savants united at Tolēdo. See 'Ilkanian and Rudolfine Tables.'

These tables recognise what was called the Trepidation,' of Ptolemy's system. This was a mere cabalistic mystery, and has not the smallest foundation in any scientific observation. Milton makes Satan, in his way to earth,

Pass the planets seven; and pass the fixed [stars]; And that crystallin sphere, whose balance weighs The Trepidation talked [of]; and that first moved [primum mobile].—Paradise Lost, iii. 481, &c.

It was Alfonso X. who (puzzled over the intricacies of cycles and epicycles), exclaimed, 'What a muddle! I could have done creation better.'

Alfonsine Tables (The). See above.

Alfonso the Magnanimous. Alfonso V. of Aragon (1385, 1416–1458), by far the most accomplished sovereign of the 15th cent.

Algerine Act (The), 1831. So Daniel O'Connell called the prohibition of holding political meetings in Ireland.

The time at which he (O'Connell) should have been called up for judgment did not arrive till within a month or two of the expiration of the statute under which he was convicted, and which he called the 'Algerine Act.'—Personal Recollections of Lord Cloncurry, pp. 418-421.

Pronounce Al'-je-reen'.

Algon'quin Tongue (The). The language of the native north-east Americans, dialects of which are spoken over the greater portions of eastern North America.

Mr. A. Gatschet, after a careful study of what remains of the Beothuk language, has come to the conclusion that it belongs to 'a separate linguistic family to the Innuit, Tinné, Iroquois, and Algonkin.'—Lady BLAKE, Nineteenth Century (Dec. 1888, p. 905).

Alham'bra of the Crimea (The). Aloupka, built of rich greenstone, in various colours; the Gothic and Saracenic being the prevailing orders of the architecture.

Alien Acts (The). 33 Geo. III. c. 4, Jan. 4, 1793, and 34 Geo. III. c. 43, 67, &c., A.D. 1794, were passed on account of the great number of foreigners who came to England in the years 1792, 1793. The object of these acts was to confer on the crown the power of banishing aliens from the realm. These acts were superseded by the Peace Alien Act, 6 Will. IV. c. 11, A.D. 1836, which required the masters of ships arriving from a foreign port to declare the number of foreign passengers on their bills, and also required each passenger on landing to show his passport. As no penalty is attached to non-compliance, the provisions soon fell into neglect.

By the Junian Law, B.C. 126, all aliens were banished from Rome. In 122 the law was extended to Latins and Italiots.

All Saints' Day, Nov. 1. In commemoration of all the dead who have 'died in the Lord,' especially those for whom no special day has been appointed. Called also 'All Hallows,' and, in French, 'La Toussaint.' These terms were, in 830, substituted by Gregory IV. for the previous one of 'Al Martyrs.'

All Souls College, Oxford, 1487. Founded by Henry Chichele, archbishop of Canterbury. The head-master is called the Warden.

All Souls Day. 'Festa Animārum,' Nov. 2, in commemoration of all the dead. It was instituted by Odilon, abbot of Clugny, in 998. Till 1582 it was observed in Milan on the third Monday of October.

Also called 'Animarum Commemoratio,' or 'Omnium Fidelium Commemoratio'; in French, 'Trépassés' (or Jour des Trépassés).

All the Hacks, 1807–1809. An imbecile ministry which succeeded the bungling parliament called, in ridicule, 'All the Talents.' The Duke of Portland was premier, and his chief supporters were Perceval, Castlereagh, Canning, and Hawkesbury (Lord Liverpool). The duke died Oct. 30, 1809.

All the Talents (Administration of), 5 Feb., 1806, to 23 March, 1807 Formed by Lord Grenville after the death of Pitt (Jan. 23, 1806). It consisted of Lord Auckland (President of the Board of Trade), Lane Barham, duke of Bedford (Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland), Erskine (Lord Chancellor), Sir Gilbert Elliot [Lord Minto] (President of the Board of Trade), Lord Ellenborough (Chief Justice of the King's Bench), General Fitzgerald (Secretary of War), Earl Fitzwilliam (Secretary of War), Charles James Fox (Foreign Secretary), Lord Grenville (First Lord of the Treasury), Earl Grey (Lord of the Admiralty), Earl of Moira (Master-General of Ordnance), Lord Henry Petty (Chancellor of the Exchequer), Pigott (Attorney-General), Romilly (Solicitor-General), Lord Sidmouth (Privy Seal), Lord Spencer (Secretary for the Home Department), Lord Temple (Vice-President of the Board of Trade), Windham (Secretary for the Colonies). N.B.—Canning was not a member of this ministry.

Alleluiat'ica (Victoria), 30 March, A.D. 430. A legendary victory won by St. Germānus over the Picts and Saxons at Mold.

Alliteration.

C.—Hamconius wrote a poem in which every word begins with C. It opens thus:—

Certamen Catholicum cum Calvinistis

Hucbald wrote a poem of 100 lines, every word of which begins also with C The last two lines are:—

Conveniet claras claustris componere cannas,
Completur claris carmen cantabile calvis.

M.—In the 'Materia More Magistralis' every word begins with M.

P.—Placentius, the Dominican (16th cent.) wrote a poem containing 253 Latin hexameters, and entitled 'Pugna Porcorum,' every word of which begins with P. It opens thus:—

Plaudite, porcelli; porcorum pigra propago
Progreditur . . .

T.—Tusser has a poem of 12 lines in rhyme, on Thrift, every word of which begins with T.

The alliterative poem beginning 'An Austrian army awfully arrayed' contains 26 lines. Each line in succession begins with one letter in alphabetical order. See 'Reader's Handbook,' p. 719.

The distich on Cardinal Wolsey is not so well known:—

Begot by butchers, but by bishops bred,
How high his Honour holds his haughty head.

Allo'dia, or 'allodial lands.' Freeholds, that is lands held without the requirement of military service. In times of trouble it was by no means unusual for such a tenant to place his lands under a lord, and pay him military service for protection. See 'Mesne lord.'

Almack's. A suite of assembly rooms, built in 1765, in King Street, St. James's, London, by a tavern-keeper named M'Call, who inverted the two syllables of his name, Mac-call, into Allmack or Almack. The rooms became famous for fashionable balls under the management of a committee of ladies of the highest rank. The rooms are now called Willis's Rooms, from a proprietor named Willis.

Al'magest. The Arabic translation of Ptolemy's 'Magna Constructio,' by command of Al Mamûn, A.D. 827. It was retranslated by Gerard of Cremona, about 1230. Ptolemy's 'Syntaxis of Astronomy' was written about A.D. 150.

Almiran'tê (El), without the adjunct of a proper name, means Columbus.

So El Marchese, among Mexicans, means Cortes; and Il Segretario, among the Florentines, means Machiavel.

Al'mohades (3 syl.) A dynasty that ruled in Africa and Spain in the 12th and 13th cent. The word means 'The Unitarians,' and they assumed that they alone of all the earth worshipped God properly. The founder of the sect was Mahommed Ibn Toumert, of the Atlas region. The power of the Mohades was destroyed in Spain in 1257 and in Africa in 1269. (Mohades, 2 syl.)

Almo'rah, in Hindustan (Convention of), 27 April, 1815, for the cession of Kumaon to the British.

Almo'ravides (4 syl.). A dynasty in Africa and Spain founded by Yahia Ibn Ibrahim about 1050; driven out of Spain in 1155; suppressed in Africa 1208. The word Almoravides is a corruption of 'Al Morabeth' (the frontier people). Called in English the Marabûts.

The founder is sometimes called Abdallah Ibn Yasim, who undertook to instruct the tribes on the slopes of the Atlas range in the Mahometan faith.

Alog'ians (The), or 'Al'ogi.' 2nd cent. Those who denied the divinity of the Logos, and rejected the Gospel of St. John with the Apocalypse. (Greek, ἀ, negative, λόγος, the word.)

Alom'brados (The). Religious sectaries of Spain first mentioned in 1575, suppressed by the Inquisition in 1623. They were an early school of the Illuminăti.

Alphonsine Tables. See 'Alfonsine' &c.

Altenberg, in Hungary (Congress of), 12–28 Sept., 1809. For the negotiation of peace between France and Austria.

Alter ego. Is an official title originally in use in the Two Sicilies, meaning the vicar-general of the king, to whom was deputed sovereign power. The French lieutenant-general of the kingdom was a similar officer.

It is now used to signify a very dear friend, a 'second self.'

Altmark, in Prussia (Truce of), 26 Sept., 1628. Between Gustăvus Adolphus of Sweden and Sigismund of Poland, for six years.

Extended to 26 years Sept. 12, 1635.

Altona, in Holstein (Convention of), 20 June, 1689. Between Christian V. of Denmark and Christian Albert of Holstein-Gottorp, by the mediation of the kaiser. (Al'-tō-nah.)

Amal (The). The chief or king of the Goths. The Amals, or 'sons of Odin,' were a race of heroes who reigned over the Goths in the 5th and 6th Christian centuries. The word means celestials—Amal'aric, or rather Amalric, one of this race, means 'the celestial king.' Theodorick the Great was an Amal. Kingsley in his 'Hypatia' frequently uses the word.

Amal'fian Code (The), or 'Tabŭla Amalphitāna.' A code of maritime laws compiled by the Amalfians in the 11th cent., and observed by all Italy.

Amazo'nian Brigade (The), 1792. The dames de la Halle and the women of the Faubourg St.-Antoine enrolled themselves into this brigade in the French Revolution. Their head-dress was a bonnet-rouge, or red night-cap, with a tricolour cockade, and their arms were pikes.

Am'azons. Runjeet Singh of Lahore formed a regiment of 150 of the prettiest girls in Cashmere, Persia, and the Punjab. They were magnificently dressed, armed with bows and arrows, and appeared on horseback as cavalry. This regiment was more for the amusement of the maharajah than for war service.

Ambarva'lia, a festival in which the Romans, in solemn procession, prayed for their fields and increase of corn. (Am= round about, arva= the fields.)

It was the day of the 'little' or private Ambarvalia, celebrated by a single family for the welfare of all belonging to it: as the great college of the Arval brothers at Rome officiated in the interest of the whole city.—PATER, Marius the Epicurean, chap. i.

Amber Witch (The). A literary forgery, professing to be a 'story of the olden time.' When it first appeared the great scholars of Germany applied severe tests of historical and philological criticism to the work, and declared it to be an undoubted relic of antiquity. Even those acute neologists, the Tübingen Reviewers, found it 'hoary with the lapse of centuries.' When the wise ones had fully committed themselves, Dr. Reinhold came forward and proved beyond a doubt that he was himself the author. See 'Literary Forgeries.'

Amboise (Conspiracy of), 1560. Formed by the partisans of the Prince of Condé, to carry off François II., and to massacre the Guises, who had removed from Paris to Amboise when they gained secret information of the conspiracy. Called the Conspiracy of Amboise because the conspirators assembled there to carry out their purposes. It was betrayed to the Duke de Guise, and 27 barons, 11 counts, and 7 marquises were executed in one day.

Pronounce Ahm-bwoïs.

Amboise (Edict of), 19 March, 1563. It gave to the Huguenots free exercise of religion in those towns which were in the power of the Calvinists at the date of 7 March, 1563; permission to the lords hauts justiciers to hold assemblies throughout the whole extent of their domains; permission to the nobles of the second rank to celebrate their worship in their own houses, but only for their household; finally, permission in each bailiwick pertaining directly to the parlements for a single place of worship. To all other persons it accorded only the right of private worship. See 'Edict of January.'

Amboise, in France (Treaty of), 12 March, 1563. Concluding the 'Religious War' (1562–63); signed by Charles IX. of France.

Amboy'na (The Massacre of), 1624. The Dutch laid claim to all the Spice Islands in the Indian Archipelago. In one of these (Amboyna) the English East India Company had established, in 1612, a small settlement at Cambello. In the whole island there were some 20 English, 30 Japanese, and 200 Dutch. The Dutch pretended that the English and Japanese had combined to expel them from the island, so they seized Captain Towerson, with 9 other Englishmen, 9 Japanese, and 1 Portuguese, and, after torturing them, cut off their heads. See 'Massacres.'

Ambro'sian Chant, or 'Hymn,' called 'Ambrosiānum,' mentioned by Isidore in his 'De Eccl. Offic.' Book I. c. 6. It was a chant or hymn introduced into the church at Milan in the 4th cent., now known as the 'Te Deum laudāmus,' said, as we now have it, to have been the joint work of St. Ambrose and St. Augustine.

Ambro'sian Library (The), at Milan, founded by Cardinal Federigo Borromēo in 1602, and plundered by Napoleon in 1796. The plunder was restored in 1816. So named in honour of St. Ambrosius, patron saint of Milan. N.B. St. Ambrose was Bishop of Milan, A.D. 374–397.

Ambro'sian Liturgy, 'Missal,' 'Office.' So called from being edited and supplemented by St. Ambrose, bishop of Milan (340, 374–397). This liturgy is one of the most ancient; and must, of course, have been in use before the time of St. Ambrose. This is called the Liturgy of Milan, and is one of the chief liturgies of the Roman Church, the other three being the Roman, the Gallican, and the Spanish Liturgies.

Ambro'sian Mass, 'Missa Ambrosiāna.' Used at Milan, according to the service employed by St. Ambrose.

Am'brosin. A coin of the middle ages, struck by the dukes of Milan, on which St. Ambrose was represented on horseback, with a whip in his right hand.

Amedieu (2 syl.), or 'Friends of God,' 1400. A religious congregation who wore no breeches, but a grey cloak girded at the loins with a rope. Pius V. united them to the Cistercians and Soccolanti.

Amen Corner, London. Before the Reformation the clergy used to walk in procession every year on Corpus Christi day to St. Paul's Cathedral. They mustered at the upper end of Cheapside, and there commenced chanting the Paternoster, which continued through 'Paternoster Row'; at the end of the Row they said Amen, and the spot was called 'Amen Corner.' They then began the Ave Maria, turning down 'Ave-Maria Lane.' After crossing Ludgate, they chanted the Credo in 'Creed Lane' (which no longer exists).

Corpus Christi Day, called in French the 'Fête Dieu,' is the Thursday after Trinity Sunday; it was the greatest Church festival in the year.

American War of Independence (The), 1775–1783. The first skirmish was at Lexington, 19 April, 1775; issue doubtful, but unimportant. Terminated by the Peace of Versailles, signed at Paris 3 Sept., 1783. The object of the war was to make the United States of America independent of England. The chief battles of the war are subjoined. Those in common type were doubtful. Those in italics were won by the Americans. Those in capitals were won by the British.

Yorktown, 19 Oct. 1781 (Washington over Cornwallis).

The war lasted eight years to a day. The battle of Lexington was fought 19 April, 1775, and the cessation of hostilities with Great Britain was, by order of General Washington, proclaimed in the American camp 19 April, 1783.

France acknowledged the independence of the United States 16 Jan., 1778; Spain in 1779; Holland on 19 April, 1782.

England signed a provisional compact with America, 30 Nov., 1782; announced to Parliament, 5 Dec.; and all hostilities ceased 20 Jan., 1783. The British troops evacuate New York, 25 Nov.; and an American detachment under General Knox took possession of the town.

American War (The Second), 1812–1814. The American War of Independence terminated in 1783. The second war between America and Great Britain was declared by the United States, June 18, 1812, and concluded Dec. 24, 1814, by the Peace of Ghent. The chief battles were: (capitals, English victories; italic, American victories).

QUEENSTOWN (Sheaffe over Van Rensselaer).
STONY CREEK (Vincent over Winder), 1813.
Moravian Town (Harrison over Proctor), 5 Oct.
BLADENSBURG (Ross over Winder), 24 Aug. 1814.
Plattsburgh (Macomb over Prevost).
New Orleans (Jackson over Pakenham).

The immediate cause of this war was, that in 1811 a British ship called 'The Little Belt,' under Captain Bingham, had engaged the American frigate named 'The United States,' under Commodore Rogers, and each party laid the blame on the other. Nearly the last incident was that the President Madison, on Aug. 24, prepared a grand banquet at the White House, but General Ross took Washington by surprise, and feasted his men on Madison's banquet. (Ross killed 12 Sept. 1814.)

American Civil War (The), 1861–1865. Between the Federals of the Northern States and the Confederates of the Southern and slave-holding States. The total loss of life was 800,000. The Federals were the victors, and American slaveholding was abolished. Cost of the war, to the Federals, 940,000,000*l.* sterling; to the Confederates, 460,000,000*l.* Total, 1,400,000,000*l.* sterling.

Ami du Peuple (L'). A scandalous democratic journal conducted by Marat in the French Revolution. Its articles were most ferocious, and no one was spared except the very scum of the people. The original name of this infamous journal was the 'Publiciste Parisien,' and its last title was 'Le Journal de la République.'

Pronounce Lah'-me du Peu'pl.

Am'iens (Peace of), 1 Oct., 1801. One of the most fatuous ever made by England. As Lord Grenville said: 'England gave up everything, and France nothing. France kept Savoy, Belgium, the Germanic States on the left bank of the Rhine, Upper Italy, and Holland. In Asia she was to have

Pondicherry, Cochin, Negapatam, and the Spice Islands; in Africa she was to have the Cape of Good Hope and Senegal; in the West Indies she was to hold Martinique, St. Lucia, Guadaloupe, Tobāgo, Curaçao, and most of St. Domingo; in America she was to be repossessed of St. Pierre and Miquelon; and in South America she was to keep Surinam, Demerara, Berbice, and Essequibo.' We had spent in the nine years 461,800,000*l.*, and retained nothing but Ceylon and Trinidad. Addington's Ministry. On 22 May, 1802, a fresh rupture put an end to the 'Peace.'

Amis des Noirs (Société des). The first anti-slavery society instituted at Paris by Brissot de Warville, Feb. 1788.

Pronounce Ah'-me da Nwar'.

Amnesty Association (The), 1870. The members were nearly all Fenians, and one of them was Mr. Parnell. Other members were Egan, Biggar, J. Nolan, John Levy, James Carey, John Sullivan, and Daniel Curley.

Amor'ian Dynasty (The), of the Byzantine Empire. It includes Michael II., the Stammerer, who was born at Amoria, in Phrygia, from 820–829; Theophilus, 829–842, and Michael III., the Sot, 842–867. This dynasty was then succeeded by the Macedonian under Basil I.

Michael II. conspired against Leo the Armenian, and was made emperor in 820.

Amor'ian War (The), A.D. 838. Between the Emperor Theophilus (son of Michael the Stammerer), and the Calif Motassem (son of Harun al Rashid). So called from Amorium, in Phrygia, the birthplace of Theophilus. The Saracens had the word AMORIUM inscribed on their saddles, in revenge of Theophilus's siege of Sozopetra, the birthplace of Motassem. The Saracens were the victors, but the slaughter on both sides was great. Gibbon gives it as 70,000 Moslems and 30,000 Christians.

Theophilus was defeated at Dasymon, and Amorium was lost.

Amphictyon'ic Council (The). Established B.C. 1124 to the 2nd cent. A.D. A politico-religious court of twelve Grecian tribes held twice a year. In spring, the members met in the Temple of Apollo, at Delphi; and in the autumn they met in the Temple of Ceres, at Anthēla, near Thermopylæ. Their purpose was (1) to determine questions of international law; and (2) to preserve the religious institutions of Greece.

Æschinēs gives the following names: the Thessalians, Bœotians, Dorians, Ionians, Perrhæbians, Magnetes, Locrians, Œlæans, Phthiots, Malians, Phocians, and one omitted, probably the Dolopians. In the time of Demosthenēs the glory had departed from the council.

Amphis'san War (The). The third sacred war of Greece, from Feb. to Aug. B.C. 338. The Locrians of Amphissa rebuilt Cirrha on the 'Sacred Land,' and the matter, B.C. 339, was laid before the Amphictyonic Council, which declares war against these Locrians. Philip II. of Macedon undertakes the war for the Council, and is joined by the Peloponnesians; but Athens and Thebes take the side of the Locrians. Amphissa is taken and destroyed in the summer of 338, and in August of the same year the Thebans and Athenians being overthrown at Cheronēa, the war is brought to an end.

Am'pian Law (The), B.C. 64. A law by T. Am'pius, one of the tribunes, to allow Pompey to wear the symbols of triumph at the Circensian games.

Amyclæ'an Silence, perilous silence. It is said that the Amyclæans were forbidden to disturb the peace by raising a cry of danger from invasion. This law was passed, because the people were always crying 'wolf,' out of fear of the Spartans. It so happened that the Spartans came at last, and none durst sound a note of warning, and so the city was taken. Hence the Greek proverbs, 'Amyclæ perished through silence,' and 'more silent than the Amyclæans' (Amyclis ipsis taciturnior).

Anabaptists, 1521. The nickname of a religious party who maintained that, as baptism should not be administered without a personal confession of faith, the baptism of infants was worthless, and those who had so been baptized must be baptized again as adults, at their own express desire, and after a confession of faith.

In Germany, John of Leyden, Munzer, Knipperdoling, and others were called Anabaptists, and maintained that Christ was not God, that righteousness is of works, that there is no such thing as original sin, that infants ought not to be baptized, that all men are of one rank, and that civil magistrates are anti-scriptural. See 'Mennonites.'

The Anabaptists of Moravia called themselves apostolical. They went barefoot; had a community of goods; dressed in black; and had very gloomy views of future judgment, the malice of Satan, and the enduring pains of hell.

Anac'reon (The French). I. Pontus de Thiard, one of the 'Pleiad poets' (1521–1605).

II. P. Laiyon, perpetual president of the 'Caveau Moderne,' a Paris club noted for its good dinners. No one not a poet could be a member of it (1727–1811).

Anacreon (The Persian), Mohammed Hafiz. His collected poems are called 'The Divan' (1310–1389).

Anacreon (The Scotch) Alexander Scot (flourished 1550).

Anacreon (The Sicilian). Giovanni Meli (1740–1815).

Anacreon Moore. Thomas Moore of Dublin, who translated Anacreon's odes from Greek into English in the spirit of the original, and wrote numerous odes and other poems of unusual merit (1779–1852).

Anacreon of Painters (The). Francesco Albāno (or Albāni), 1578–1660.

Anacreon of the Guillotine. Bertrand Barère de Vieuzac, president of the National Convention in 1792. So called from the flowery language he employed in speaking on the measures of the Reign of Terror.

Anacreon of the Temple (The). Guillaume Amfrye, abbé de Chaulieu (1639–1720), the Tom Moore of France. Called 'of the Temple' from the place of his abode. Sometimes called the Horace of France.

Anacreon of the Twelfth Century. Walter Mapes or Map (1150–1196). His song 'Meum est propositum' has been translated by Leigh Hunt.

Anagni, in Italy (Council of), 24 March, 1160, in which Pope Alexander III. excommunicated Frederick Barbarossa.

Anally, in Ireland. The modern Longford.

Anatomy (Professorship of), in the University of Cambridge, 1707; founded by the University. Stipend 800*l.* a year. See 'Lowndean Professor.'

Anatomy Act (The), 2, 3, Will. IV. c. 75, 1832. It provides that a person must have a licence to practise anatomy; it enjoins that inspectors be appointed to visit chambers where anatomy is carried on; that any one may leave his body to be dissected, if he chooses. The law is not applicable to post-mortem examinations.

The cause of this Act of Parliament was that persons previously used to murder people and sell their dead bodies for dissection. Burke and Hare murdered sixteen persons and sold their bodies. They used to inveigle men, women, and children into a house, make them drunk, and then smother them by placing a pitch plaster over the mouth and nose.

Anatomy of Melancholy (The), 1621. 'A carnival of quotations, Greek, Latin, German, French, and Italian; philosophical, geometrical, medical, poetical, astrological, musical, pedagogic.' The subject is melancholy, its nature, seat, varieties, causes, symptoms, prognosis; its cure, by legitimate and forbidden means, by dietetics and by pharmacy. Author, the Rev. Robert Burton (1576–1640).

Ancenis, in France (Treaty of), 10 Sept., 1468. A treaty of peace between Louis XI. and François II., duc de Bretagne.

Ancient of the Mountains (The). Chief of the Assassins.

The Assassins settled in Persia in 1090. Murdered the Marquis of Montferrat in 1192; Louis (Ludwig) of Bavaria in 1213; the Khan of Tartary in 1254, &c. In 1257 the mischievous sect was extirpated.

Ancients. The Moravian elders who are the civil and ecclesiastical heads of the community. They preside over the education of the children, enjoin penances, pronounce excommunications, and determine the rank of each member of the community.

Between the French 'National Council' and 'Corps Législatif' were 'two councils,' one of which was called the Conseil des Anciens (consisting of 250 members), the other being the Conseil de Cinq-cents. The Florentine Council in the 13th cent. were called the Anziani. Senator means 'senior,' or elder.

Andelot (Treaty of), 28 Nov., A.D. 587. Between Gontran of Orleans and Childebert II. of Austrasia. By this treaty Burgundy was assigned to Gontran.

Andrew (Knights of St.), 10 Sept., 1698. A Russian military order (founded by Peter the Great). The cordon is sky-blue. The motto is 'For Religion and Loyalty.'

The Scotch order is generally called the Order of the Thistle.

Andrews (University of St.). Lectures commenced here in 1410. Charter granted by Henry Wardlaw, bishop of St. Andrews, 27 Feb., 1411. Chartered 8 March, 1432, by James I. of Scotland. St. Salvator College founded, 1455, by James Kennedy, bishop of St. Andrews. St. Leonard's College founded, 1512, by prior John Hepburn. St. Salvator's and St. Leonard's Colleges united 1747, and called the 'United College.'

The Pædagogy of Wardlaw was enlarged in 1538 by Archbishop Beaton, and called St. Mary's or New College.

Andrussow, in Russia (Truce of), 30 Jan., 1667. Between Alexis Michaïlowitz, czar of Russia, and John II., king of Poland, for fifteen years. It stipulated for the re-annexation to Russia of Smolensko, Polotsk, Mohilef, and Kief, with the abandonment of part of the Ukraine and Severia.

Ane'da or Agne'da. The modern Latin name of Edinburgh (Scotland).

Angel of the Church of Smyrna (The). Polycarp, the fourth of the Apostolic Fathers (q.v.). He is so addressed in the Book of the Revelation. It is said that he was a disciple of John, the apostle, who appointed him bishop.

Angel of the Schools (The). Thomas d'Aquinas, the fifth doctor (1224–1274). See 'Angelic Doctor.'

Angelic Doctor (The). 'Doctor Angelicus,' 'Angel of the Schools,' 'the Eagle of Divines,' 'the Universal Doctor,' &c. Thomas Aquīnas, or St. Thomas of Aquīno, in Italy, of the Dominican order (born 1227, died 1274, canonised by John XXII. in 1369, and declared by Pius V., in 1567, to be the 'Fifth Doctor of the Church'). He was a schoolman of the Aristotelian class, and a Nominalist (q.v.). His great opponent was Duns Scotus, a Realist (q.v.), of the Franciscan order; and from these two leaders Nominalists were called 'Thomists,' and Realists 'Scotists.'

The five doctors were Ambrose (340 397); Augustine (354 430); Jerome (345-420); Gregory, and Aquinas. See Addis and Arnold's Dict., 'Doctors of the Church.'

It is said that Thomas Aquinas was called the 'Angel of the Schools,' or the 'Angelic Doctor,' from his controversy 'Utrum Angelus possit moveri de extremo ad extremum non transeundo per medium.' Aquinas took the negative.

Angel'ici, 1st cent. Certain Christians who worshipped angels. They were most numerous in A.D. 180. Mentioned by St. Augustine in his 'Liber de Hæresibus,' 'qui angelos cultu divino prosequebantur.' Angelolatry was forbidden by the Council of Laodicea in 366, but enjoined by the Second Council of Nice in 787. See 'Angelites.'

Angel'ici. An order of knighthood instituted 1191 by the Emperor Isaac II.

Angel'icus, meaning 'Hymnus Angelicus,' is the hymn sung in the Mass, 'Glory to God in the highest, &c.,' sung by the angels at the Nativity. The Trisagion is also called 'Hymnus Angelicus.'

The monk's dress is called 'Angelicus,' or 'Angelica Vestis,' 'quod et ipsi dicantur angeli a patribus,' as in the Revelation the ministers of the churches of Asia are addressed as 'Angels.'

An'gelites (8 syl.), A.D. 494. Monoph'ysites (4 syl.), or heretics who maintained that Christ had but one nature. They received their name from Angelius, in Alexandria, where they used to meet. See 'Angelici.'

Angel'ium (The). The annunciation. First mentioned by Gelāsius in 492.

An'gelus, 1095 (Council of Clermont). A prayer and a bell which calls to the prayer. The Angelus is a prayer to the Virgin Mary, instituted by Urban II. It begins with the words 'Angelus Domini nuntiavit Mariæ' (Luke i. 28), then follows the salutation of the angel Gabriel, 'Ave Maria,' &c. The prayer contains three verses, and each verse ends with the salutation, 'Ave Maria.' The bell, which is rung three times a day, morning, noon, and evening, was instituted in 1316, by John XXII. It was Louis XI. who (1472) commanded it to be rung daily at noon.

Louis IX., in 1472, commanded all his subjects to repeat the 'Salutatio Angelica' every noon, at the sound of a bell. The Compline is about three hours after the Vespers, which are said at sunset, say 6 o'clock p.m.

Anglesea Leg (The). An artificial leg like that made for the Marquis of Anglesea.

Dr. Bly's leg is an improvement on the Anglesea leg.

Pronounce An'-gle-see.

Anglo-Israel Identity Society (The). A religious sect which holds that the inhabitants of Great Britain are none other than the lost ten tribes of the House of Israel. Some of the reasons assigned are these: (1) The children of Israel were to inhabit islands north-west of Palestine; (2) they were to speak a language not Semitic; (3) they were to possess colonies in all parts of the earth (Isa. liv. 3); (4) Israel was to have a nation from her, but independent of her (America); (5) Israel was to be under a monarchy; (6) Israel was to be unconquerable, but to be a great conqueror; (7) Israel was to be a sabbath-keeping people; (8) Israel was to be a prolific race; (9) Israel was to send missionaries to the end of the earth (Isa. xliii. 21).

Anglo-Israelism (19th cent., last quarter). The hypothesis that the English are the descendants of the lost tribes. See above.

Anglo-Saxon (Professorship of), in the University of Cambridge, 1878. Founded by the Rev. Joseph Bosworth, D.D., of Trinity College, and called the Ebrington and Bosworth Professorship of Anglo-Saxon. Stipend not less than 500*l.* a year.

Anne Margaret Elliot, married twice, first Colonel Ebrington, and then Dr. Bosworth.

Anglo-Saxon Chronicle (The). Said to have been begun at the instance of King Alfred. It begins with Cæsar's invasion, and ends with the accession of Henry II. (1154).

An'grias (The). The Mahratta pirates. Conaji Angria and his brothers began their piratical exploits in 1670. Angria was taken prisoner by the English in 1756, when his piratical state was overthrown.

An'ima Mundi, called by Plato, 'Psuchê tou kosmou.' Plato compared the great world to a human being (or the little world). As man is vitalised by the living soul within him, so the world itself is vitalised by its living soul, without which it would be a mere corpus mortuum. The sun would give neither light nor heat, the vegetable world would yield neither leaves nor seed, the animal world would consist of dead bodies only. The sun would not glow, the trees would not blossom, the air would not circulate, the rivers would not run into the sea, the sea would not evaporate, and the seasons would have no succession.

Stahl (1660–1734) called this 'Psuchê' 'Anima Mundi,' by which he meant that it is not God who vivifies and preserves all things in being, but a vital principle which dwells in the universe, as the soul dwells in man. This anima mundi is not material, but co-exists with all objects and quickens them:

Warms in the sun, refreshes in the breeze,
Glows in the stars, and blossoms in the trees,
Lives through all life, extends through all extent,
Spreads undivided, operates unspent.—Pope.

An'imism, Animists. The system which explains the phenomena of life and disease by the action of soul (anima), and rejects the solution of these phenomena as purely physical. Van Helmont may be called the chief advocate of animism, and the system was taken up by George Ernest Stahl in the 18th cent. Those who believe in animism are called 'Animists.' See Rom. i. 20.

The difference between Stahl's doctrine and Spinoza's is this. Stahl taught the existence of an independent and all-pervading 'anima'; but Spinoza taught the identity of phenomena and deity. Pope expresses Stahl's idea in the well-known lines—

Great in the earth, as in the ethereal frame, &c. See above.

Annals. Registers kept in Rome from the commencement of the state down to the time of Publius Mucius; they were made by the Pontifex Maximus, and were called 'Annales Maximi.' Livy freely used them in his history, Annals are bare records of events. History is tracing out the motives and consequences of these events.

Annals of Tacitus (The). Said to be a forgery by Poggio Bracciolini, a learned scholar of Tuscany (1381–1459), author of 'Historia Florentina' (printed 1715), and 'De Varietate Fortunæ' (printed 1723). The tale is that he was paid 500 gold sequins (about 250*l.*) by Cosmo de' Medici for his MS.; the original is still shown in the library of Florence. It was published in 1468, when Johannes de Spire produced 'the last six books, which he affirmed he had copied carefully from the original in St. Mark's, Venice;' but this original was only Bracciolini's forgery. The first six books did not appear till 1514 (i.e. 46 years after the last six). See 'Literary Forgeries,' &c.

The reply to this is that Poggio Bracciolini was a professional dealer in MSS. and purchased them if possible, or obtained permission to make transcripts. The sixteen books of Annals in MS. are not Poggio's original work, but merely a transcript of the original lent him to copy. The manifest reply is, first, that Poggio was not a mere tradesman, but apostolic secretary to Boniface IX. and seven succeeding popes (1412–1452). He attended the Council of Constance (1414–1415), most certainly not as a tradesman. He resided with Cardinal Beaufort in 1417; was chancellor of the republic of Florence in 1452, and was the author of two important works at least. Where is the original from which Poggio made his copy? And can any reference to the Annals' be shown before the 16th cent.?

The Annals consist of Books I., II., III., IV., half of V., VI., . . . XI., XII., XIII., XIV., XV., and part of XVI.

No writer has mentioned the name of the 'Annals of Tacitus' before 1533, when Beatus Rhenanus so speaks of the book, and may be said to have given it its name. See 'Tacitus and Bracciolini,' published by Diprose & Bateman, Lincoln's Inn Fields.

Annap'olis, in Maryland (U.S. America). So named in compliment to Anne (1669), afterwards Queen of England, when it was constituted the seat of local government.

An'nates (2 syl.), or 'first fruits.' In ecclesiastical law means the value of a spiritual living for a whole year. From 1260 to the time of the Reformation, the pope claimed the first fruits; but by the 26 Hen. VIII. c. 8 (1534) they were, in England, annexed to the crown, and by 2 Anne c. 11 the revenue thus arising was vested in trustees for a perpetual fund to augment poor livings. This fund is called 'Queen Anne's Bounty.' Annates were first calculated according to a rate made under Innocent IV. in 1253. This rate was augmented by Nicholas III. in 1292. The Council of Pisa pronounced them simoniacal in 1435, but Alexander VI., in 1500, doubled the rate.

It appears that these 'Annates' were not actually the whole produce of a living for a year, but a sort of property tax paid by the new incumbent on presentation.

Anne (1 syl.), Queen of England (1664, 1702–1714), sister of Mary (wife of William III.), and younger daughter of James II. Married Prince George of Denmark. She had thirteen children, only one of whom lived to the age of 11. The rest died in infancy.

Her style: Anne, D.G. of Great Britain, France, and Ireland, Queen, Defender of the Faith, &c.

Anne of Bohemia was the wife of Richard II.; Anne of Cleves was one of the wives of Henry VIII.; Anne of Denmark was the wife of James I. of England.

Anne, 'the Word.' Anne Lee (1736–1784), the apostle of the Shakers, by whom she was called 'Mother,' that is, 'the true Mother of all living in the new creation,' and 'the Morning Star of the second coming of Christ.' She was born in Toad Lane, Manchester, and her father was John Lee, a blacksmith. She married Abraham Standley, also a blacksmith, joined the Shakers, and migrated to New York in 1774.

Annius of Viterbo. Nannius, or 'Giovanni Nanni,' a Dominican (1432–1502), a literary impostor. His work, entitled 'Antiquitates Variæ,' professes to contain selections from Berosus, Manetho, Megasthenes, Archilocus, Myrsiles, Fabius Pictor, Sempronius, Cato, &c., but are, for the most part, mere fabrications. See 'Literary Forgeries.'

Anno'næ Præfectus. An officer appointed by Augustus to superintend the corn-market (ancient Rome).

Annual Indemnity Act (The), 1689. A clumsy makeshift for the repeal of the Corporation and Test Acts, whereby Dissenters were admitted into office in defiance of these acts, and were legally indemnified for violating them. An Act passed in every session of Parliament to indemnify those who neglected to take the sacrament before entering parliament or accepting some civil office.

By 22 Vict. c. 15, an Act of Indemnity secures from punishment or damage all those who have neglected to take the necessary oaths of office, &c.

Annual Mass, 'Missa Annuālis,' The mass which is said daily throughout the year.

Annual Register (The). Commenced by Robert Dodsley for the year 1758–9, appeared in June 1759. The 'Register' is published once a year, and contains a brief abstract of every event of historical interest, during the preceding twelve months. Also notices of new books and other miscellaneous matter. The work still goes on.

Edmund Burke assisted Dodsley in preparing his Registers.

The New Annual Register, edited by Dr. Morgan, was started 1781 and came to a close in 1825.

The Edinburgh Annual Register, written by Sir W. Scott and afterwards by Southey, commenced 1808 and closed 1827.

Annuncia'da, 1460. A society founded at Rome by Cardinal John Turrecremata for the marriage of poor young women. It now provides, every Lady-day, 60 Rom. crowns, a dress of white serge, and a florin for slippers to above 400 persons for marriage portions.

Annun'ciades (4 syl.). The name of several religious orders instituted in honour of the Annunciation.

I. 1362, called 'The Annunciades of Savoy,' created by Amadeus VI., count of Savoy. This was a military order.

II. 1500, an order instituted at Bourges by Jeanne de Valois, daughter of Louis XI., in honour of the ten virtues of the Virgin Mary.

III. 1604, 'The Celestial Annunciades,' instituted by Maria Vittoria Fornari. They dress in a blue mantle and are therefore called 'The Blue Sisters.'

The Annunciades of Jeanne de Valois wear a grey gown, a scarlet scapular, a blue simar, and a white mantle, to prefigure penitence, the passion of Christ, heaven, and virginity.

Annunciation (The), 25 March, our Ladyday. Commemorates the announcement of the angel to Mary that she was to be the mother of the Messiah (Luke i. 26–38).

In the Roman Catholic Church the Annunciation, or 'Festum Campanārum, is the Monday next after Easter Monday.

The 'Annunciatio Dominica' (or) 'Beatæ Virginis Mariæ' was instituted 629. By the Twelfth Council of Toulouse it was transferred to Dec. 18; but in 691 it was restored to March 25. See 'Order of the Annunciation.'

Annus Deliberandi, in Scotch law, is the interval allowed to the heir from the death of a proprietor of hereditary property to make up his mind whether he will accept the succession with its incumbrances or not. The time is now reduced to six months.

Annus Mirab'ilis, A.D. 1666. The year of the great fire of London, and of the successes of our arms over the Dutch. So called by Dryden, who has a poem on the subject.

Anomalis'tic Year. The interval between two successive times of the earth being at the least distance from the sun. It consists of 365 days, 6 hours, 13 minutes, 45 seconds, and is 25 minutes less than a mean tropical year.

Anomœans, 357. A branch of the Arian heretics, who maintained that the essence of the Son is not like the essence of God the Father (Greek anomoios, unlike).

They rejected the dogma called 'Homoiousian, i.e. that the nature of Christ was like that of God the Father. The 'heresy' was condemned by the Council of Ancyra in 358, and some subsequent councils.

Antal'cidas (Peace of), B.C. 387. A peace between Persia and the different states of Greece, arranged by Antalcīdas (or Antalkidas), the Lacedæmonian, after the suicidal contest called the Corinthean war (q.v.).

It ran thus: 'King Artaxerxes thinks it just that the cities in Asia and the islands of Clasomēnæ and Cyprus should belong to him. He also thinks it just that all the other Grecian cities should be left independent, except Lemnos, Imbros, and Scyros, which are to belong to Athens, as of old. If any state refuses to accept these terms, I, King Artaxerxes will make war thereon, both by sea and land.

Antelu'can. The 'before daylight' service held by early Christians to avoid observation (Latin, ante lucem, before daylight).

Anthropol'atræ, or 'Worshippers of Man,' so the Apollina'rians called the 'orthodox' Christians, because they worshipped Christ, who, they maintained, was 'a perfect man of a reasonable soul, and human flesh subsisting' (Greek, anthropos, latreia, man-worship).

Anthropomor'phism, in theology, means that God is formed like man, or rather that God is man's ideal, as every man forms his own god. One man forms him revengeful, another all merciful, a third love, and so on, according to each man's notion what a god ought to be.

Anthropomor'phites (5 syl.), 4th cent. Egyptian monks who maintained that God has the human form, and is of the same substance as man, because he made man in his own likeness.

Anti-Addressers, 1759. Those Irish Catholics who disapproved of the 'address,' and therefore seceded from the Catholic Association. See 'Addressers.'

Anti-Birminghams, 1680. Opponents of the Birminghams (q.v.), or Exclusionists. They were the friends of James, duke of York, and favourers of 'the right divine' and succession of James.

Anti-Burghers, 1747. Those Scotch Presbyterians who refused to take the required oath 'that they heartily and entirely concurred in the religion as by law established.' Those who accepted the oath were called Burghers.

Anti-Corn-Law League (The), 20 March, 1839. An association against the corn-laws was formed in London in 1836; the Manchester Anti-Corn-law Association was formed 24 Sept., 1838; the League with Cobden at the head was formed in 1839; dissolved 2 July, 1846. The corn-laws existing prior to the repeal consisted of a sliding-scale. When, for example, corn was selling at 62*s.* a quarter, a duty of 24*s.* 8*d.* a quarter was imposed on imported corn; for every shilling less than 62*s.* a quarter an extra shilling was added to imported corn; but when corn exceeded that price the duty rapidly increased, till it reached 73*s.*, when a minimum tax of 1*s.* was imposed. This minimum tax of 1*s.* a quarter is still paid to defray the expenses of registration.

Anti-Corn-law Wafers. Sheets of mottoes (40 for 1*s.*) advocating free-trade in corn. These mottoes are either original or mere extracts; some aimed at wit, some at smartness, some were political truisms, and some were satirical. During the Anti-Corn-law agitation these 'wafers' had a large sale.

Anti-Gallican Society (The), 1757. 'To promote British manufactures extend the commerce of England, and discourage the introduction of French modes and the importation of French commodities.' The headquarters of the society were at Lebeck's Head, Strand. St. George's Day (23 April) was the day of their anniversary feast.

It was at its best in 1771.

Anti-League League (The), 1844. A league formed to counteract the Anti-Corn-law League, on the supposition that the higher the price of corn, the higher the rate of wages. Chartists were anti leaguers.

Sir Robert Peel said experience proved that the high price of corn was not accompanied by a high rate of wages, and that wages did not vary with the price of corn (1845).

Anti-Pædo-baptists, 1607, now called Baptists. Certain dissenters who object to infant or pædo baptism, and maintain that no one should be baptized without expressing a personal wish to undergo the ceremony, and without a personal confession of faith. They perform the rite by total immersion. (Greek anti pais baptisma, against child baptism.)

Anti-Popes. Popes elected in opposition to the pope of Rome.

1. NOVATIANUS, elected in opposition to Cornelius, A.D. 251.
2. FELIX II., elected on the banishment of Liberius, A.D. 355.
3. URSIANUS or URSINUS, elected in opposition to Damasus, A.D. 366.
4. EULALIUS, elected in opposition to Boniface I., A.D. 418.
5. LAURENTIUS, appointed by Festus in opposition to Symmachus, A.D. 498.
6. DIOSCORUS, consecrated in opposition to Boniface II., A.D. 530.
7. VIGILIUS, appointed by Belisarius on the exile of Silverius, A.D. 537.
8. 9. PETER and THEODORUS, in the pontificate of John V., A.D. 686.
10. 11. PASCHAL and THEODORUS, elected in opposition to Sergius, A.D. 687.
12. 13. 14. THEOPHYLACTUS, CONSTANTINUS, and PHILIP, elected at the death of Paul I., A.D. 767-768.

Constantinus was deposed by Pope Stephen III., shut up in a monastery, and his eyes put out, Aug. 6, 768.

15. ZIZIMUS, elected in opposition to Eugenius II., A.D. 824
16. ANASTASIUS, who contested the election of Benedict III., A.D. 855.
17. SERGIUS, elected in opposition to Formosus, A.D. 891.
18. BONIFACE VI., chosen to succeed Formosus, A.D. 896, died a fortnight afterwards.
19. CHRISTOPHORUS, who deposed and imprisoned Leo V., A.D. 905.
20. LEO VIII., elected to succeed John XII., A.D. 964, deposed 965.
21. BONIFACE VII., elected on the death of Benedict VI., A.D. 974, deposed 975.
22. GREGORY, who unseated Benedict VIII., A.D. 1012, deposed by Kaiser Henry II., A.D. 1014.
23. SILVESTER III., elected to succeed Benedict IX. on his banishment, A.D. 1044. Benedict sold the pontificate to John, 1044.
24. BENEDICT X., who opposed Stephen IX., A.D. 1058.
25. HONORIUS, appointed by the diet of Basel in opposition to Alexander II., A.D. 1061, deposed by the council of Osbor, 1062.
26. CLEMENT III., elected at Brixen in opposition to Gregory VII., A.D. 1080. Clement was set up by Kaiser Henry IV.
27. ALBERT, appointed to succeed Clement, taken prisoner by the partisans of Paschal II. A.D. 1100.

28. THEODORIC, appointed to succeed Albert, A.D. 1100.
29. MAGINULFE, appointed to succeed Theodoric, A.D. 1106.
30. GREGORY VIII., elected in opposition to Gelasius II., A.D. 1118. Gregory was set up by Kaiser Henry V.
31. CALIXTUS, elected during the pontificate of Honorius II., A.D. 1124-1130.
32. ANACLETUS, elected by a majority of the conclave in opposition to Innocent II., A.D. 1130.
33. VICTOR IV., chosen to succeed Anacletus, A.D. 1138, abdicated.
34. VICTOR (also called Victor IV.), elected in opposition to Alexander III., A.D. 1159.
35. PASCHAL III., elected to succeed Victor, A.D. 1164.
36. CALLISTUS III., elected to succeed Paschal, A.D. 1168. Abjures his schism, 1178.
37. INNOCENT III., chosen in the place of Callistus, A.D. 1178. Taken prisoner by Pope Alexander, 1180, and died soon afterwards.
38. NICHOLAS V., chosen by Louis of Bavaria in opposition to John XXII., A.D. 1328. Renounced his schism, 1330.

The Great Schism of the West, 1378-1429. When there was a pope at Rome, and another at Avignon, and sometimes three or four popes.

Presuming the French popes to be anti-popes in this schism, we have—

39. CLEMENT VII., the French pope in opposition to Urban VI., A.D. 1378.
40. BENEDICT XIII., who succeeded Clement, A.D. 1394.
41. ALEXANDER V., elected by the Council of Pisa, which took upon itself to depose the two existing popes, and to elect a third, A.D. 1254.

There were now three popes, viz. Gregory XII. at Rome, Benedict XIII. at Avignon, and Alexander V.

42. JOHN XXII., who succeeded Alexander, A.D. 1410. Was deposed by the Council of Constance 1417, and Martin V. elected.

There were now four popes: Gregory XII., Benedict XIII., John XXIII., and Martin V.

43. CLEMENT VIII., succeeded Benedict XIII., A.D. 1424. Abdicates 1429, and thus the schism ends.

Gregory XII. died 1417, John XXIII. died 1419, Benedict XIII. died 1424. Clement VIII. abdicated 1429. Martin V. was left sole pope.

44. FELIX V., elected in opposition to Eugenius IV. by the Council of Basel, A.D. 1439; abdicated 1449. Undoubtedly an excellent choice, accepted by England, France, Germany, Spain and Lombardy. Only Italy (bar Lombardy) and Venice refused to acknowledge him.

Anti-Remonstrants, or 'Gomarists,' 1611. Ultra-Calvinists and followers of Frans Gomar, of Bruges (1563–1641), who arbitrarily laid down the dogmas of absolute predestination and reprobation in answer to the 'Remonstrance' of the Arminians presented to the states of Holland in 1610.

The word is also applied to the Jansenists (q.v.); and their opponents (the Jesuits) were termed Remonstrants.

Anti-Tobacconists (The), 1848. In Italy. The Austrians had the monopoly of tobacco in Italy, and the Liberals resolved to leave off smoking, so that a cigar became the sign of loyalty, and non-smoking of disaffection. The Austrians resented the anti-tobacco movement; and in order to put a stop to it, supplied their Italian troops with cigars, and ordered them to smoke them ostentatiously in the streets. This insult was resented by the Italians. On 17 March the Milanese rose in revolt and expelled the Austrians. Venice next rose and did the same. Sicily expelled King Ferdinand II., and elected in his stead Charles Albert (Albert Amadeus I.). At last Garibaldi appeared and liberated Italy, making it a united and independent kingdom.

Anti-Tory Association (The), 1834. Established in Ireland by Daniel O'Connell to oppose the new Tory administration under the leadership of Sir Robert Peel. See 'Irish Associations.'

Anti-Trinita'rians. Those who reject the doctrine of the Trinity on philosophical grounds.

Those who reject it on theological grounds are called Arians, Socinians, or Unitarians; Mohammedans are Anti-Trinitarians.

Anti-Union Society (The), 1830. A new name for the Repeal Association (q.v.), when that association was proclaimed. Both had the same object viz. the repeal of the Union effected in 1801, or the amalgamation of the Irish and British Parliaments. See 'Irish Associations.'

Antidi'co-Mariani'tæ (4th cent.), i.e. 'Detractors of Mary,' as the Apollinarians and Eunomians were called, who denied the perpetual virginity of Mary; in other words, believed that Mary had other children besides Jesus, who was her 'firstborn' (Matt. i. 25). The brethren of Jesus mentioned in the gospels they considered to be the other children of Mary (see Matt. xiii. 55, 56; Mark vi. 8; Matt. xii. 46; Gal. i. 19).

In English 'Antidicomarianites,' pronounce Antidi'-i-co Ma'-ri-an-ites (Greek, ἀντίδικος, Μαρία, (adversary [of] Mary).

Antino'mians, 1535. A sect founded by John Agricŏla, who maintained that Christ abolished the entire law for believers. They furthermore affirmed that good works do not further salvation, which is wholly of grace. 'Not of works, lest any man should boast.' 'If (salvation) is by grace, then it is no more of works, otherwise grace is no more grace. But if it be of works, then is it no more grace, otherwise work is no more work'

(Rom. xi. 6); (Greek, anti, nomos, opposed to the law, i.e. of works.)

The system is called 'Antinomianism.'

The Antinomians taught that the chosen were at liberty to help themselves to such a share of this world's goods as their necessities required; and that however they might sin in their outward man, in the inner man they sinned not. (Strype, Cranmer, p. 178.) This is a gross perversion of Antinomianism.

N.B. In New England, Antinomians, in the 17th cent., denied the 'moral law to be the rule of Christ' (John Harvard, 1628).

The Antinomians contended that all things were free and allowable to the saints without sin.—HOWITT, Hist. of Eng. vol. ii. p. 262.

Antiphona'rium. An Antiph'onary, or book containing the Antiph'onies throughout the year. Such as the 'Greater Antiphonies of O'; the 'Rogational Antiphonies'; the 'Alleluyatic Antiphonies'; the 'Antiphona ad introitum'; the 'Antiphonæ Invitatoriæ'; the 'Antiphona de Podio'; the 'Processional Antiphonies' &c. By the Constitutions of Archbishop Winchelsey, at Merton (1305), every parish church was ordered to have one.

The 'O Antiphonies' are the fifteen prayers beginning with the letter O ('Horæ Beatissimæ Virginis Mariæ'). The 'Antiphona de Podio' is the 'Salve Regina' made by Ademarus, bishop of Podium, i.e. Puy. The 'Antiphona ad introitum' was sung in introitu Missæ. The 'Invitatoriæ' were sung on Sunday nights.

Antiphon'eti. An image of Christ crucified set up near the pulpit. Du Cange quotes (vol. i. p. 276, col. 2) the following words:

Visus est sibi in occiduo graduum, qui ad sacram sedem ducunt, ascensu stare, ubi præter divinam Domini imaginem quam Antiphoneti appellant, ipsius etiam Niconis effigies expressa est.—MARTEN, 10, 6, Amplis. Collect, col. 880.

Antiquaries (The Society of). For the cultivation and understanding of the antiquities of the chief countries of Europe and America. It was started in 1572 by Archbishop Parker and Sir Robert Cotton; but James I. dissolved this society in 1604; and it was reconstructed in 1717.

The London Society was chartered in 1572.
The Scotch Society was founded in 1780.
The Royal Irish Society was chartered in 1786.
The French Society was founded, as the Académie Celtique in 1805; but in 1814 it changed its name into the Société des Antiquaires de France.

The American Antiquarian Society was incorporated in 1812 by the legislature of Massachusetts.

Antiquitates Variæ, 1498. A literary forgery by Annius of Viterbo (Nannius, Giovanni Nanni), a Dominican. His 17 volumes profess to be selections from Berosius, Manětho, Megasthĕnês, Archilŏcus, Myrsilês, Fabius Pictor, Sempronius, Cato, &c., but the selections are not genuine.

Anto'nian Laws (The). The laws of Mark Antony, the Roman consul.

1. To change the name of the month Quintĭlis into Julius (July).

2. To abolish the perpetual dictatorship.

3. To repeal the Judiciary Julian Law, commanding that the judices should be chosen from the senators and equitês only, and not from the tribuni ærarii.

The vanity of Augustus in making Sextilis (August) the same length as Quintilis (July), deranged the useful system that the even months, 2, 4, 6, 8, 10, 12, had thirty days each, and the odd numbers, 1, 3, 5, 7, 9, 11, had thirty-one days each.

Antonine Column (The). A column, like that in the Place Vendôme (2 syl.), Paris. It was erected by the Roman senate in honour of Marcus Aurelius Antonīnus, to commemorate his victories over the Marcomanni and other Germanic tribes. On the shaft is represented spirally the victories of the emperor, and an inscription was cut on the pedestal. Sixtus V. had the bad taste to substitute a gilt statue of Paul, holding a Latin cross, for that of Marcus Aurelius; and to substitute a new inscription. So that now the Apostle Paul surmounts a huge column commemorating victories over Germanic tribes; and the new inscription is absolutely ludicrous. It stands on the Piazza Colonna in Rome.

Antonine's Itinerary. Extending over the whole Roman empire, embracing all the main roads in Italy and the provinces, with the respective distances. Attached is a maritime itinerary of the distances from port to port. The distances of this itinerary were surveyed by command of Julius Cæsar. Augustus and Antony, B.C. 44, 30, 24; and A.D. 19; and the entire book was corrected and extended between 285–305.

The Peutingerian Table (q.v.) and the Jerusalem Itinerary are also valuable for ancient geography.

Antony's Fire (St.). A pestilence also called feu sacré and mal des ardents, especially destructive in France and Germany between 994 and 1089. It appeared in England in the years 1011 and 1012. Hugues Capet, founder of the Capetian dynasty, died of this terrible plague. See 'Feu Sacré,' 'Plague,' &c.

Called St. Antony's Fire, because Urban IV. in 1089 founded an order of St. Antony to take charge of those afflicted with this disorder. Never in the history of man was such a disastrous century as that which began at the close of the tenth. All Europe looked for the end of the world, which contributed not a little to the calamities which followed in battalions.

Antwerp. Fabulously derived from hand-werpen (hand-throwing); hence the arms of the city are two hands thrown into the Scheldt by the hero Brabo. Much more likely it is an t' werf (the city) on the wharf.

Anzia'ni (The), or seniors in Florentine history before 1282. They were twelve in number, two for each sestiere of the city. These seniors acted in concert with a foreign Podestà, and a captain of the people charged with military authority. See 'Ancients.'

Ape (1 syl.). The assumed signature of the famous caricaturist, who drew so many of our living notabilities. He was Signor Carlo Pellegrini, who died 1889.

Apega. Wife of Nabis, tyrant of Sparta. He invented an infernal machine which he called after his wife, 'Apega.' It was a box exactly resembling his wife in her royal apparel, but inside it was full of spikes which wounded the victim enclosed in almost every part of the body. The 'Iron Virgin' was a similar instrument of torture employed by the Inquisition. It represented a woman of Bavaria, and the spikes were so arranged as to pierce the least vital parts in order to prolong the sufferings of the victim inclosed. (Apega, 3 syl.)

Apellês of Europe (The). Antonio Allegri da Correggio (1494–1534).

Apelles of his age (The). Sam. Cooper is so called in his epitaph in Old St. Pancras Church (1609–1672).

Apex. In the Fenian organisation is the president of the head centres. See 'Bees.'

Apocryphal Scriptures, of the New Testament. From Eusebius:—

The Acts of Paul.
Pastor of Hermas.
The Revelation of Peter.
The Epistle of Barnabas.
The Institutions of the Apostles.
The Gospel according to the Hebrews.
The Gospel of Peter.
The Gospel of Thomas; Acts of ditto.
A Gospel of Matthew.
Acts of the Apostles by Andrew.
Acts of the Apostles by John.

Doubtful.

The Revelation of John.
The Epistle of James.
The Epistle of Jude.
The Second Epistle of Peter.
The Second and Third Epistle of John.

Eusebius, Book III. chap. 25. See 'Old Testament.'

Other books not mentioned by Eusebius. The Gnostic Scriptures were:

The Prophecies of Cain.
The Writings of Pachur.
The Psalms by Valentinus and Bardesanês.
The Gnostic Hymns by Marcus.
The Books of Adam, of Enoch, of Moseh, of Elijah, of Isajah, and many others.
Sundry writings by Barkor, Armagil, Barbelon, Balsamum, Lensiboras, &c.—Hier, Ad Theod. iii. 6, &c.

Apollina'rians, 4th cent. Followers of Apollinăris or Apollinarius, bishop of Laodicea, who denied that Christ had a human soul, and affirmed that the Logos or divine nature supplied the place of the reasonable soul. Condemned in the Council of Alexandria, A.D. 362, and again by the council at Rome in 375. In 378 Apollinaris was deposed.

Apologists. Those 'Fathers' who wrote 'Apologies,' or treatises in defence of the rites, doctrines, and moral conduct of Christians in the first three centuries.

Apollinaris (Claudius), 2nd cent., bishop of Hierapŏlis, was a Christian apologist.

Justin Martyr, 103–167. Wrote two 'Apologies,' both in Latin; one he addressed to Antonīnus Pius, in 150; and the other to the Senate, in 164. He says that the Christian religion tends to good morals and submission to rulers; shows that Christ fulfilled prophecy; and explains Christian rites and doctrines.

MEL'ITO, bishop of Sardis. Addressed his 'Apology for Christians' to Marcus Aurelius in 170.

ORIGEN, 185–254. Wrote 'An Apology for Christianity,' against Celsus. He became a Gnostic.

QUADRA'TUS, bishop of Athens. Presented his 'Apology' to Hadrian in 126.

TATIAN, born in Syria (flo. 170). Wrote his 'Apology' about 160. Afterwards he was accused of heresy, for forbidding the use of wine even in the sacrament of the Eucharist. He was a Gnostic.

THEOPH'ILUS of Antioch, 120–190. Wrote 'An Apology for the Christian Religion,' in three books.

Tertullian, 160–240. Shows in his 'Apology' that faith and patience were manifested by Christians in persecution.

Many others wrote in defence of Christianity, but not 'Apologies.' For example:

ARNOBIUS (flo. 296). Wrote a 'Disputation against the Gentiles,' in seven books.

ATHENAG'ORAS (flo. 117). Wrote a defence of Christians against the charges of atheism, incest, infanticide, and other abominations.

CYPRIAN, 200-250. Wrote on the 'Absurdity of Idolatry.'

JEROME, 345-420. Refuted the objection that no distinguished person had embraced Christianity.

MINUCIUS FELIX (flo. 250). Wrote a dialogue entitled 'Octavius,' in which the speakers represent several objections against Christianity, but are compelled to acknowledge their errors.

ORO'SIUS (flo. 415). In his 'History of the World' he refutes the accusation that plagues, famine, earthquakes, &c., were judgments of God to show his displeasure against Christians.

Besides these, CYRIL of Alexander wrote a reply to Julian the apostate; and THEODORET, in twelve sermons shows the superiority of the prophets and apostles to the Greek philosophers.

LACTANTIUS (250–325), wrote 'Divine Institutions,' in seven books; AUGUSTINE (354–430) wrote 'On the City of God.'

EUSEBIUS (270–338), though no Apologist, wrote an 'Ecclesiastical History,' in ten books, which served the same end.

In modern times.

GROTIUS (1583-1645) defended Christianity in his 'De Veritate Religionis Christianæ,' 1636.

LARDNER (Nathaniel), 1684-1768, did the same in his 'Credibility of the Gospel History,' 1727-1755.

BUTLER, bishop of Durham, (1692-1752), in his 'Analogy of Religion,' 1736.

WATSON, bishop of Llandaff (1737-1816), in his 'Apology for Christianity,' 1776.

Still more recently we have Neander, Thouck, and Reinhard (among Protestants); with Pascal, Bergier, Mayr, and Chateaubriand among Catholics.

The branch of theology which deals with the defence of Christianity is called 'Apologetics.'

Apology of Melanchthon (The). That is, his Apology or defence of the Augsburg Confession (q.v.), one of the Libri Symbolici Ecclesiæ Evangelicæ of the Lutherans.

Apostle of Beauvais (The). St. Lucian, who died 290. His day is January 8. Also patron saint.

Apostle of Brazil (The). Jose de Anchieta, 1533–1597.

It must be distinctly understood there is a great difference between a patron saint and an apostle. The former protects and is generally chosen by the people. The latter converts. Occasionally an apostle is subsequently chosen by a people as their patron saint.

Apostle of England (The). Hugh Latimer, bishop of Worcester, 1472–1555. Burnt at the stake in Mary's reign. See 'Apostle of the English.'

It was Hugh Latimer who said to Ridley while being chained to the stake: 'Be of good comfort, Master Ridley, and play the man. We shall this day light such a candle in England, as I trust by God's grace shall never be put out.'

St. George is patron saint of England, and St. Paul of London.

Apostle of France (The). St. Denys, i.e. Dionysius the Areopagite, burnt to death A.D. 95. Also patron saint of France.

Apostle of Hungary (The). St. Stephen (I.), King of Hungary (979, 997–1038).

Apostle of Infidelity (The). Voltaire (1694–1778).

Apostle of Liberty (The). Thomas Jefferson, third president of the U.S. America (1743–1826).

Apostle of Massacre (The). Jean P. Marat called himself so (1744–1793).

Apostle of Presbytery (The). John Knox (1505–1572).

Apostle of Temperance (The). Father (Theobald) Mathew, a friar of Cork, who began his temperance movement in Ireland in 1837, and met with wonderful success. The movement was in full force during O'Connell's repeal agitation and even during the potato famine (1790–1856).

Apostle of Virginia (The). Rev. A. Whittaker, 17th cent.

Apostle of the Abyssinians (The). St. Frumentius, who died 360. His day is 27 Oct. Also patron saint of Abyssinia.

Apostle of the Allemanian Nations (The). St. Gall or Gallus, an Irishman.

Apostle of the Alps (The). Felix Neff (1798–1829).

Apostle of the Ardennes (The). St. Hubert (656–730). His days are 30 May and 3 Nov.

Apostle of the Armenians (The). Gregory of Armenia (256–331). Also the patron saint of Armenia. His day is 30 Sept.

Apostle of the English (The). St. Gregory the Great is so called by the Venerable Bede (544–604).

Apostle of the English People (The). St. Augustine, who died 607. See 'Apostle of England.'

St. George is the patron saint of England.

Apostle of the French (The Great). St. Remi (439–535). His day is 1 Oct. The patron saint of France is St. Denys.

The patron saint of Paris is Ste. Geneviève.

Apostle of the Frisians (The). St. Wildrod or Willibrod (657–738). His day is 7 Nov. Also the patron saint of Friesland.

Apostle of the Gauls (The). St. Denys martyred in 272. His day is 9 Oct. St. Irenæus is sometimes so called (130–200). His day is 11 Nov. See 'Apostle of France.'

The patron saint of Gaul is St. Martin.

Apostle of the Gentiles (The). St. Paul, who died A.D. 66. His days are 29 June and 25 Jan.

Apostle of the Germans (The). St. Boniface, an English Benedictine monk, whose name was Winfrith or Winfrid, born at Kirton or Crediton, in Devonshire, then part of Wessex, in 680. He was archbishop of Germany in 731, metropolitan at Metz in 742, and was slain 5 June, 755, aged 75. St. Martin is the patron saint of Germany.

Gregory II. consecrated him bishop of the New German churches, in 725, and changed his name to Boniface (or Well-doer).

Apostle of the Goths (The). Ulfilas, their first bishop (348–388). He translated the Bible into the Gothic tongue, and one copy of the four gospels (if not more) is still extant.

Apostle of the Highlanders (The). St. Colomb (521–597). His day is 9 June. Also the patron saint of the Highlands.

Apostle of the Hungarians (The). St. Anastasius (954–1044).

St. Louis is the patron saint of Hungary; and also St. Mary of Aquisgranum (Aix-la-Chapelle).

Apostle of the Indians (The). Bartolomé de Las Casas (1474–1566). Also the Rev. John Eliot (1603–1690).

Apostle of the Indies (The). St. Francis Xavier (1506–1552). His day is 3 Dec.

Apostle of the Irish (The). St. Patrick (372–493). His day is 17 March.

Apostle of the Lowlands (The). Cuthbert, Archbishop of Canterbury (741–758.)

Apostle of the Netherlands (The). St. Amandus (594–667). He was bishop of Maestricht. Also the patron saint.

Apostle of the New Jerusalem (The). Emanuel Swedenborg (1688–1772).

Apostle of the North (The). St. Ansgar (801–864). Also Bernard Gilpin (1517–1583).

Apostle of the Peak (The). William Bagshawe, of Ford Hall, a nonconformist in the reign of Charles II. (17 Jan., 1627–8—2 April, 1702).

Apostle of the Scottish Reformers (The). John Knox (1505–1572).

St. Andrew is the patron saint of Scotland. His day is 30 Nov. It is said that his remains were brought by Regulus to Fifeshire, A.D. 368.

Apostle of the Slavi, or Slaves (The). St. Cyril, who died 868. His day is 14 Feb.

Apostles (The 14). According to Gospel history or Church tradition—

1. Andrew of Bethsaida, a fisherman, brother of Simon Peter, and son of Jona (bar-Jona). Bound to a cross like the letter X, called a St. Andrew's cross, by order of Ægæus, proconsul of Achaia (1st cent.). His day is 30 Nov. His symbol in paintings is a St. Andrew's cross. His scene of labour was Scythia, according to tradition.

2. Bartholomew of Galilee, a fisherman; supposed to be Nathaniel Bar-Tholemy. Flayed alive in Armenia,

A.D. 71. His day is 24 Aug. His symbol is a knife. His scene of labour was India, according to tradition.

3. JAMES I. (the Greater), of Bethsaida, a fisherman, brother of John, and son of Zebedee and Salomê. Beheaded at Jerusalem by Herod Agrippa, A.D. 43. His day is 24 July. His symbol is a pilgrim's staff and a gourd bottle.

4. JAMES II. (the Less), surnamed 'The Just,' supposed to have been a Jewish ecclesiastic. Brother of Simeon and Jude, called 'brothers of the Lord.' Son of Cleopas (or Alphæus) and Mary. Thrown from a pinnacle of the temple, and then beaten or stoned to death, A.D. 65. His day is 1 May. (See 'Philip.') His symbol is a fuller's club.

Said to be the first bishop of Jerusalem, and succeeded in 67 by his brother, Simeon or Simon.

5. JOHN (the beloved disciple, an Evangelist) of Bethsaida, a fisherman, brother of James I., and son of Zebedee and Salomê. The two brothers were called Boanerges. John was the youngest of the apostles, and died at an extreme old age at Ephesus between A.D. 91 and 100. His day is 27 Dec. His symbol is a bowl with a winged serpent flying out of it. He wore a priest's petalon.

6. JUDAS ISCARIOT, i.e. of the tribe of Issachar. Place of birth, parentage, and vocation unknown. Hanged himself A.D. 64.

7. JUDE, Judas not Iscariot, surnamed Thaddæus, of Nazareth. Brother of James II., and son of Cleopas (or Alphæus and Mary), a 'brother of the Lord.' Occupation unknown. Shot to death by arrows in Armenia or Persia, A.D. 80. His day is 28 Oct. His symbol is a club.

8. MATTHEW, or Levi, of Galilee, a Roman revenue officer at Gennesareth. One of the four Evangelists. Slain by a sword in Ethiopia (1st cent.). His day is 27 Sept. His symbol is a hatchet.

9. MATTHIAS, elected by lot to the college, in place of Judas Iscariot. Nothing known of him. Said to have been first stoned and then beheaded in Colchis (1st cent.). His day is 24 Feb. His symbol is a battle-axe.

10. PAUL, or Saul, of Tarsus. Probably designed to be a Jewish scribe. Brother of Rufus (Rom. xvi. 13), and son of Simon of Cyrenê, who helped to carry the cross (Mark xv. 21). Beheaded at Rome, A.D. 66. His days are 29 June (death), and 25 Jan. (conversion). His symbol is a sword.

11. PETER (Simon), or Cephas, of Bethsaida, a fisherman, brother of Andrew, and son of Jona (Bar-Jona). Crucified at Rome with his head downwards, A.D. 66. His day is 29 June. His symbol is two keys.

Called by Catholics 'the Prince of the Apostles.'

12. PHILIP, of Bethsaida, probably a fisherman. Parentage unknown. Hanged against a pillar at Hierapŏlis, a city of Phrygia, A.D. 80. His day is 1 May. (See 'James II.') His symbol is a long staff with a cross at the end.

13. SIMON or Simeon (Zealotês), probably a fisherman of Nazareth. Brother of James II. and Jude, and son of Cleopas (or Alphæus) and Mary. Crucified in Persia, A.D. 107, at the age of 120. The oldest and last of the Apostles. His day is 18 Feb. His symbol is a saw.

Said to have succeeded his brother James in 67, as bishop of Jerusalem.

14. THOMAS (surnamed Didymus), of Galilee. Probably a fisherman. Parentage unknown. He was run through the body with a spear at Coromandel (1st cent.). His day is 21 Dec. His symbol is a spear. His scene of labour was Parthia, according to tradition.

The Apostolic days are: Jan. 25, Feb. 18 and 24, May 1 (two apostles), June 29 (two apostles), July 24, Aug. 24, Sept. 27, Oct. 28, Nov. 30, Dec. 21 and 27. None in either March or April, the busy season of Lent and Easter, but two are placed in the following months of May and June.

Of the two non-apostolic Evangelists nothing is known. Probably Luke (Lucius) was a Roman by birth, and it is supposed he was a physician and an artist. Tradition says he was hanged in Greece on an olive-tree, in the 1st cent.

Mark is supposed to be John Mark, the companion of Paul. Tradition says that, being dragged through the streets of Alexandria, he was hurled from a high rock into the sea.

Apostles' Creed (The), or 'Symbol of the Apostles.' This creed is so called because each of the twelve clauses is attributed to one of the apostles. Thus:

1. PETER: I believe in God the Father Almighty, Maker of heaven and earth.
2. JOHN: [And] in Jesus Christ, His only Son, our Lord.
3. JAMES (Sen.): Who was conceived of the Holy Ghost, born of the Virgin Mary.
4. ANDREW: Suffered under Pontius Pilate; was crucified, dead, and buried. ('Dead' not in the Oriental Creed.) 'Was dead'=was deaded.

5. PHILIP: He descended into hell. (From the Creed of Aquileia.)
6. THOMAS: The third day He rose again from the dead. (St. Augustine.)
7. JAMES (Jun.): He ascended into heaven, and sitteth on the right hand of God the Father Almighty.
8. MATTHEW: From thence He shall come to judge the quick and the dead.
9. NATHANIEL: I believe in the Holy Ghost.
10. SIMON: The Holy Catholic Church, the Communion of Saints. (Added 6th cent.)
11. MATTHIAS: The forgiveness of sins.
12. JUDE: The resurrection of the body, and the life everlasting. (Last part belongs to the 3rd cent., the first part to the 4th cent.)

These twelve articles, we are told, were suggested by the Apostles in a grotto of Mount Olivet, before their final separation, and the Apostles were anciently delineated each holding a banderole, on which was inscribed the words of the symbol attributed to him.

Apostolic Bishops (The). The bishops of the Apostolic Churches (q.v.). In 1046 the Council of Reims declared that the bishop of Rome is the sole apostolic primate of the Universal Church, and hence such terms as apostolic see, apostolic nuncio, apostolic notary, apostolic brief, apostolic vicar, &c. meaning papal nuncio, notary, &c.

Apostolic Blessing (The). The blessing of the pope of Rome, as successor of St. Peter.

Apostolic Brethren, or 'Apostolici' (1260–1368). A Christian sect founded by Girolamo Segarelli, a weaver of Parma, who went about in the dress of an apostle, preached repentance, free society, and a return to apostolic manners. From 1290 his adherents began to denounce infant baptism, the dogma of purgatory, invocation of saints, prayers for the dead, and the corrupt lives of the clergy. In 1300 Girolamo Segarelli, the founder, and many of his followers were brought to the stake.

Dolcino then became the head of the society and drew together many thousands of followers, but in 1305 a crusade was preached against him, and being captured, he was burnt alive. The brotherhood lingered on till 1368, and gradually died out. Dante refers to Dolcino in the 'Inferno,' xxviii. 55.

Volumus quod nullus clericus, nulla secularis persona, intuitu religionis eorum, ac insolito habitu, eos de cætero recipiat, aut eis alimenta ministret.—Council of Jerusalem, 1267.

Apostolic Chamber (The). A council entrusted with the care of the revenues of the see of Rome. Equal to papal chamber or board.

Apostolic Churches (The). Alexandria, Antioch, Jerusalem, and Rome; sometimes Corinth and Ephesus are also included. These churches are supposed to have been founded by the Apostles themselves.

Apostolic Constitutions (The), or 'Apostolic Canons.' A collection of ecclesiastical laws attributed to St. Clement, a disciple of St. Peter, but proved to be not earlier than the 3rd cent. Indeed the Quini-Sext (q.v.) council, held at Constantinople in 690, pronounced the collection to be apocryphal. See 'Literary Forgeries.'

Apostolic Fathers (The). The immediate fellow-labourers of the apostles, born in the first century. They were: (1) Barnabas, who died A.D. 61; (2) Clement of Rome, 30–100; (3) Ignatius, who died 115; (4) Polycarp, 80–169. They were succeeded by the Primitive Fathers (q.v.)

Papias of Hierapolis, and Hermas, author of the 'Shepherd,' are sometimes ranked amongst the apostolic fathers. Papias died 163, Polycarp in 167, and Hermas in the 1st cent. It is doubtful whether Hermas is a proper name at all.

Apostolic Kings (The). Pope Sylvester II., in 1000, granted to Stephen of Hungary and his successors the right of so styling themselves. The reigning king is addressed as Your Apostolic Majesty, and referred to as H.A.M. In 1758 Clement XIII. conferred the title of H.A.M. on Maria Theresa, as queen of Hungary, and the emperor of Austria, as king of Hungary, continues the same style.

Apostolic Letter or Brief (An). A papal letter or brief.

Apostolic Months (The). The six following months: January, March, May, July, September, and November. That is, every alternate month beginning with January. It was on these months that the pope (according to the Vienna Concordat of 1448) took possession of the vacant benefices in Germany, &c.

Apostolic Party (The), 1819–1830. In Spanish history. Fanatical Catholics who were also absolutists. Their leaders were priests and their troops were smugglers and robbers. They ultimately merged into the Catholic party.

Apostolic See (The). The see of Rome, said to have been founded by the apostle Peter.

Apostolic Succession (The). The supposed succession of the priesthood in an unbroken line from the Apostles, by means of ordination and laying on of hands.

Apostolic Vicar (The), or 'Vicar Apostolic.' The cardinal who represents the pope in extraordinary missions.

Apostolical Canons, 'Canōnes Apostolici.' Two collections of ecclesiastical rules and formularies attributed to Clement of Rome (1st cent.). This, however, has been entirely disproved, and probably they were first drafted in the 2nd and 3rd cents., and the main portion is assigned to a period close upon the great council at Nice (A.D. 325). The first allusion to these canons is in the Council of Constantinople, A.D. 394. The whole number is 85, of which 50 are regarded with respect by the Western Church, but all are accepted by the Greek Church. See 'Apostolic Constitutions.'

The first fifty were translated from the Greek into Latin, in the 5th cent., by Dionysius the Younger. References being made in these canons to Eusebius (265–338), Athanasius (296–373), and Epiphanius (310–403), suffice to prove that parts at least of these canons cannot have been earlier than the 4th cent. (See 'Literary Forgeries.')

Apostolical Constitutions (The). In eight books, in which the Apostles are introduced as speakers. They are supposed to date from the 4th cent., but certainly much is of later date. They enjoin the duty of assembling twice a day for public praye 1and psalmody; the observance of fasts and festivals; the obligation of the Jewish Sabbath and the Christian Sunday; the duty of reverencing bishops as God's anointed ones and of inferior clergy as Christian magistrates. Epiphanius (367–403) speaks of these books, and, though not genuine, they are useful in showing the religious tone and feeling of the period. See 'Apostolical Canons.'

The first six books contain rules for a Christian life; Book VII. is an abridgment of the preceding six books, and Book VIII. relates to priests and their duties.

Apostolical Junta (The), 26 Sep., 1825. Formed by Ferdinand VII. of Spain for the purpose of assisting the ministry.

Apostolicals (The). Members of the Apostolical Junta (q.v.).

Apostol'ici, or 'Apostolic'ians,' or 'Apotac'tici.' Heretics mentioned by Papias, who died A.D. 169. They professed to follow the Apostles in having all things in common, and renounced riches and marriage. See 'Apostolic Brethren.'

Epiphanius' (310–403) says these vagabonds made use of the Apocryphal Acts of St. Andrew and St. Thomas.

Apostolicians. The Waldenses, or Vaudois, were so called in the 12th cent.; so were the Apostolic Brethren (q.v.) of the 13th and 14th cents. See also 'Apostolici.'

Apostol'icum (The), 7 Jan., 1765. A bull granted by Pope Clement XIII. at the solicitation of the Jesuits, confirming their institution. It was suppressed 11 Feb., 1765, by a Parlement of Paris.

The publication was forbidden in Portugal in 1765.

Apostoo'lians, or 'Apostoo'lists,' 1664. A branch of Baptists in Holland, founded by Samuel Apostool (1638–1700). They split from the Mennonites, and were Calvinistic in their views of absolute predestination.

Apotac'tici, or Apotac'titæ. The same as the Apostol'ici (q.v.).

Apothe'ker (The). The Fourteen Saintly Helpers (q.v.).

Similar to the Theoi Alexikakoi of the Greeks, and the Dii Averrunci of the Romans.

Apparel. To give apparel was, in Ireland, a symbol of lordship. Thus our John, as lord of Ireland, being applied to by Crovderg for help against the O'Conors, gave the required aid, and sent a quantity of scarlet cloth to be presented to the king of Ireland and the provincial chiefs, who acknowledged the English supremacy. It was, in fact, a livery.

O'Donnell applied for apparel (1541), a request which the Deputy, not understanding the political meaning, thought very strange, seeing that when he made it he wore a coat of crimson velvet with twenty or thirty pair of aglets, under a double cloak of rich crimson satin corded with black velvet, and a bonnet of equal splendour.—O'Conor, History of the Irish People, p. 128.

Appartements. Receptions held thrice a week by Louis XIV. at Versailles. An 'Appartement' was an assembly of all the court in the grand saloon from seven till ten, when the king sat down to table. There was first music, then billiards, cards, dominoes, chess, and dancing. A guest was at liberty to order of the attendants anything he wished for.

Appeal (An). An accusation by a private subject against another for some heinous crime, demanding punishment on account of some specified injury suffered, rather than for the offence against the public. In 1386 the members of the commission appointed to regulate the affairs of the nation and the king's household (Rich. II.) appealed of high treason the Archbishop of York, the Duke of Ireland, the Earl of Suffolk, Sir Robert Tresilian, and Sir Nicholas Brembre, for disputing their authority. The appeal was sent to the king, who was obliged to give way, and the accused fled, but only Sir Nicholas Brembre and Tresilian were captured and executed. The object of the appellants was really to depose the king, and take the crown into their own custody.

Appeal (Court of). The Judicial Committee of the Privy Council was constituted a Court of Appeal by 3, 4 Will. IV. c. 41 (1833), and by 14, 15 Vict. c. 83 (1851).

Appeal (Right of). 'Provocatio ad populum' in Roman law. This right was secured to all Roman citizens by the Valerian Law B.C. 509, but was abolished by the 'Twelve Tables' (q.v.), B.C. 451. It was restored by the Valerian-Horatian Law B.C. 449, and confirmed by several subsequent laws.

Appeal to Cæsar (I). 'Appello Cæsarem.' By the law of Porcius Læca, de capite et tergo civium, no Roman citizen could be put to death or scourged. His appeal was to a trial before the Centuries (B.C. 256); but in the empire, Cæsar represented the Centuries. It was somewhat like our habeas corpus, which ensures a fair trial.

Appeals (The Statute of). 24 & 25 Hen. VIII., 1532, 1533, forbidding all appeal to Rome; all processes of the Court of Rome in England; and abolishing entirely the judicial jurisdiction of the papacy in any affair connected with an English subject.

Appel comme d'abus (L'). This right was recognised in 1329. It was an appeal to the civil powers against the abuses of ecclesiastical superiors, whether in contravention of the constitutions or the concordats of the country.

Appellants, 1717. Those who appealed, or rather wished to appeal, to a general council against the bull called Unigenitus, issued by Pope Clement XI. in 1718, against the 'Moral Reflexions' of Quesnel. This book favoured the Jansenists and condemned the Jesuits. The bull condemns it in globo—that is, as a whole—without particularising any stated parts, doctrines, or dogmas, as objectionable. The archbishop of Paris, and the bishops of Mirepoix, Sénez, Montpellier, and Boulogne wished to refer the matter to a general council, but Louis XIV., in his usual overbearing manner, insisted that the bull should be accepted unconditionally. The controversy was kept alive till 1780, when the bull was registered by the Paris parlement, and the heat of the opponents cooled down; but even to this hour there are some appellants who disapprove of the bull.

Ap'pian Way (The), B.C. 302. A road between Rome and Capua begun by Appius Claudius Cæcus, during his consulship. The oldest and most famous of all the Roman roads.

Called the Queen of Roads (Regina Viarum).

Apple-pie Causes. Causes in which judgment is beyond the possibility of dispute. Lord Eldon used to say, 'I have often wished that all my causes were apple-pie causes.' He referred to a complaint made to him when he was resident fellow of University College. Some of the undergraduates complained to him that the cook had sent to table an apple-pie that could not be eaten. Lord Eldon ordered the cook to bring the pie before him, but the cook returning informed him that the pie was eaten; whereupon Lord Eldon gave judgment for the defendant. 'You complain,' said he to the undergraduates, 'that the pie could not be eaten, but the pie has been eaten, and therefore could be eaten.'

Apple-stall Legislation, 1851. The eviction of Ann Hicks from Hyde Park by the First Commissioner of Woods and Forests. In 1843 Ann Hicks had a little apple-stall in the Park. She obtained permission to erect a wooden stand in which to lock up her commodities. The wood was repaired by brick, then raised five feet high with a roof and chimney, then surrounded with hurdles which every few weeks encroached more and more upon the Park, and grew into a little garden. The Duke of Wellington, as Ranger of the Park, had to employ the Crown solicitors; and the commissioners had to pay Ann Hicks a sum of money by way of compensation before she could be got rid of.

Apposition Day. Midsummer-day is so called at St. Paul's School, founded by Dean Colet in 1509. It was designed for 153 boys, being the number of fishes caught by the disciples, as related in the fourth gospel, and dedicated to the boy Jesus, who at twelve years of age 'apposed' the doctors in the Temple.

Apprenticeship (Statute of), 1562–3 (5 Eliz. c. 4). Provided that no person should exercise any trade in England who had not served a seven years' apprenticeship. Abolished in 1814, except in the legal profession, in which clerks must be 'articled' before they can practise for themselves. See 'Arti.'

Appropriation Clause (The), 1888. A part of the 'Act for altering and amending the laws relating to the Temporalities of the Church in Ireland.' The temporalities of the Irish bishoprics were, by this clause, vested in ecclesiastical commissioners for the provision of divine service, the payment of church rates, the repairs of churches, and other similar purposes.

The statute abolished ten bishoprics, and united them to the ten remaining ones. It abolished those of Dromore, Raphoe, Clogher, Elphin, Killala and Achonry, Clonfert and Kilmacduagh, Kildare, Ossory, Waterford, and Lismore, Cork and Ross.

Après nous le déluge. 'Let the flood come, for aught I care, when we are gone' was the scandalous exclamation of Madame de Pompadour, the Court favourite of Louis XV. Louis himself said to the Duc de Choiseul, when urged to attend to business, 'Bah, duke! the crazy old machine will hold out my time; and my successors must look after themselves.'

Aqua Tofa'na, 'Acqua Tofan'ica,' 1709. A liquid poison concocted by Tofana of Palermo, and called by her 'Manna of St. Nicholas of Bari,' and said to be a liquid which oozed from the tomb of that saint. Four or five drops were fatal. Tofana confessed to the murder of 600 victims. Thought to have been a solution of arsenic.

In the 16th and 17th cents. Spara and her assistant, Gratiana, used a similar poison to kill young husbands when their wives wished to be widows. In 1659 the number of young widows in Italy excited the attention of Pope Alexander VII., and suspicion was excited against a society of young wives presided over by Spara, an old woman. Five were executed.

Aquæ et Ignis Interdictio, i.e. banishment.

It is somewhat remarkable that the Roman symbol of marriage was 'Fire and Water,' not, perhaps, because man and wife in old Rome led a cat and dog life, but simply because fire and water are two essentials of 'married life,' or 'home.' Bachelors could partake of the Ignis et Aqua of other men.

Aquarians. A very early section of Christians who celebrated communion with water instead of wine. St. Cyprian speaks of them with condemnation; but it is said that they drank water to prevent detection by their breath.

Aquitaine, Aquita'nia. One of the four great regions of ancient Gaul, including all the south-west part lying between the Pyrenees, the Gulf of Gascony, and the river Garonne.

Henry II. called himself 'dux Normannorum et Aquitanorum.'
Richard I., John, and Henry III. called themselves 'dux Normanniæ et Aquitaniæ.'
Edward I., II., III., dropped the former and called themselves 'dux Aquitaniæ.'
Between Edward III. and George III. Franciæ was substituted for 'Aquitaniæ' and rex for dux.

Arabella (The Lady)—that is, Arabella Stuart, 1575–1615. Cousin of James I.

She was the daughter of Charles Stuart, earl of Lennox; and Charles was younger brother of Henry Darnley, who married Mary Queen of Scots. Hence, James I. and the Lady Arabella were the children of two brothers.

Mary Queen of Scots claimed the throne of England as the grand-niece of Henry VIII. and Queen Margaret. But Charles Lennox married the niece of Queen Margaret, and consequently was one degree nearer to that queen than Mary was. Besides, the Countess of Lennox was a native Englishwoman. The name of the countess was Margaret, and, as Sir Walter Scott observes, if brought to a court of law, English lawyers would probably have decided against Mary Queen of Scots and her son James.

Arabian Literature in Spain (The Golden age of), 961–976. When Al Hakem II. was king of Cordŏva. Al Hakem II. founded schools, endowed colleges, invited over learned men of all countries, and formed at Cordova an immense public library.

Arabian Odyssey (The). Mr. Hole, in his remarks on the 'Contes Arabes' ('Arabian Nights'), considers 'Sinbad the Sailor' as the Arabian Odyssey.

The 'Arabian Nights Entertainments' are the 'Contes Arabes' of Antoine Galland, a French orientalist, who travelled under the patronage of Colbert. They were published in Paris in 12 vols. (1704-1717).

Arabic (Professorship of). In the University of Cambridge, 1632; founded by Sir Thomas Adams, Bart., and endowed with a stipend of 40*l.* a year. The present stipend is 540*l.*

Arabic versions of the Bible. I. The Old Testament, A.D. 925, translated by Rabbi Saadia Gaon Haphitomi.

II. The Pentateuch, translated in 1486, by Harites ibn Sina.

Ar'biter Elegantia'rum. Petronius was the director-in-chief of the pleasures and amusements of Nero. Beau Nash was the 'arbiter elegantiarum' of Bath (1704, &c.).

Arbitrary Appropriation (The), 12th cent. The permission to pay tithes wherever a person thought proper. Innocent III., by a decretal epistle, abolished this liberty, and enjoined that every man must pay his tithe to his own parish church.

Arbor Day. A day set apart in Canada and the United States for planting trees. Thus—

The 2nd Wednesday in April 1874 was Arbor Day in Nebraska, when twelve million trees were planted in that state alone.

The 15th of April, 1876, was Arbor Day in Michigan.

The 3rd Tuesday in May 1876 was Arbor Day in Minnesota, when 1,842,886 trees were planted in that State.

The 27th of April, 1882, was Arbor Day in Ohio.

The first Friday in May 1887 was Arbor Day in Canada.

The first Friday in May should be set apart by the trustees of every rural school and incorporated village (in Canada) for the purpose of planting shady trees, making flower-beds, and otherwise improving and beautifying the school-grounds.—Education Department of Ontario.

Arca'na. The secret operations of alchemists, the chief of which was the 'Philosopher's Stone.'

The Double Arcane, or Arcānum, the sulphate of potash.

The Coral Arcane, or Arcānum, the deutoxide of red mercury, prepared by nitric acid.

The Jovial Arcane, or Arcānum of Jupiter, a mixture of the deutoxide of tin and nitrate of mercury.

Archangels (The Seven).

CHAMUEL, represented as bearing a cup and staff.

GABRIEL, the messenger of God; represented as floating through the air, with his hands crossed over his breast. Also with royal robes, bearing a lily in his hand.

MICHAEL, represented in complete armour, bearing a sword. Sometimes he is represented with eyes bandaged, and bearing a sword and pair of scales, in allusion to his being the angel of the Judgment.

RAPHAEL is represented as a pilgrim with staff and gourd; or a traveller carrying a fish (Tobit).

URIEL is represented carrying a parchment scroll, to signify his being the interpreter of prophecies.

ZADRIEL bears the sacrificial knife which he took from Abraham, when the patriarch was about to slay his son.

ZOPHIEL bears a flaming sword.

Archdeacon's Court (The). To hear ecclesiastical causes, subject to an appeal to the bishop, 24 Hen. VIII. c. 12.

Archê and Duum'virat. The vital principle and the soul. Terms used by Van Helmont of Brussels (1577–1644) to express the dual nature of man. By archê he meant the vital principle penetrating the entire body, which principle performs all the functions of nutrition and digestion. 'Duumvirat' with him meant the intellectual principle or soul. He called it duum-vi-rat because it resides in the 'two organs' called vi[scera] and rat[a], that is the bowels and the spleen. See 'Natura Naturans,' 'Anima Mundi,' and 'Pre-established Harmony.'

He did not place the soul in the brain, because he said the brain has no blood; but as the digestive organs are so intimately wrapped up with the intellectuality of man, he placed the soul there.

Archestratides, B.C. 577. The Archons of Athens.

Pronounce Ar-kes-trat'-i-dees.

Archibald Bell-the-cat. Archibald Douglas, earl of Angus (died 1514).

An armed conclave was held in Lauder church (on the subject of ridding the kingdom of the upstart Cochrane, who had risen from the station of a mason to become the earl of Mar). Lord Gray reminded them of the fable of the mice which laid a project for preventing the ravages of the cat by tying a bell round her neck. 'An excellent project indeed,' said one of the conclave, 'but who would undertake to bell the cat?' 'That will I,' exclaimed Douglas, earl of Angus; and ever after he was called Archibald Bell-the-cat.—Sir W. SCOTT, Hist. of Scotland, xx.

Archimandrite. A father provincial of the Greek Church. The superiors of convents are Mandrites (2 syl.) or Hegumĕni.

Pronounce Ar'-ki-man'-drite.

Archon'tics. 'Archon'tici' or Valentinians, a section of the Gnostic school founded by Valentinus in the 2nd cent. So called because they taught that 'mundum universum a Deo conditum opus esse ἀρχόντων.' They denied the resurrection of the body, the divine institution of the sacraments, and maintained that the incorporeal could not communicate with the corporeal, or that a spirit god could reveal anything to a material substance like man.

Arctic Highlands (The). That part of the American continent which lies between Hudson's Bay and the mouth of the Mackenzie. The general route of the explorers of a north-west passage, such as Franklin, Richardson, Back, Dease, Simpson, Rae, &c.

Areop'agites (The), (5 syl.). An Athenian court of judicature, which was held on the Mars Hill (in Greek, Arês Pagos). All wilful murders came under the cognisance of this court. The number of members varied; but on a column in the citadel of Athens, erected to Rufus Festus, the number is stated to have then been 300.

Argen'teus Codex (The), or 'Silver Book.' The MS. of Ulphilas's Mœso-gothic translation of the gospels, discovered in the abbey of Werden, and taken to Prague in 1597. It was captured at Prague in 1648, and presented to Christina of Sweden; subsequently, it was presented to the University of Upsala in 1662. It contains a large part of the four gospels and is written on vellum, the letters being silver, and the initials gold. (Ar-gen'-te-us, 4 syl.)

Ar'gentine Republic (The), 1816. Thirteen confederated provinces of Rio de la Plata, South America.

Argyll. God bless the Duke of Argyll! The Duke of Argyll set up rubbing-posts for cattle in the Highlands of Scotland. When the tenders of cattle used these posts for their own delectation, suffering from what they call yuke, they gratefully ejaculated, 'God bless the Duke of Argyll!'

Pronounce Ar-gile.

A'ria Cat'tiva Mala'ria. So the Italians call the emanations of the Pontine marshes, which produce fevers. The aria cattiva reaches even to the lower parts of Rome.

A'rian Controversy (The), 4th cent. In the time of Constantine the Arians were very numerous. They withdrew from the Trinitarians, built their own churches, and ordained their own bishops. The General Council of Nice, A.D. 325, condemned the Arians as heretics.

A'rianism, A.D. 312. The religious tenets of Arius of Alexandria (270–336), who disavowed the dogma of the Trinity, and denied that Christ, the Word, is co-equal and consubstantial with God the Father. In fact, he maintained that Christ is not God at all, but was a human being, born of human parents.

The religious views of Arius were condemned in the First General Council held at Nice in 325. Arius said: If God is one, all wise, all powerful, and everywhere present, it is a contradiction of terms to suppose a second possessed of the same attributes. The party-word of the Arians was homoiousios not homoousios. That of the Athanasians was homoousios not homoiousios (homo-ousios = identical in nature; homoi-ousios = similar [but not identical] in substance).

Arios'to of the North (The). Sir Walter Scott (1771–1832).

Aristar'chos and Zoilos. Critics. Aristarchos (B.C. 160–88) of Samothrace revised Homer with such severity that his name is proverbial for a caustic critic. Zoïlos of Amphipŏlis also criticised Homer with equal severity and was called 'Homeromastix.'

Aristides (The British). Andrew Marvell (1620–1678), poet, satirist, and politician. He was the last paid M.P. for Kingston-upon-Hull.

Pronounce Ar'-ris-tī'-dees.

In 1678 the Lord Treasurer Danby paid a visit to Andrew Marvell in his humble lodging; and, at parting, slipped into his hand a cheque for 1000*l*. Marvell bade the Treasurer wait a moment, and said to the serving boy, 'Jack, child, what had I for dinner yesterday?' 'Don't you remember,

Sir? It was a shoulder of mutton?' 'Aye, true! I remember. And what am I to have to-day?' 'The blade-bone broiled.' 'So, my lord, you see my dinner is provided. I thank you, but there is the piece of paper you gave me. My services belong to my constituents.'—C. THOMSON, Autobiography, p. 87.

Aristi'des (The English). John Pym, the republican (1584–1643). See above.

He sought no advantage to himself, he derived nothing from his exertions or his prominent position, but the satisfaction of seeing his country saved by his labours. He derived no influence from wealth or rank, for he had none of either; his whole prestige was intellectual and moral worth. He wore himself out for the public good, and died as poor as he commenced, the only grant which he received from the state being an honourable burial in Westminster Abbey.—HOWITT, Hist. of Engl., 'Charles I.,' chap. iv. p. 242.

Aristides (The French). M. Grévy, the third president of the third republic of France, from 1879 to 1884.

Aristoph'anes (5 syl.). Samuel Foote (1722–1777) is called the English or Modern Aristophănês.

Aristophanes of his age (The). J. Baptiste Poquelin de Molière, the French dramatist (1622–1673).

Aristophanes of the Revolution (The). Camille Desmoulins (1762–1794). See above.

Aristote'lian Categories (The). The ten Aristotelian categories are: (1) substance; (2) quantity; (3) quality; (4) relation; (5) action; (6) passivity; (7) position in space; (8) position in time; (9) situation; (10) possession.

Aristotelianism. The system of Aristotle's logic and metaphysics applied to the Christian system in the middle ages. This substitution of reason for faith, and logical inferences for what are called 'inspired truths,' gave birth to the Scholastics. The tendency of Platonism was to enthusiasm and mysticism, that of the Aristotelians to subtlety and logical minuteness. Platonists tended to fanaticism, Aristotelians affected disputation. Thomas Aquīnas was an Aristotelian, Duns Scotus a Platonist.

Aristotle of China. Tehuhe (8 syl.), who died A.D. 1200, also called 'the Prince of Science.'

Aristotle of Christianity. Thomas Aquīnas, who tried to reduce the doctrines and dogmas of Christianity to syllogistic formulæ (1224–1274).

Aristotle of the nineteenth century (The). George Cuvier (1769–1832), the great French naturalist.

Ark of the Covenant (The). Exod. xxv. A chest of shittim wood, the lid of which was of pure gold. It contained at one time the two stone tables of the law, a pot of manna, Aaron's rod, and the book of the law. The lid was the 'Mercy Seat.' It was taken to Babylon and lost sight of.

'Shittim wood,' probably cedar.

Arkan'sas (U.S. of America). So called in 1819 from its chief river. The inhabitants of this state are nicknamed 'Toothpicks.'

The rivers are the Mississippi, the Arkansas, the Red River, the White River, and the St. François. The Arkansas is a magnificent river, navigable for 1,980 miles, area reckoned 178,000 square miles.

Arm of Iron (The). Baldwin, who married Judith, widow of Ethelbald. Judith, when she married Ethelbald, was a widow, having been previously married to his father, Ethelwulf.

Baldwin I., Bras de Fer, count of Flanders, died 877.

Arma'da (The), or 'The Invincible Armada,' as the Spaniards vauntingly named it, 29 July to 7 Aug., 1588. The Armada consisted of 130 vessels, four of which were gigantic galleys, and the whole carried 2,500 cannons. Against this was opposed 50 English vessels no bigger than yachts, and 30 queen's ships, the biggest of which was smaller than the least of the Spanish ships. The Armada was so roughly handled that it tried to retreat round the Orkneys, but a storm scattered the ships and dashed them to pieces against the Irish cliffs. What escaped were 50 of the 130 ships, and 10,000 of the 30,000 men—a miserable wreck. The medal struck to commemorate this mighty overthrow had for its legend, 'He sent out his arrows and He scattered them' (Ps. xviii. 14).

Armagnacs (Les), 1407–1497. In French history. The faction headed by Bernard VII., comte d'Armagnac, during the insanity of Charles VI. The other faction was that of the Burgundians led by Jean Sans-peur, duke of Burgundy. The object of each was to get possession of the king, and thus obtain mastery of France under the title of regent. The original Armagnac faction was called the Orleanists, from Charles, duke of Orleans, who married the daughter of the Count of Armagnac and was assassinated in 1407 by the Duke of Burgundy. On the death of the Duke of Orleans the Count of Armagnac put himself at the head of the Orleanist party, entered Paris at the head of an army in 1413, and was named Constable by the Queen Isabella. He made himself odious by his exactions, and broke with the queen, who fled to the court of Burgundy in 1418. The Burgundians now entered Paris and drove out the Armagnacs. The count fled, was discovered, and assassinated with many of his adherents. The race died out with Charles I., brother of Jean IV., in 1497.

Armatoles (3 syl.), or 'Armatōli.' A Thessalian militia instituted at the beginning of the 16th cent. by Selim I. to oppose the incursions of the Klephtes. In the insurrection of 1821 the Armatoles and Klephtes united against Turkey. Botzaris was the most illustrious leader of the Armatoles.

Armed Neutrality (The), 1780. Against Great Britain, which insisted on the right of search during the American war, to be assured that neutral vessels were not carrying to America articles reckoned contraband of war. Catharine of Russia resisted this claim, and was joined by other European states on the principle that 'free bottoms make free goods.' Denmark and Sweden joined Russia in August; the States-General on 24 Dec.; Prussia on 8 May, 1781; the Kaiser, 9 Oct.

The treaty between Russia, Denmark, and Sweden was ratified 16 Dec., 1800.

Armée de Condé (L'), 1789. An army collected on the banks of the Rhine by Louis Joseph, prince de Condé, to resist the Revolution. It was distinguished for its valour at Wissemburg, Haguenau, and Bentheim; but in 1800 the prince took refuge in England. He returned to Paris at the restoration, and died at Chantilly in 1818.

Arme'nian Era (The). Commenced 7 July, 552. Superseded by the Julian era in 1330.

Arme'nian Liturgy (The). Dates from the time of Gregory the Illuminator (257–331), who introduced Christianity into Armenia. It is based on the Liturgy of St. Chrysostom.

Arme'nians (The). Christians of Armenia, and the purest of the disciples of Eũtỹches (3 syl.). They still maintain that the manhood of Christ is of a divine and incorruptible substance. The Jacobites say the Armenian Christ is a mere phantom; and the Armenians retort by saying the Christ of the Jacobites is a God with all the infirmities of the flesh, and even with the infirmities of nutrition and digestion. They are pretty numerous in Russia, Austria, and Turkey. See 'Arminians.'

The Armenians believe that the Holy Ghost proceeds from the Father only. See 'Filioque.'

Armin'ianism, 1603. The religious tenets of Dr. James Arminius, a Latinised form of Harmennsen or Hermannsen, a native of Holland (1560–1609). The following five points are the most salient: (1) God wills that all should be saved, and His predestination is only the effect of His foreknowledge; (2) Christ died for all, and God will bestow eternal life on all who repent and believe on Christ; (3) Man is of himself incapable of true faith, and hence the necessity of being born again by the Holy Ghost; (4) All good works are to be attributed to the Holy Ghost, but that Holy Ghost forces no one against his own inclination; (5) God gives to the true believer the means of continuing in grace. Condemned by the Synod of Dort in 1618.

At the present day, Arminians reject all 'creeds;' advocate the right of private judgment in the interpretation of Scripture; virtually reject the dogma of original sin; look on the sacraments as religious ceremonies; dwell on preaching more than on churchism; and are anti-Calvinists.

Armin'ians. Anti-Calvinists in the five points. See above.

Arms of Bourges (The). An ass on an arm-chair. The tradition is this: Asinius, a Roman governor of Bourges in the time of Cæsar, being too ill to stand, was carried in an arm-chair to animate his troops; and gained a signal victory. Be this as it may, the arms are a never-failing source of jests; and to honour one with the arms of Bourges is like giving Dr. Pangloss the degree of A double S.

Pronounce Bourjh.

Arms of the English sovereigns (The).

WILLIAM I. and II. Gules, 2 lions (leos pardés) passant gardant Or. And for Matilda of Flanders, gyronny of 8; in the nombril point a plain shield gules.

HENRY I. and Matilda of Scotland. England as before, and Scotland.

STEPHEN and Matilda of Boulogne. Gules, 9 sagittaries Or, 3 torteaux.

HENRY II. England as before; and for Eleanor of Aquitaine, gules, 1 lion passant gardant. His cognisances were a crescent beneath a star, an escarbuncle of 8 rays, and the broom-plant or genista for his name Planta-genet.

RICHARD I. 3 lions passant gardant for England; and for Berengaria of Navarre, a cross botonné Arg. Motto: Dieu et mon droit.

HENRY III. England; and for Eleanor of Provence, paly of 8, Or and Gules.

EDWARD I. England; and for Eleanor of Castile, a label of 5 or 6 q. With Margaret of France, England and semée de lys.

EDWARD II. The same with his father, but with 2 small castles on the side of his throne to show his descent through his mother, from Castile.

EDWARD III. England, within a border of France (i.e. Az. semée-le-lys, placed on his throne, between 2 fleurs-de-lys, to show his descent from France). He first quartered the arms of France in 1858. His cognisances were the sun issuing from the clouds, the stump of a tree sprouting.

RICHARD II. France and England quarterly, with a label of 5 points, the middle point charged with the cross of St. George. He was the first to bear supporters, which were 2 angels.

HENRY IV. France and England quarterly, 4 fleurs-de-lys, and the supporters of Richard II.

HENRY V. and VI. France and England quarterly, the 5 fleur-de-lys reduced to 3, in imitation of Charles VI. of France. Supporters, the black bull of Clare and white lion of Mortimer. Crest, the fleur-de-lys of France, and the lion of England conjoined. Likewise with 2 lions' supporters, and arms within the garter.

EDWARD IV. V. France and England. Supporters, a lion and a white hart.

RICHARD III., France and England, between 2 boars, or a bull on the right and a boar on the left.

HENRY VII. France and England, surrounded with a garter, and ensigned with a large crown. Crest, the portcullis, from the mother of the family of Beaufort. Supporters, a red dragon, from Cadwallader; and on the left a greyhound Arg. collared Gules, from the Somersets. Badges, the white and red rose per pale.

HENRY VIII. France and England. Supporters, a red dragon and greyhound (in the early part of his reign), afterwards a lion of England and a red dragon sinister. For Katharine of Aragon, impaling Castile and Leon, and Aragon and Sicily.

EDWARD VI. France and England. Supporters, a lion and a griffin.

MARY. A lozenge, 1 and 4 France, 2 England, 3 Spain. Supporters, an eagle dexter, and a lion rampant gardant sinister.

ELIZABETH. France and England, ensigned with imperial crowns. Supporters, a lion dexter crowned, and a red dragon sinister.

JAMES I. France, England, Scotland, and Ireland, differently blazoned. Supporters, lion and unicorn.

∴ George III. omitted France, and it has been omitted ever since.

Army Book 48. The orderly corporal's ledger, a monthly account-book, each page of which is headed Company Daily Messing Account. It contains an exact account of the articles and price of every eatable served to the company, in four columns. (1) The article (as tea, sugar, oatmeal, &c.); (2) the quantity; (3) the rate charged; and (4) the sum totalised.

Army Plea (The). See under 'Plea.'

Army of England (The), 1797. A French army raised by the Directory and placed under the command of Bonaparte (Napoleon), for the subjugation and plunder of England. After visiting Etaples, Ambletense, Boulogne, Calais, Dunkirk, Furnes, Newport, Ostend, and Walcheren, Bonaparte satisfied himself that the attempt must be abandoned.

Again, 1803, when Bonaparte was first consul, he assembled a fine army on the heights above Boulogne, called the 'army of England,' and there continually exercised it, under the inspection of Soult, Ney, Davoust, and Victor; but hearing that England was one vast camp, he abandoned his projected invasion in despair.

Army of God and the Church (The), 1215. The barons and their retainers who took up arms against King John when he refused, at Oxford, to sign Magna Charta.

Pandulph told the king that the primate of the kingdom ought to excommunicate the barons for daring to present the charter; but Stephen Langton replied, he ought rather to excommunicate the foreign mercenaries who overran the kingdom, and indeed would do so, unless the king ordered their instant dismissal.

Army of Reserve (The), 1804. A contingent to the regular army enforced on every parish by William Pitt. The men were called out for five years' service, but were not compelled to quit the United Kingdom. The reserve were attached to the regulars as second battalions.

Army of Viscounts (The), 1568. An army of Huguenots which overran Gascony, Quercy, and Languedoc. So called because it had for leaders Viscount Montelar, Viscount Bruniquel, Viscount Caumont, and Viscount Rapin.

Viscounts pronounce Vi'counts.

Army of the Cross (The), and 'Soldiers of the Cross,' the crusaders. Every man wore a cross cut in red cloth either on his shoulder or on his breast. First crusade was 1096 (Rufus reigned in England at the time).

Army of the Indus (The), 1839. An army under the command of Sir

John Keane, raised to restore Shah Shuja to the throne of Afghanistan, from which he had been driven by Dost Mohammed, chief of Cabul. The army consisted of a British force amounting to 28,000 men, 6,000 Sikhs of the Punjab, and 5,000 troops raised by the Shah Shuja. The shah was restored and crowned 8 May; Ghazni was taken 2 July; Jellalabad 30 July; Dost Mohammed fled to Bokhara, and Sir John Keane entered Cabul 7 Aug., 1839.

Arnaldists. A branch of the Waldenses; so called from Arnaldo of Brescia (1100–1155). This Arnaldo was a disciple of Abélard, but on his return to Italy became a monk, and introduced numerous reforms, to bring back his followers to primitive times. He was condemned by Innocent II. and the Lateran Council in 1139, after which he withdrew to Switzerland. Wishing to increase his following, he went to Rome in 1144, but was driven out by Lucius II. and Eugenius III. He was seized by Barbarossa and put to death. See 'Waldenses.'

Pronounce Ar-nol'dists.

Ar'naoot. An Albanian Mohammedan. A pasha's bodyguard should be composed of Arnaoots.

Arnold's Historical Essay. Oxford University. Value 42*l.* annually. Founded, by subscription, in honour of Dr. Arnold, Regius Professor of Modern History (Head-Master of Rugby), 1850.

Arpad (House of). The Hungarian dynasty which succeeded on the death of St. Stephen. The crown remained in the dynasty for three centuries. It began with Andrew, duke of Arpad, who reigned 1046–1061. The last of the Arpads was Andrew III. (1290–1301). This was a most heroic dynasty, still fondly remembered by the Hungarians. Andrew II., a very worthless king, like our King John, reluctantly granted the Bulla Aurea, or Magna Charta of Hungary.

Ladislaus I. (1077-1095) was the greatest of the Arpad kings. He was canonised. Bela III. (1173-1196) was an excellent king.

Arquebuses of Sancerre (The), 1573. Slings. When Sancerre was besieged by the French Catholics, the inhabitants, who had no firearms, defended themselves with simple slings. The town endured a long famine, and the siege is compared to that of Jerusalem by Titus and Vespasian.

Arrabbia'ti (The), i.e. 'the Enraged.' The party of the Medici opposed to that of Savonarola, called the Piagnoni (or the Weepers). The Arrabbiāti wanted to see an oligarchy, not a tyranny in Florence.

Arraigns (The Clerk of). The official who reads the indictment, and calls on the prisoner to plead.

The calling of a prisoner by his name to the bar of a law court to answer to the charge laid against him in the indictment is called 'Arraignment.'

Pronounce Ar-rains'.

Arrest of Judgment. A plea made by an unsuccessful defendant, after verdict, to arrest judgment in consequence of some error which vitiates the proceeding. By 15, 16 Vict. c. 76 (1852), omitted facts and other 'faults' may now be corrected.

Arrest of the Five Members. I. By Charles I. 4 Jan., 1642. Charles I., supposing he had evidence of treason against five members of parliament, imparted to him by James Graham, earl of Montrose, proceeded to the House with a band of armed attendants to arrest the members and strike terror into the rest of the House. A measure like this depends wholly on its success. Cromwell succeeded when he turned out the members and locked the doors upon them; but the five members that Charles sought, having an inkling of what was about to happen, kept away, and Charles cut a most ridiculous figure, a blusterer utterly foiled and made a fool of.

The five members were Hampden, Haslerig, Hollis, Pym, and Strode.

II. By Louis XVI., May 1789. Louis was urged by the Parlement de Paris to convene a States-General in order to solve the national deadlock in the ministry of Brienne. He agreed to do so, but a few days afterwards refused to do anything of the sort; and, entering the Assembly, insisted on its registering two royal edicts, one of which was for a succession of Government loans. Epréménil, Sebastian de Cabre, Fréteau and Monsabert demanded the calling of the States-General; and Louis, rising, left the assembly commanding the edicts to be registered without another word. Fréteau and Cabre were arrested by lettres de cachet, and the parlement was dissolved, but it would not submit to be stamped out thus. When the parlement met, an officer was sent to arrest Eprémenil and Monsabert, and the king called a lit de justice; but the parlement denounced the conduct of the king and the arrest of its members as unconstitutional, and refused to recognise the royal edicts; no one subscribed to the loans.

The 5th member was the Duc d'Orleans. He was not actually arrested, but banished from Paris, and commanded to confine himself to his château of Villars Cotterets.

Arrestment for founding jurisdiction, in Scotch law. By this law a foreigner (or one out of the jurisdiction of the Scotch courts) may, if he has any sort of property in Scotland, be sued in the Scotch tribunals on a warrant called 'Ad fundandam jurisdictionem.'

Arrêt d'Union (L'), 13 May, 1648. Henri IV. of France created an impost called paulette, whereby members of the parlement, by paying an annual cess, could transmit their offices to their heirs. Mazarin, acting for Louis XIV. in his minority, ratified this privilege to the four chief courts, viz. the Parlement, the Chambre des Comptes, the Cour des aides, and the Grand Conseil, but with this proviso, that the last three companies 'perdraient quatre années de leurs gages.' The parlement refused to recognise this distinction, and insisted that all the four bodies should be treated alike. This 'stand,' called l'arrêt d'union, insisted that no one should be admitted to any office in the state without the consent of the widow and heirs of the previous deceased officer. It furthermore enacted that all the four companies should stick together 'malgré la défense qui leur en fut faite, et au mépris d'un arrêt du conseil du roi qui cassait l'édit d'union.' Mazarin arrested the president Blancménil and a councillor named Broussel. This led to a riot, and Mazarin was obliged to release his prisoners. This was the beginning of the Fronde War (q.v.).

Arrondissement (4 syl.). A division of a French department presided over by a sub-prefect.

Ars Sacra. Chemistry was so called in Alexandria, because only priests could study it or practise it.

Ar'sacides, or Arsăcĭdæ (The), B.C. 250–A.D. 226. The Parthian dynasty of Persia, founded by Arsăcês, the Greek spelling of Ashk, a tributary chief who induced the Parthians to revolt from the Seleucidæ, B.C. 250. The first stock gave 20 kings, who ruled over Persia for 476 years; the second line, called the Ashk-anians, gave 11 kings, and ruled 221 years. Capital Ctesiphon. See 'Sassanides.'

Pronounce Ar'-sas-sides, Ar-sas'-i-dee.

Art Unions. Institutions to promote a patronage and sale of fine art productions. The Art Union of Munich was established in 1823; that of Düsseldorf in 1829; in Edinburgh in 1834; in London 1837.

Arti, or Arts. Every burgher of Florence must belong to one of the twenty-one arts, just as, before the reform, every freeman or voter of England was obliged to rank as a tradesman. It was not necessary to follow the trade, but it was indispensable to 'matriculate' as a tradesman in order to take up your freedom.

The 7 higher arts were: (1) judges and notaries, (2) calimala or manufacturers, (3) exchangers, (4) wool-staplers, (5) silk mercers, (6) physicians and apothecaries, and (7) furriers.

The 14 lower arts were: (8) butchers, (9) shoemakers, (10) blacksmiths, (11) drapers and clothesmen, (12) masons and stonecutters, (13) vintners, (14) innkeepers, (15) oilmen, pork-butchers and rope-makers, (16) hosiers, (17) armourers, (18) locksmiths, (19) saddlers, (20) carpenters, and (21) bakers.

Each art had its guild. All other trades must unite with some one of these arts, or were not ranked as burghers or freemen.

Articles in Theology. See under.

Three articles; three test articles; four articles; five articles; six articles; seven articles; nine articles (under 'Lambeth Articles'); ten articles; eleven articles; twelve articles; thirty-nine articles; forty-two articles. Also nine articles of the Evangelical Alliance.

Articles of Confederation and perpetual Union (The Thirteen), 1777.

1. The States to be called the United States, instead of the United Colonies, as heretofore.

2. Each state to retain its sovereignty and independence.

3. All the states to league together for mutual defence.

4. The free inhabitants of any one state to enjoy the immunities and privileges of free citizens in every other state.

5. Traitors or great delinquents fleeing from a state to be delivered up to the state where the offence was committed.

6. Laws and judicial proceedings of each state to be respected by all.

7. Delegates from each state elected to meet in congress the first Monday in November.

8. No state to have less than two or more than seven delegates.

9. Each state to maintain its own delegates.

10. Each state to have only one vote in congress.

11. Freedom of speech to be allowed to all delegates, and freedom from arrest, except for treason and felony.

12. No state to enter into war or make peace without consent of Congress.

13. In times of peace no ships of war or military force to be kept in any state without consent of Congress.

Articles of Henry (The), or Pacta Conventa, 1573. Articles agreed to by Henry de Valois on his election to the throne of Poland.

1. That the king should not elect his successor; 2. should not declare war without the sanction of the Diet; 3. should not appoint ambassadors to foreign courts; 4. should not impose any tax; 5. should be governed by a privy council of 16 (4 bishops, 4 palatines, and 8 castellans); 6. should confer no dignity or office on any foreigner; 7. should neither marry nor divorce a wife without consent of the Diet, &c.

Articles of Reform (The). Ireland, 1340. By these articles Edward III. threatened to take the lands and possessions of the Anglo-Irish into his own hand, if the great landholders were not more attentive to their duties. In two centuries the English lords in Ireland had grown enormously rich, and showed symptoms of a very rebellious spirit. It had become the fashion among them to assume the dress, cut of the hair, and manners, as well as the names of the Irish.

Articles of Schmalkal'den or Smalkald (The), 1537. The articles of defence adopted in the city of Schmalkalden by the Protestants under the direction of Martin Luther.

Articles of Torgau (The), 1580. The 17 articles drawn up by Luther at the request of the Elector of Saxony, showing the points of difference between the Reformer and the Church of Rome. The document was presented to the Elector at Torgau, whence the name.

Torgau, pronounce Tor'gow.

Articles of War. Government regulations relating (1) to the army, (2) to the navy, and (3) to the marine forces.

Articles of the Peace. The terms required from a defendant, when a person swears in court that he is in fear of damage or personal injury from the defendant. The terms set forth what security the defendant shall give that he will keep the peace, and to what length of time the terms extend.

Articlemen, 1648. Those restorable Irishmen who were promised pardon and restoration by the articles of the peace made between the Duke of Ormonde on behalf of the king (Charles II.), and confederate Catholics. The Act of Explanation shut the door of hope on more than 6,000 of the restorable Irish.

There were four classes of restorable Irish, viz. Innocents, Articlemen, Ensignmen, and the King's Nominees (q.v.).

Artic'uli Cle'ri, 1313. An Act for the purpose of maintaining in England certain prerogatives of the Church against the temporal power.

Artillery Company (The Honourable), 1537. The oldest Volunteer corps in Great Britain, being established in the reign of Henry VIII. In the Gordon riots (1780) it successfully defended the Bank of England against the rioters. The members are elected by ballot on a recommendation of five members, and pay an annual subscription of two guineas, but the uniforms are expensive: of the cavalry, 29*l.* 9*s.*; of the artillery, 18*l.* 14*s.* 6*d.*; of the infantry, 14*l.* 17*s.* 6*d.*

It consists of one squadron of light cavalry, an artillery division, six companies of infantry, and a veteran company. The Prince of Wales is captain-general and colonel of the company.

Artist of the Revolution (The). J. L. David (1748–1825), founder of the Statuesque School. His best piece is the 'Oath of the Horatii,' and his most popular piece is 'Napoleon crossing the Alps.' Napoleon is represented as prancing on a fiery white charger, with fluttering shawl, and in a very theatrical attitude. Historically, he rode a patient mule, was buttoned to the chin in a large grey coat, and toiled through the deep snow doggedly.

Artists and Smiths (Patron saint of). St. Eloi (588–659), master of the mint in the reign of Clotaire II.

Artizo'e. The Fatale Marmor of the Persians, mentioned by Pliny. Elagabălus was a similar black conical stone representing the sun, and worshipped at Emĕsa.

Similar palladia were the Black Stone of the Seids. It is a huge mass of very rich grey silver ore of one of the Indian tribes of South America, which was removed from place to place, as the tribe fled from before the Spanish invaders. The Caaba of the Mussulmans, which Mahomet removed to Mecca, was another Fatale Marmor; so probably was the Idol of Diana at Ephesus, which 'fell from heaven.' We have also the Lia Fail of Ireland; the Tanist Stone; the pillar of Shechem (2 Kings xi. 14); and so on.

Artoty'ritæ or Bread and Cheese Christians. So called from their using bread and cheese in the Eucharist. (Greek, artos, bread; turos, cheese.)

Ar'undel Marbles (The). 'Mar'mora Arundellia'na' or 'Marmora Oxonien'sia,' preserved in the University of Oxford, and often called the Oxford marbles, the most valuable of which is the 'Parian Chronicle' (q.v.). These gems of Grecian art were collected by Mr. (Sir William) Petty, who was commissioned by the Earl of Arundel to collect antiquities in Greece. Brought to England A.D. 1610; presented to the University of Oxford by his son Henry Howard, in 1667.

The entire collection originally contained 37 statues, 128 busts, and 250 inscribed marbles, besides altars, sarcophagi, fragments and gems; but part was sold in 1678. The Pomfret marbles were given to Oxford in 1755.

Arval Brothers (College of the). 'Fratres Arvāles,' priests of Rome who went in procession through the fields, and prayed for the increase of corn. (Varro.)

The little or private Ambarvalia were celebrated by a single family for the welfare of all belonging to it, as the great college of the Arval brothers . . . officiated in the interest of the whole state.—PATER, Marius the Epicurean, chap. i.

A'ryan Languages (The). The different languages of the Aryan Nations (q.v.), which have all one common source, and bear a strong family likeness. 'They count with the same numerals, call individual speakers by the same pronouns, address parents and relatives by the same titles, call the different parts of the body by the same names, decline their nouns on the same system, compare their adjectives in the same way, conjugate their verbs alike, and form derivatives by the same suffixes.'

A'ryan Nations (The). The Persians, Hindûs, and all Europeans except the Basques, Turks, Hungarians, and Finns. See 'Semitic' and 'Turanian.'

Eastern branch: the Persians and Hindûs, which include Zend, Armenian, Kurdish, and Afghan; Sanskrit, Hindi, Hindustani; Gipsy; Pali, and the dialects of Ceylon.

Western branch (First Swarm), the Celtic. It settled in Greece; and spread into Italy, Spain, France, and the British Isles; (Second Swarm), the Teutonic, colonised Germany, and spread into Denmark, Sweden, Norway, and England; (Third Swarm), the Slavonic, settled in Bohemia, Poland, and Russia.

Pali is the sacred language of the Buddhists; Sanskrit is the sacred language of the Hindûs; Zend is the sacred language of the Persians. All now dead languages.

As = a God. The twelve Asæ or Æsir of Scandinavian mythology are Odin, Thor, Baldur, Niord, Freyr, Tyr, Bragi, Heimdal, Wedar, Wali, Uller, and Forseti.

The chief goddesses are Frigga, Freyja, Idunna, Eira, and Saga.

The twelve divine Asæ.—ERIC G. GELJER, Hist. of Sweden, p. 5.

Asca'nian House (The). One of the most ancient families of Germany, so called from the castle of Ascania in Aschersleben. It reigned over the principality of Anhalt in the 11th cent., and gave the sovereigns of Brandenburg (1143–1320) and of Saxony. The dukes of the Ascanians of Saxony formed two branches, viz. Saxe-Wittenberg, extinct in 1422, and Saxe-Lauenburg, extinct in 1689.

Ascension Day, or 'Holy Thursday.' A religious festival held on the 40th day after Easter to commemorate the Ascension of Jesus Christ.

Beating the bounds (of parishes), called in Scotland 'riding the marches,' used to be, and still is in some places, observed on this day.

Ascet'ics (The), 3rd cent. Persons who devoted themselves to a solitary and contemplative life, following the system of the Essenes and Therapeutæ (q.v.) among the Jews. They practised great austerities for the mortifying of the flesh, withdrew the mind from worldly objects, and tried to lose themselves in God. They haunted the deserts of Egypt and Syria, and gave rise to monachism.

Asci'tes (3 syl.). From the Greek ἀσκός, a bladder, meaning 'inflated like a bladder.' Christian heretics who 'utrem inflatum et opertum solebant circumferre, tanquam ipsi essent evangelici utres novi, vino novo repleti' (Acts ii. 13). Augustine mentions them in his book of 'Heresies' (62).

Ascodrog'itæ, or 'Ascodrog'ili.' Christian heretics of Galatia, 'qui utrem inflatum ponunt et cooperiunt in sua ecclesia, et circumeunt eum insanientes potibus, non intelligentes quod ait Salvator' —'New wine must be put into new bladders.'—Du Cange, i. p. 408.

Ash Wednesday. First day of Lent, when at one time penitents appeared before their bishop or priest with naked feet and clad in sackcloth ready to submit to penance. The pessimi were first sprinkled with ashes of the palms burnt on the Palm Sunday of the preceding year, and were then driven out of the church door by the clergy, who cried after them 'In the sweat of thy brow shalt thou eat bread!' The less offensive were signed on the forehead with the sign of the cross, and the priest or bishop said, 'Memento, homo, quia pulvis es, et in pulverem reverteris'! Said to have been introduced by Gregory the Great (590–604), sanctioned by the Council of Benevento in 1091.

Ashari (The). An Arabian sect which held that God, being the cause of everything, is the author of all human actions; but men, being free, acquire merit or incur guilt according as they obey or disobey the precepts of religion. Averroës, the Arabian philosopher of Cordòva, (1149–1198), adopted the creed of the Ashari sect.

Ashbourne's Act (Lord), 1885. A government loan of five millions sterling set apart to be lent to Irish farmers, at the rate of 3½ per cent., to enable them to buy their farms of their landlords. In 1888 a second five millions was voted by parliament for the same purpose.

No landlord would, of course, join the Land League, and therefore the best plan of quieting Ireland is to multiply the freeholders, all of whom have a stake in the peace and prosperity of the island. Napoleon introduced government loans of very small value per share to induce the poorer classes of France to become holders, with the same view. Applicants for a small number of shares were first awarded their shares, and those who applied for the largest number were deferred to the last. Thousands of persons slept all night in the Piazza of the Rue Rivoli that they might be early applicants. I myself saw the thick crowd there long after midnight.

Ashbur'ton Treaty (The), 9 Aug. 1842. In 1842, Lord Ashburton was appointed special ambassador to the United States of North America, to settle the north-west boundary question, and other disputes which then threatened to involve the two countries in war. In August he concluded the famous Treaty of Washington, commonly called the Ashburton Treaty, by which the Oregon question was settled, and the frontier line between the state of Maine and Canada was definitely agreed to. By the 8th and 9th articles, provisions were made for putting an end to the African slave trade; and the 10th article provides for the mutual extradition of suspected criminals.

Ashmo'lean Museum (The). In the University of Oxford (1683); bequeathed to the university by Elias Ashmole (2 syl.). It is used to hold the collection of natural and artificial curiosities, and to aid in the study of chemistry and natural science.

This collection properly belonged to certain persons of the name of Tradescant, and is more correctly called the 'Tradescant Collection.'

Asia. From the Greek ἄσις, mud. The first part known to the Greeks was that watered by the river Caÿster, where some Ionian colonists settled. Hence, Asia means 'the land of mud,' and it is somewhat noteworthy that Paris used to be called Lutetia, which means the same thing. The mythological derivation of the word from Asia, daughter of Oceănus and Tithys, is only a poetical way of stating the fact that the river Caÿster, like any other river, is a daughter of the sea.

Asia. (Acts of the Apostles xvi. 6; compare xix. 22, 26, 27, &c.) Here Paul, who was in Phrygia or Galatia, speaks of going into Asia. To understand this it must be known that, after the battle of Magnesia, in Asia Minor, Eumĕnēs, king of Pergămus, was rewarded by the addition of Lydia and some other districts; and when the kingdom of Pergamus became a Roman province, it was dignified by the title of Asia, but Galatia was still ruled by native chiefs, and formed no part of 'Asia,' in the sense alluded to. Hence Paul might leave Galatia and go to the Roman province of Asia, still travelling in Asia Minor.

Askha'nians (The). So the Persians call the Arsăcĭdæ (q.v.), but there are no points of agreement. The Arsacidæ give thirty kings, the Askhanians only seven. The Arsacidæ continued 476 years, the Askhanians only 132. The Askhanians derived their name from Ask or Ashk, the father of Arduan, the founder; the Arsacidæ derived their name from Arsăcês, their founder.

Some tell us that the Askhanian was the second house of the Arsacidians, and that it gave eleven kings, who ruled 221 years.

Asmonæ'ans (The). So the Maccabees, rulers of the Jews, were called, because Mattathias, who first headed the revolt against Antiochus Epiphănês, was great-grandson of Asmonæos, a wealthy Jewish priest (Josephus, 'Antiquities,' book xii. chap. viii.) See 'Maccabees.'

Aspasia of France (The). Ninon de l'Enclos (1615–1705).

Ass (The Procession of the), 14 Jan. A mediæval religious procession, in commemoration of the Flight into Egypt.

Thus described by Ducange: 'A beautiful girl being selected, was mounted on an ass, richly decorated. An infant child was nursed on her lap, and the procession was formed by the clergy and laity, from the highest to the lowest, who walked from the cathedral to the parish church of St. Stephen. On reaching the west door, the ass, bearing the girl and infant, was led to the gospel side of the altar, and high mass was begun; but, instead of "Amen," both clergy and congregation cried "He-haw," imitating the braying of an ass. The Introit, Kyrie Eleison, the Gloria in Excelsis, the Credo, &c., were all concluded with "He-haw." At the close of the mass, the officiating priest, turning to the people, said, "Ite missa est," "He-haw, he-haw, he-haw," three times.'

Probably this was the festival of Vesta adapted to Christian history. An ass, by its braying, saved Vesta from brutal violence, and 'the coronation of the ass' formed a ceremony in the festival of that goddess.

Ass of Mesopota'mia (The). Merwan II., the 14th and last of the Ommiade califs (688, 744–756). The surname ('Al Himar') was a compliment, due to his temperance and strength.

Mesopotamia was noted for a breed of asses which never fled from an enemy. See Homer, λ 557, where Ajax is compared to an ass. The poet says the Trojans beat Ajax with darts and arrows as boys beat an ass feeding in a meadow. Doubtless a compliment is intended, for, like the Mesopotamian ass, Ajax would not show his back to the foe.

Assassination Plot (The), 1696. A conspiracy to assassinate William III., near Richmond, on his return from the chase. The chief conspirator was the Earl of Aylesbury. It was discovered 15 Feb., the day before that fixed for its execution. On 27 Feb., 1696, an association was formed for his defence.

In May 1695 a plot was formed against him which also proved abortive.

Assassins. A military and religious order of Persia formed in the 11th cent. They belonged to the Shiite sect of Mohammedans. Abdallah formed a party of these assassins into a secret society, ostensibly to maintain the claims of the Fatimide califs to universal dominion, and to extirpate the Sunnites (2 syl); but it was Hassan ben Sabah, called the 'Sheik of the Mountain,' who made the name a name of terror. He died in 1124 after a 'reign' of 35 years; and in 1256 the sect was stamped out by Hulagû.

The Syrian branch continued some fourteen years longer. It was this branch which murdered the Marquis of Montferrat in 1192; Louis of Bavaria in 1213; the Khan of Tartary in 1254; and frequently put the life of Saladin in danger. They were ultimately conquered by Bibars, sultan of Egypt.

It is supposed that the word Assassin is a corruption of Hashishim (eaters of Hashish, the hemp plant), a powerful intoxicant.

Assemblée des trois états (L'). The legislative assembly of Louis le Gros (1108–1137), in which the commons were allowed to take part with the noblesse and the clergy. They were not again convened till 1302, in the reign of Philippe IV., when the assembly was called 'Les Etats Généraux.'

Pronounce As-sahm'-blay day trwors'-a-tah'.

Assemblée Législative, 1 Oct. 1791–21 Sept., 1792. The National Legislative Assembly of France consisting of 745 members, not one of the previous house, called the Constituent Assembly being eligible; hence such men as Robespierre, Pétion, and Danton were excluded. It consisted wholly of men unknown, but of red republican principles—low attorneys, club orators, newspaper writers, and mere adventurers. The special function of this assembly was to conform the laws to the new constitution. On 21 Sept., 1792, the Legislative Assembly gave place to the National Convention. Burke said there were '400 lawyers and 300 of no condition whatever.'

Pronounce As-sahm'blay Led'-jis-lah'tif'.

Assemblée Nationale (L'). I. 17 June, 1789–30 Sept., 1791. The National Assembly of France. The clergy and nobles having refused to sit in the same chamber with the commonalty, the deputies of the tiers état withdrew, constituted themselves into a deliberative body, and assumed the name of the National Assembly. On the jeu de paume (20 June), they swore not to separate till they had given France a new constitution, and from that day the house was called 'L'Assemblée Constituante.' Having prepared the constitution, they dissolved themselves, and gave place to the 'Assemblée Législative,' whose function was to conform the laws to the new constitution. On 21 Sept., 1792, the Legislative Assembly gave place to the National Convention.

II. 4 May, 1848, of 900 members. The most democratic form of government ever devised. Every Frenchman who was of age was an elector, and every Frenchman after the age of 25 was eligible to become a deputy. There was only one assembly. See above.

Pronounce As-sahm'-blay Nas-se-o-nahl.

Assemblies of the Wilderness (The), 18th cent. French history. The assemblies of the restored Protestants of France. Held in open day when possible; but when dangerous, in some wild retreat or rocky nook. Summonses were issued only a few hours beforehand, and unarmed sentinels were placed on the heights to give notice of the approach of soldiers.

Assembly (The Act of). Enacts that no persons, professing to believe in Jesus Christ, shall be molested in respect to their religion, or in the free exercise thereof, or be compelled to the belief and exercise of any other religion against their consent.

Assembly of Divines (The), or 'Westminster Assembly,' 1643. Convoked by the Long Parliament in Hen. VII.'s chapel, Westminster, to reconstruct the Church of England. Episcopacy was abolished, and Presbyterianism substituted in its place. Above 3,000 of the clergy refused to submit, were ejected from their benefices, and pensioned off with a fifth part of their clerical incomes In 1644, ten of the assembly and thirteen presbyters were told off to ordain ministers to these vacancies. The Assembly was dissolved in 1649. It was this assembly which put forth the 'Assembly's Larger and Shorter Catechisms' for the use of the people. This assembly was a spiritual court, with jurisdiction over all affairs pertaining to religion or morals.

Assembly of Notables (The). An assembly of the princes of the blood, and the chief nobility, magistrates, and clergy, convened occasionally in times of trouble to consult with the king on matters of state. Every member of the assembly was named and invited by the king. It possessed no legislative or executive functions. Assembled for the first time in 1369, under the summons of Charles V. of France.

They were again convoked in 1470, and met at Tours. Again in 1526, and met at Cognac Again in 1560, and met at Fontainebleau. Again in 1561, and met at St. Germain. Again in 1566, and met at Moulins. Again in 1596, and met at Rouen. Again in 1626, and met at Paris; but the two best known were those convened at Versailles 22 Feb., 1787, and 12 Dec., 1788.

Assent (Royal) to bills which have passed the House of Commons and House of Lords is given, either personally in the House of Lords or by letters patent. After the title of the bill has been read by the clerk of the crown, the clerk of the parliament says (if it is a bill of supply) 'Le roi' (or 'La reyne') 'remercie ses bons sujets, accepte leur bienveillence, et ainsi le veult.' If a public bill, not of supply, he says 'Le roi (la reyne) le veult.' If a private bill, he says 'Soit fait comme il est désiré.'

If the royal assent is withheld, the announcement is made by the words 'Le roi s'avisera,' but the last instance of such a refusal was by William III. in 1693.

One would think it is time for the monarchs of England to speak English, and not old French.

Assessors (The). Since the Municipal Corporations Act of 1835, two officers chosen by the burgesses to assist the mayor in revising the burgess lists.

Assid'ians, or 'Chasidim.' A set of zealous defenders of the unity of God, against the attempts of Antiochus Epiphanes and his successors to force the Jews into idolatry. Mattathias headed the Chasidim for four years, afterwards Judas Maccabæus assumed the chief command.

'Chasidim' means pietists.

Assien'to. A Spanish treaty conferring on some foreign nation a monopoly in the negro slave-trade. In 1713 the exclusive right of importing negroes to Spanish America was transferred from France to England, and was made over by government to the South Sea Company for thirty years. In 1748 the English company relinquished its right (which had still four years to run) on the payment of 100,000*l.*, and the concession of certain commercial advantages.

The Spanish name of this treaty is 'El Asiento de los Negros.'

Assien'to Company [of England], 1713. I. Under the Treaty of Utrecht. This English company had the monopoly or exclusive privilege of supplying the Spanish West Indies and the South American colonies with slaves. The queen (Anne) had one-fourth of the profits of this traffic in human blood. Abolished (1807) by 47 Geo. III. c. 36. The word means 'a treaty,' and is applied to a compact between Spain and some foreign nation.

II. [of France], 1702. The French Guinea Company took the name of the 'Assiento Company,' when Philip V. of Spain granted them the exclusive right of importing 4,800 negroes of both sexes annually for ten years to the continent and islands of Spanish America.

Assignats, 9 Sept., 1790, recalled 18 July, 1796. French government notes. The National Assembly confiscated all the church lands, but being unable to sell them, kept them as national property, and issued paper money to the amount of 400,000,000 livres, making the church lands security for the repayment. These assignats were negotiable like our bank notes, and were generally for 100 francs (4*l.*) each, though some were as low as 5 francs. In June 1793, this paper money was worth only one-third of its nominal value; and in March 1796, an English sovereign would have bought 7,200 francs worth of assignats. They were then bought in by the French government at the rate of one franc in specie for 30 francs in paper.

It is said that the entire amount of assignats issued represented 45,578,000,000 francs, i.e. 1,823,000,000*l.* sterling.

Pronounce As'-sin-yahs'.

Assistors (The Council of). The same as the 'Council of Adjutators' (q.v.).

Assize of Arms, 1181. The substitution of the old military obligation of every freeman to serve in defence of the realm in lieu of feudal retainers. By this law, every knight was forced to arm himself with coat of mail, shield, and lance; every freeholder with lance and hauberk; every burgess and poorer freeman with lance and iron helmet. This universal military levy was wholly at the disposal of the king for purposes of military defence.

Assize of Battle. Trial by combat

Assize of Bread (The), 1214. A public price set upon bread according to its weight, from the reign of John to that of George IV., 1824.

Assize of Clarendon (The), 1166. A law in the reign of Henry II. which revived the old English system of mutual security or frank pledge to provide for the good order of the realm. By this law no stranger could remain in any place more than one night, without giving sureties for his good conduct; and twelve men in every hundred, with four from each township, were sworn to report known criminals or evildoers within their district, that they might be brought to trial by ordeal. This is the foundation of our 'grand jury' system.

Assize of Jerusalem (The). 'Les Assises de Jérusalem,' 1099. A body of laws promulgated by Godfrey, the 'Defender and Baron of the Holy Sepulchre.' Gibbon calls it 'a precious monument of feudatory jurisprudence.'

Assize of Northampton (The), 1176. An expansion of the Assize of Clarendon. By this assize Henry II. divided the kingdom into six districts or circuits, to each of which he assigned three itinerant judges. Appeals from the judges might be made to the king himself in council. This is the basis of our Privy Council, and the equitable jurisdiction of our lord chancellor.

Associate Presbytery (The), 1733. Those who separated from the establishment in Scotland under Ebenezer Erskine assumed this name, but they were generally called Seceders.

Associated Patriots (The), 1821. The Carbonāri of France. After the July Revolution, 1830, the society assumed the name of the 'Charbonnerie Démocratique.'

Associated Synod (The), or 'Associate Synod,' 1740. Separatists from the General Assembly of Scotland, led by the Rev. Ebenezer Erskine and his brother Ralph. They objected to the law of the assembly made in 1732, 'that if a patron neglected to fill up a vacancy within six months, the elders should select a candidate, subject to the veto of the presbytery. Erskine insisted that the appointment of ministers belonged to the people, and that heritors and elders had no right to interfere. Now merged in the United Presbyterian Church.

Association Bill (The), 1829. A bill to suppress the Catholic Association of Ireland preparatory to the introduction of a bill for Catholic emancipation.'

Association for Discountenancing Vice (The), 1800. In Ireland. The masters and mistresses were to be Protestants, and the reading of Scriptures was part of the daily curriculum. The church catechism was taught, and no other religious catechism was allowed.

Association of Russian Knights (The). A secret Russian society formed in the reign of Czar Alexander I. Its object was to put an end to the abuses of the interior administration of the empire. Being informed that the Czar intended to restore Poland, the society resolved to assassinate him. On mature reflection the scheme was abandoned, and the society was reorganised as 'the Union of Public Good.'

Association of the North (The), otherwise called the 'Association of St. Petersburg.' A secret society organised in 1823. It consisted of believers and adherents, the former being the founders from whom three presidents were elected, and the latter members admitted by the believers. The object was ultimately to convert Russia into a republic, but this was to be done gradually, and for the nonce the czar was to be reduced to a monarch with similar powers to the American president. The Emperor Alexander I. was to be assassinated, and all the rest of the royal family deported or exiled. The assassination was fixed for the beginning of 1826, but the czar died 30 Nov., 1825.

Assumption Day, 15 Aug. Instituted in the 7th cent.

Assumption of the Virgin Mary (The), 7th cent. The dogma that the soul and body of the Virgin Mary was carried up to heaven by Christ and his angels.

Assyrian Canon (The), B.C. 909-640. Discovered and published by Rawlinson in 1862.

Asto'ria (Oregon, U.S. America). So called, in 1811, from Mr. Astor, merchant of New York, who founded here a fur-trading station. The adventure of this merchant forms the subject of Washington Irving's 'Astoria.'

Astral Body (The), or linga sharira, the third principle. A semblance of the human form, fully inhabited by its higher principles. It can migrate to any distance from the physical body. The Scotch 'double' is a sort of linga sharira.

Astral Spirits. The supposed spirits which pervade the stars, each star having its own spirit, (or soul). Paracelsus taught that every human being has an astral spirit; hence the influence of a person's particular star on his life.

Astrologers. The most noted are: Tommaso Pisano, father of the celebrated Christina Pisano (*-1380); Johann Müller Regiomontānus, German (1436-1476); Johann Stöffler, German (1452-1531); Cardan (1501-76); Nostradāmus (1503-1566); Count Cosmo Ruggieri, astronomer to Catharine di Medici (16th cent.); Philip and Matthieu Laensberg (17th cent.). The chief astronomers between Ptolemy and Kepler believed in astrology.

The rule of the triplicities, as recommended by Pythagoras, Hipocrates, Diocles and Avicenna. Or I will begin ab nova auctionis, as Haly, Massahala, Ganwehis, and Guido Bonatus have recommended.

Will you place . . . the vernacular name of Isaac Newton in opposition to . . . Dariot, Bonatus, Ptolemy, Haly, Ezitus Uiteriek, Naibod, Harfurt, Zael, Taus ether, Agrippa, Duretus, Maginus, Origen, and Argol?—Sir W. SCOTT, Guy Mannering, chap. iii.

Astronomy and Experimental Philosophy (Professorship of). In the University of Cambridge, 1704; founded by Dr. Plume, archdeacon of Rochester. Stipend 800*l.* a year, exclusive of fees. The professor is called the Plumian Professor. See 'Sheepshanks Exhibition.'

At'abeks (The), i.e. 'Father of the Princes,' 11th and 12th cent. A title assumed by certain emirs, governors of provinces, who, under the Seljuks, usurped supreme power. The chief were: (1) The Atabeks of Irak, founded by Omad Eddin Zenghi. This dynasty lasted from 1127 to 1218. (2) The Atabeks or Attabegs of Farsistan, who ruled over Persia (1148–1264), and were driven out by Hulagou; (3) the Atabeks of Aderbaïdjan (1169–1225); (4) the Atabeks of Laristan, the last of whom, named Rokneddin, died 1339. See 'Attabegs.'

Ateliers Nationaux, 1848. National workshops for unemployed operatives. The works were generally useless, badly done, and dearly paid for. In Paris they proved an utter failure; and similar attempts in England and Ireland have always been fruitful sources of discontent and rebellion.

Pronounce At-tel'-e-a Nas'-se-o-no'.

Atella'næ, 'Fab'ulæ Atella'næ,' or 'Ludi Oscī.' First introduced into Rome from Atella in Campania. Called 'Ludi Oscī' because the two chief characters (Macchus and Bucco) spoke Oscan and represented Oscan characters. They were, like our after-pieces, extravagant and droll.

Athana'sian Creed (The), between 428 and 460. Probably composed in France by Hilary, bishop of Arles. It was originally composed in Latin, but our version is from a Greek translation.

It was originally called 'the Catholic Faith,' but in 440 it was called 'the Athanasian Creed,' not meaning the creed composed by Athanasius, but the creed which sets forth the views of Athanasius, the great opponent of Arius. It was received in Italy, 700; in the churches of France in 670; in Germany about 787; in England about 800, and in Rome not before 930 or 1014.

Athana'sians. Those who, like Athanasius (296–373), believe there are three persons (the Father, Son, and Holy Ghost) in the one undivided Godhead; that all the three are co-equal and eternal, 'none afore or after other,' and that the Holy Ghost proceeded from the Father and the Son.

The Athanasian Creed was not composed by Athanasius, but expresses his opinions respecting the Trinity. It was not received in the Latin Church till 930 or 1014, and was never sanctioned by any council.

Athenæum. I. Founded in Rome by Hadrian A.D. 133.

II. The London weekly journal established in January 1828.

III. The club so called in Pall Mall, founded in 1824.

Athenian Confederacy (The), B.C. 431. It contained Thessaly and Acarnania (in northern Greece), Corcyra, Zacynthus, and Naupactus. Their allies were Chios and Lesbos, with all the other islands of the Ægëan Sea, except Melos and Thera, together with the Greek cities on the coast of Asia and Thrace.

Athenian Moses (The). Plato (B.C. 428–347), the Greek philosopher, is so called by Numenius.

Athens of India (The). Benares (2 syl.), 460 miles from Calcutta, the seat of Brahminical learning.

Atlantic Cable (The). A cable between Valentia in Ireland and Heart's Content in Newfoundland, successfully laid in 1866. Many laid since.

Atlantic Telegraphs. Telegraphic cables used for sending telegraphic messages across the Atlantic. In communication with all the telegraphs of the two worlds.

At'omic Theory (The). The 'laws of combining proportion,' discovered by Dalton and expressed in four laws: (1) that of constant proportions; (2) that of reciprocal proportions; (3) that of multiple proportions; and (4) that of compound proportions.

At'abegs (The). See 'Attabeks.'

Attabeg is from 'Atta,' a master or tutor, and 'Beg,' or 'Bey,' a lord, a kind of 'mayor of the palace.'

Attacot'ti, or 'Attacots.' The Irish of prehistoric times who paid tribute to the Scoti. The word is a Latinised form of an Irish word meaning tribute-payers. The insurgent peasantry who assassinated Frederick the Just of Ireland were Attacots, and the word is applied to disturbers of the peace even in North Britain.

Attacot'tic Rebellion (The). A prehistoric rebellion of the Attacotti or tributaries of Ireland against the Scoti, who were 'massacred,' and a native prince set over the island; succeeded by his son, Moran. See 'Irish Associations.'

Attacot'tic Wars (The). The two plebeian rebellions (q.v.).

The chief movers of those two rebellions known by the name of the Attacottic Wars.—T. MOORE, History of Ireland, vii. 151.

At'talic Wealth. Unexpected or unlooked for wealth. B.C. 133, Attalus, the rich king of Pergămos, made the Romans his heirs. Queen Victoria has been enriched by 'Attalic wealth.'

Atterbury's Pad. Lord Coningsby was so called. In the debate on the Occasional Conformity and Schism Bill in 1718, Atterbury, bishop of Rochester, opposed the bill, and said, 'I prophesied last winter the bill would be brought forward, and I am sorry to find my words have come true.' Lord Coningsby insolently retorted: 'The right reverend speaker has set himself forth as a prophet; but, for my part, I know no prophet to liken him to, unless to that famous prophet Balaam, who was reproved by his own ass.' To this the bishop replied: 'I am well content to be compared to the prophet Balaam, but I am sure I have been reproved by nobody but his lordship.'

Attic Moses (The). Plato (B.C. 428–347).

Attic Orators (The Ten). i. Æschĭnês (B.C. 398–314); ii. Andocĭdês (467–391); iii. Antĭphon (died 411); iv. Demosthĕnês (385–322); v. Dinarchos (361–293); vi. Hyperĭdês (396–322); vii. Isæos (flo. 420–348); viii. Isocrătês (436–338); ix. Lycurgos, not the lawgiver (396–323); x. Lysĭas (458–378).

Atticus (The Christian). Reginald Heber bishop of Calcutta (1783–1826).

Atticus (The English). Joseph Addison (1672–1719).

Who but must laugh, if such a man there be?
Who would not smile if Atticus were he?
POPE, Prologue to the Satires.

Atticus (The Irish). George Faulkner, printer and author (1700–1775). So called by Lord Chesterfield.

At'ticus of Midlothian (The). The Right Honourable W. E. Gladstone (1809–), so called for his 'Midlothian speeches,' which obtained for him the premiership in 1880.

At'tila le petit. Thiers, the French historian (1797–1877).

He was also nicknamed 'Tamerlan à lunettes'; 'Caméléon'; 'General Bonne'; and 'Le roi des Versailleux.'

Attorney-General (The). A ministerial officer of the crown at an annual stipend of 7000*l.* He is appointed by letters-patent, and stands in relation to the sovereign as any other attorney does to his employer. His duties are to conduct prosecutions for such grave offences as tend to disturb the state; to advise the heads of other ministerial departments on legal points; to conduct all suits relating to the public revenue or charitable endowments in which the crown has a right to interfere; and, in short, to act in all things as the legal adviser of the sovereign.

The stipend of the Solicitor-General is 4,000*l.*; but both these lawyers are paid extra fees for 'contentious business,' according to the usual professional scale.

Attorney-General of the Lantern (Procureur général de la Lanterne). Camille Desmoulins (1762–1794), one of the chief instigators of the French Revolution, when those obnoxious to the mob were hanged on the street lamp-ropes.

Pronounce At-tur-ney.

Attroupement (3 syl.). A political or party meeting in the public streets or squares, like those in Trafalgar Square, London, in 1887–1888. By the French law, till April 1831, they were declared unlawful, and if persisted in, after due notice, the military dispersed them. Those apprehended might be imprisoned for two years, at the discretion of the magistrates.

At'ua (plu. Atuas). The Elohim of the Tongans, including (1) the original gods; (2) the souls of nobles; (3) the souls of metabooles or vassals, when appear as ghosts to relatives; (4) the souls of attendants and serfs; (5) the Atua-pow, the mischievous gods; and (6) the Mooi, or god which supports the earth. (Mariner, vol. ii. p. 127.)

Aubaine (2 syl.). The right of French kings to the property of every foreigner who died in France without being naturalised. Abolished by the National Assembly in 1790; re-established by Napoleon in 1804; and finally annulled on 14 July, 1819.

Auchterarder Case (The), 1834–1843. The great test case of the celebrated 'Voluntary Controversy' (q.v.) of Scotland. The question was this: Is the congregation to give a 'Call' or invitation to its pastor, or has the Kirk a right to appoint any minister it thinks proper? A vacancy occurred in the parish of Auchterarder, containing 3,000 souls. In a congregation of 300, only two persons signed 'the Call,' and the kirk pronounced it insufficient. The House of Lords was appealed to, and confirmed the decision of the kirk, but when the kirk selected a minister, the court of sessions interfered. The kirk commanded the presbytery to proceed with the presentation, and it did so, but was summoned at the bar of the civil courts, and the candidate was prohibited from preaching in the church. This controversy went on till 18 May, 1843, when 470 clergymen withdrew from the General Assembly, and constituted themselves into 'The Free Church of Scotland.'

During the controversy various other cases occurred, as those of Dunkeld, Lethendy, Strathbogie, &c

Audæism, 338. The heresy of Audæus or Udo of Mesopotamia, who insisted that God had a human form. At that early period he accused the clergy of worldliness and impurity of morals. Udo died A.D. 370.

Audi'ans or 'Audæans.' Same as Quartodecimans (q.v.).

The same capital punishment was inflicted on the Audians or Quartodecimans who should dare so perpetrate the atrocious crime of celebrating on an improper day the festival of Easter.—GIBBON, Decline and Fall, &c., chap. xxvii.

Audit Ale. Extra strong ale, supposed to be provided for an audit feast, when the college accounts are audited. It is, however, sold at the butteries of Cambridge University at any time.

Audley Street, London. So named from Mr. Hugh Audley, a barrister of the Inner Temple, who bought the ground thereabouts for building purposes. He began with 200*l.*, and at death, in 1662, left a property worth 400,000*l.*

Aughton Pudding Feast. Held every twenty-one years at Aughton, near Ormskirk, in Lancashire. About a century ago a firm of wand weavers constructed for their trade an immense oblong boiler, which was inaugurated by cooking therein a large plum-pudding of a ton weight (20 feet long and 6 feet thick). In 1886 (16 June) the pudding weighed 1,000 lbs., and was provided by public subscription.

Augsburg (Diet of). See under 'Diet.'

Augsburg (Treaty of), 22 Sept., 1555. Also called the 'Religious Peace of Augsburg, in which full liberty of worship was confirmed. Lutherans and Catholics were declared alike eligible to all offices of state, and to seats in the imperial diets. Every ruler was allowed to sanction what form of religion he chose in his own province, but all were to tolerate those who held different views.

Augsburg Confession (The). The statement of the doctrines of Luther and his disciples, handed in to Charles V., who had convoked a diet at Augsburg to receive it, 8 April, 1530. The first part contained 21 articles of faith and doctrine; and the second part contained 7 articles on disputed points: as (1) on the two kinds of the eucharistic sacrament; (2) on the marriage of priests; (3) on the mass; (4) on confession; (5) on distinctions of meat; (6) on conventual vows; and (7) on the authority of bishops.

The 'confession' is no longer an exponent of the theological views of German Protestants.

Augsburg Interim (The). The provisionary settlement of the points in dispute between the Lutherans and Roman Catholics, till they could be finally settled by a general council. The Augsburg Interim was held at Augsburg in 1548, by order of Charles V. A compromise was agreed to, but in 1552 it was declared to be unsatisfactory, and another compromise was made at Leipsic, called the 'Leipsic Interim.'

August, 31 days. This month ought to be 30 days. Thus: March 31, April 30, May 31, June 30, July 31, August 30, &c.; but when the Latin month Sextilis was named August, in honour of Augustus (as the month Quintilis had been changed to July in honour of Julius), court flattery could not allow the Augustan month to be shorter than the Julian month, so the short month was shifted to Sept., and the symmetry of the Calendar was destroyed. September was the birth-month of Augustus, but August (Sextilis) was his lucky month. Thus he held his triumph for his Illyrian, Actium, and Alexandrian victories in Aug. B.C. 29, and was made emperor the same month. He died 19 Aug., 14 B.C.

August 1. The anniversary of the accession of the house of Hanover.

August 4 (1789). When the National Assembly of France, in one sitting, abolished all privileges formulated in 19 articles, and presented their measure to the king. It included:—

The abolition of all serfdom, seignorial dues, and seignorial jurisdictions.

The suppression of exclusive rights of hunting, shooting, keeping warrens, dovecotes, &c.

The abolition of tithes, sales of offices, and monopolies.

The equalisation of taxes.

The eligibility of every citizen to any civil or military office.

The suppression of all privileges granted to towns or provinces.

Such an amount of legislation in one night is wholly unparalleled.

August 10 (1792). 'La sanglante journée du 10 août,' called by Legendre 'the glorious 10th of August.' The Tuileries were stormed by the Paris mob. Mandat, commander of the National Guard, was assassinated by the mob. Danton, Tallien, Billaud-Varennes, and Collet d'Herbois usurped the municipal functions, dubbing themselves 'Les Commissaires de la Commune.' The Swiss guard was assassinated by the Paris mob. The king (Louis XVI.), the queen (Marie Antoinette), and her three children, were saved alive, for a time, by the National Assembly. They were sent to the Temple. The National Convention was formed, consisting of Servan, (minister of war; Roland (of the interior); Clavière, (of finance); Lacoste (of marine); Lebrun (of foreign affairs); and Danton (of justice). Santerre was made commander of the National Guard in place of Mandat, and an 'Extraordinary Tribune' was appointed to examine into the offences of the Bloody Tenth of August.

August 15. French history. The birthday of Napoleon I., and while the empire lasted considered a national holiday. It was on 15 Aug., 1806, that he was surnamed 'The Great'; that he repealed the republican calendar; that he appointed the cathedral of St. Denis the place of sepulchre for the emperors of the French; that he converted the Panthéon into the church of Ste.-Geneviève; that he created his brother Joseph king of the Two Sicilies; his brother Louis king of Holland; his brother-in-law Murat grand duke of Cleves and Berg; gave his stepson Beauharnais in marriage to a Bavarian princess; and bestowed imperial fiefs on his great ministers and generals; that he united fourteen princes of the south and west of Germany into the 'Confederation of the Rhine'; and appointed the day a national festival for ever. Napoleon III. used to keep it magnificently.

Neither of the two emperors was buried in the cathedral of St. Denis. Both died in exile.

Augusta. The 2nd Roman Legion, A.D. 50. The Romans made the 'civitas Trinobantum' a station for this legion, and called the station Augusta. Tacitus in his Annals calls it Londinum. Now din is Keltic for town, and Lon, if the o is also corrupt for y or i, would be lyn or llyn, which means in Keltic a pool or body of water, so that Llyn-din means the water-town, or town on the pool.

Liver-pool seems to give colour to this etymology (another plausible suggestion is Lion, cheerful or gay).

Augustales Sodalos, about A.D. 17. An order of priests instituted by Tiberius.

Pronounce Aug-us-tay'-leez So-day'-leez.

Augustan Age of China (The). The reign of Tae-tsong, son of Kao-tsou, founder of the 18th Imperial dynasty. Tae-tsong is called the Solomon of China (626–650).

Augustan Age of England (The). The reign of Queen Anne (1702–1714) also called the Silver Age, the Golden Age being the reign of Elizabeth. By far the foremost name is that of Sir Isaac Newton, and of commanders, John Churchill (duke of Marlborough). The poets were Congreve, Garth, Gay, Parnell, Philips, Pope, Prior, Rowe, and Swift. The other authors were Addison, Barnes, George Bull, Anthony Collins, Jeremy Collier, Roger Cotes, Defoe, Dodwell, Flamsteed, George Hickes, Dr. John Jeffery, John Norris, Ray, South, Steele, &c. Wren, Archibald Pitcairn, and Sir Cloudesley Shovel also lived in this reign. Except Pope and Gay, the poets have no high standing, and of the miscellaneous class, Addison and Defoe are the best known.

Augustan Age of France (The). The middle period of the reign of Louis XIV., while Colbert was his chief minister (1619–1683).

Augustan Age of Germany (The). The 19th century.

Augustan Age of Hindûstan (The). The reign of Vikramâditya, surnamed Sakari (or foe of the Sakas), B.C. 56.

It is an anachronism to speak of an Augustan age before the reign of Augustus.

Augustan Age of Persia (The). That of Artaxerxes (B.C. 464–425), about which time historians, philosophers, poets, painters and sculptors of peculiar merit flourished.

Augustan Age of Portugal (The). The reign of Dom Affonso Henriques (1094, 1137–1185). In this reign Brazil was occupied; the African coast was explored; the sea-route to India was traversed; Camoens flourished, &c.

Augustan Era (The). Began 14 Feb., B.C. 27.

Augustine (The Rule of St.)—included: absolute obedience; personal poverty; universal charity, and perfect chastity, both of mind and body.

The order first appeared in England about 1105.

Augustino (The second St.). Hugues de St. Victor, who died 1140.

Marcus Antonius (121–180) is called the 'Augustine of philosophy.'

Augus'tines (3 syl.), or 'Augustinians,' 1257. I. Some thirty monastic fraternities were so called, not because they were founded by St. Augustine, but because Pope Alexander IV. imposed on them the rule of St. Augustine (18th cent.).

II. An order of nuns which claimed descent from a convent founded by St. Augustine at Hippo, of which his sister was abbess. Till 1632 they wore a black habit, but it was then changed to a violet. Their special office was the charge of hospitals and the sick.

Augustin'ian Canons. Those who lived under the rule (kanôn) of St. Augustine. Their dress was a long black cassock, having a white rochet over it, covered with a black cloak and hood. See 'Austin Friars.'

Augusti'nus, 1640. A work by Cornelius Jansen (1586–1638), just completed before he died, and which proved the occasion of a religious controversy the most important in its doctrinal, social, and political aspects since the Reformation. Its object was to show that the teaching of St. Augustine was in direct opposition to that of the Jesuits on the subjects of grace, free will, predestination, and pelagianism. It was inhibited by the Jesuits in 1641. In 1642 Pope Urban VIII. condemned it, in his bull 'De Eminenti'; Alexander VII. condemned it 1656; but the scholars and divines of Port Royal defended it.

In France, the members of Port Royal (q.v.) were Jansenists; those of the Sorbonne (q.v.) were bitterly opposed to the 'Augustinus,' and issued seven allegations to prove it to be heretical. These seven allegations were reduced to five.

Augustus and Cæsar. For above 1,000 years, from Vespasian to Alexius Comnênus, 'Augustus' was the title given to the sons and brothers of the reigning monarch, and 'Cæsar' was the next in rank. The imperial wife, mother, sisters, and daughters were 'Augusta.' Only the emperor could assume the purple or red buskin. The buskins of a 'Cæsar' were green.

In the reign of Diocletian the two viceroys of Illyricum and Gaul were entitled 'Cæsar,' and the two emperors of Rome and Constantinople were each 'Augustus,' A.D. 292; but this arrangement soon lapsed after the death of that emperor. The Roman senate gave Octavius the title of 'Augustus.'

Auletes. Ptolemy X. of Egypt was so called for his skill in playing on the flute (B.C. 65–51).

Pronounce Au-le'-tees.

Aulic Council. The supreme tribunal of the German empire. It consisted of a president, a vice-chancellor, and eighteen councillors. This council always followed the court, and was hence the aulic or court tribunal (Latin, aula, the court or palace). It was instituted in 1501 by Kaiser Maximilian, and was suppressed in 1806, when the empire was reconstructed; but there are still 'aulic councillors' in Austria.

Au'rea Bulla, or Golden Bull of Hungary. The Magna Charta of that kingdom, granted in 1222 by Andrew II., just seven years after King John signed the Magna Charta of England. By article 31 it was provided that, if a king violated any of the principles of the Golden Bull, his subjects might depose him, or take up arms against him without being guilty of treason. This article was cancelled in 1705 by Joseph I. Like John, Andrew was a bad king; and, like John, he neither observed his Aurea Bulla nor intended so to do.

Auro'ra (Missa de). The second mass on Christmas Day, the first being the Missa de nocte, or midnight mass, and the third high mass. See 'Mass.'

Sir Walter Scott says, 'On Christmas Eve the mass was sung,' and he has been accused of an oversight, inasmuch as no mass is ever said or sung at nighttime. But Cassianus ('Instit.' book ii. c. 18) says, 'Quare post missam nocturnam dormire non oporteat.' Again, 'Missa de Exceptato' is defined by Du Cange as the mass 'quæ die vigiliam Natalis Domini precedente cantatur, unde eadem Preparatio ad vesperam Natalis Domini vocatur in Missali Gothico.' Cassianus says again (c. 7): 'Missa Canonica celebrata usque ad lucem post vigilias extendunt.' However, the 'Missa de nocte,' we are told, was only begun before midnight, the 'sacrifice' must be in the morning after the clock has struck 12.

Austin Friars, or 'Begging Hermits,' or 'Hermits of St. Augustine.' Were not founded by St. Augustine, but had the rule of St. Augustine imposed on them by Innocent IV. in the middle of the 13th cent. In 1256 Pope Alexander IV. placed them under a superior called a 'general.' In 1570 Friar Thomas, a Jesuit, reduced a still more austere rule, forbidding his disciples to wear shoes, whence they were called 'The Barefooted Friars.'

Austria (House of), 1438–1745. Has given Germany fourteen kaisers, from Albert II. to Karl VII.

Sometimes the house of Hohenstaufen is called the house of Austria, and sometimes the present reigning emperor is also called the house of Austria, but ought to be called the house of Austria-Lorraine.

Austria-Lorraine (House of). The present reigning family of Austria. This house began in 1745 with Franz of Francis I., who married Maria Theresa.

Austrian Hye'na (The). Julius Jakob von Haynau, an Austrian general (1786–1853), noted for his ruthless cruelty towards the Hungarians, and his alleged flogging of women. In 1850 he visited the brewery of Messrs. Barclay & Perkins, when he was assaulted by the draymen, and barely escaped with his life. Subsequently, he received similar discourtesy in Belgium and France. Called also 'the Austrian butcher.'

Austrian Lip (The). A protruding under-jaw, with a heavy lip disinclined to shut close. It came from Cimburgis, a Polish princess, who married Kaiser Friedrich III., and displayed itself in their son, Maximilian (I.) Hence also called the 'Cimburgis Under-lip.'

A somewhat similar peculiarity occurs in the family of Sir Gideon Murray, of Elibank. He had taken prisoner a young gentleman named Scott, whom he was about to hang, but his wife induced him to commute the sentence into marriage with their daughter Meg, of 'muckle mouth.' Meg made a good wife, but the muckle mouth descended to their posterity for many generations.

Austrian War (The), 1859. To rescue Italy from the hands of Austria. The belligerents were France and Sardinia against Austria. France won the battles of Magenta and Solferino, and then made peace with Austria. Garibaldi continued the contest to a successful issue.

Rome was not added to the new kingdom of Italy till the autumn of 1870. Venetia was ceded to Italy in 1866, as the fruits of the Austro-Prussian war.

Austro-German Treaty of Alliance (The), 7 Oct., 1879. Between the Emperor of Austria and the Emperor of Germany. They agree, if either state is attacked by Russia, both shall unite their full strength to repel it. If either state is attacked by any nation except Russia, the other shall observe a friendly neutrality. If Russia assists any other state in an attack upon either Austria or Germany, the two allies shall consider the attack as made by Russia Signed at Vienna.

In 1887 Italy joined the alliance.

Austro-Hungarian Empire (The), 14 Nov., 1868. The kaiser-king of Germany had to abandon his title of Emperor of the West, or of the Holy Roman Empire, in 1806, and was entitled 'Emperor of Austria,' till 1868, when he styled himself 'Emperor of Austria and King of Hungary and Bohemia,' his dominion being styled the 'Austro-Hungarian Empire.'

Austro-Prussian War (The), 1866. Called the Seven Weeks' war. Won by Prussia. The chief victories were the battles of Custozza, Langensalza, Sadowa, and Olmutz. By this victory Prussia became the chief power of Germany, and Austria was entirely excluded therefrom. Total cost of the war 66,000,000*l.* sterling. Total loss of life 50,000.

Authentic Doctor (The). Gregory of Rimini ('Gregorius Ariminensis'), general of the Augustine order at Montpellier, died 1358. He wrote two books of 'Sentences.'

Pierre de Lombard, who died 1160, was the great 'Magister Sententiarum.'

Authorised Version (The), 1611. Means the English translation of the Bible, authorised to be read in churches by James I. Fifty-four men were appointed by the king to bring out this version, but seven died or retired from the task. This version is often called 'King James's Bible,' or the 'King's Bible.' See 'Bible.'

The Psalms in the Common Prayer Book are those in the Bishops' Bible, and so were the epistles and gospels till 1661.

The Authorised Version was based on Tyndale's translation (q.v.), which passed through three stages: (1) the publication of the Great Bible (1539–1541), in the reign of Henry VIII.; (2) the publication of the Bishops' Bible (1568–1572), in the reign of Elizabeth; (3) the publication of the King's Bible, in 1611, in the reign of James I. Revised 1870–1884, in the reign of Victoria (published 1885).

Auto da Fé (plu. 'Autos da Fé'). An act of faith. In the Catholic Church a day was held by the Spanish Inquisition to examine into the faith of a supposed heretic. If innocent, the accused was absolved; if guilty, he was handed over to the secular power to be put to death, generally by burning at the stake. The sentence of the court and the session also are both called 'Autos da fé.'

Burning of heretics symbolised hell fire, to which heretics were consigned by the Church.

In Portugal it was customary to erect a vast theatre capable of holding 3,000 spectators, and the accused were brought forward one by one to hear judgment. Those who were brought in their own clothes paid a fine and were discharged; those who wore a 'Sanbenito'— that is, a straight yellow coat without sleeves, charged with a St. Andrew's cross—had to forfeit all their effects, but their lives were spared; those who had their 'Sanbenito' decorated with red serge patches resembling flames, without a cross, were discharged, but warned, if ever they relapsed, they would be delivered to the flames; those, lastly, who had the 'Sanbenito' decorated with flames and devils were condemned to die. The place of execution in Portugal is called 'Roussi.'

Pronounce Awe'-to-dan-fay'.

Auxiliary War (The), B.C. 214–20*l*. Between the Romans and the last Philip of Macedon. The Romans were the victors.

Avaricious Tyrant. Mauritius, emperor of the East (582–603). This was a mere pun. Mauritius refused to pay Chagan, king of the Avāri, four oboli a head for the prisoners taken by him in war, in 587. This refusal not only fixed on him the ill name, but also lost him his crown and empire.

Avengers (The). A Fenian society organised by Burton, of which he was himself the 'supreme head.' It consists of the most desperate of the Irish faction, bound by oath to murder any one the society wishes to be removed. Burton was condemned to penal servitude for life in May 1885. See 'Irish Associations.'

Aver'roism. The doctrines of Averroës, the Arabian philosopher, that the soul is not an individual possession, but part of a Universal Intellect diffused through the whole world. A sort of pantheism. See 'Averroists.'

Aver'roists. Of Seville, Cordova, and Fez. Disciples of Averroës, the Arabian philosopher and expositor of Aristotle (1149–1225). He taught the doctrine of evolution, or that every existing form has been developed from some previous one; that each individual is a part or limb of the great mundane whole, and that this mundane whole is animated by a General Intelligence or 'Anima Mundi,' and ultimately all existences will be reabsorbed in deity

Of course he denied what we call 'the human soul,' for the 'Anima Mundi' was general and not particular. Thomas Aquinas combated this doctrine, which was condemned by the University of Paris in 1240, and by the Lateran Council in 1512. The Averroists were opposed to the Alexandrists (q.v.).

Avignon Captivity (The), 1309–1376. When the popes resided at Avignon in France, instead of at Rome.

Avignon, pronounce Av'-vin-yŏng'.

Avignon Obedience, in the great Western schism, means obedience to the Avignon pope. As obedience to the pope of Rome is called 'Roman Obedience.' See above.

Avocat-général (L'). A magistrate attached to the ministry of France, and charged to defend the law and public order.

Pronounce Av'-vo-kah' djen'-e-rahl

Avocats au Conseil d'Etat et à la Cour de Cassation. Ministerial officers charged to follow the procedure and plead for clients before the Conseil d'Etat and la Cour de Cassation (q.v.). These two courts since 10 Sept., 1817, have been united. Such an 'avocat' must be 25 years of age, and must have been in the profession at least two years. The number is limited to sixty.

Pronounce Av'-vo-kah' o con-say'-e da-tah'.

Avvogado'ri (The), 1178. Three Venetian magistrates whose duty it was to watch over the public interests. In the courts of justice they acted as checks upon the administration of the law, and were also public accusers. In the councils they superintended the debates, and without the presence of one of the Avvogadori no act of any session was valid. The police was under their care; the public disbursements passed through their hands; they were the guardians of the public registers. (Singular, 'Avvogadore,' 5 syl.)

Ayerst Hall, in Cambridge University. Named after the Rev. W. Ayerst, the first principal, 1884.

The chief object of this foundation is to reduce the expense of a college education.

Aylesbury Men (The), 1704. Mr. Ashby, a burgess of Aylesbury, and five other Aylesbury men who insisted that they had a right to vote for their own member, because they were freeholders. The House of Commons gave it against the claimants, and the House of Lords reversed the judgment. When the Aylesbury men commenced actions against the constables of their town, they were committed to Newgate for contempt of the House. The queen (Anne), to cut the knot, dissolved the parliament, the men were then set at liberty, and the matter dropped.

Ayoubites (3 syl.). Descendants of Ayoub, a Turkish dynasty which reigned in Egypt and Syria from 1171 to 1254. It was founded by Saladin, son of Ayoub, and was overthrown by the Mamelukes.

Azores (2 syl.). Martin Behem, in 1448, gave this name to these western islands, because he found them full of hawks (azor, Spanish, a goshawk).

Aztecs. The dominant tribe of ancient Mexico. Their kingdom was founded in 1325. Allied with the Tolteos, they extended their kingdom of Tenochtitlan (Mexico) to the Gulf of Mexico and the Atlantic. They were at their best in the 15th and 16th cents., when the Spaniards arrived. The supreme god of the Aztecs was Taotl, and the protector of their nation was Huitzilopochtli.

Az'ymites (3 syl.). Those who celebrated the communion with unleavened bread.

There was a tribe or province under the Saracens so called. Thus Robert the monk, in his 'History of Jerusalem,' book vi., speaks of 'Persæ et Medi, Arabes et Turci, Azymitæ et Saraceni, Curti et Publicani, et diversarum nationum alii multi.'

Babel (Tablet of the Tower of), 1876. Discovered by Mr. George Smith. A tile of burnt clay impressed while soft with an inscription. It is much broken, and only four columns of writing out of six remain. The translation runs thus:—

. . . of Babylon He hastens to the submission.
Small and great He confounded the mound.
Their walls all the day they founded.
For their destruction in the night
He did not leave a remainder.
In His anger, secret counsel He poured out
. . . to confound their speech He set His face.
He gave the command—He made strange their counsel.
They weep hot tears for Babil. . . .
Bitterly they weep. . . .

Babington's Conspiracy, 1585. To murder Elizabeth, and having liberated Mary to place her on the throne instead. Pius V. excommunicated Elizabeth, and authorised all true Catholics to compass her death. Three priests—Gifford, Gilbert Gifford, and Hodgson—associated with Savage, undertook the assassination of the queen. Another priest, Ballard, afterwards joined the conspiracy; then Anthony Babington, a young man of fortune, with ten others (Windsor, Salisbury, Tilney, Tichbourne, Gage, Travers, Barnwell, Charnock, Dun, and Jones); last of all a man named Polly, who was, in fact, one of Walsingham's spies, who made his employer acquainted with all the proceedings. At the fulness of time all were apprehended and executed, except Salisbury, who escaped abroad (20 Sept., 1586).

Babism, 1843. A new religion founded in Persia by Mirza Ali Mohammed, a young man who professed to be the real successor of Ali, the prophet of Iran. He told the people that he was the báb (the door) through which all must go who enter into paradise. His followers are called Bábis. He condemned polygamy; disapproved of the seclusion and veiling of women; allowed believers to mix with unbelievers; and advocated a republican form of government. The royal troops were sent against the Bábis, thousands were put to death, and Mirza Ali, with his 'apostles,' were publicly executed. However, Mirza Yahya, a youth of sixteen, was chosen successor, and the religion of the Báb still continues.

It is not a little remarkable that Jesus Christ says of himself: 'I am the báb or door. By me if any man enter in, he shall be saved' (John x.).

Babouvism. Socialism, or the spoliation of land from landowners to distribute to those who had none; agrarian equalisation. So called from its author, Edouard Fleury Babeuf, who perished on the scaffold in 1797. The socialistic system of this Frenchman bears an extraordinary likeness to the platform of the Irish Land League (1881, &c.).

Baby Jumper (The). Bob Munton, who was entrusted by the Cambridge undergraduates with their business at Newmarket races (18th and 19th cent.).

Babylon. Old Cairo was so called, as well as the city on the Euphratês. Thus we read of the fourth crusade, 'Babylon was proclaimed to be the destination of the armament' (Villehardouin).

Babylonian Captivity (The). Lasted seventy years, from B.C. 588, when Jerusalem was taken by Nebuchadnezzar, and the people of the kingdom of Judah were deported to Babylon. On the conquest of Babylon by Cyrus, B.C. 538, the captives had permission to return. Only a few of them returned with Zerubbabel in 536, but a second migration was made B.C. 458, under the command of Ezra; and a third, B.C. 445, under Nehemiah.

The ten tribes never returned, and they have been identified with the Kurds, the Afghans, the Nestorians, the North American Indians, the Angles, and many others.

Babylonica doctrina. Astrology in which the Chaldæans were especially skilled.

Ne Babylonios tentaris numeros means, do not pry into futurity by astrological calculations—do not consult fortune-tellers.

Bac'chiadæ. The kings of Corinth, so called from Bacchis, who, B.C. 981, succeeded his father Prumnidês, and ruled with firmness and equity. His descendants continued to reign in Corinth till B.C. 779, when the government of the Prytanês was established.

Bachardians. Pantheists, so called from one Bachardus, of whom Hermann says, 'Hujus Brunonis tempore, quidam fuit (Deo et hominibus detestabilis) Bachardus nomine, speciem gerens magnæ sanctitatis, sed plenus malitia homo' ('Chron. Comit. Schawenburg,' p. 26). This must be taken for what it is worth, but most likely the word is simply a corruption of Beghardians, Pantheists on the borders of the Rhine in the 12th cent., condemned by the Council of Vienne in 1811, and so called from the German begehren (to beg), their fundamental law being that 'necessaria mendicarent, quo facilius possint sua deliria divulgare.' These begging friars were also called 'Fratres Conversi, hoc est, fratres non habentes domicilia' ('Annales Colmarienses,' year 1302). The Turlupins and German Mystics of the 14th cent. were offshoots of the Beclards.

Back-staff (A). An instrument invented, in 1590, by Captain John Davis, and used for taking the sun's altitude at sea, before the invention of the quadrant and sextant. In using it, the observer turned his back to the sun.

Baron of the Rhyming Crew (The). John Dryden (1631–1701); so called by Landor.

Badge.

Of England, a white and red rose ensigned with the royal crown. (The crown ensigned with the initial of the sovereign.)

Of Scotland, a thistle ensigned with a royal crown.

Of Ireland, either a golden harp or a sprig of trefoil, ensigned with the royal crown.

Of Wales, a dragon passant, wings elevated, gules, on a mount vert.

Of Ulster, the 'bloody hand.'

Of France, the fleur de lis.

The white hart was the badge of Richard II.; the silver swan of the house of Lancaster; the bear and ragged staff of the earl of Warwick, and so on.

Badger State (The). The State of Wisconsin, in North America. The natives are [Wisconsin] badgers.

Badingueux. The party of the French emperor Napoleon III. The empress's party was called 'Montijoyeux' and 'Montijocrisses.'

Badinguet was the name of the mason in whose clothes Louis Napoleon made his escape from Ham; and the empress was the second daughter of the count of Montijo of Spain. One of the nicknames of the emperor was 'Badinguet.' See 'Napoleon III.'

Bagarre (Day of the), 13–16 June, 1790. A scuffle at Nismes, which lasted four days, between the Protestants and Catholics. It was political under the guise of religion. As many as 134 persons lost their lives in this senseless squabble.

Bagaudæ (The), A.D. 287. Rebels in Gaul, consisting chiefly of Roman citizens. They rose in insurrection in 287, but were suppressed by Maximian. From the reign of Gallienus to that of Diocletian the peasant class of Gaul was especially wretched, and, like the peasant class of France, they turned on their oppressors. Their numbers were so formidable that town after town opened its gates to the rebels; but, as in the Jacquerie, their hostility was mainly directed against the upper classes. For a time the bagaudæ tyrannised without control, but their power was soon crushed when the Roman legions were brought against them.

Bagaudæ, a Βαγεῖσθαι, quod est vagari apud Suidam. Boxhornius ab Hebræo Boguedim (rebelles). Altaserra sic dictos censet Bagaudas (quasi silvicolas) a voce gau, quæ Gallis silvam sonat. A bagad, quæ vox Armoricis turmam sonat, et hominum collectionem.—Du Cange.

Bagdad' (Peace of), Oct. 1727. Between the sultan, Ahmed III., and the shah, Meer Aschraf. War was renewed in 1730.

Bagford Ballads (The). Sixty-four folio vols. deposited among the Harleian MSS., in the British Museum, collected by John Bagford, a shoemaker, bookseller, and printer, of Great Turnstile, Holborn (1650–1716).

Bagimont's Roll, 1512. See 'Bajimont's Roll.'

Bagnes (1 syl.). French convict prisons. In 1748 the galleys as a punishment were abolished, and convicts were employed in hard labour on public works, and lodged in bagnes. The Constituent Assembly of 1791 called this public labour travaux publics, but in the Code Napoléon it is called travaux forcés.

Bagnigge Wells. The bagnios or baths established in 1708, in opposition to the cold baths of Mr. Baines. See 'Cold Bath Fields.'

Bagnolenses, or Bagnolensians. A branch of the Waldenses, so named from Bagnols, a town in France, where they sprang up.

Bahar'ites (3 syl.). The first of the Mameluke dynasty in Egypt. These Mamelukes were Egyptian slaves. Malek Saleh bought 1,000, trained them to the use of arms, and placed them in a fortress on the seacoast (called in Arabic bahar'). They succeeded in usurping the sovereign power, and Noureddin-Ali in 1254 called himself Sultan of Egypt. In 1382 the Baharite Mamelukes were succeeded by the Borgites or Bordjites.

Baharites in 3 syl. Borgites in 2 syl.

Bailies in Scotland correspond to aldermen in English corporations, and provost corresponds to our mayor. The Scotch Municipal Reform Bill was passed 18 Aug., 1840, and rendered this office unnecessary.

Bailiwick (A). A district within which the sheriff's bailiffs may execute their office. A sheriff is the king's or queen's bailiff. The corresponding French word is bailliage.

Bairak-tar (i.e. standard bearer). The title of the Grand Vizier Mustapha (1755–1808).

Bairam (2 syl.). A Moslem festival in the month Shawall or Chaval, and following the Ramadan (q.v.) or great fast of four weeks' duration. The Great Bairam is the time when all true Mussulmans are supposed to make a pilgrimage to Mecca at least once in their life. The feast of Bairam lasts four days, but it is preceded by a lesser Bairam of three days' duration, which begins on the first of Chaval, and puts an end to the fast. As the Turkish calendar consists of 12 lunar months, it follows that the months Ramadan and Chaval, in the course of 33 years, have run through all the seasons of the year.

The Great Bai'ram, or 'festival of the sacrifices,' commemorates the offering of Abraham on Mount Moriah.

Bajimont's Roll, 1512. The Valor Beneficiorum,' drawn up by the clergy in council at Edinburgh, and giving the valuation on which the ecclesiastical benefices of Scotland were taxed from the close of the 13th cent. to the Reformation, so-called from an Italian, Baiamund or Bajimont de Vinci, sent in 1276 from Rome to make the valuation, and collect the tithes for an expedition to the Holy Land.

Balaam's Ass Sunday. The second Sunday after Easter, when the story of Balaam is read in the lesson for the day. See 'Sundays.'

Balafré (Le), that is, the scarred one. So Henri, duc de Guise was called, after receiving at Dormans (1575) a frightful sword-cut on the face (1550–1588).

Quentin Durward, nearly an old archer in the Scotch Guard at Plessis les Tours, one of the castle palaces of Louis IX. is called Le Balafré in 'Quentin Durward.' Probably Sir Walter Scott had some Bothwell for the appellation.

Balance of Power (The). That limitation of the European states which forbids any one of the nations having such a preponderance as to endanger the independence of the others. In the 18th and first half of the 19th cent. it was a European principle, but is now utterly exploded.

Balance of Trade (The). The difference between the aggregate amount of the exports and imports of a nation; or the difference of purchase and sale between any two nations. This calculation no longer exists, as it leads to false conclusions.

Balbus (the stammerer). The most renowned was Lucius Cornelius Balbus of Gades, in Spain, who served under Pompey the Great against Sertorius. Pompey took him to Rome, B.C. 71, and he gained the esteem of Julius Cæsar. Cicero defended him in an oration still extant. In the civil war Balbus accepted the management of Cæsar's affairs during the frequent absences of the great dictator, and to this Balbus the 8th book of the 'Commentaries' is dedicated. After the death of Cæsar Balbus served the consulship, B.C. 40.

Balfour Studentship. For original research in biology and animal morphology, in the University of Cambridge. Value 200*l.* a year, tenable for three years. Candidates need not be members of the university. Founded from the memorial fund of Francis Maitland Balfour, fellow of Trinity, 1883.

Balia. A temporary delegation of sovereignty to a number of dictators. They named the magistrates and banished suspected individuals, in the republics of Italy. Italian, balia, power.

A balia was appointed (in Florence), for ten years to exclude all the Albizi from magistracy . . . and this was repeated six times in twenty-one years. —HALLAM, Middle Ages, vol. i. p. 540.

When the signory has taken its place to address the assembly the piazza is guarded by armed men, and then the people are asked if they wish to give balia (dictatorial power) to the citizen named.—SYMONDS, Renaissance in Italy.

Balia (The Council of). The council which discussed and carried into effect every important measure of Florence during the Medici administration. They appointed eight men for criminal business, and this committee was called the 'Otto di guardia e balia.'

In Venice was a similar council convened originally only on great emergencies, but in the time of Lorenzo di Medici, the Balia was made permanent, and became the legislative, administrative, and judicial power of the republic.

'Magistratus novem civium apud Senenses, qui rebus bellicis præfecti sunt.'—Du Cange.

Baliol. See 'Balliol.'

Ball Money. Blackmail levied on the newly married to prevent their being mobbed on leaving church. Called 'ball-money,' because it was given ostensibly to buy a foot-ball for the village green, but probably it rarely got further than the nearest public-house.

Ball put off (A). Andrew Marvell says, in his Satires, 'A silly fellow's death puts off the ball.' The allusion is to the death of the beadle of the ward, attacked, 1672, by the Duke of Monmouth, young Monk (Duke of Albemarle), and eight others, in a drunken brawl. Charles II. pardoned the ruffians, but deferred the ball which was to have taken place at Whitehall the same night.

Balliol (John). Joint claimant with Robert Bruce of the throne of Scotland, at the death of Alexander III. He was great-grandson of David, but in the elder line. Robert Bruce was grandson, but in the younger line. Edward I. decided the claim in favour of Balliol.

MALCOLM IV. had two sons, WILLIAM I. and David.
From WILLIAM I. descended ALEXANDER II. (his son), and ALEXANDER III. (his son), when issue failed.
Then comes David, who had three daughters, viz. Margaret, Isabella, and Adama.
Margaret's daughter, Devergilda, married John Balliol, and had a son called John Balliol (the claimant).
Isabella married Robert Bruce, and had a son called Robert Bruce (the claimant).

Balliol College, 1263. Founded by John Balliol of Barnard Castle, Durham, father of John Balliol, king of Scotland. The head of the college is called the Master.

Ballot (Voting by). Was first publicly adopted in England in the election of the school boards in 1870. In 1872 an act was passed by which ballot was applied to parliamentary and municipal elections in the United Kingdom.

In France the ballot is used in the election of members of the Chamber of Deputies, and not unfrequently in the deliberations of the legislative chambers.
In the United States of America and in the Australian colonies almost all public elections are conducted by ballot.

Baltadji. The 400 halberdiers who attend on the royal princes and princesses of Constantinople. Their colonel is called the 'Kizlar-agasi.' The name means hatchet-bearers.

Baltimore, in Maryland, U.S. America. So called, in 1634, from Lord Baltimore, who led a colony to settle there.

Bambi'no. A representation of the infant Christ in swaddling clothes, surrounded by a halo and watched over by angels. The 'Santissimo Bambino' in the church of the Ara Cœli, at Rome, is carved in wood from Mount Olivet, and the likeness is attributed to Luke the evangelist. The festival of the Bambino occurs in the Epiphany.

Bampton Lectures (Oxford University), 1779. The highest distinction the university can bestow. The lecturer must be an M.A. of Oxford or Cambridge, and is chosen annually on the fourth Tuesday in Easter term by the heads of colleges, but no one can hold the appointment twice. Founded by the Rev. John Bampton, of Trinity College, Oxford, who left 120*l.* a year for eight lectures, preached in Great St. Mary's on eight consecutive Sunday mornings between Lent term and Trinity term, on the following subjects: (1) Confutation of heresies; (2) The divine authority of the Holy Scriptures; (3) The authority of the Fathers; (4) The divinity of the Holy Ghost, and (6) The Articles of the Established Church as explained by the Apostles' and Nicene Creeds. Thirty copies of the sermons are printed within two months of their delivery. The endowment is 200*l.* for the eight printed sermons.

The Cambridge Hulsean Lectures are of a similar character to the Oxford Bampton Lectures.

Ban. An Illyrican word, bojan=lord, about equal to the German margraf. Croatia is still a banat. There were at one time several others, as Dalmatia, Slavonia, Bosnia, Wallachia, Bulgaria, Servia, &c. In the reign of Maria Theresa, a ban was the third dignitary o' the Hungarian kingdom, but on the erection of the vassal lands into crown lands in 1849, the banat of Hungary ceased. Some say Slavonic Pan = lord.

Jellachich, the Ban of Croatia, resolved to hold a Sclavonic diet at Agram on 6 June (1848).—Howitt, Hist of Engl. (year 1849, p. 56).

Ban (A), in French history, is a call to arms, and the 'banlieu' was the district encompassed by the call or proclamation.

Ban and Arrière-ban. Regulated in France by Louis le Gros, 1124, and last levied in 1672. The 'ban' was a summons of the king to his immediate vassals, calling them to his banner; the 'arrière-ban' was the summons of the suzerain to his tenants. Sometimes the levy itself was called the 'ban' or 'arrière-ban.' See 'Bouillet' sub voce.

Ban of the Empire. 'To be put under the ban of the empire,' in German history, means to be cut off from society, and deprived of rank, title, privileges, and property.

Banat (A). The district under a ban. The ban of Croatia is the third of the Hungarian barons. See 'Ban.'

Banbury Saint (A). An overstrained puritan. Mr. S. R. Gardiner calls Banbury the 'most puritan of all puritan towns.' It is a tradition that cats who caught mice on Sunday in Banbury were hanged on Monday.

> To Banbury came I, O profane one!
> Where I saw a puritane one
> Hanging of his cat on Monday
> For killing of a mouse on Sunday.
> Drunken Barnaby.

Banbury Story (A). An idle silly story. A correspondent in 'Notes and Queries' (21 May, 1887, p. 404), derives the phrase from one William Morrell, who lived at Banbury, noted for the wonderful tales which he told of his travels. He was a professor of chirurgery, and was looked on by the country people as a prodigy. (See Gardner, 'History and Gazetteer of Oxfordshire,' p. 432.)

Banco (Sittings in). Now means the sittings of judges during term-time, when the several judges sit in their respective courts; but formerly it meant those judges who held their court at Westminster, in contradistinction to judges of the curia or aula regis, who followed the king. See 'Days in banc.'

Banco. The standard money in which a bank keeps its accounts, as distinguished from the current coin of the locality. Thus the Hamburg bank keeps its account in an hypothetical coin having no representative in the current coinage.

Band of Hope, 1855. Children under working age—that is, about 14—who have agreed to abstain from all intoxicating drinks. Started by the Rev. Jabez Tunnicliffe, of Leeds. First president of the union was Canon Morse, who was succeeded by Lord Ebury, and then by Samuel Morley, M.P. Stephen Shirley was one of the most active leaders, but Mr. Tunnicliffe suggested the name.

Band of the Heroine (The), A.D. 618. A band raised by Lee-chee, daughter of Lee-chee-min, who sold all her jewels to pay for a band of soldiers to assist her father in deposing Yang-tee, the emperor of China. The emperor was deposed, and the conqueror, after a short interval of a few months, founded the thirteenth imperial dynasty, called that of Tâng, the Augustan age of China.

Band-room Methodists, or 'The United Free Gospel Churches,' 1806. So called because they met originally in the Band-room at Manchester. They do not pay their ministers. They admit persons who are not members into their society, and ignore class-meetings.

Bandage (The), with which Christ was blindfolded by the soldiers, according to Mark xiv. 65, was given (we are told) by Charlemagne to St. Namphasus, who built the abbey of Marsillac (in France), where he deposited it. It is now kept in a little country church called St. Julian of Lunegarde. It is a linen bandage stained in places with blood. See 'Crucifixion, Relics of the.'

Asservatur in ecclesia S. Juliani de Lunegarde (cujus præsentatio ad abbatem Marciliacensem pertinet) tenue velum ex lino Ægyptio; idemque illud esse dicunt quo Christi faciem milites obduxere, dum per ludibrium colaphis cæderetur. Est et in eadem ecclesia frustum arundinis ei in signum regni affectati pro sceptro traditæ.—Dominicy, De Sudario Capitis Christi, p. 47.

Bande Noire. A society of speculators which, after the French Revolution, bought up the châteaux, the abbeys, the monuments of art, not to preserve them, but to sell them as 'raw material.' These Vandals would pull down a fine building merely to sell the material, or a work of art as so much gold, silver, or marble. Hence 'Bande Noire' means Vandals who would sell a Colossus of Rhodes merely as so much bronze, or Doomsday Book as so much parchment. See 'Black Band.'

Bandit. In Italian bandito, plural banditi, means an outlaw or banished man; what we call banditti the Italians call briganti (brigands).

Bandoleer (A). A leather belt formerly slung by musketeers over the left shoulder, and to which were suspended twelve little cases, each containing sufficient powder for a charge.

Bangorian controversy (The). Whether or not the reigning monarch can consistently be called the 'head of the Church.' The question was raised by Dr. Hoadly, bishop of Bangor, who preached (31 March, 1717) before the king (George I.) on the text 'My kingdom is not of this world,' meaning to prove that the kingdom of Christ is spiritual, not temporal. This brought on a long paper war, but had the happy result of severing convocation from the government, for it has never since been called together by the sovereign, and has now no legal authority whatever. Hoadly's chief opponents were Dr. Sharpe and William Law.

Dr. Hoadly denied that episcopacy is a divine institution, and also denied the existence of a visible Church. He greatly objected to Articles XVIII. and XIX.; and denied wholly the divine right of kings. His opinions tended to republicanism, disestablishment, and the equality of all Christian creeds.

Bank Holidays. In 1871 an Act of Parliament (34, 35 Vict. c. 17) was passed providing that Easter Monday, Whit Monday, the first Monday in August, and the day after Christmas Day, shall be bank holidays, and that bills due on such days shall be payable the day following.

The sovereign has power to appoint any other day as a bank holiday.

Bank Restriction Act (The), 7 Geo. IV. c. 6 (1827). The prohibition of banknotes under 5*l*. The issue of small notes was restricted 5 April, 1826, but the Act of prohibition was deferred till the following year.

Bannatyne Club (The), 1823. Instituted by Sir W. Scott in Edinburgh for printing rare works illustrative of Scotch history, topography, poetry, and miscellaneous literature in a uniform size and style. Only 100 copies of each work were published, one for each member who paid 5*l*. a year. The club was dissolved in 1859.

The club was called after George Bannatyne, by whose industry much of the Scotch poetry of the 15th and 16th cents. had been preserved.

Banner (A). In feudal times was the square flag of a knight banneret, made by cutting off the point of the pennon of a simple knight.

Now any flag carried on a pole may be called a banner; but the royal national flag is more strictly called the Royal Standard; a bishop's banner is called a gonfalon (one is called an oriflamme); a ship's flag is a union-jack, an ensign, and the long strip of bunting is a pennon. For telegraphic uses three flags are used, viz. a square flag; a pennant or triangular flag; and a flag with two points like a <, called a burgee.

A white flag indicates a truce or a desire to come to terms for a truce; a red flag means defiance; a black flag indicates a pirate's vessel; and a yellow flag a ship in quarantine. See 'Labarum.'

Banner-bearer of the Church (The). Louis the Great of Hungary was so styled by the pope (1342–1382).

Banner of St. Ambrose (The). The sacred oriflamme of Milan. When taken to a battle-field, it was drawn thither in a red car, by red bullocks harnessed with red trappings.

Banneret. A higher grade of knighthood conferred by the king for some heroic deed performed in the field. So called because the knight's pennon was then exchanged for a banneret, by rending off the points and making it square. The first banneret was made by Edward I. and the last by Charles I., in 1642.

George III., at the naval review, Portsmouth, in 1778, conferred the title on Admiral Pye and some other officers.

Banns. A proclamation or public notification, as 'banns of marriage,' first enjoined by the fourth Council of the Lateran, 1215.

Bantingism, 1862. The system adopted by Mr. William Banting to reduce obesity. His system was to abstain from fat-producing foods, such as bread, sugar, fat, oil, and butter.

Breakfast: tea or coffee without milk or sugar; beef, mutton, kidneys, boiled fish, eggs, biscuit, dry toast, brown bread.

Dinner (at 1 o'clock): fish, any meat but pork greens, dry toast, game, poultry, sherry, claret, but no port or champagne.

Tea (at 5 o'clock): fruit, rusk, tea without milk or sugar.
Supper (8.30): fish, meat (not pork), claret.

Bap'homet. A small image used by the Knights Templars in their religious services. It had two heads, one of a man, and the other of a woman. It held the key of life, and was surrounded with the sun, moon, and stars. The Gnostics and Manichæans made use of a similar image. It is compounded of two Greek words, baphê mêtes (wisdom from baptism), meaning the wisdom which those initiated by baptism possess.

Baptiste (Jean). A generic name of French Canadians, like John Bull for an Englishman, Sawney (Alexander) for a Scotchman, Taffy (David) a Welshman, Michael a German, brother Jonathan a native of the United States of North America, &c.

Baptists. Protestant dissenters who baptize by immersion, and only those of an adult age, who have made a satisfactory personal confession of faith. They are independent in church discipline, like the Congregationalists. Baptists are divided into General Baptists and Particular Baptists (q.v.).

There are Baptists, Baptized Believers, Calvinistic Baptists, General Baptists, General Baptist New Connection, Old Baptists, Open Baptists, Particular Baptists, Presbyterian Baptists, the Scotch Baptists, the Seventh-day Baptists, the Strict Baptists, the Union Baptists, the Unitarian Baptists, &c. See 'Apostoolians.'

Bar (The Confederation of), 29 Feb., 1768. A confederation of Polish 'patriots,' organised by Pulawski, Krasinski, and others, who protested in this city against the intermixture of the Muscovites in the government of Poland. In 1767 the dissidents of Poland had organised themselves into the Confederation of Radom (q.v.), which called on Russia for aid. Russia gladly responded, and this led to the partition of Poland in 1772. See 'Dissidents.'

France took the side of the Confederates of Bar, and Turkey joined them when the War of Independence began. As a rule, the Confederates of Bar were Catholics and the Confederates of Radom were of the Greek Church, Calvinists, Arians, and other anti-Catholics.

Bar of Dower (A). Forfeiture of the dower which a widow would otherwise be entitled to receive out of the lands and tenements of her deceased husband. Elopement would be such a bar, so would treason in the husband, by which his property is confiscated to the crown.

Bar of Michael Angelo (The). The ridge of bone which forms the base of the forehead, and along which the eyebrows are traced, is called the bar, which in Michael Angelo was well developed. This is said to indicate great mental power.

Barattiero (plural 'barattieri'). See under 'Bianchi.' Dante, the poet who sided with the Bianchi, was condemned by the Neri (q.v.) to be burnt alive as a 'barattiero' in 1302.

Dante made his escape and quitted his Guelf connections after this, and composed his immortal 'Commedia' ('Hell,' 'Purgatory,' and 'Paradise')

Barbadoes Leg (A). A disease in the leg indigenous to Barbadoes; the limb becomes tumid, hard, and misshapen. It is similar to the elephantiasis of the Arabs.

Barbarians. All the world except the Greeks themselves were so called in the time of Homer. The human race was by the early Greeks divided into Hellenês and Barbaroi; the ancient Jews divided mankind into Jews and Gentiles.

I am a debtor both to the Greeks and to the Barbarians.—Rom. i. 14. See also 1 Cor. xiv. 11.

II. The Romans ranked as Barbarians all people except themselves and the Greeks; but after the fall of the Roman empire, the Teutonic races which overran Europe were called Barbarians.

In modern speech, the word means persons of a low civilisation.

Barbarossa = Rufus or Red Beard. So Friedrich I., kaiser of Germany, was called by the Italians (1121, 1152–1190).

Aroodje (2 syl.), or Harudj, and Khair Eddin, two brothers, natives of Mitylênê, who turned Turkish corsairs, and were the terror of the Mediterranean in the first half of the 16th cent., were so called. These two brothers made themselves masters of Algeria and Tunis. Karl V. defeated them, restored Tunis to the dey, and set free 20,000 Christian captives in 1535.

Barber Poet (The). Jacques Jasmin (1798–1864) of Gascony, a barber by trade.

Barber-surgeons. The Company of Barber-surgeons was incorporated in England by charter of Edward IV. in 1461. It was united with the Company of Surgeons by 32 Hen. VIII. c. 42 (1540); but in 1745, by 18 Geo. II. c. 15, the two were made separate corporations.

For 'Barber's Pole,' see 'Dict. of Phrase and Fable,' p. 65.

Barbers. Pierre la Brosse, the barber of St. Louis, was made chief minister of Philippe le Hardi; Olivier le Dain, barber of Louis XI., was the confidant of that king. Figaro, the barber of Seville, in Beaumarchais' comedy ('Le Barbier de Séville'), is the type of barber-surgeons.

Barberini Vase (The). So the Portland vase was called before it received its present name in honour of the Duchess of Portland. It was for two centuries the principal ornament of the Barberini palace.

Barbes. Vaudois ministers. The word is synonymous with 'uncle,' and is now no longer used except as a term of endearment to old men. A minister since 1630 has been addressed as monsieur le pasteur.

Barclay's Janissaries, 1696. Sir George Barclay was at the head of a conspiracy for the assassination of William III., and was aided by twenty picked men from the court of St. Germain. Others were subsequently added one by one. These were called his Janissaries. The idea being that they would help Sir George to the 'George and Garter,' by subverting the throne. (Macaulay, 'Hist. of Eng.,' chap. xxi.)

Janissaries were the infantry of the Turkish empire, 25,000 of which were massacred in 1825 by Sultan Mahmood. The word means 'new troops.'

Barclayans (The). A religious sect founded by the Rev. John Barclay of Perthshire (1734–1798). Also called Bere'ans (q.v.).

Bar Cochba (Son of the Star). The title given to Shimeon, who gave himself out to be the star spoken of by Balaam. 'There shall come a star out of Jacob, and a sceptre shall rise out of Israel,' &c. He opposed Hadrian, and A.D. 132 made himself master of Jerusalem. The Romans were driven back in all directions, and Bar Cochba occupied fifty fortified places and 985 villages At length Julius Sevērus was sent to Palestine, and, A.D. 135, we are told that 580,000 Jews perished, and Bar Cochba was among the slain.

No dependence can be placed on numbers, especially in Jewish history. Tens are made hundreds, either from the spirit of exaggeration or from carelessness.

Bard of all time. Shakespeare (1564–1616).

Bard of Avon (The). Shakespeare, born and buried at Stratford-upon-Avon (1564–1616).

Bard of Ayrshire (The). Robert Burns, a native of Ayrshire (1759–1796).

Bard of Hope (The). Thomas Campbell, author of 'The Pleasures of Hope' (1777–1844).

Bard of Memory (The). Samuel Rogers, author of 'The Pleasures of Memory' (1762–1855).

Bard of Olney (The). William Cowper, who lived for many years at Olney, in Buckinghamshire (1731–1800).

Bard of Prose (The). Boccaccio, author of the 'Decameron' (1313–1375).

Bard of Rydal Mount (The). William Wordsworth, who lived at Rydal Mount. Also called the 'Poet of the Excursion,' from his principal poem (1770–1850).

Bard of Twickenham (The). Alexander Pope, who lived at Twickenham (1688–1744).

Bard of Woodstock (The). Geoffrey Chaucer (1328–1400).

Bard of the Imagination. Mark Akenside, author of 'The Pleasures of the Imagination' (1721–1770).

Bardesa'nists (The), 2nd cent. Followers of Bardesānes (8 syl.), a Syrian heresiarch of the Valentinian or Platonic school. He also denied the doctrine of the resurrection.

Bardesanistæ, inter alia exsecranda mysteria, Christum cœleste corpus habuisse confirmant, nec adsumpsisse carnem de Virgine, sed per eam, quasi aquam per fistulam translisse deliberant. Gloss, 'Sangerm.'

Barebone Parliament (The). From 14 July to 22 Dec., 1653, convened by Cromwell after the dismissal of the Rump (q.v.); so called from one Barbon, a leather-seller of Fleet Street, a name corrupted into Barebone, and seized on as a nickname for this parliament. Cromwell named eight officers and four civilians as his council of state, and this council chose 156, or (some say) 140 men for the parliament; six being for Wales, six for Ireland, and five for Scotland. Their first act was to elect eight of their number 'to seek the Lord in prayer,' and their wish was to substitute the law of Moses for the law of the land. This parliament or convention, however, was called together chiefly to pave the way to a parliament on a really national basis. It named a new council of state, and then the Speaker placed the abdication of the convention in Cromwell's hands. See 'Parliaments.'

The Barebone Parliament projected the abolition of the Court of Chancery; the introduction of civil marriages; the abolition of tithes, and lay patronage; and parliamentary reform. Cromwell was afraid of these measures, and the dissolution of the convention was determined on.

Bare-feet (Pieds-nus), 1563. French Catholics incited by monks and priests to put down the Huguenots. These bands consisted of persons of no calling, vagabonds and beggars, armed with reaping hooks, knives and pikes. In their attacks they respected neither law, modesty, nor pity.

The Pieds-nus fell upon the Calvinists by surprise, massacred men, outraged women, demolished houses, tore down the vines, rooted up the trees, and desolated whole districts.—FELICE, History of the Protestants of France, viii.

Barefooted Carmelites (The), 1540. Reformed Carmelites, founded by St. Theresa, and approved by Gregory XIII. in 1580.

Barefooted Friars (The), 1570. A branch of the Austin Friars or Begging Hermits, 'reformed' by Friar Thomas, a Jesuit, who forbade his disciples to wear shoes.

Barefooted Monks, or Feuillants. Reformed Cistercians during the 16th cent., contemporary with the Reformation. The author of this reform was Jean de la Barrière.

Barlaam, died 1348. Censured by the Council of Constantinople 1341. He drew upon himself the odium theologicum of the monks of Mount Athos by denying that the light seen on Mount Tabor was the 'light of God,' i.e. the uncreated essence of the Deity, or, as Milton calls it, the 'bright effluence of bright essence increate.' The monks of Mount Athos were the strenuous supporters of the divine essence of that light.

Barlaamites. Those who entertain the same views as Barlaam respecting the light seen on the mount of transfiguration. See 'Palamites.'

Barlettare. Qui nescit barlettare nescit prædicare. Fra Gabriele de Barletta, a preacher of the Dominican order in the 15th cent. (flo. 1450), enjoyed at Naples an immense popularity. His sermons were a mixture of pathos and burlesque, and have passed through thirty editions. No one can lay claim to be a pulpit orator who cannot preach like Barletta.

Barn-burners (The). Ultra-Radicals or Nihilists. As the Dutchman burnt down his barn to rid himself of the rats, so these Nihilists would pull down the state about their ears in order to get rid of abuses.

Barnabas (The Gospel of). An apocryphal book containing 222 chapters. It is held in honour by Mohammedans because it is supposed to refer to Mohammed when it speaks of a 'messenger of God who will perfect the dispensation of Jesus.' There is an Arabic version, a Spanish version, and an Italian one. The last is supposed to have been written in 1450.

There is also an epistle ascribed to Barnabas, partly doctrinal and partly practical. It is a pious work, but there is no sufficient reason to suppose it was composed by the companion of Paul the Apostle. Dr. Lardner supposes it to date from 71 or 72, whereas the Gospel of St. Barnabas is not earlier than 1211. (See p. 85, col. 2.)

Barnabites (3 syl.), 1530. An order of monks which sprang up in Milan. So called because the church of St. Barnabas in that city was granted them to preach in. Their special duties were to attend the sick and instruct the young. In France and Austria their special duty was to convert Protestants.

Barnes Scholarship (Thomas). For classics and mathematics. Value 60*l.* a year, tenable for four years. Founded in the University of Cambridge for undergraduates in their first year by Thomas Barnes of Pembroke College, 1844. See 'Bell scholarship.'

Baron of the Holy Sepulchre. Godfrey of Bouillon, in Belgium, commander-in-chief of the first crusade (1096–1099), when the city of Jerusalem was taken. The victorious army would have created him 'king of Jerusalem,' but Godfrey refused 'to wear a crown of gold where his Master wore only a crown of thorns.'

Baron Slumber. John Wodehouse, earl of Kimberley (born 1826–). When secretary of state for the colonies he greatly objected to the delivery of official telegrams at night-time, for fear they should disturb his night's rest.

Barones majores we now call peers. In the time of John they were summoned to parliament by the king. The Barones minores were summoned by the county sheriffs, and called 'knights of the shires;' they sat in a different house. All Barones majores were called to the king's council, but only a few of the Barones minores, who were very numerous.

Barones, 8 syl.; majores, 3 syl.; minores, 3 syl.

Barons (The 24), 1258, &c. By this is meant the 24 barons who, in the reign of Henry III. of England, endeavoured to convert the kingdom into an oligarchy. They virtually set aside the king and placed the supreme power in the hands of twelve advisers. It was these barons that first called knights of the shires to assist in reforming abuses, and the parliament called by them at Oxford is called the Mad Parliament (q.v.), because their measures were so anti-aristocratical and anti-despotic.

Barons. Barons are either greater or lesser. Barones majores being peers, the Barones minores being gentry possessed of lands erected into a barony, sometimes called Free Barons. See Sir Robert Douglas, 'The Baronage of Scotland.'

Barons (War of the). An insurrection of the barons against Henry III. It broke out in 1262 and terminated in 1265, when Simon de Montfort was killed in the battle of Evesham.

Sometimes the uprising of the barons, 1215-1216, to compel King John to sign Magna Charta, is spoken of as the Barons' War, or War of the Barons, likewise.

Barons of the Exchequer (The) Anciently the three puisné judges of the exchequer. There were besides a lord-treasurer and a chancellor. The court now consists of five judges, viz. the chief baron and four barons of the exchequer.

Puisné pronounce pu-ne. French puis-né.

Baronet. Primus Baronetorum Angliæ. Sir Nicholas Bacon, of Redgrave, in Suffolk, whose successors are styled so still.

Baronet. See under 'Knight Baronet.'

Baronial Days. Days when the barons sat to hear the complaints of their vassals.

Barracoon (A). A depôt on the coast of Africa for newly-captured slaves, where they were stowed till they were carried off in the slave-vessels.

Barrel-Mirabeau. Boniface Riquetti, viscount de Mirabeau (1754–1792), was so called from his huge bulk and the quantity of liquor he consumed.

Barren Periods. Plato says there are periods when inferior things are made partakers of extraordinary virtues, and celestial virtues show themselves in earthly things; and there are periods when no such virtues shine forth in them. The former he calls Fertile periods, the latter Barren periods. Miracles belong to the fertile periods, but when magical operations ceased, came a barren period.

Barricades (Day of the), 'Journée des barricades,' 12 May, 1588, when the Parisians barricaded the city against the Swiss Guards sent by Henri III. to put down the populace, who were clamourous to place Henri of Guise on the throne.

(ii.) 5 Aug., 1648, when the populace barricaded the streets of Paris, because their favourites Blancmesnil, Charton, and Broussel, 'conseillers au parlement,' had been arrested.

(iii.) July 1830. July 27, 28, 29, called La Grande Semaine, when Charles X. was driven from the throne.

(v.) June 1848. June 23, 24, 25, when the national workshops were closed.

(vi.) 2 Dec., 1851. The coup d'état, when Louis Napoleon became emperor.

A barricade is a barrique filled with sand, &c.

Barrier (Treaty of the), 15 Nov., 1715. Between the Kaiser, the King of Great Britian (George I.), and the States-General of the United Provinces. It was signed at Antwerp.

Barrier Act (The), 8 Jan., 1697. An Act of the General Assembly of the Church of Scotland, intended as a barrier against innovations, and a hindrance to hasty legislation. It provides that no change shall be made in the laws of the Scotch Church without being first approved by a majority of the presbyteries. After having obtained this approval, even then the General Assembly had the power of veto.

Barrier Treaty (The), 1709. (i.) Propounded by Lord Townshend to De Torcy, the French plenipotentiary on behalf of the Dutch. The Dutch were to receive from France as a barrier to their states Furnes, Fort Kenock, Menin, Saverage, Yprês, Warneton, Comines, Wervick, Lille, Condé, Tournay, and Maubeuge. The French were also to deliver back all the towns, cities, and fortresses which they had taken in the Netherlands. In 1712 the Tory government disallowed this treaty as injurious to British trade.

(ii.) 5 Nov., 1713. Between the Dutch and the king of France, shortly before the peace of Utrecht; by which treaty, the Dutch reserved the right of holding garrisons in certain fortresses of the Spanish Netherlands.

Barriers (Battle of the), 30 March, 1814. Between Napoleon and the armies of the allied sovereigns, fought under the walls or barriers of Paris. The French army was defeated, and Napoleon abdicated.

Barristers first acted as advocates about 1600. The rules for admission to the bar were adopted by all the Inns of Court in 1762; the new rules were agreed to in 1852.

By the new rules a student is compelled to attend two of the five courses of lectures delivered at the halls of the Inns of Court, during one whole year, which is divided into three educational terms. He may, however, avoid attendance on these lectures by passing an examination in law.

Bartenstein, in Wurtemberg (Convention of), 26 April, 1807. Between Alexander I., czar of Russia, and the King of Prussia.

Barthélemi (The). The slaughter of the Huguenots on the eve of St. Bartholomew, and some days after.

[Sully] escaped the Barthélemi, and had a command in the battles of Coutras, Arques, and Ivri. —PRINCE, Parallel Hist., vol. ii., p. 164.

Barthélemite order (The), 1640. An order of clerical students living in common, and founded by Barthelemy Holzanter.

Bartholomew's Day (St.), 24 Aug., 1572. When the massacre of the French Huguenots began, at the instigation of Charles IX. and his mother. It is said that as many as 30,000 Protestants were murdered in France in this terrible persecution.

Some estimate the entire massacre as high as 70,000 persons. Felipe II. of Spain warmly approved of it, and Pope Gregory XIII. went in solemn state to the church of St. Louis to hear a grand Te Deum as a public thanksgiving; he also had a medal struck to commemorate the event, and proclaimed the year a year of jubilee.

Bartholomew Fair, 24 Aug. (old style). Henry I., in 1133, granted the charter of this fair to Rayer or Rahere, a monk. Like all other fairs, it was connected with the church, and miracle-plays, mysteries, and moralities were performed. In 1445 four persons were appointed by the Court of Aldermen as keepers of the fair. In 1661 the fair lasted fourteen days. In 1691 the fair was limited to three days. In 1840 the fair was removed to Islington; and in 1855 it was discontinued.

Bartholomew's Hospital (St.). Smithfield, London, originally part of the Priory of St. Bartholomew. It was founded in 1123 by Rahere, the first prior (originally minstrel to Henry I.), who had, in 1102, founded the priory. After the dissolution of the monasteries the hospital was, in 1544, refounded for 100 beds.

A medical school was added in 1662, and the hospital was rebuilt by subscription in 1729. It now contains 600 beds, and some 70,000 patients are relieved there every year.

Bartholomew Slaughter of Ottoman History (The), 1513. The Sultan Selim began his reign by a general massacre of all the Schiites in Europe and Asia. 40,000 were slain, and 30,000 sentenced to perpetual imprisonment.

Bartholomists or 'Bartholomites,' 1640. Partisans of Pope Urban VI., whose name was Bartholomæus Prignani, or Bartholomew of Prignano, in Naples. Many of the cardinals protested against his election (in 1378), out of dislike to his severity; and these dissentients elected Robert of Geneva, who went to Avignon, under the name and title of Clement VI. This was the commencement of the 'Grand Schism of the West.' Urban was recognised by England, Germany, Bohemia, Hungary, and Sicily; but Clement was acknowledged by France, Spain, and Naples. Urban contracted the intervals of the jubilees to 33 years, and established the fête of the Visitation of the Virgin. He died 1389. The religious order so called was instituted in 1640.

Bartole, or Bartolus. See under 'Coryphæus,' &c.

Bas-Chevaliers. Knights bachelors, or knights holding military fees by a base tenure. Superior knights were termed bannerets.

Base Court (The). The outer court of a feudal mansion, containing the stable-yard and accommodations for servants.

Base-Empire (The). The Roman empire in its decadence, from Constantine; and the Eastern empire after Theodosius.

Basel (Council of). See under 'Council.'

Basel (Treaty of), 1795. Between the French Republic, Prussia, and Spain. By this treaty Prussia withdrew from the coalition against France, and gave up to the republic her possessions beyond the Rhine. Spain gave up to the republic St. Domingo.

Basel, Basle, or Bâle. In the vicinity is a marble monument to commemorate the battle of St. Jacob's, in 1444, when 1,600 Swiss kept a French army (twenty times their number) in check for ten hours. All the Swiss except ten were killed.

Basel Compact, 1431. Between Siegmund and the Hussites. Siegmund consented to allow the laity the use of the cup in the Eucharist. Procop, leader after Zisca, insisted also that the 'Bible and nothing but the Bible should have any authority in religious doctrines, rites, and sacraments.' The insurgent Bohemians then split into two parties; the Calixtines or Chalice-men (q.v.) accepted the treaty, but the Taborites (3 syl.) stood out till both the Procops were dead, when peace was made. See 'Taborites,' and 'Hussite War.'

Basil (Monks of), 358. Founded by St. Basil, bishop of Cæsarēa, who retired into Pontus, where he founded a monastery, and gave written rules for its regulation, the first ever enacted in the Christian Church. These rules were afterwards adopted by St. Benedict. The monks call themselves of the 'Order of St. Basil.' See 'Basilians.'

The monks of St. Basil in Spain (suppressed in 1835) followed the Greek ritual; those of Italy follow the Latin ritual. Numerous in Russia, but never introduced into England.

Basilæon or Basilica. A Greek adaptation of the Pandects, Code, and Institutes of Justinian, in 60 books. It was begun 877 by Basilius I., called the Macedonian, continued by his son Leo VI., called the Philosopher, to 900, and revised by Leo's son, Constantinus Porphyrogĕnitus, in 945.

Basilian Race (The). That is the race of Basil, emperor of the East. He was born of poor parents, but on the murder of Michael III. in 867 seized the throne, and his reign was both wise and equitable. He enforced the strict administration of justice; corrected abuses, and began the famous compilation of laws called after him 'Basilics' or Basilica. He was killed by a stag when hunting, A.D. 886, and was succeeded by his son Basil II.

The Byzantine empire, since the accession of the Basilian race, had reposed in peace and dignity—GIBBON, chap. lii.

Basilians (The). Of Plymouth and Beaconsfield, England, of France and Canada, are a congregation of priests founded at St. Basil (Vivarrais), France, in 1800. They are not connected with the old order of St. Basil.

Basil'ica or 'Basil'ika.' A Greek code, commenced A.D. 876, by the Emperor Basilios I., and completed by his son Leo VI., the philosopher. It was revised by order of Constantine VII. in 945. This code contains the Institutes, the Code, the Digest or Pandect, the Novellæ, and the Imperial Constitutions, in 60 books, subdivided under titles.

The Basilica does not contain all that the Corpus Juris contains, but at the same time it contains some things which are not included in the Justinian body of laws.

Basilica. Originally the court (stoa) in which the basileus (3 syl.) of Athens administered justice. In Rome the Basilica was not only a court of justice, it was also a market place and an exchange. In B.C. 182, Marcus Portius Cato erected a basilica at Rome, and later on the basilica was a synonym of forum. Many of the churches in Italy are called basilicas, and so are large structures erected over tombs, as the basilica of Edward the Confessor in Westminster Abbey. See 'Basilæon.'

Basilica Aurea. 'The Golden Basilica,' that of the Lateran, in Rome, called Constantiana from its builder, and 'Golden' from its superb structure and ornaments.

'Basilicon Doron.' A work composed by James I. of Great Britain, for the edification of his son, on the principles of government, describing the duties of a young prince, and the principles by which he should rule.

Basili'des (4 syl.). A famous Gnostic of Egypt in the 2nd cent. He taught the existence of two principles, one good or light, and the other evil or darkness. The good principle has seven æons, called mind, the word, the understanding, power, excellencies, princes, and angels, forming the 'blessed Ogdoad,' or combination of eight. From these æons sprang other æons, making the total of 365, the mystic number of the Gnostics (or Basileides).

It is thought that the Gospel of St. John bears a resemblance to 'Basilidism,' ch. i. In the beginning was the Word . . . and the Light shineth in darkness . . . and the Word was made flesh, &c.

Basilid'ians, the followers of Basilidès, an Alexandrian Gnostic, numerous in Egypt, Syria, Italy, and Gaul (2nd 3rd and 4th cents.). They denied the doctrine of the atonement; believed in the transmigration of souls; looked on Jesus as a mere human being, on whom at baptism the æon Nous (intelligence) descended. They affirm that it was not Jesus who was crucified, but Simon of Cyrenè, who bore his cross.

Basket Processions. The procession of the basket was the chief ceremony of the 4th day of the Eleusinian mysteries. The basket was placed on an open chariot and followed by a long train of Athenian women, each one of whom also carried a basket. The procession commemorated the rape of Proserpine, and the baskets represented the basket which the maiden was filling with flowers when Pluto carried her off to the infernal regions to be his wife.

Basoche (Les clercs de la), that is, Clerks of the Palace. When the kings of France lived in the Palais de Justice, the judges, the barristers, the proctors, and all persons connected with these officials, were called Clercs de la Basoche. The president was called Le Roi de la Basoche. Basoche (2 syl.) is a French corruption of the Latin word basilica (a royal palace).

Basocians (The). The lawyers connected with the Palais de Justice, who formed themselves, in the 15th cent., into a theatrical company, to act satires on living characters and passing events. François I. was obliged to withdraw their licence in 1540.

This interdict only applied to Paris, for we read of the Basochian farces of Bordeaux for several years after.

Bastard eigné. An eldest son, born before wedlock, whose parents subsequently married each other and had other children.

Bastard of Orleans (The). Jean, comte de Longueville and of Dunois (1392–1470), natural son of Louis, duc d'Orléans and Marie d'Enghien.

Bastards. 'La guerre des Bâtards,' 1324, between certain seigneurs of Gascony and Charles IV. (Le Bel) of France. So called 'parce que les Gascons avaient pour chefs des bâtards de la noblesse.'

Bastille. The French prison; was founded in 1369 by Hugues d'Aubriot; four towers were added in 1383; the fosse and outer wall in 1634. It was destroyed by the Paris mob 14 July, 1789.

The 14th of July and the 20th of June (the Jeu de paume, q.v.), were the two great holidays in the Revolution.

The Bastille was besieged and taken three times: viz. in 1418 by the Burgundians; in 1594 by Henri IV.; and on 14 July, 1789, by the Parisians, from which day the great Revolution is generally dated.

Only seven prisoners were found within it. The site of the prison is marked by a column in the Place de la Bastille. One soldier and eighty-three insurgents fell on this memorable day.

The prisoner confined in the Bastille for 35 years at the instigation of Madame de Pompadour, mistress of Louis XV., was H. Mazers de Latude. He was 24 years old at his incarceration, and his offence was giving Madame de Pompadour a false report of a plot against her life. He was liberated in 1784 and died in 1805. His 'Memoirs' are very interesting. The only prisoner who escaped from the Bastille was D'Aligre.

The governor, when the Bastille was destroyed by the mob in 1789, was Jourdan Delaunay, who fell into the hands of the mob and was hanged on a lamp-rope.

There were only seven prisoners found in the Bastille when it was stormed; one was Tavernier, who had been confined ten years in the Isle St. Marguerite, and thirty in the Bastille. He was more than ninety years of age and an idiot. One of the governors named St. Florentin used to boast that he had received more than 50,000 lettres de cachet.

Batavia, the modern Holland. The country of the Batavi, who settled in the island formed by the river Rhine and the Waal, called by the Romans Insŭla Batavorum.

Batāvi or Batāvi.

Batavian Republic (The). Proclaimed 16 May, 1795; raised to the 'kingdom of Holland' under Louis, brother of Napoleon Bonaparte, in 1806; Belgium and Holland united to form the kingdom of the Netherlands under William I. in March 1815; Belgium separated from Holland 1830, and Prince Leopold of Saxe-Coburg was elected king of Belgium by the National Congress 4 June, 1831.

Bath, in Somersetshire. The Hū'dăta Therma (hot waters) of Ptolemy; the Aquæ Solis of Antonīnus; the Caer-Baden of King Bladud and Geoffrey of Monmouth; the Caer-Ennant (city of ointment and of healing) of a subsequent period; the Ack-man-chester (the sick-man's city) of the Saxon.

> Ensample of his wondrous faculty,
> Behold the boiling baths at Caïr-badón,
> Which seethe with secret fire eternally.
> SPENSER, Faery Queen, bk. ii., cant x. stanza 26.

Bath (Knights of the). An English order instituted by Richard II., but re-instituted in 1399 by Henry IV., and again in 1725 by George I. There are 26 knights. The ribbon is red, to which is attached a medal having three crowns, with the legend 'Tria juncta in uno.' So called because the knights were required to bathe before inauguration. G.C.B. = Grand Cross of the Bath; K.C.B. = Knight Commander of the Bath; and C.B. = Companion of the Bath.

Bath Shillings. Silver tokens coined at Bath in 1811–1812, and issued for 4*s*. 2*s*. and 1*s*. by C. Culverhouse, J. Orchard, and J. Phipps.

Baths and Spas. Good for Anæmia. Schwalbach, St. Moritz, Harrogate.

Articular rheumatism and gout. Aix-les-Bains.
Asthma. Mont Dore.
Atonic gout. Royat.
Biliary obstructions. Carlsbad.
Calculous disorders. Vichy, Contrexéville.
Diabetes. Neuenahr, Carlsbad.
Gouty-catarrhal dyspepsia. Homburg, Kissingen.
Obesity. Marienbad.
Plethoric gout. Carlsbad.
Scrofulous glandular affections. Kreuznach.
Skin diseases. Aix-la-chapelle, Cannstadt, Bourbonne-les-bains, Uriage.
Throat affections. Cauterets, Eaux Bonnes.
Bath and Buxton. To soften the skin, and give it tone.
Harrogate and Droitwich, brine baths for anæmia.

Baths and Washhouses (Public), 1846, were established by Act 9, 10 Vict., c. 74.

Bâton blanc (Le). A marshal's bâton, in France, is covered with violet-coloured velvet spangled with gold, so that a white bâton means no honour at all, or nothing whatever. Hence the phrase: 'La garnison est sortie de la place, le bâton blanc à la main,' means the garrison went forth without either arms or baggage. And 'Il est sorti de son emploi, le bâton blanc à la main,' means he left his place without a penny in his pocket or bundle of clothes at his back; with only his walking-stick in his hand.

Bats (Parliament of), 1426. During the regency of Henry VI., in consequence of the brawls between the Duke of Gloucester and Cardinal Beaufort, the citizens were forbidden to carry arms; so when parliament assembled the members of the House of Commons came armed with bats and clubs. See 'Parliaments.'

Battersea Training College, 1840. Instituted by (Sir) J. P. Kay Shuttleworth in conjunction with Mr. Tuffnell, for training teachers, especially those intended for our 'national' or parish schools.

Battiad (The), 1750. A lampoon on Dr. Battie, said to be the composition of Dr. Schomberg, Moses Mendez, and Paul Whitehead. Dr. Battie took a very active part in the College of Physicians against Dr. Schomberg. It is somewhat remarkable that Dr. Battie's father-in-law is pilloried by Pope in the 'Dunciad.'

Battie Scholarship, for Classics. Value between 30*l.* and 35*l.* a year, tenable for seven years. Founded in the University of Cambridge by William Battie, M.D., of King's College, 1747. See 'Regius Professor of Greek.'

Battle. The last battle in which a king of England has been allowed to appear in person on the field was the battle of Dettingen (1743), against the French on behalf of Maria Theresa of Austria. The English were led by George II. and Lord Stair. The latter was most incompetent, but George II., by courage and dash, rescued the army from most imminent peril, and repelled the French at the hazard of his life.

For battles named from the localities in which they are fought, see Appendix, 'Battles.'

Battle (Trial by), or 'Wager of Battel.' The last waged in the Court of Common Pleas, Westminster, was in 1571; the last waged in the Court of Chivalry was in 1631; and the last waged in the Court of Durham was in 1638. Abolished by 59 Geo. III. c. 46.

So late as 1818 this procedure was decided by the Court of King's Bench to be a legal mode of trial.

Battle Abbey, Sussex. Founded by William I. in 1067 in commemoration of his victory, 14 Oct., 1066. The high altar marks the spot where the standard of Harold was fixed. The town is called Battle, but was previously known as St. Mary-in-the-Wood. The ruin which now remains was the front entrance of the abbey. The abbey is now the property of the Duke of Cleveland.

It was consecrated 11 Feb., 1094, and its first inmates were Benedictine monks from Normandy.

Telham Hill is where the Norman standard was raised. Locally called Tellman Hill.

The Anglo-Saxon camp stood on the rising ground (called Senlac) occupied by the abbey.

Battle Field, in Shropshire. So called in commemoration of the decisive victory of Henry IV. over Henry Percy, surnamed Hotspur, in 1403.

Battle of Belahoe (The), 1588. This was no battle, but simply a spoiling of the spoiler. The two chieftains O'Neill and O'Donnel, having made a predatory inroad into Meath, were returning with their spoil when Lord Leonard overtook them at the Ford of Belahoe. After a feeble resistance the two Irishmen fled, leaving their spoil in the hands of the Englishman (Lord Leonard).

Battle of Bonnymuir (The), 2 April, 1820. A jocose phrase to express a brush which some men of Glasgow had with the military. The fact was this: the Radicals of Glasgow called a monster meeting for Sunday, 2 April, 1820, in the interest of parliamentary reform, but hearing that great preparations had been made to prevent a disturbance, the meeting was abandoned. Some fifty or sixty men, however, started on the projected expedition of destroying the Carron Ironworks, but were dispersed at Bonnymuir by the military. Nineteen were arrested and three imprisoned for a few days, but the whole affair was considered to be a storm in a teacup.

Battle of Nations (The). The terrible three days' conflict at Leipzig in Oct. 1813 between Napoleon and the allies. Its issue was the defeat of the French, and the deliverance of Germany. It is called 'the Battle of Nations,' not only from the number engaged, but also because it was the champion battle of the nations of Europe. See below 'Battle of the Nations.'

The nations engaged were the French, Austrians, Prussians, and Russians.

Battle of Wartberg (The). The annual contest of the Minnesingers for the prize offered by Hermann, margraf of Wartberg, near Gotha, in Germany, in the 12th cent.

Battle of the Barriers. See 'Barriers,' &c.

Battle of the Bastards. See 'Bastards,' &c.

Battle of the Blues (The). The annual University boat-race on the Thames, from Putney to Mortlake, the Saturday before Holy Week. Called the Blues because both crews wear blue, the Cambridge crew light blue, and the Oxford crew dark blue.

In 1840, 1841, 1842, the race was from Westminster Bridge to Putney. In 1846 and 1876, it was from Mortlake to Putney.

Battle of the British Soldiers (The). The battle of Inkerman, 5 Nov., 1854.

Battle of the Butchers and Carpenters (The), 1413. Paris. The Duke of Burgundy and the Duke of Orleans led two factions during the idiocy of Charles VI. The Duke of Burgundy armed the butchers and the faction adopted as their badge a white hood. The Orleanists or Armagnacs armed the carpenters, and this faction adopted for badge a white scarf. In 1413 a regular conflict took place between them, on the Place de Grève, Paris, and the carpenters succeeded in driving the butchers out of Paris. The Duke of Burgundy fled to Flanders, and the Duke of Orleans entered Paris in triumph.

Battle of the Diamond. The engagement between the Roman Catholics and Orangemen of Ireland in Sept. 1795. So called from Diamond, County Antrim, where it was fought.

Battle of the 5th of November (The), 1854. The famous battle of Inkerman, in which the Russians in far greater force were defeated by the allied English and French armies. This battle is often compared with that of Agincourt by Henry V.

The Russians had failed to raise the siege by the battle of the 5th of November.—Howitt, History of England (year 1854, p. 268).

Battle of the Forty (The). A battle between twenty Frenchmen and twenty Italian cavaliers. A painting of this battle is in Hampton Court. It belonged to William III., and was painted by Peter Snayers or Esaias Vandervelde (1593–1670).

Battle of the Giants (The), 18 Sept., 1515. The battle of Marignano, in which the allied French and Venetian armies under François I. and D'Alviano defeated the allied Italian and Swiss army. The carnage was very great, 12,000 of the conquered and 4,000 of the conquering army were left on the field. Trivulzio, who had been present in eighteen pitched battles, called them all child's play compared with this 'combat of the giants.' (Guicciardini, book xii. vol. iii. p. 167.)

Battle of the Herrings (The), 12 Feb., 1429. In which Sir John Fastolfe defeated the French general Dunois, near Rouvray. Called in French 'La journée des harengs.' Sir John conducted the convoy of herrings in triumph to the English camp before Orleans. Sir John had 1,600 men-at-arms and archers, with some hundred carts of provisions (bread, wine, and salt herrings, for it was Lent), for the besieging force. Dunois came against him with 6,000 Scots and French. Sir John placed the carts between the attacking force and the attacked, and placed his archers between the carts. Six hundred Scots lay dead on the field, and the French fled. So the English besieging force was both strengthened and victualled.

Battle of the Kings and Nations (The). Leipzig, 1813. See 'Battle of Nations,' and 'Battle of the Nations.'

Battle of the Moat (The). A skirmish before Medīna, between Mahomet and Abu Sofian, chief of the Koreishites. So called because Mahomet had a moat dug before the city to keep off the invaders; and in this moat much of the fighting took place.

Battle of the Nations (The), A.D. 625; also called 'the Battle of the Moat' or Ditch. The third great battle of Mahomet, in which he defeated Abu Sofian and the Koreishites. See above, 'Battle of Nations.'

The other two great battles were those of Bedr and Ohud, both in 623.

Battle of the Peoples (The grand). The battle of Leipzig, 16 and 18 Oct., 1813. The 'peoples' were the Austrians, Russians, Prussians, and Swedes, allied against the French under Napoleon. The allies numbered 240,000 men, the French 160,000. In the heat of the battle seventeen German battalions (10,000 men), in alliance with the French, deserted, and the French were utterly defeated. They lost above 40,000 men, and the allies about the same number.

Battle of the Rocks (The), 1814. The battle of Falkenstein, when the French mountaineers hurled rocks on the Germans and Cossacks who sought to dislodge them. Rows of fifteen or twenty men were overthrown by a single rock, and the besiegers fled in disorder to escape certain death.

This was a repetition of the battle of Morgarten (15 Nov., 1315), won by the Swiss mountaineers over the Austrians.

Battle of the Spurs (The). I. A battle fought at Courtray in 1302, between the French and the Flemish. The Flemish were led by John, count of Namur and William de Juliers. The French were defeated. It is called the battle of the spurs because as many as 4,000 gilt spurs, worn by French knights, were picked up on the field after the fight was done.

II. 'Journée des esperons,' 16 Aug., 1513. Also called the battle of Guinegate. Between the French and English. The French pretended to give way to decoy the English cavalry; but by so doing they spread a panic, and the whole French army fled in a stampede without striking a blow. When the French officers, taken captive, were brought before Henry VIII., he jocosely complimented them on the speed of their men, and the Frenchmen entering into the jest, declared with a laugh that the only weapon they used was the spur. 'Well,' said the bluff Henry, 'then we will call it the Battle of Spurs,' and so it has ever been designated. See Guinegate.'

Battle of the Standard (The), 22 Aug., 1138, or battle of Northallerton, in Yorkshire. David I., king of Scotland, was defeated by Stephen. The standard consisted of the consecrated banners of St. Cuthbert of Durham, St. Peter of York, St. John of Beverley, and St. Wilfrid of Ripon, fixed to a mast, and mounted on a four-wheeled carriage, wheeled into the centre of the field; and on the top of the mast was a pyx containing a consecrated host. It was lent to Stephen by Thurstan, archbishop of York. The field of the battle was Cuton or Cutton Moor, near Northallerton, and the Scotch, being defeated, fled in confusion to Carlisle.

David I. came in defence of Maud, the 'lady of England' (q.v.), and was joined by Archbishop Thurstan.

Battle of the Thirty (The), 27 March, 1351. The French general Beaumanoir, and the English general Bemborough, agreed to settle a dispute of territory by the combat of thirty knights on each side. At first the English were successful, but Bemborough being slain, the struggle was renewed, and the French won the fight. It is still said in France, when speaking of a hard contest, it was as desperate as le combat des Trente. The battle was fought at the Midway Oak, between the castles of Josselin and Ploermel, in France.

Battle of the Three Emperors (The), or the battle of Austerlitz, 2 Dec. 1805, when Napoleon defeated the united armies of Austria and Russia, commanded by their respective emperors. The three emperors were Napoleon emperor of the French, Francis emperor of Austria, and Alexander emperor of Russia. The result of the victory was the Peace of Presburg.

Battle of the Three Hundred, B.C. 547. The Lacedæmonians and Argives each laid claim to Cynuria, and agreed to submit the decision to 300 champions chosen from each side. So fierce was the contest that only one Spartan and two Argives survived. The two Argives, supposing all the Spartans to have been slain, hastened home with the news of victory; but it was shown that one Spartan survived, and a general battle ensued, in which the Spartans proved the conquerors.

Battle of the West (The great). The battle between King Arthur and Mordred. It was in this battle that the king received his death wound. (How far this is historic cannot be decided. And doubt rests both on the time and place of the battle.)

Battle which lasted a week (The), A.D. 732. The battle of Tours between Charles Martel, leader of the Franks, and Abdalrahman, the Moslem general of Spain. The Saracen army was 400,000 strong, but Abdalrahman was slain, and his army was overthrown with great slaughter after a whole week's fighting. No other battle in all history lasted so long.

Battles (The fifteen decisive), according to Professor Creasy:

1. Marathon (B.C. 490), in which the Greeks, under Miltiadès, defeated Darius, the Persian, and turned the tide of Asiatic invasion.

2. Syracuse (B.C. 413), in which the Athenian power was broken, and the extension of Greek domination was prevented.

3. Arbēla (B.C. 331), by which Alexander overthrew Darius, and introduced European habits into Asia.

4. Metaurus (B.C. 207), in which the Romans defeated Hannibal, and Carthage was brought to ruin.

5. Armin'ius (A.D. 9), in which the Gauls overthrew the Romans under Varus, and established their independence.

6. Châlons (A.D. 451), in which Attila, 'the Scourge of God,' was defeated by Aëtius, and Europe saved from utter devastation.

7. Tours (A.D. 732), in which Charles Martel overthrew the Saracens, and broke from Europe the Mohammedan yoke.

8. Hastings (A.D. 1066), by which William of Normandy became possessed of the English crown.

9. Orléans (A.D. 1429), by which Jeanne d'Arc raised the siege of the city, and secured the independence of France.

10. Armada (The), A.D. 1588, which crushed the hopes of Spain and of the papacy in England.

11. Blenheim (A.D. 1704), in which Marlborough, by the defeat of Tallard, broke the ambitious schemes of Louis XIV.

12. Pultowa (A.D. 1709), in which Charles XII. of Sweden was defeated by Peter the Great of Russia, and the stability of the Muscovite empire was established.

13. Saratōga (A.D. 1777), in which General Gates defeated Burgoyne, and virtually decided the fate of the American Revolution.

14. Valmy (A.D. 1792), in which the allied armies under the Duke of Brunswick were defeated by the French revolutionists, and the Revolution was suffered to go on.

15. Waterloo (A.D. 1815), in which Wellington defeated Napoleon, and rescued Europe from French domination.

Several of these might be changed for far more important battles, as, for example, that which gained the independence of Switzerland, that which destroyed the independence of Poland, &c., &c.

Bauern Krieg. The peasants' war of Germany at the time of the Reformation, similar to the Jacquerie of France and Wat Tyler's rebellion in the reign of Richard II.

Bavaria (House of). Furnished Germany with two kaisers, Ludwig V. (1814–8347), and Robert (1400–1410).

Baxter's Maxim. 'In necessary things unity, in doubtful things liberty, in all things charity.' Though attributed to Baxter, he was not the original author of the maxim.

Baxterians. Those who adopt the religious system of Richard Baxter (1615–1691). With the Calvinists they believe in election, but with Arminians they reject the doctrine of reprobation.

Their religious system is (1) that, although Christ died in a special sense for the elect, yet He atoned for all, and, therefore, if a man is not saved, it is his own fault.

(2) They reject the dogma of reprobation.

(3) They maintain that it is possible for saints to fall away from saving grace.

Dr. Watts and Dr. Doddridge were Baxterians. Baxter was the author of the 'Saints' Everlasting Rest,' and of the 'Call to the Unconverted.'

Bay State (The), Massachusetts, which before the Federal constitution was called the colony of Massachusetts Bay.

When first the pilgrims landed on the Bay State's iron shore.—LOWELL.

Bayaderes. The trained dancing girls of India, which are divided into Devádassi (devoted to the service of the temples), and the Nautchis. The former dwell within the inclosure of the temple, and never leave it without a permit from the high priest; the latter are not attached to the temples, but take part in grand processions. The Devádassi prepare garlands for the idols, dance before them, sing sacred songs, and take part in all processions; the Nautch girls go about the country and perform for pay.

Pronounce bahy-a-dairs' (3 syl.).

Bâyandourians (The), or 'the Bâyandouree.' The Turkoman dynasty generally called the White Sheep. Bâyandour was the founder of the line, but Ussum Kassan (the Tall) founded the dynasty, which was driven out by Ismail I. in 1499.

Bayard (The British). Sir Philip Sidney (1554-1584).

The Chevalier de Bayard (1475-1524) was called Le Bon Chevalier, sans peur et sans reproche. He took part in the 'Battle of the Spurs,' 16 Aug., 1513, where he was taken prisoner, but was restored to liberty by Henry VIII. without ransom.

Bayard of India (The). General Sir James Outram (1802–1863). In the Indian Mutiny he was sent to supersede General Havelock, but by rare chivalry he allowed Sir Henry Havelock to retain command.

Bayard of Poland (The). Prince Joseph Poniatowski (1763–1814).

Bayard of the Netherlands (The). Louis of Nassau, brother of William of Orange (founder of the Dutch republic).

Bayeux Tapestry (The). Discovered in the cathedral of Bayeux in 1728; removed to Paris by order of Napoleon I. in 1803; restored to the town hall of Bayeux in 1804; and copied by C. A. Stothard in 1816. Supposed to be the work of Matilda (wife of William the Conqueror) and her maidens. It is a picture in worsted needle-work of the history of England from the mission of Harold to William, duke of Normandy, to the conquest of England by William, whereby he became king of England. It is now preserved in a glass case in the library of the town of Bayeux. It was originally one piece of cloth 227 feet long and 20 feet wide; containing 623 figures of men, 137 of birds, 49 of trees, 37 of buildings, and 41 of ships.

The Bayeux tapestry and Domesday Book are invaluable documents of the period.

Bayonne (The Secret League of), 1567. A Catholic league between France and Spain, to compel France, Spain, and Flanders to abandon Protestantism. Here, in 1572, Catherine de' Medici and the Duke of Alva planned together the massacre of the French Huguenots. Mary, queen of Scots, joined the league in the year of her marriage with Henry Darnley.

Bayonne (The Treaty of), 5 May, 1808. When Carlos IV. of Spain resigned his crown to Napoleon I.

Bayou State (The). Bayou means a creek. The State of Mississippi, which abounds in creeks, is so called.

Bear Flag War (The), 1847. In California, between General Fremont and the Mexicans, who tried to prevent the Americans from settling in California. The Mexicans were soon driven back, and the independence of California was secured.

Bear State (The). The State of Arkansas, the forests of which are infested by bears.

Beards.

The Arabians dyed their beards red, because Mahomet hated black hair.

Assyrians and Africans appear in sculpture and paintings with long beards.

Britons, according to Cæsar, shaved all but the upper lip. The Anglo-Saxons and Danes wore forked beards. The Normans were clean shaved. Edward III. is represented on his tomb at Westminster with a long beard. In the reign of Elizabeth beards were cut into fantastic shapes. In the reign of James I. each profession wore a differently shaped beard. In the reign of Charles I. a small pointed beard was the mode. In the reign of Charles II. only whiskers and moustaches were worn. The modern fashion of wearing beards was introduced in the Crimean War, 1854, but the habit had been creeping in ten years before. Even the clergy no longer considered it needful to follow the fashion of Catholic priests.

In the reign of Elizabeth it was ordered that 'no fellow of Lincoln's Inn shall wear a beard above a fortnight's growth.'

Egyptians apparently wore beards only in mourning; in some statues we find that they had beards enclosed in a beard-case.

France. Beards were worn till the reign of Louis XIII., who was beardless, and the custom changed. In the reign of Napoleon III. the French shaved off their whiskers, and shaved the chin, only leaving a knot of hair, called an imperial. The moustache was worn long, pointed, and waxed.

Grecian heroes are represented with short curled beards. The philosophers are for the most part represented with long beards. Alexander made his soldiers shave that the enemy might not lay hold of their beards.

Jews. In Leviticus xix. 27 the lawgiver says, 'Thou shalt not mar the corners of thy beard.' Beards were always worn by the Jews.

Lombards, or Longobards, wore long beards.

Parthians. The kings had bushy beards.

Persians entwined their beards with gold thread.

Romans, according to Pliny, began to shave A.U.C. 454. Scipio Africanus introduced daily shaving. The first fourteen emperors shaved, but Hadrian retained his beard.

Spain. Beards were worn till the accession of Felipe V., who, being beardless, like Louis XIII., set the fashion of clean chins.

Béarnaise (Le). Henri IV. of France, so called from 'Le Béarn,' his native province (1553, 1589–1610).

Beatification,—Canonisation. In imitation of heathen apotheosis. When persons are beatified, their picture or image is allowed to be placed in some particular church, where spiritual communion may be held with them in prayer. When persons are canonised their image or picture may be placed in all churches, that the whole body of Christians may hold communion with them. Instead of image or picture, the names of the beati or canonised saints are inscribed in missals or service books.

Beauclerk, 'Good Scholar.' Henry I. of England (1068, 1100–1135).

Beau Sabreur (Le). General Murat, marshal of France, and afterwards king of Naples (1771–1815).

Beauté (La dame de). Agnes Sorel (1409–1450) was so called from the Château de Beauté, on the banks of the Marne. This château was given to her by Charles VII.

Beauty of Holiness (The). Jeremy Taylor was so called from the extraordinary beauty of his person and his great piety. He died 1667, aged 54.

Becket, in his flight from Northampton, Nov. 1164, assumed the garb of a monk, and called himself 'Dereman.'

His murderers were four knights, viz. Richard Brito, Hugh de Morville, William de Tracy, and Reginald Fitzurse who struck the first blow. He was assassinated in Canterbury Cathedral, 29 Dec., 1170. In 1538, Henry VIII. put forth a proclamation that Becket was killed in a riot of his own provoking; and as he was a rebel and traitor, his name should be erased from all religious books and calendars.

Becket's Day was Tuesday. He was born on Tuesday, baptized on Tuesday, took flight from Northampton on Tuesday, withdrew from the realm to take refuge in France on Tuesday, had his vision of martyrdom at Pontigny on Tuesday, returned to England on Tuesday, was assassinated on Tuesday, and his body was removed from the crypt of the cathedral to the shrine on Tuesday. The new church was consecrated to him by Cardinal Manning on Tuesday (18 April, 1875).

Beckmanites (The), 1875. A religious sect, the followers of Mrs. Dora Beckman of Alpena, Michigan, who died 1883. Mrs. Beckman claimed to be a 'second Christ,' and gave out that Christ, in her person incarnate, 'is the bride of the Church.' In 1888 a Beckmanite of Chicago claimed to be the wife of Christ. Their midnight meetings were so disorderly, that an appeal was made to the legislature to forbid them.

Bed of Justice, 'Lit de justice.' The seat occupied by the king of France in a parlement when he enforced an edict not acceptable to the house. As the parlement derived its authority from the crown, when the king was present the power of the parlement was in abeyance. The last 'lit de justice' was held by Louis XVI. at Versailles, in Sept. 1787.

Bede (The Venerable). An English monk and historian of the 8th cent. There is a tradition that a monk, writing his epitaph, fell asleep without completing the verse, and when he woke discovered the word 'venerabilis' supplied by some unknown hand. The whole line then ran thus:—

Hac sunt in fossa Bædæ [venerabilis] ossa.

Bedells' (Esquire). In the University of Cambridge. Two officers elected by the senate to carry silver maces on all public solemnities. They precede the chancellor or his deputy in processions; receive from him all graces, and deliver them officially to the proctors; they summon members of the senate to the chancellor's court; arrange all public processions, and on all such occasions carry their maces or staffs of office.

Bedlam. A corruption of Bethlehem, formerly a hospital founded by Simon Fitz-Mary in Bishopsgate Street Without, in 1246, as 'a privy of canons, with brethren and sisters.' When the religious houses were suppressed by Henry VIII. the corporation converted it into a lunatic asylum for six lunatics, but in 1641, the funds being insufficient, partially convalescent patients were turned out to beg, and wore a badge. These were the 'Bedlam Beggars,' generally called 'Tom-o'-Bedlams.' In 1675 the old building was taken down and a new one was erected in Moorfields. In 1814 this building was also pulled down, and a new hospital built in St. George's Fields.

Bedouins of Paris (The). The Red Republicans and roughs who thronged the streets in every insurrection and revolution.

Bees (The). Candidates for 'dangerous work' in the Fenian lodges. Every seven bees is responsible to a 'centre'; each set of seven centres is responsible to the district centre; each set of seven district centres is responsible to the 'head centre,' with whom alone these district centres are allowed to communicate; and, lastly, the head centres communicate with the 'Apex' (q.v.).

A circle, centre, and bee are Fenian officers, not boards. They correspond to captain, lieutenant, and sergeant. Each bee has ten members under his jurisdiction.

Bees' College (St.), Cumberland, 1816. Founded by Bishop Law.

Befa'na. A kind of Santa Klaus, who visits children on Twelfth Night to put presents in a stocking hung at their bed. Befana, it is said, was an old woman busy cleaning her house when the Magi passed by, but she said she would look out for them on their return. As they went home another way, she is looking out for them still, but entertains a great fondness for young children. The word is a corruption of 'Epiphania' (Epiphany).

Begards. See 'Beghards.'

Begeaux (Les). In the reign of Charles VI. of France. Bands of free-booters, consisting of Burgundians and their butchers, predatory forces from Artois, discharged German, Lombard, and Savoyard mercenaries, with other disorderly persons, who laid waste the country round Paris and ravaged France at will. These brigands were still more demoralised than the Free Companies in the time of the Black Prince.

The two most noted of their leaders were Jean de Foix and De Sobre.

Beggars (The), 1566. Those Calvinists of Holland who leagued together to resist the Inquisition in their country. The term arose thus: Three hundred of the chief men of the Netherlands, all Calvinists, were deputed to demand of Margaret of Austria, the governor, the removal of the Inquisition. When Margaret inquired of the Comte de Barleymont, her counsellor, about the deputation he told her they were only a 'set of beggars' ('Ce ne sont que des gueux'). This reply got wind, and the party assumed the title of 'Beggars' as their distinctive badge, and from that time dressed as beggars, substituting a fox's tail for a feather, and a wooden platter instead of a brooch. Their place of rendezvous was a house called the Cock, out of whose mouth proceeded the words 'Vivent les gueux par tout le monde!'

It is said that the count 'spat upon them, called them beggars, and dismissed them contemptuously.' 'Geus' is still a Dutch by-word for 'Protestant.'

Beggars of the Sea (The), or 'Les gueux de mer,' 1566. Those Hollanders who placed themselves under Count Horn, in the Zuyder Zee, to resist the Spanish invaders. See below.

Beggars of the Wood (The), or 'Les gueux des bois,' 1566. Those Hollanders who lurked in the woods, and resisted on land the Spanish invaders. See 'Beggars.'

Begging Friars. The second Council of Lyons reduced them to these four orders: Franciscans or Grey Friars, Dominicans or Black Friars, Augustines (Black Friars), and Carmelites or White Friars.

Begging Licences. Licences granted to the poor Venetian nobles to beg. These beggars were called 'I Vergognosi' (q.v.).

Beghards (The). 'Beghardi,' or 'Begehardi,' 1065; 'qui vulgariter Begehardi quoad viros, et Beginæ quoad feminas nominantur' (Conradus de Monte, 'de Erroribus Begehardorum'). Also called 'Tertiaries' (the third order). See 'Beguins.'

Secta quædam pestifera illorum qui Beguini vulgariter appellantur, qui se Fratres pauperes de tertio Ordine S. Francisci communiter nominabant, ex quibus plures fuerunt tanquam hæretici condemnati et combusti.—BERNARD GUIDO, Life of John XXII.

Beghinæ, or 'Belgian Beguins.' Very numerous in Belgium in the 12th and 13th cent. John XXII. (7 Kal. Martii, anno 8) calls them 'Sorores de Pœnitentia.' It is said that their founder was Begha (Papini Landensis filia, S. Gertrudis Nivellensis sorore); but this cannot be relied on.

In Alemannia mulierum continentium, quæ se Beguinas volunt appellari, multitudo surrexit innumerabilis, adeo ut solam Coloniam mille vel plures inhabitarent.—MATTHEW PARIS (year 1251).

Begihards (The). 'Begihardi,' preaching friars, 1302.

Fuerunt conversi seu Begihardi, hoc est, fratres non habentes domicilia.—Annales Colmarienses (year 1302).

Begin with Vesta. Before the guests of a Greek banquet began to eat, an oblation was always offered to Vesta, the tutelary goddess of hospitality.

Begtashi. A religious order in the Ottoman Empire, instituted in the 14th cent., by Hadji Begtash. The members have secret signs and passwords, like freemasons, to which they bear many resemblances Béguins, of Flanders, 1207. Followers of Lambert le Bègue, of Liège. They believed men capable of perfection, and of obtaining so clear a view of God as to become freed from the obedience of any human laws, civil or ecclesiastical. They are now orthodox.

They were called Bizochi in Italy; Béguins in France; and Beghards in Germany.

Begums. Women of high rank in the East Indies. The charge of Warren Hastings, brought by Sheridan in his famous speech of five hours' length, referred to his treatment of the mother and grandmother of Asoff-ul-Dowlah, nabob of Oude. These ladies were very rich and kept a splendid court. Asoff-ul-Dowlah forced large sums of money from them, and the begums appealed for protection to Warren Hastings, governor-general of India (1778). Hastings commanded the nabob to abstain from further extortions, but Hastings resolved to get the begums' money for conducting the war in Madras. His plan was this: He supplied the nabob with a brigade of British soldiers to keep down his own people, and ran up so heavy a claim that the nabob could not pay it. Hastings told him to extort the money from the begums. The nabob trumped up a charge against the begums that they were concerned in stirring up the insurrection at Benares, 115 miles from their residence, and marched against them. The ladies resisted, and were taken prisoners, but had concealed their treasures (3,000,000*l.* sterling). The two chief ministers were seized and put in irons, and the two ladies were placed in rigorous confinement. As the money was not produced, torture was applied, and 500,000*l.* was produced. More severe torture forced from the ladies, another 500,000*l.* The begums and their two ministers were released, and were told that they 'owed this favour to the governor-general.' See 'Sheridan's Begums Speech.'

Begum is the fem. of Beg, or Bey.

Behmenists. Disciples of the German mystic Jacob Böhm or Boehm (1575–1624). He taught that all things consist in Yes and No. The Yes is pure power, life, deity; the No is the reply to the Yes, and indispensable to the revelation of the truth. The present controversy respecting the absolute and relative is an offshoot of Behmenism (1890).

Behring. A strait, sea, bay, and island named after Captain Vitus Bering, a Dane in the service of Peter the Great. He discovered the strait in 1728. Captain Bering died in 1741 in the island which bears his name.

Belgian Lion (Order of the), 29 Sep., 1815. Instituted by William I., king of the Netherlands. The decoration is a white enamelled cross surmounted with the royal crown, in a blue 'ring' with the letter W and a circle of laurels; on the reverse, the royal arms with the legend 'Virtus Nobilitas.' The ribbon is blue, edged with orange.

Belgic Confession (The), 1559. One of the chief confessions of faith of the continental Calvinistic or Reformed churches. See 'Confessions.'

Belgica. That part of ancient Gaul which lay between the Seine and the Rhine.

Believers. So those were called who believed in the divine visitation of Joanna Southcott, prophetess of Exeter (1750–1814).

Believers in Christ (The). A sect, whose special doctrine is that their prayers alone can influence the decrees of divine providence.

Bell, Book, and Candle. In the ceremony of the greater excommunication by the Catholic Church, since the 8th cent., after reading the sentence a bell is rung, the book closed, and a candle extinguished; and from that moment the person excommunicated is excluded from the communion of saints, divine worship, and the sacraments.

Bell-rock. A reef of old red sandstone, 2,000 feet long, once a fruitful source of shipwreck. The abbot of Arbroath (John Gedy, 14th cent.) placed on the reef a bell fixed on a beam of wood, and the beam being agitated by the sea, kept the bell incessantly ringing. Southey, in a ballad on the subject, says that Sir Ralph the Rover wantonly cut the bell from the buoy, and on his homeward voyage was wrecked on the reef.

Bell Scholarships. For classics and mathematics. Two annually for undergraduates, worth about 5*l.* a year each, tenable for four years. Founded in the University of Cambridge by the Rev. William Bell, D.D., fellow of Magdalene College, 1810. See 'Barnes Scholarship.'

Bell the Cat. See p. 42.

Belle Alliance (La). The name of a farm some thirteen miles from Brussels; ever memorable for being the position occupied by the centre of the French infantry in the battle of Waterloo (18 June, 1815). Napoleon himself was in the vicinity of this farm, but Wellington was at Mont St. Jean, two miles further north. Between these two spots was La Haye Sainte, where were posted the French tirailleurs.

The Prussians call the battle of Waterloo the 'Battle of la Belle Alliance,' and the French call it the 'Battle of Mont Saint-Jean.'

Belle Bretonne (La). The Princess Eleanor, also called the Pearl of Brittany, daughter of Geoffrey, duke of Brittany, grand-daughter of Henry II., and niece of King John. She would have been heir-presumptive if her brother Arthur had succeeded Richard Cœur de Lion, but from the time of Arthur's death she had to endure a life-long imprisonment at the hands of John.

Belle Cordière (La). Louise Labé (1526–1566), a French poetess, who married Eddemond Perrin, a wealthy ropemaker.

Belle Corisande (La). Diane, comtesse de Guiche et de Grammont (1554–1620).

Belle Gabrielle (La). Daughter of Antoine d'Estrées, grandmaster of artillery, and governor of the Ile-de-France. She was the mistress of Henri IV. of France, and died from eating an orange (1565–1599). Also called 'La Belle Jardinière.'

Belle Parricide (La). Beatrice Cenci, executed 1599.

Belle et vertueuse Huguenotte (La). Rachel de Rouvigny, the mother of Rachel, who first married Francis, lord Vaughan, and afterwards Lord William Russell. She received the name of Wriothesley from Thomas Wriothesley, the mother of her first husband (an heiress).

Bellot Straits. In the Arctic ocean; so named from Mons. Joseph René Bellot, who perished in the Arctic regions, while searching for Sir John Franklin (1826–1853).

Bellum Episcopale, 1640. The convocation which met this year made canons, and gave subsidies to carry on the war against the Scots.

Beloved Merchant (The). Michael de la Pole was so called by Edward III. This De la Pole in the next reign was created earl of Suffolk.

Belted Will. Lord William Howard, who died in 1640. His belt used to be shown at Naworth. He was second son of Thomas Howard, fourth duke of Norfolk (beheaded in 1572). In right of his wife he succeeded to Naworth Castle, in Cumberland, and was the ancestor of the present earls of Carlisle. In 1603 'Belted Will' was restored in blood, by Act of Parliament; he died and was buried at Greystock.

Beltein, or 'Beltane.' A festival observed in Ireland and in some parts of Scotland. Sometimes fires are kindled on hills; and sometimes the young muster on some green spot, feast on a dish of eggs and milk, and go through various ceremonies. The Irish Beltein is held on 21 June, the Scotch hold theirs on May-day (old style). The Romans held the festival of Cybelê on May-day; and Gregory changed the day in order to change 'Cybelê and all the gods' into 'St. Mary and all the saints.'

Beltane means Baal's fire, and probably the festival is a relic of heathen times. See 'Hallow Eve Fires.'

Belvedere (3 syl.) means a corridor or look-out which commands a fine view (Italian 'bel vedere,' beautiful view). The most famous is that of the Vatican, built by Bramante, but the word is associated with a statue called the Apollo Belvedere, i.e. the Apollo of the (Vatican) belvedere or corridor, discovered at Cape d'Anzo (Antium), in the 16th cent. It was taken from Rome to France in 1797 by Napoleon, but restored after the battle of Waterloo, in 1815.

Belzunce, bishop of Marseilles. Immortalised by his attention to the sick and dying in the plague of Marseilles in 1720. It was introduced by Captain Chataud, who brought over a Turk infected, and entered Marseilles 25 May. Above 40,000 persons within the walls of the city, and 10,000 in the suburbs, died between 25 May, 1720, and 20 Aug., 1721, when the plague ceased. See 'Plagues &c.'

So when Contagion, with mephitic breath,
And withered Famine, urged the work of death,
Marseilles' good bishop, London's generous mayor,
With food and faith, with medicine and with prayer,
Raised the weak head, and stayed the parting sigh,
Or with new life relumed the swimming eye.
DARWIN, Loves of the Plants, ii. 433, &c.

N.B. The mayor was Sir John Lawrence, and the plague referred to was the Great Plague of London. There's many a statue to a lesser man.

Bench. A seat of justice. There are two benches: the Crown Bench, called the Queen's or King's Bench; and the Common Bench, called the Court of Common Pleas. The former takes cognisance of crown or criminal offences; while the Common Bench or Court of Common Pleas has jurisdiction in civil matters only.

There is a plea side even in the Queen's Bench, but there is no criminal side in the Common Pleas.

Bench Warrant (A). A warrant signed by a superior judge or two justices of the peace, during the assizes, to apprehend a defendant against whom a bill of indictment has been found.

Benedictines (The), A.D. 528. Founded by St. Benedict, who drew up the 'rule' of his order in 529. They wear loose black gowns with large wide sleeves, and cowl ending in a point as a head covering. They perform their devotions seven times a day. Every monk of the order has two gowns, a table-book, a knife, a needle, and a handkerchief. The Benedictines are great agriculturists, and at one time supplied Europe with corn. The order was introduced into England by St. Augustine, archbishop of Canterbury, about 600.

The rule implied obedience to the superior, avoiding laughter, holding no private property, living sparingly, exercising hospitality, and above all great industry. They were the most gentlemanly and most literary of the monkish orders.

Benedictines (Father of the English). St. Dunstan, archbishop of Canterbury (925, 959–988), who enforced the Benedictine rule, and became the first abbot of that order in England.

Benefice (A). A church living. Estates distributed in fief by sovereigns of France and Germany among their favourite nobles were termed beneficia. Similarly, the temporalities of bishops are held by the bounty of the sovereign, and the temporalities of rectors and vicars are (or at one time were) held of the bishops.

Benefices. In England and Wales, 11,728. Of these, 9,669 are in the province of Canterbury, and 2,059 in the province of York. The number of parishes is 14,610. The entire number of incumbents in England and Wales is 11,029.

The number of churches and episcopal chapels is 11,825, but of officiating ministers, 12,832.

The income of the archbishop of Canterbury is 15,000*l.* a year; of the archbishop of York, 10,000*l.*; of the bishop of London, 10,000*l.*; of Durham, 8,000*l.*; of Winchester, 7,000*l.*; of Ely, 5,500*l.*; of St. Asaph and Bangor, 5,200*l.*; of Worcester, 5,000*l.*; of all the other bishops between 5,000*l.* and 4,000*l.*

Benefit of Clergy, or 'Privilegium clericale.' The origin of this privilege is not clear, but it was based on the text, 'Touch not mine anointed, and do my prophets no harm' (Ps. cv. 15). The privilege related to ecclesiastical places and persons. Places consecrated to religious offices were exempted from arrests, and hence became sanctuaries; and the clergy themselves were exempt from criminal processes in the civil courts. By 3 Edw. I. A.D. 1274, we find the privilege had extended to all laymen who could read, and such a criminal could not be put to death, but was branded on the brawn of the left hand. In 1691 the privilege was extended to women. By 4 Hen. VII. c. 13, A.D. 1489, it was enacted that no person should be allowed to avail himself of the benefit more than once. By 7 & 8 Geo. IV. c. 28 s. 6, A.D. 1827, the benefit was abolished.

It never at any time extended to high treason.

Benefit of Inventory (The). In Scotch law. A legal privilege whereby an heir secures himself against unlimited liability for his predecessor, by giving up within the year an inventory of his heritage. The heir is then liable only to the extent of this inventory. The law was virtually abolished by 10, 11 Vict. c. 47, ss. 23, 25.

Benefiziati (The). See 'Eighty.'

Benevolences. In English history. Were 'gratuities' or forced gifts exacted by a king, the loyalty of the giver being measured by the amount of the gift. These exactions, in violation of Magna Charta, had been made by Henry III. and Richard II.—Edward IV., in 1473, after the death of Henry VI., called on his subjects to replenish his purse by their benevolences. They were declared illegal by 1 Rich. III. c. 2 (1484); but were again exacted by Henry VII., Henry VIII., and James I. By the Bill of Rights (1 Will. & Mary st. 2, c. 2, 1689) they were again declared to be illegal. In the Petition of Rights (3 Car. I.) one of the articles is this, that 'No man shall be compelled to yield any gift, loan, benevolence, or tax, without common consent of the Act of Parliament.'

Bengalee' Era (The). Began A.D. 593.

Bennet College, Cambridge, 1852. Founded by the benevolence of two guilds, that of Corpus Christi and that of the Blessed Virgin Mary; Henry, duke of Lancaster, also assisted the endowment. It is now almost always called Corpus Christi College or C.C.C.C.

Bentham (Jeremy), 1748–1832. It was Bentham who said the principle of government should be 'the greatest happiness to the greatest number.'

It was Priestley who taught Bentham this political axiom.

Benthamist Doctrine (The). 'The greatest happiness of the greatest number.'

Beothuks (The). Aborigines of Newfoundland, now numbered with the great awk and dodo. They were Red Indians, who daubed their skin, canoes, garments, weapons, and almost everything they possessed with red ochre and grease. The word is said to mean 'men.'

So the Apaches, Dakotahs, and many other Indian tribal names signify 'the people.'—Lady BLAKE, Nineteenth Century, Dec. 1888, p. 905. Dakotah signifies 'allied.'

Bephania. See 'Befana.'

Hodierna solemnitas . . . tribus vocabulis decoratur: (1) Epiphania, (2) Theophania, (3) Bethphania . . . a beth quod est 'domus,' et phanos 'apparitio,' quia revolutis XXX et uno anno ad nuptias fuit invitatus (Jesus).—BARELETA, Sermon on the Epiphany.

Berbers. A general name for the tribes inhabiting the mountainous regions of Barbary and the northern portions of the Great Desert.

In Algeria they are termed 'Kabyles' (3 syl.); in Morocco they are called 'Shelloob'; in the Atlas range, 'Amazirgh' or 'Timzirght.'

Bere'ans (The). A Christian sect founded by the Rev. John Barclay of Perthshire (1734–1798). They derive their name from the Bereans who 'received the Word of Truth with all readiness of mind, and searched the Scriptures daily' (Acts xvii. 1). They are for the most part Calvinistic in doctrine, but believe that the knowledge of God, even of his existence, is a pure matter of revelation; that the Psalms refer wholly to Christ, and not to David at all; and that assurance is the outcome of faith.

They are called Barclayans from their founder.

Berengarians, 11th cent. Followers of Berenger, or Berengarius, of Tours (1000–1088), who emphatically denied the corporal presence in the Eucharist. Leo IX. procured the condemnation of Berenger's doctrine by the Council of Rome in 1049 and the Council of Vercelli in 1050. In 1079 Berenger declared his belief in transubstantiation, and was much honoured by Gregory VII.

Bergen, in Norway (Treaty of commerce), 1217. Between England and Norway, noteworthy as being the first treaty made by England with any foreign power. The English-Scotch traders were, however, soon displaced by the merchants of the Hanse towns, who continued to maintain their monopoly till 1560, when it was broken up by Frederick II. of Denmark.

Berkeleyism. Idealism as taught by Bishop George Berkeley. To understand this it must be borne in mind that an abstract idea is the idea of an abstract noun, as goodness, solidity, &c. apart from any object. Berkeley, abandoning this theory, maintained that all that is known is the idea; thus, all that we know of a tree is our idea of a tree. He does not say there is no such thing as a tree, but only that our knowledge of such an object is our idea or conception of a tree.

Dr. Johnson kicked a stone and asked if that stone were only an ideal one. It is a sorry thing that a man like Johnson should have been so foolish. What did Johnson know of a stone beyond his idea of it? The kick may have given him a more accurate idea of its hardness, but still, all he knew of it was limited to his conception or idea of a stone.

Berlin (Peace of), 28 June, 1742, which closed the first Silesian war, between Maria Theresa of Austria and Friedrich II., the Great, of Prussia. By this treaty Silesia was given up to Prussia.

Berlin Decree (The), 21 Nov., 1806. Issued by Napoleon for the ruin of Great Britain :—

1. The British Isles were declared in a state of blockade.

2. All commerce and correspondence with Great Britain were forbidden.

3. Every Englishman found on the Continent was declared a prisoner of war.

4. All British goods and merchandise were to be considered lawful prize.

5. All vessels coming from England or an English colony were to be refused admission into any continental harbour.

Bermudas (The). So named from Bermudez, a Spaniard, who first sighted these islands in 1527. They are also called 'Sommers Isles,' from Sir George Sommers, an Englishman, who was shipwrecked here in 1609. Sir George's shipwreck was the immediate reason why these islands were colonised from Virginia, which, at the time (1611), was itself only four years old.

Probably the 'Bermoothes' of Shakespeare ('Tempest,' i. 2) is Bermudas.

Bernadotte (The House of). The present reigning family in Sweden and Norway. Carl XIII. died childless, and concurred with the states in choosing Bernadotte, one of Napoleon's generals, as his successor. Bernadotte proved true to his adopted country by refusing to enforce Napoleon's 'Continental System' on Sweden.

The Continental System was to 'boycott' Great Britain, and ruin its foreign trade. Bernadotte reigned as Carl XIV., but his name was Jean-Baptiste-Jules Bernadotte. He died in 1844, and was succeeded by his son, Oscar I., who died in 1872, and was succeeded by his son, Oscar II.

Bernard (The Great St.). The hospice on this famous mountain pass was founded in 962, by Bernard de Menthon, a Savoysien nobleman, for the benefit of pilgrims.

Bernardiani. Franciscans of the Strict Observance, so called from St. Bernardin of Sienne, of the same order (1380–1444).

Bernardines, 1115. Cistercians reformed by St. Bernard of Clairvaux (1091–1153). Called White Monks from the colour of their habit.

Also a congregation of women of the same order, who consecrated themselves to the education of girls. The chief establishments were those of the Port-Royal, and another in the Faubourg St.-Antoine.

Bernese (The). Henri IV. of France. Before he was king of France he was called the Bernese or Béarnese king. He was king of Navarre, sovereign prince of Béarn, and first peer and prince of France.

Bernesque Poetry, 'Poesia Bernesca.' Burlesque poetry, so called from Francesco Berni of Tuscany (1490–1536).

Bersærker (The). The bodyguards of Danish jarls and kings, noted for their dauntless daring. These military fanatics were probably so called from 'ber' (bare), 'særker' (garment), because they wore no armour in battle. Ogier the Dane, one of Charlemagne's paladins, was a Bersærker.

Berserkir rage means a frenzy of passion wholly beyond control. The rage of the French in the first Revolution was Berserkir rage.

Bertram (Dr. Charles Julius). A literary impostor. He was professor of English at Copenhagen, and professed to have discovered, in 1747, the 'De Situ Britanniæ' of Richardus Corinensis (Richard of Cirencester), in the library of Copenhagen. In 1758 he published it with two other treatises, calling the whole 'The Three Writers on the Ancient History of the British Nations' ('Scriptōres Tres'). His forgery was exposed by J. E. Mayor, in his preface to 'Richardi de Cirencestria Speculum Historiale.' See 'Literary Forgeries,' &c.

The 'Scriptores Tres' were Richardus Corinensis (of Cirencester), Gildas Badnicus (of Bath), and Nennius Banchorensis (of Bangor).

Beshters. A Jewish sect, a branch of the ancient Chasidim, which take their stand on the Kabbala, but remain (ostensibly at least) within the province of rabbinical Judaism (Baal Shem Tob).

Besieger (The). Demetrius Poliorcetês, king of Macedonia.

Bess of Hardwick. Elizabeth, countess of Shrewsbury, to whose charge, in 1572, Mary Queen of Scots was committed. She built a former mansion of Chatsworth, the present Hardwick Hall, and founded, by her three marriages, the wealth and dignity of the Cavendish family. The countess treated Mary with great harshness and rigour, being excessively jealous of the earl, her husband.

Bethlehem Hospital. Granted to London for lunatics in 1547. The word is generally called Bedlam (q.v.), and its lunatic inmates Bedlamites. In 1814 a new building was erected south of the Thames.

Bethlehem Massacre (A). A murder or massacre of young children. Of course, the allusion is to the massacre of the Innocents by Herod.

These ruthless scoundrels would not scruple committing a second Bethlehem massacre.—Sir W. Scott, Guy Mannering, chap. xxxix.

Bethlemites (3 syl.), 1257. A sect of monks, of whom Matthew of Paris writes: 'Concessa est mansio Fratribus Bethleemitis in Cantabrigia . . . quorum habitus similis est habitui Prædicatorum. Signatur autem capa eorum in pectore quadam stella rubra 5 radiis crinita, in cujus medio quædam rotunditas est aërei coloris propter stellam, quæ apparuit in Bethleem nato Domino.'

Beza's Codex. A Greek MS. of the four Gospels and Acts of the Apostles, with a corresponding Latin text on every opposite page. It was presented by Theodore Beza to the University of Cambridge in 1581, and is sometimes called the 'Codex Cantabrigiensis.' It is a thick quarto, written on vellum in uncial letters. Supposed to be of the 5th or 6th cent.

Bianchi (The). I. 1294. A political faction in Pistoia, similar to the Cenchi of Florence; favourers of the Ghibellines. The Bianchi were opposed to the Neri or faction of the Guelfs. The names Bianchi and Neri belonged to two powerful families. Bianchi = 'white'; Neri, 'black.'

Dante, the poet, though of the house of Donati, joined the Bianchi faction, had his house pulled down over his ears, and was actually condemned, 'col falso pretesto d'aver egli commesso baratterie, cioè estorsioni di denaro e vendite di offici pubblici.' Dante says of baratteria (Inferno, xxi. 41):—

'Ogni uom v'è barattier, fuor che Bonturo;
Del no, per li denar, vi si fa ita.'

II. or 'White Penitents,' 1399. Fanatics who dressed in white, and wandered about Italy crying out 'Misericordia,' with their faces covered and bent towards the ground. A great crucifix was borne before them. Their constant song was 'Stabat Mater dolorosa.' The march continued for three months at a time, and those who refused to join the procession were accounted heretics.

They appeared in France, but Henri IV. forbade any one, 'under pain of forfeiting all his goods, to receive the new sect in white clothes, pretending to great sanctity' (Rot. Parl. vol. iii. p. 426). This was because their hiding up their faces gave great opportunity to the commission of all sorts of crimes.

Biandrate (3 syl.). Commander of the Order of St. John of Jerusalem.

Biaronne (L'ambassade de). The three tailors of Tooley Street, see 'Dict. of Phrase and Fable,' p. 875. Biaronne is a small town in Spain, the chief trade of which is in honey. The embassy referred to consisted of 'trois cents chevaux et une mule,' i.e. trois sans chevaux et une femme. Oudin, 'Curiosités Françaises.'

Bible. The name given by Chrysostom to the scriptures in the 4th cent. Divided into chapters in the 13th cent. either by Cardinal Hugo or by Stephen Langton (archbishop of Canterbury). The first English bible divided into verses was published at Geneva in 1560. The oldest MSS. of the New Testament are in uncial characters, and are supposed to belong to the 6th cent. The oldest modern MSS. (in cursive characters) date from the 10th cent. The most valuable MSS. are:

1. The Codex Alexandrinus in the British Museum. See 'Alexandrian Codex.'

2. The Codex Vaticanus in the Vatican at Rome. Considered the oldest.

3. The Codex Ephræmi, in the Imperial Library at Paris.

4. The Codex Cantabrigiensis, or 'Codex Bezæ,' given by Beza to the University.

Bible Christians, 1815. Followers of Mr. Bryan, a local preacher, who separated from the Methodist connection, and introduced a more popular element in his scheme of church government. These Methodists are great advocates of open-air preaching, and receive the Lord's Supper sitting.

Bible Clerks in Oxford University. Students on the foundation received at reduced fees. These foundations belong to five of the colleges: All Souls, Exeter, Lincoln, St. John's, and Worcester; and to one Hall, viz. that of St. Mary. See 'Clerks,' 'Sizars,' 'Servitors.'

At Oriel College, Oxford, there are five bible clerks not on the foundation. At one time they had to read the bible lessons at chapel.

Bible Moths. A nickname given to revivalists, subsequently called Methodists.

Bible Orchard. A piece of ground bought for 50*l.*, the legacy of Dr. Robert Wilde, who died in Aug. 1678, and desired that the interest accruing therefrom should be expended in the purchase of six bibles not exceeding the price of 7*s.* 6*d.* each. The bibles were to be raffled for on the communion table of the parish church of St. Ives, Hunts, every year by six boys and six girls of the town. The practice of throwing dice on the communion-table has been discontinued, and now the raffle takes place on a table placed on the chancel steps.

Bible Prohibited. Innocent III. in 1199 prohibited the private possession and reading of the bible. Similar prohibitions were repeated at Toulouse in 1229; at Béziers in 1233; at the synod of Oxford in 1383.

The synod of Tarragona, in 1234, denounced as a heretic anyone who, having a translation of the bible, refused to surrender it to be burned within the space of eight days.

The bible is placed among the books forbidden in the 'Index Librorum Prohibitorum.'

Bible Society (The), founded in 1780. All bible societies were condemned by the bull of Pius VII., 29 June, 1817 and again by Leo XII. in 1824. The society of Biblical Archæology was instituted in London, in 1871. The object of the Bible Society is the diffusion of the bible without note, comment, expurgation, or addition to the text.

The American Bible Society, founded at New York in 1817.

The British and Foreign Bible Society, founded in London in 1802, issues annually 1¼ million copies of the bible.

The Edinburgh Bible Society, 1860. Also a Bible Society at Glasgow.

The French Bible Society, founded in London, 1792.

The Hibernian Bible Society, 1806.

The Naval and Military Bible Society, 1781. The first ship in which bibles were distributed by this society was the ill-fated 'Royal George,' which went down at Spithead, 29 Aug., 1782.

The Prussian Bible Society, founded at Berlin in 1814.

The Russian Bible Society, founded at St. Petersburg by Dr. Paterson, in 1813.

Biblia Pauperum. The leading events of 'human salvation through Christ' in pictures with text in Latin. This picture-book bible and the 'Mirror of Salvation' were immensely popular in the 13th cent. The pictures were copied by artists and sculptors, and were textbooks with the Franciscans, Carthusians, and others. See 'Bibles.'

Biblia Sacra Latina (about 1455). A folio bible, printed in double columns, the initial letter of each chapter being 'illuminated' by hand with a pen in colours and gold. Unhappily the book bears no date. The first book printed with moveable metal types by John Gütenberg and Fust. See 'Psalmorum Codex.'

Not to be confounded with Biblia Latina, which bears the date 1462.

Bicêtre. The grand hospice in the department of the Seine on the road to Fontainebleau. This hospice derives its name from John, bishop of Winchester, who built and fortified a castle on the spot in 1204. There is no w in French, so the letter is supplied by ou, v or b, and cêtre (the French form of 'cester'). Hence Winchester becomes Vincêtre or Bincêtre, softened into Bicêtre. In 1632 the castle was converted by Louis XIII. into a hospital for military invalids, and was so used till the Hôtel des Invalides superseded it. It is now used for incurable lunatics, strangers, and a poor-house, a prison for vagrants and for criminals condemned to the galleys, or men condemned to death awaiting execution.

Biela Comet. Discovered in 1826 by William, baron von Biela, astronomer; discovered at Josephstadt, in Bohemia. It separated into two in Dec. 1845.

Bien fortuné (Le), i.e. the Lucky, so Philippe VI. was called. The reason is this: when Charles died in 1328, his cousin Philippe de Valois was chosen regent, because the royal widow was expected to give birth to a posthumous child. The child proved to be a girl, which by the Salic law was disqualified, and so the regent by 'good luck' became the king (1293, 1328–1350).

Bigi (The). The friends of the Medici in Florence opposed to Savonarola.

Bill. 'The bill, the whole bill, and nothing but the bill,' 1831. The cry arose on the motion of General Gascoyne, who moved, as an amendment, that the number of representatives for England and Wales should not be diminished. The amendment was carried by a majority of eight, the bill was abandoned, and the parliament dissolved.

Bill Chamber. A department of the Court of Session in Scotland in which one of the judges officiates at all times, during session and vacation. The youngest judge is lord ordinary on the bills during session; and the duty is performed during vacation by the other judges, with the exception of the two presidents.

Bill of Adventure (A). A writing to signify that the goods shipped by a merchant in his name are the property of another, whose adventure it is; but the shipping merchant undertakes to account to the adventurer for what the goods produce.

Bill of Attainder (A). A bill in Parliament, introduced for penally enacting the attaint and punishment of a person or of persons who have criminally offended against the state and public peace.

Bill of Complaint (A), or 'bill in Chancery.' The formal statement in writing by which a plaintiff in the Court of Chancery seeks equitable redress or relief.

Bill of Costs (A). An account stating articulately and in detail the charges and disbursements of an attorney in the conduct of his client's business.

Bill of Exceptions (A). A statement of objections against the ruling of a judge in a civil cause. This is done by way of appeal against the judgment.

Bill of Indemnity (The), 1660. All the injuries and offences against the crown or against individuals, arising out of quarrels between political parties since 1 June, 1637, shall be and are forgiven Except (1) the 51 individuals actually concerned in the death of the king's father; (2) Vane and Lambert; (3) Lord Monson, Hazlerig, and five others, as far as regards liberty and property; (4) all judges in any high court of justice, together with Hutchinson, Lenthall, St. John, and 16 others (named), who shall not be eligible to hold any office, civil, military, or ecclesiastical. The 19 regicides who have voluntarily surrendered, shall not be put to death without a special Act of Parliament, passed expressly for that purpose.

Bill of Rights (The), 2 Nov., 1689. By which William and Mary, being called to the throne, bound themselves to rule on the constitutional principles set forth in the bill. It stated that it is contrary to law for the king to suspend the laws, or interfere with them without consent of parliament; that it is contrary to law for the king to erect commission boards, levy money, or impose fines without consent of parliament; that it is contrary to law for the king to keep a standing army in times of peace without consent of parliament. It provided for freedom of speech in parliament, disallowed excessive bail and fines, enjoined the due impanelling of juries, forbade grants and promises of fines before conviction, and insisted that parliament only shall be empowered to amend the laws and redress grievances.

Bill of Sales (The), 1660. Passed by the Convention Parliament (q.v.). This was for the restoration of all crown lands. Church lands were not included, so that many church livings remained to the Presbyterians.

This must not be confounded with a 'bill of sale,' or assignment of chattels personal.

Billets, 1796. Royal missives granted to the Vaudois to repair and enlarge their temples, or even to remove their sites, provided notice was given to the intendant of the province.

Billy Blue. Lord Admiral St. Vincent (John Jervis), 1734–1823. Admiral of the Blue, 1795. Called Lord St. Vincent from his victory over the combined French and Spanish fleets off Cape St. Vincent in 1795.

Bi-metallism. The employment of two metals, like gold and silver, of fixed legal relative value. Till 1873 this had been the custom for nearly 200 years. One ounce of gold was then equal to 15½ ounces of silver. Up to 1873 silver was the standard of Germany, as it is still of India, China, and Japan; but in 1873 gold was made the sole standard of Germany, and silver became a mere article of commerce and circulating counter, which varied in value according to circumstances. The relative value might be one ounce of gold worth twenty ounces of silver, or any other difference; and those countries which pay in silver pay more as the relative value of silver declines. Bi-metallists want to restore the fixed relative value of these metals.

Birdcage Walk (St. James's Park, London). Here Charles II. made an aviary.

Birmese War. See 'Burmese.'

Birmingham Political Union (The), 1 Feb., 1830. Members paid from 4*s.* to 2 guineas a year. There were several affiliated unions for the dissemination of Radical principles, such as free trade, manhood suffrage, shorter parliaments, the ballot, and so on.

Birminghamers, 1680. Opponents of the Court, or adherents of the Exclusion Bill—that is, a bill to exclude James from succeeding Charles II. The Court party were called Anti-Birminghamers. The Birmingham manufacturers had become notorious as coiners of base money, so the Tories and 'Catholics' nicknamed the Exclusionists 'Birminghamers,' i.e. men who preferred a base or usurping king to one of the real stamp of right divine.

The Whigs were Birminghamers, Petitionists, and Exclusionists (see these words).
The Tories were Anti-Birminghamers, Abhorrers, and Tantivies (see these words).

Biron's Conspiracy, 1602. The conspiracy of Charles de Gontaut, duc de Biron, to dethrone Henri IV. This was a conspiracy with Spain and Savoy. Biron was to receive in marriage the daughter of the Duke of Savoy and the full sovereignty of Burgundy. Biron was betrayed and beheaded.

Birthday. The following, among many others, died on the anniversary of their birthday.

ALEXANDER the Great, 24 July (B.C. 356-324).
ANTIPATER, died B.C. 44.
BROWNE (Sir Thomas), 19 Nov. (1605-1682); his 77th birthday.
CARACALLA, 8 April (188-217).
DIGBY (Sir Kenelm), 11 June (1603-1665).
ELIZABETH, wife of Henry VII., 11 Feb. (1466-1503).
GARSIAS, grandfather of Petrarch, at the age of 104.
GREGORY the Great, 12 March (540-604).
HILARUS (M. Ofilius), the comedian.
HOLLAND (Sir Henry), born 1788.
PLATO, 21 May (B.C. 430-347).
RAPHAEL, 6 April (1483-1520).
SANDFORD (John), died 1850.
SHAKESPEARE, 23 April (1564-1616).
WILLIAMS (John), archbishop of York, 25 March (1582-1650). See Pliny, Nat. Hist. vii. 53.

Bishop in partibus, 1623. A vicar apostolic, vested with episcopal authority by the pope over a church in want of a bishop, but which, for some reason, cannot have one of its own. In such a case a bishop is consecrated to some see, in partibus infidēlium, which had formerly a bishop, but has now no church. These bishops in partibus were created only during the pope's pleasure, and might be removed at any hour. They are now called titular bishops.

Bishop of the English (The). Augustine (597–604). Sent over by Gregory the Great. He is called 'The Apostle of the English.'

Bishops (Commitment of Twelve), 1641. Williams, archbishop of York, prevailed on eleven other prelates to join him in a declaration stating that they could no longer, without danger to their lives, attend their duty in parliament, and that therefore they protested against the validity of any votes or resolutions during their absence. The Lower House impeached the twelve prelates of high treason for this declaration, and ten were committed to the Tower. The bishop of Lichfield and the bishop of Durham, on account of their great age and infirmity, were given in charge to the usher of the Black Rod.

Bishops' Bible (The), 1568–1572. The corrected edition of the Great Bible (q.v.) in the reign of Elizabeth. Archbishop Parker engaged the bishops and other learned men to take each a portion for revision; the different portions were printed with short annotations, and the whole called 'Parker's Bible' or the 'Bishops' Bible.' It was based on Tyndale's translation. See 'Bibles.'

Bishops' Book (The) 1537. Or 'The godly and pious Institution of a Christian Man, &c.,' compiled by the bishops and dedicated to the king. Quoted in brief as the 'Institution.' See 'King's Book.' It was founded on the 'Ten Articles' (q.v.), and explained such matters as the Apostles' Creed, the Ten Commandments, the Lord's Prayer, Ave Maria, the seven sacraments, infant baptism, baptismal regeneration, confession, absolution, the apostolic succession, and the real presence. Two articles, published in 1536, were appended, one on Justification and the other on Purgatory.

Bishop's Eye (The). So the archdeacon is called in canon law.

Bishops' War (The) 1640. The contest of the Scotch against the appointment of bishops in their country, which Charles I. tried to force upon them. It terminated in the conference held at Repton, October 1640.

Charles I. was urged to stand to his ground by Laud and the Earl of Strafford. The Scotch had petitioned for triennial parliaments and freedom of election and debate. Strafford said the rascals ought to be 'whipped' into their senses. When the parliament refused to vote supplies without redress of grievances, Strafford told the king he was entitled to help himself, and he advanced to the North with an army. The Scots crossed the Tyne, occupied Newcastle, and despatched proposals of peace. Charles, to evade calling a parliament, summoned at York a 'Great Council of Peers,' but the council was obstinate, and the king after all was forced to call a parliament. Laud called these Scots 'the rascal riotous multitude.'

Bissextile Year. Leap year was so called, because Julius Cæsar ordained that the 23rd Feb. should be counted twice on leap years; and by the Roman calendar the 23rd Feb. was the sextile or vi. Kal. Martii, i.e. the sixth day before the Kalends, or 1st of March.

Bizochii, or Fratricelli, 1189. A sect of Minorites condemned by Boniface VIII. (1294–1303), by John XXII., and by Martin V. in 1418.

Nonnulli viri pestiferi, qui vulgariter Fratricelli, seu Fratres de paupere vita, aut Bizochi, sive Bichini, vel aliis fucatis nominibus nuncupantur.—JOHN XXII. (year 6), Epist. Communium.

Black. The colour consecrated to the Abbassides (8 syl.). Their turbans and garments were black; and two black standards (called Night and Shadow) were borne aloft on pike-staves nine cubits long in the van of their army. The 'Black and White Factions' were the factions of Abu Moslem the Abassside, and Merwan II. the Ommiade calif.

The Fatimites (3 syl.) colour was green; the Ommiades (3 syl.) white; the Abbasides, black.

Black and White Cockade (The). The allied American and French badge in 1780.

Washington directed all his continental troops to adopt the black and white cockade, as a sign of amity (between America and France).—HOWITT, Hist. of Engl. (Geo. III. p. 264).

Black and White Faces. See under 'White, &c.'

Black and White Factions (The). I. Of Florence, called the Neri and Bianchi. Rival factions towards the close of the 13th cent., and for the first five years of the 14th. The Blacks were the noblesse, and the Whites the rich merchants. The Whites joined the Ghibellines. Dante was a White, and was banished in 1302.

II. That of the Abbassides and Ommiades. The colour of the Abbassides (3 syl.) was black, and of the Ommiades (3 syl.) was white.

The colour of the Fatimites (3 syl.) was green.

Black Act (The), 1722 (9 George I c. 22). Is so called because it was directed against the Waltham deer-stealers, who blackened their faces for disguise, and under the name of 'Blacks' appeared in Epping Forest. This act was repealed in 1827.

It made it felony to appear with the face blackened or otherwise disguised in any park, warren, &c., for the purpose of hunting or stealing deer, &c.

Black Acts. Acts of the Scottish parliament from the reign of the first James to 1587 (James VI.) were so called because they were printed in black letter.

Black Agnes. Wife of the Earl of Dunbar, famous for her defence of Dunbar Castle, when in 1337 it was besieged by Lord Salisbury. See 'Sow.'

Came I early, came I late,
I found Black Agnes at the gate.
Sir W. Scott.

Black Arrow (The Band of the). A fraternity of freebooters at the time of the war of the Two Roses. The arrows used by the band left a black mark on those wounded by them.

Black Assize (The). The assize held at Oxford, 6 July, 1577. So called from the fatal pestilence which broke out at the time. It is said that it broke out in the court-house just as the judge was passing sentence on Richard Jencks, a bookbinder, who was condemned to lose his ears for sedition; and it was popularly called a divine judgment for the cruelty or injustice of the sentence.

Another 'Black Assize' was that held at Cambridge in the Lent term of 1521, when a similar putrid fever broke out.

Black Band (The). I. A body of German foot-soldiers employed by Louis XII. in the Italian wars. So called because they carried black ensigns after the death of their favourite commander.

II. A body of Italian troops in 1526 was also called the Black Band because they also carried black ensigns on the death of their leader, Giovanni de' Medici.

III. A French regiment of Piedmont, who had served for a long while in Italy for the same reason, was called the Black Band in 1596, on the death of Comte de Brissac. See 'Black Brunswickers' and 'Bande Noire.'

IV. Saxon mercenaries in the employ of Denmark. The Black Band employed by John I., king of Denmark, to enforce on Sweden the 'Union of Calmar,' in 1497, had served under the kaiser Maximilian in the wars of Flanders.

Black Bartholomew's Day. I. French history, 24 Aug., 1572. Noted for the great Huguenot slaughter in France.

II. English history, 24 Aug., 1662. When, by the Act of Uniformity, some 2,000 ministers in England and Wales resigned their benefices, or were ejected from them for conscience sake.

Who so active as he to execute the fatal edict of Black St. Bartholomew's day, when so many hundreds of gospel-preachers were expelled from house and home, from hearth and altar, from church and parish.—Sir W. Scott, Peveril of the Peak, chap xiii.

Black Belt (The). A part of Alabama where the negro population has always been very dense.

Black Book (The), 1536. A book containing the reports of two royal commissioners, named Legh and Leyton; appointed by Thomas Cromwell, chief minister of Henry VIII., to visit the religious houses of England. About a third of them are charged in these reports with drunkenness, simony, and crimes perfectly revolting. In consequence of the charges all houses were suppressed whose income fell below 200*l.* a year, and their revenues were confiscated to the crown. The great abbeys were still suffered to remain.

Called 'Black Books' because they blackened the practices of the religious houses in England when Henry VIII. designed their dissolution.

Black Book of the Exchequer (The). 'Liber Niger Scaccarii,' 1175 (Henry II.). Said to have been the work of Gervase of Tilbury; contains an account of the exchequer and its officers. It describes the ranks and privileges of those officers, their wages, perquisites, and jurisdiction; with the revenues of the crown in money, grain, and cattle. Called black from their black leather covers. See 'White, Red, Yellow Books.'

There are two Black Books of the Exchequer preserved in the Public Record Office. The smaller one was bound by William Caxton the printer, and had at one time two stamps for the decoration of the leather cover. These stamps, being Caxton's, prove the book to have been bound by the great printer.—James Wheale, Book-binders and Book-binding (1889).

Black Breeches. See 'Procession of the Black Breeches.'

Black Broth (μέλας ζωμός). The chief food of the Spartans, who dined in public.

A citizen of Sybăris said: 'He no longer wondered why the Lacedæmonians were the most valiant soldiers of the world; seeing that any man of sound mind would rather die a thousand times than devour such nastiness.' And Glaucos, the Locrensian, declared that it is unfit food for the meanest of the free-born.

Black Brunswickers (The), 1806 The 700 hussars under the command of Frederick William, duke of Brunswick, son of Charles William Ferdinand, duke of Brunswick, who made the foolish manifesto against the French republic, was driven by the republican army from Valmy, and mortally wounded at Auer-stadt. His son Frederick William took part in the campaign of Waterloo, and was slain at Quatre-Bras (1815). The Duke Frederick William, at the death of his father, clothed his hussars in black, with lace disposed like the ribs of a skeleton. Their caps and helmets, moreover, bore in front the device of a skull and cross-bones, and instead of feather, long flowing black horse-hair was adopted. It was Charles, son of Frederick William, who two days after the battle of Quatre-Bras joined in the battle of Waterloo.

Black Bull's Head (The). The sign of death. It is repeatedly mentioned in Highland tradition, and seems to have been a Celtic custom. When William, son of the fifth earl of Douglas, and his younger brother David, were inveigled, in 1440, to Edinburgh Castle, as they sat at meat, the black bull's head was placed before them. The two boys were forthwith dragged from table and cruelly beheaded.

Black Cabinet (The). 'Le Cabinet Noir.' The secret apartment where (in continental countries) letters of political importance, or such as are supposed to be so, are opened by government agents. Some are copied, and the copy sent to the address given; others are impounded and find their way to the head of the police.

Black Califs (The). The Abbassides (3 syl.), whose uniform and standards were black.

As subjects of the White party, i.e. the Ommiades (3 syl.), they might lawfully invade the dominions of the Black Califs.—GIBBON, chap. lii.
The standard of the Fatimites (3 syl.) is green.

Black Camisards (The), 1703. Huguenots. So called in contrast to the White Camisards (q.v.), who were Catholic auxiliaries in Montrevel's army.

Camisard is used in two senses; sometimes the Protestant insurgents of the Cevennes are so called.
Camisard should not be confounded with Camisade (an attack by night).

Black Canons (The). The Canons Regular of St. Augustine were so called from their black cloaks. The 'Black Friars' were Dominicans. See 'White Canons.'

Black Captain (The). Lieutenant-Colonel Davidoff, an officer in the Russian army in the time of the French invasion, was called by the invaders 'Le Capitaine Noir,' from the terror of his name, like our 'Black Prince.'

Black Charlie. Sir Charles Napier (1786–1860).

Black Clergy (The). Monks in Russia are so called in contradistinction to the white clergy, or parish priests.

Black Code (The), of Louis XIV., 1685. Colbert's code relating to the African slave-trade.

Black Colin Campbell. General in the army of George III.
Introduced by Sir W. Scott in 'Redgauntlet.'

Black Country (The). South Staffordshire, famous for its hardware manufactures and its mines of coal and iron. The volumes of smoke thrown off all day and night cover everything with smut and destroy vegetation, so that a patch of grass or green tree can scarcely be seen. Gardens are well nigh unknown, and cleanliness is almost impossible. In this vast district, Wolverhampton (to the south-east) produces locks, tin, and japan wares; Walsall (to the north-west) saddlers' ironmongery, brass, and iron wares, &c.; West Bromwich (to the south), coal and iron; Bilston, Sedgley, Wednesbury, Dudley (chains and nails), Darlaston, &c., are all busy towns in the same district.

Black Crosses, Cruces Nigræ or Croix noires. The Greater Litany on St. Mark's Day, when the altars, crosses, and relics are covered as in mourning.

Thys letanye is sayd [called] the blacke crosse; for thenne in sygne of pestylence, wepying, and of penaunce, they clad them [the croses, &c.] wyth blacke clothes.—The Golden Legende (WYNKYN DE WORDE, 1512).

Black Days. Varro (Book v.) says: 'Dies postridie Kalendas, Nonas, Eidus, appellati atri, quod per eos dies novi inciperent.'

Black Death (The), 1348–1382. The oriental plague which desolated Asia and Europe in the 14th cent. So called from the black spots which appeared at the time of death on the skin, from putrid decomposition. It broke out in China in 1333, and carried off 13,000,000 of the inhabitants, and in the rest of Asia about 24,000,000. In 1349 it reached Norway and Sweden; in 1351 it desolated Russia. It reappeared in 1360, 1378, 1382; carrying off 30,000,000 Europeans. Of the 4,000,000 which formed the population of England, more than half were swept away. Labour was at a high premium, the price of food rose greatly, and a strike between capital and labour followed.

Dr. Hecker puts down the mortality of London from the Black Death at 100,000; of Norwich about 52,000 (the entire population of London at the time being 130,000, and of Norwich 60,000). The deaths at Lübeck were 90,000; at Basle 14,000; at Erfurt 20,000; and 200 villages were quite depopulated.

Black Dick. Richard, earl Howe (1725–1799). The English admiral sent to operate against D'Estaing, in command of the French forces on the coast of America, during the war of independence.

Black Dog of Arden (The). So Piers Gaveston nicknamed Guy, earl of Warwick, and the earl vowed he would show the Gascon his teeth. He combined with other great barons and murdered the royal favourite.

Black Douglas (The), i.e. the formidable or terrible Douglas (died 1390).

It is said that the name of this indefatigable chief had become so formidable that women used in the northern counties to still their froward children by threatening them with the Black Douglas.—Sir W. Scott, Hist of Scotland, xi.

Black Eagle (Knights of the), 17 Jan., 1701. A Prussian order instituted by Frederick, elector of Brandenburg, when he was crowned king of Prussia. Ribbon, orange; a Maltese cross, and the legend 'Cuique suum.' There are thirty knights besides those of the royal family. They are sworn to be just and chaste, and to protect widows and orphans.

Black Flag (The). I. Betokens a pirate; a white flag, peace; a red flag, defiance; a yellow flag that the vessel is in quarantine. The pirate's black flag is called the 'Jolly Rover.'

A black flag is hoisted on club-houses, &c. to indicate vexation or annoyance at some political measure thought to be destructive or injurious to their well-being; thus was it hoisted over the club-house of Liberty in Brussels, in Sept. 1884. It is set up at the corner of infected streets down which the public are forbidden to go. Thus was it set up in Naples in Sept. 1884, when the cholera prevailed in that city. It was hoisted on the Hôtel de Ville of Paris in 1793, as a symbol of distress and a call to arms, when the city was threatened with invasion. It was carried in the insurrection of Lyons, Nov. 1831, when the silk-weavers rose en masse.

II. The 'national party' in Ireland, during the visit of the Prince of Wales in 1885, displayed black flags. Black was the colour of the royal banners of Ireland, and Cassanæus states that 'the royal arms of Ireland was a king enthroned in majesty in a field sable.' See 'Anthologia Hibernica,' i. 172.

III. A black flag was displayed by Tamerlane, when a besieged city refused to surrender, meaning that he gave over the city to utter destruction and spoliation.

Black Flags (The). Mussulman soldiers, the black banner being that of the prophet of Mecca and of the faith of Islam. In the Annamite war, 1883, between the Annamese and the French, the Black Flags were political refugees from border provinces, and were by far the bravest of the Chinese (Annamite) army. Their headquarters was Laokai, on the left bank of the river, in the angle formed by the confluence of Nan-si-ho with Songkoi. See 'Yellow Flags,' and 'Flag of the Prophet.'

Black is the colour of the Abbasides (8 syl.), green of the Fatimites (8 syl.), and white of the Ommiades (3 syl.). Hence the banner of the kalif of Bagdad was a crescent on a black flag; that of the sultan of Damascus a crescent on a green flag.—Gibbon, ch. lii.

Black Flagellants (The). So called from their black masks. See 'Flagellants' and 'Blancs Battus.'

Black Friars (The). The Dominicans or Preaching Friars were so called in England from the colour of their dress. They were founded in 1216, and first appeared in England in 1221.

Called 'Jacobins' in France from their establishment in the Rue de Jacques, Paris. The 'Black Canons' were the Augustines or Canons Regular of St. Augustine. There was also an order of Black Nuns.

Black Friday, 6 Dec., 1745. The day on which the news arrived in London that the army of Charles Edward (the Young Pretender) had reached Derby (reign of George II.).

II. 11 May, 1866. It was announced the day before that the great discounting house of Overend, Gurney, & Co. had suspended payment. Only twelve months before the bank had been converted into a limited liability company, and half a million had been given for the goodwill. On the day of suspension the Bank of England raised its rate of discount to 9%. The English Joint-Stock Bank and its thirty branches closed their doors. The next announcement was that Messrs. Peto and Betts, the great contractors, had failed, their liabilities being 4,000,000*l.* Then the Imperial Mercantile Credit Association, with a capital of 5,000,000*l.*, and the Consolidated Discount Company, with a capital of 1,000,000*l.*, gave way. The panic was terrible, but it rapidly subsided, and the mischief was very much less than was apprehended.

Black George, of Servia. Kara George Petrovitsch, a Servian peasant who, in 1804, revolted against the Porte. Having defeated several armies sent against him, in 1807 he took Belgrade, and formed a military government in Servia. In 1811, Turkey acknowledged him 'hospodar of Servia,' but, in 1814, the Turks recovered the country, Black George fled to Austria, was imprisoned, and died.

Black-haired Race (The). The Chinese.

He (Commissioner Keshen) humbly hopes that the Holy One will look down with pity and compassion on the black-haired race . . . so that the people of the land may not be turned to ashes.—Keshen's Dispatches, 1841, to the Emperor of China.

Black Hand (The Band of the). A socialist society discovered in Andalusia in 1883, and consisting of about 50,000 members of all ranks. The confederacy was divided into 190 district federations and 800 local sections.

Black Hole of Calcutta (The), 1756. A cell, 18 feet square, in which the Nabob Suraja Dowlah confined 146 Englishmen captured by him at Calcutta. After a night of agony from heat, thirst, and want of air, only 23 survived till morning, and these 'were the ghastliest forms that ever the eye of man had seen.'

The governor Drake had imprisoned several native merchants unjustly. When the subahdar marched against the factory with 400 or 500 men, Drake fled and Howell took the command of the English. The Indians, with muskets presented, drove Howell and his 145 Englishmen into the 'Black-hole prison, situated at the end of the barracks.' Mr. Howell was one of the 23 who escaped, and it is from his pen that we obtain a narrative of this disastrous event.

Black Hood House (The). The Non-Regent or Lower House in the University of Cambridge. So-called because its members wore black hoods. This house consisted of masters of arts of more than five years' standing and doctors of more than two. Graduates on the boards of shorter standing formed the Regents' or Upper House. See 'White Hood House.' Abolished in 1858. See 'Senate.'

Regents mean tutors, professors, and lecturers. Non-regents, those who had served their time and were exempt from these duties. Such masters of arts stripped off the white lining of their hoods.

Black Horse (The), or 'The Blacks.' The 7th Dragoon Guards; facetiously called, in the reign of George II., 'The Virgin Mary's Guard.' They are called the 'Blacks' from their black facings, and 'horse' because they are a cavalry regiment.

Black Indulgence. A licence to preach without interruption, granted by Charles II. to those Presbyterian ministers who complied with certain specified regulations made by parliament. This indulgence made a great schism, and those who availed themselves of it were hated with odium theologicum.

Of all the baits with which the devil has fished for souls in these days of blood and darkness, that Black Indulgence has been the most destructive.—Sir W. Scott, Old Mortality, chap. v.

'Presbyterian!' answered Gilfillan contemptuously; 'a wretched Erastian, or rather an obscure prelatist—a favourer of the Black Indulgence; one of the dumb dogs that canna bite.'—Sir W. Scott, Waverley, chap. xxxvi.

Black Jagers (The). See 'Black Brunswickers.'

Black John. Scottish history. John Home, the man who revealed the plot of Sir James Edmonstone to take James VI. prisoner and keep him so till he recalled the lords banished or disgraced for the part taken by them in the raid of Ruthven (q.v.), 1584.

Black Knight of Lorn (The). Sir James Stewart, who married Joanna, the widow of James I. of Scotland.

Black Legion (The), 1806. That of the Duke of Brunswick. After the death of his father, Frederick William put all his soldiers into mourning. Their military caps had in front for device, a skull and cross-bones, and for gay feathers were substituted flowing black horse-hair. This was because Napoleon refused to allow the dying duke to be removed to Brunswick; so the son commanded that his legion should wear mourning till the death of Napoleon. However, soon after the battle of Waterloo, the Brunswickers resumed their proper costume.

Black Legions (The). So the Hungarian troops were called in the 15th cent. See 'Black Troop.'

We generally read of the Black Legion, in the singular number, and the Black Hussars: but Godkin, in his 'History of Hungary,' says, 'the Hussites were everywhere compelled to give way before the terrible attacks of the Black Legions, as the Hungarian troops were called' (p. 127).

Black List. I. 1832. A list of all those members of the House of Commons who voted in favour of reform till the bill was thrown out by the Lords; but it was known that the king (William IV.) hated the bill and wanted to shelve it. Several members shuffled and held themselves at bay. These 72 members constituted the black list, to be blackballed at the next election.

II. A printed list of bankruptcies, liquidations by arrangement, registers of protested bills, decrees of absence, offers of composition, and other matters pertaining to the credit of firms and individuals, circulated from London to subscribers for the information and guidance of men of business.

Black Lord Clifford. John, ninth Lord Clifford, son of Thomas, Lord Clifford. Also called 'the Butcher' (died 1461).

Black Lord Herbert. Edward, Lord Herbert of Cherbury (1581–1648).

Black Mail. A payment made by the Highlanders in the first half of the 18th cent. as a compromise to bandits, who promised that neither the property nor person of anyone who paid the impost should suffer injury. In 1601 (by 43 Eliz. c. 13) the levy of black mail was made felony.

Mail (Anglo-Saxon mal, rent-tax), used in Scotland to designate every sort of periodical payment, and is still the term employed technically for rent paid by a tenant to his landlord.

Black Militia (The). The officials of the Jesuits.

Black Monday. I. Easter Monday, 14 April, 1360. So called because it was so dark with mist and hail, so cold and windy, that many of the men and horses in the army of Edward III. lying before Paris perished.

See Shakespeare, 'Merchant of Venice,' ii. 5.

II. 27 Feb., 1865. So called in Victoria (Australia), from a terrible sirocco from the N.N.W. which produced frightful havoc between Sandhurst and Castlemaine.

Black Money. Base money introduced from foreign countries. By the statute of York (12 Edw. II. A.D. 1318), it was ordered that all manner of black money (noir monnoie) lately current in the realm shall be excluded. In 1339, a certain black money called turneys was made in Ireland, and circulated to the injury of the king's sterling money; and in 1341 the mayor and bailiffs of Dover made proclamation for the better observance of the statute of York respecting black money.

Camden speaks of the prohibition of black money by Edward III. (9 Edw. III. st. 2).

Black Parliament (The). I. In English history, 1529. The parliament held by Henry VIII. at his palace in Bridewell, the year of the king's divorce from Katharine. See 'Parliament.'

II. In Scotch history, 1320. The parliament which condemned to death Sir David de Brechin, Sir William Malherbe, Sir John Logie, and Richard Brown, and imprisoned for life the Countess of Strathearn and Sir William de Soulis, for a conspiracy against Robert Bruce. The plan was to put Bruce to death and make Sir William de Soulis king. The Countess of Strathearn betrayed the conspiracy. See 'Parliament.'

Black Prince (The). I. 1355. Edward, prince of Wales, son of Edward III., was first so called by the French just before the battle of Poitiers. He had won the marvellous battle of Cressy, had invaded Gascony, had carried terror through the length and breadth of France, and was called the very devil or prince of darkness. Froissart says 'he was called black by the terror of his arms'; and Strutt, in his 'Antiquities,' gives the same reason.

See this word in the 'Dictionary of Phrase and Fable,' p. 90. All the armour known of the prince was gilt armour.

Black Prince (The). I. Nicknamed by the French 'Pie-de-Plomb' (Waurin's 'Recueil,' &c. vol. i. p. 236, Rolls Series), not a leaden pica or magpie, but a draught of lead, referring to cannons first used at the battle of Cressy, by which draughts of lead were poured into the French. Croqueter la pie in archaic French means to drink hugely. The verb pier means to drink—as

> Je vous prie que j'aye à pyer (to drink)
> Ung coup de quelque bon vin vieulx.
> Le Testament de Pathelin, p. 120.
> S'il vouloit croqueter la pie,
> J'en euse volontiers coppe,
> Pour rendre la soif destouree.
> Actes des Apostres (1541).

II. Fulc the Black, or 'Fulc Nerra,' the greatest of the Angevins. He burnt his wife at the stake; waged the bitterest war against his son; despatched twelve assassins to the murder of the minister of the French king; and shocked even the rude barbarians of the times with his treason, rapine, and blood. It was the blackness of his deeds which procured him the sobriquet of 'Nerra' (the Black).

Black Regiment (The), 1863. A regiment of negroes in the Federal army, under the command of General Banks; their prowess and courage in the storming of Port Hudson are celebrated by G. H. Boker, the war poet.

Black Rent, 1409. The tribute paid to Irish chieftains by the residents living in border counties of the Pale for peace and protection. It began in the reign of Henry IV.

Rents paid in cattle (neat-gild), or in any other way except in lawful cash are termed redditus nigri. Rents paid in lawful silver are called redditus albi (white rents).

Black Republicans. The North American republicans were so called by the pro-slavery party. These republicans resisted the introduction of negro slavery into territory where it was not already recognised. They morally hoisted the black flag of no surrender against slavery.

Black River (The). The river Til or Tula, so called from the deep black shade of the forests thrown on the water.

Black Rod, or, in full, 'Gentleman Usher of the Black Rod.' An officer of the crown in the House of Lords, whose duty it is to attend on the peers during the session of parliament To the care of this officer all peers impeached for any crime or for contempt are first committed. His staff of office is a black rod with a golden lion in repose on the top. See 'Yeoman Usher.'

Black Rood of Scotland (The). A piece of the 'true cross' set in an ebony figure of Christ, inclosed in a cross of 'gold' elaborately wrought, about a span long. This relic was taken by Margaret, the Anglo-Saxon princess, to Scotland, when in 1070 she married King Malcolm Ceanmohr. In 1291 it was delivered to Edward I., when it was found that the casket cross was only silver gilt. Of the 'true cross' nothing is known. In 1328 it was restored to Scotland. In 1346 King David II. invaded England and took with him the black rood as an amulet; but he was captured by Sir Ralph de Neville (lord of Raby), and the relic became part of his prize. It was then deposited in the shrine of St. Cuthbert, in Durham Cathedral, where it remained till the Reformation, when all trace of it disappeared.

Black Saturday. I. 10 Sept., 1547. When Lord Protector Somerset defeated the Scotch in the battle of Pinkie, near Musselburgh, with terrible slaughter.

II. 4 Aug., 1621, is so called in Scotland from a violent storm which occurred at the very time the parliament was sitting to enforce episcopacy on the people.

Black Sheep (The), 1407–1468. Certain Turkomans who, under the leadership of Kara Yussuff, made themselves masters of Azerbijan', Irak, Fars, and Kerman, but were subsequently driven out by the Turkomans of the White Sheep. Called the 'Black Sheep' from the effigy displayed on their standard.

At the decay of Timur's dynasty his empire fell into three separate parts. Hussein Mirza, a descendant of Timur, governed Khorasan and held his court at Herat; the Turkomans of the White Sheep held Armenia, Mesopotamia, and part of Asia Minor; the Black Sheep held the third part.

Black Soldiers (The), or Sidier Dhu. The independent companies raised to keep peace and law in the Highlands. So called from their dark tartans; English soldiers are Sidier Roy, or red soldiers. See 'Waverley,' chap. xviii.

Black Somerset (The). Somerset was a negro slave brought to England and turned adrift because of ill-health. Mr. Granville Sharpe took pity on him, and by care restored him to perfect health, whereupon his master claimed him again. Mr. Sharpe resisted the claim, and it was brought into the law-courts, when it was decided that slavery could not exist in Great Britain, 22 June, 1772.

Black Spring (The). That of 1771 is so called in Scotland. It was followed by a famine.

Black Stone (The). Of the Kaaba, in Mecca. Said to have 'dropped from paradise,' and set in the silver door. A pilgrim walks round the Kaaba or mosque seven times, and each time kisses the stone or lays his hand on it. We are told that the stone was originally white, but has been turned black by the sins of man.

Black Stone Examination (The). In Glasgow University is the commencement of the ceremony of graduation; the conclusion being the 'act of Laureation' in the college hall, or one of the city churches.

Black Strangers, or 'Black Gentiles.' Danes were so called by the ancient Irish. They first made their appearance in Ireland in the 8th cent. From Dublin southwards was the territory of the Black Strangers. Dublin and northwards was the territory of the White Strangers.

The country south of Dublin was called Dubh-Gal, or territory of the Black Strangers. Called by the Four Masters Dubh-gentie (Black Gentiles).

Black Sunday, 20 Jan., 1837. See 'Russian Influenza.'

Black Thursday, 6 Feb., 1851. Is so called in the colony of Victoria from a terrific bush-fire which occurred on that day.

Black Troop (The), 1470. Of King Matthias of Hungary; a royal bodyguard, and, next to the French, the earliest standing army in Europe. See 'Black Legions.'

Black Vomit (The). So the plague (1348) of Florence was called. Some think it is the same as the cholera morbus, or Indian cholera. Its principal ravages were in 1736, 1737, 1761, and 1782; in this last year Mexico lost 25,000 of its inhabitants from it. Yellow fever is so called in Mexico and tropical America.

In 1348 the plague began in China, and spread into Turkey, Egypt, Greece, Italy, France, Germany, England, and Russia. In Russia it carried off the whole royal family; in France a fourth of the inhabitants; and in Europe a third of the entire population. See 'Black Death.'

Black Watch (The). The 42nd Foot, so called from their 'black' tartan, i.e. a tartan of black, dark blue, and dark green, called 'the Black Watch tartan.' It was originally a Scotch militia, dressed in tartans of very dark colours. In 1725 General Wade was their commander-in-chief. In 1730 they were formed into six companies of 100 men each, and stationed in different parts of the Highlands to enforce the 'Disarming Act,' to prevent political meetings, and to check depredations. In 1739 they were formed under the Earl of Crawford into the famous 42nd regiment, and became one of the most distinguished of the British army. Linked with the old 73rd.

Black Wind (The). The Sherki. An easterly wind much dreaded in Armenia, and so called by the Kurds because it is a terrible scourge.

Black Year (The), 1742. The driest year known in England, when all green things were dried up.

The years 1744, 1749, 1768 were very nearly as dry.

Blacks (The). The Waltham deer-stealers in the reign of George I. were so called because they blackened their faces for disguise. See 'Black Acts,' 'Black Horse.'

Blacks and Reds, or 'I Neri' and 'I Rossi.' The Council of Ten, in Venice, were called 'I Neri' from their black official robes. The signory or privy council of the doge was called 'I Rossi' from their red robes of office.

Blacks and Whites (The), 13th cent. and first four years of the 14th. Rival factions in Italy. The Blacks were the aristocratic Guelfs, the Whites were the bourgeois and Ghibelins. Dante in 1302 was exiled for being a White, and during his exile wrote his 'Divina Commedia.'

Blackfoot. One of the disturbing factions of Ireland in the early part of the present century. The faction seems to have resembled the Terry Alts. See 'Irish Associations.'

And the Blackfoot who courted each foeman's approach,
Faith, 'tis hot-foot he'd fly from the stout Father Roach.—LOVER.
N.B. 'Hot-foot he'd fly,' i.e. quickly.

Blacksmith of Antwerp (The). Quentin Matsys, first a blacksmith and then a great painter (1450–1529).

Blacksmith's Apron (The). The standard of Kâwâh or Gawo, a blacksmith of Ispahan, who headed a rebellion against Biver-asp Zohâc, a merciless tyrant; and raised Feridoun, son of Djemchid, to the throne. The blacksmith's apron was adopted by Feridoun as the royal standard of Persia. Every king of the Djemchid dynasty (called the Pichdadians or Paisdadians) added jewels to enrich the apron-standard, called Derufsh-e-Kawânee (standard of Kâwâh). (Sir John Malcolm, 'Hist. of Persia,' vol. i. p. 13.)

It need hardly be added that the Pishdadian dynasty belongs to the mythical period of Persian history. The apron remained the royal standard till A.D. 636, when in the battle of Cadesia it fell into the hands of the Saracens.—GIBBON, chap. li.

Blackwork. That of mutes at a funeral. Waiters hired for this purpose call the employ 'blackwork,' from the black clothes and cloaks worn on the occasion.

Blanch Holding (A), or 'Blench holding.' A tenement held of a superior for a peppercorn or mere nominal rent.

Blanch-Lyon. At one time one of the English pursuivants-at-arms was so called. See 'Pursuivants.'

Blanco White of the 18th cent. (The). Pierre François le Courayer (1681–1776), a French divine who died in England, and is one of the ten foreigners buried in Westminster Abbey. He is so called by Dean Stanley.

Blancs Battus (Les). The White Flagellants; there were also the Black and Blue orders. Henri III. joined the White order, his mother Catharine de Medicis the Black order, and Cardinal d'Armagnac the Blue. They went in procession bare-footed and bare-headed, with chaplets of death-bones at their girdles, and making blood spirt from their naked shoulders by lashing them with cords. The White Flagellants wore a whit mantle, the Black Flagellants wore a black mantle, and the Blue Flagellants a blue mantle. The mantle was thrown off when the scourging began.

Blancs et Bleus (Les). The Blancs (Whites) were partisans of the Bourbons, whose emblem was a drapeau blanc. The Bleus were republican soldiers whose uniform was blue.

Blank Bond (A). In Scotland. A security in which the creditor's name is left blank, the bearer being at liberty to insert his name in the blank space and sue for payment. Abolished in 1696.

Blanket Meeting (The), 10 March, 1817. The muster of the Blanketeers (q.v.) in St. Peter's Field, Manchester. According to government estimate the number was 10,000; but this seems to be a gross exaggeration, and about 5,000 is thought to be the correct estimate. The meeting was broken up by the military.

Blanketeering Expedition (The), 10 March, 1817. The march of certain Lancashire weavers to lay their grievances before the Prince Regent. As the way was long, each man took a blanket to wrap round him at night, and a stock of provisions. At least 5,000 met in St. Peter's Field, Manchester, but the military dispersed them; some taking the road to Stockport. Not above 180 reached Macclesfield, in Cheshire, 'a most deplorable lot, without food and without organisation.' A score struggled as far as Staffordshire, and only six reached Ashbourne Bridge, when the expedition collapsed. See 'Peterloo.'

Blanketeers (The). The radical reformers of Lancashire, who mustered on St. Peter's Field, Manchester, with the intention of marching to London to lay a petition of grievances before the Prince Regent. Only six got as far as Ashbourne Bridge. The deviser of this expedition was Joseph Mitchell, draper of Liverpool. See above.

Bleu-thonge, 1189. A military order instituted by Richard I., when about to lay siege to Acre. It was in honour of St. George, and consisted of twenty-six knights, the decoration being a blue leather garter round the left leg. See 'Knights of the Garter.'

Blind Archbishop (The). Robert Wauchope (pronounce Vaucop), titular archbishop of Armagh, was blind from birth. He introduced Jesuits into Ireland in 1541; was appointed archbishop by Paul III. in 1543; and attended the Council of Trent in 1547.

Blind General (The). Zisca, the Hannibal of Bohemia. He was totally blind (1318–1424).

Blind Harper (The). John Parry, who died 1739.

Blind Harry. A Scotch minstrel of the 15th cent. blind from infancy, minstrel in the court of James IV. His epic of 'Sir William Wallace' runs to 11,861 lines.

Blind Inventor. Dr. James Gale, F.G.S. of Plymouth, inventor of non-explosive gunpowder, &c. See 'Men of the Time' (1833–).

Blind Jack of Knaresborough. Lived by laying out roads.

Blind Mechanician (The). John Streng, blind from his birth (1732–1798).

Blind Musician (The). John Stanley, musician and composer, was blind from birth (1713–1786).

Blind Naturalist (The). François Huber of Geneva (1750–1831). His 'Observations on Bees' was published in 1796.

Blind old Bard of Chio's rocky isle (The). Homer (flo. about B.C. 950).

Blind Physician (The). Dr. Hugh James (17th cent.).

Blind Poet (The). Luigi Grotto, an Italian poet, called Il Cieco d'Adria (1541–1585). John Milton (1608–1674).

Blind Postmaster-general (The). Henry Fawcett (1833–1884). An exceedingly active and efficient postmaster-general.

Blind Prebendary (of Westminster). Richard Lucas, D.D. (1648–1715), author of 'Practical Christianity,' 'Inquiry into Happiness,' 'Christian Thoughts for every Day of the Month,' 'Sermons,' &c.

Blind Scholar (The). Ambrose Fisher (17th cent.).

Blind Sculptor (The). Giovanni Gonelli, a Tuscan (1610–1664). He also made admirable likenesses; amongst others, that of Pope Urban VIII. is very celebrated.

Blind Traveller (The). Lieutenant James Holman (1787–1857), who walked through Russia almost to the Chinese frontier. He would have continued his tour, but the Russian government grew suspicious and sent him back.

Blockam Feast. Lynch law. Holinshed, in his Chronicles, referring to the rebellion of 1381, has this marginalia: 'Lawyers, justices, and jurors, brought to blockam-feast by the rebels under Jack Straw and Wat Tyler.'

Sir Robert Beaknap, the chief justice of the common pleas, being sent to Essex to try the insurgents, they denounced him as a traitor to the country, cut off the heads of the jurors and clerks of the commission, and carried them on poles through the neighbouring towns.

(A block-house is a prison, a block-stick is a cudgel, and a blocker is a broad axe. Blockam seems allied to these words.)

Blocking a Bill. Putting down notice of opposition to a bill before the House. The effect of this notice is that, unless the stage objected to can be reached before 12.30 A.M., the bill is blocked, as no bill objected to can be taken after that time.

Blois (Treaty of), 1513. A treaty of alliance between Venice and Louis XII., renewed by François I. in 1515.

Blood (The). It is said that when Longinus pierced the side of Jesus with a spear, about a spoonful of the blood was caught, and this blood was preserved at Billom, in France, till the Revolution, when it was thrown away. We are told that it was brought from Syria, in the first crusade, by two canons, named Durand Albanelli and Peter Barbasta. Several vouchers accompanied the vessel containing the blood, one dated in the reign of Tiberius, and another in that of Valens. A bull of Eugenius IV., in 1444, established a confraternity in honour of the blood. (Discours historique sur le sang précieux que l'on révère dans l'église collégiale et royale de Saint-Cerneuf de la ville de Billom, en Auvergne, 1757.)

 Some of the blood of Jesus we are assured is preserved at Mantua, said to have been preserved by Longinus, the Roman soldier who pierced the side; but it is most improbable that he would catch and preserve the blood of a despised Galilean. See 'Crucifixion, Relics of the.'

Blood (The Court of). 'The twelve judges of the Tumults,' established in the Netherlands by the Duke of Alva, in 1567 (Motley, 'Dutch Republic').

Blood Bath of Stockholm (The). Christian II. of Denmark, wishing to restore the Union of Calmar, was empowered by the pope to treat the Swedes as heretics. Armed with this authority, Christian invaded Sweden, was victorious, and solemnly crowned at Stockholm. Under pretence of obedience to the pope's bull, he put to death his political enemies, and executed ninety-four bishops, senators, knights, and burgomasters, amongst whom was Eric, father of Gustavus Vasa. This massacre, which occurred in Nov. 1520, is called in history 'The blood bath of Stockholm.'

Blood Book (The). The register of the Vehmgerichte (q.v.), in which was entered the judgments of the court, with the name of the crime which had called down the sentence.

Blood Council, Sept. 1567, or 'Council of Troubles' (q.v.).

Blood Feud. The duty of the next akin of a murdered man to slay the person who has killed him. This tit-for-tat law is well nigh universal in all nations not brought into legal civilisation. It is called Vendetta (q.v.) in Corsica and many other places, Tar by the Bedouins, Talio by the Twelve Tables of old Rome. The lex talionis is a similar barbarity, only the retaliation was not left in the hands of the next akin, but was administered by officers appointed by law.

Blood-money. Money paid by press-gangs to anyone who informed them of a man who had deserted from the naval service, or who was instrumental in giving up a deserter to the press-gang. The deserter ought to have been a sailor, but in a 'hot-press' landsmen were often kidnapped. 'Blood-money' now means money paid to a person for informing against a felon.

Blood-wedding (The). So the Germans called the massacre of the Protestants in Paris on the night of St. Bartholomew's Day (German, Bluthochzeit).

Blood of Christ (The). At Hales, Gloucestershire; said to have been brought from Jerusalem; invisible except to absolved penitents; was shown in 1538 to be the blood of a duck introduced every week into a bottle transparent on one side and opaque on the other. See 'Rood of Grace,' 'Darvel Gatheren,' &c.

Bloodless year of '82 (The). That is 1782, when Holland acknowledged the independence of the United States of America, peace was negotiated, and the provisional articles were signed by Great Britain and America. It was not, however, a 'bloodless year,' for in May the British were repulsed near Savannah, and in July the last action in the war took place near Combahee Ferry.

> And when at last he had fought us thro'
> To the bloodless year of '82.
> WILL CARLETON, How we Kept the Day.

Bloody Assize (The), 1685. The infamous assize held by Judge Jeffreys, when some 300 persons were condemned to death, more were whipped or imprisoned, and nearly 1000 were sent to the plantations as slaves, because they had joined the Monmouth rebellion.

Bloody Bill (The). The 31 Henry VIII. c. 14, which denounces death by hanging or burning on all who denied the dogma of transubstantiation. The first of the six articles, or 'Bloody Statute.'

Bloody Bonner. Edmund Bonner, bishop of London (1500–1569), a main instrument of the religious persecutions in the reign of Mary.

Bloody Feast (The), A.D. 981. The Romans, anxious to free themselves from the German yoke, formed a conspiracy to establish a republic. This conspiracy was secretly revealed to Otto II. of Germany, who went to Italy, invited the chief conspirators to a banquet at the Vatican, and when the guests were seated at table, Otto, rising from his chair, stamped his foot, and the room was instantly filled with armed men. The kaiser then deliberately unrolled a paper from which he read aloud the names of those concerned in the plot; and, as each name was read, the victim was dragged from the table and strangled. This 'bloody feast' is described in Leonine verse in the 'Pantheon' of Godfrey of Viterbo.

Bloody Feast of Rouen (The), 1356. The young dauphin, Charles, son of Jean le Bon, gave a banquet at Rouen to his private friends and leading nobles of France, to which Charles the Bad, his brother-in-law, was invited. While the guests were seated at table King Jean entered the banquet room with a numerous escort, and, seizing Charles, shook him violently, exclaiming, 'Traitor, thou art not worthy to sit at table with my son! Guards, seize your prisoner. By holy Paul! I will not eat or drink till his head be brought me!' The dauphin threw himself at his father's feet, imploring him to desist, but the king, seizing a mace, struck one of the guests with it, and four others were cut down by the guards. Charles the Bad was shut up in the Tower of the Louvre, but was released after the battle of Poitiers, 1356.

Bloody Ledger (The). An account of the burnings and spoliations of Henry VIII. on the coasts of Kintyre, Kyle, and Carrick, in 1544. We find that 192 towns, villages, farms, towers, and churches were destroyed; 10,386 head of cattle were driven off, 12,492 sheep, and 1,496 horses; and an untold amount of miscellaneous plunder was taken.

Bloody Statute (The). The statute passed in 1541, commanding all British subjects, under pain of death or imprisonment at the king's pleasure, to subscribe to the following church dogmas: (1) The Real Presence of Christ in the Eucharist; (2) The all-sufficiency of communion in one kind only; (3) The unlawfulness of the marriage of priests; (4) The indissoluble obligation of vows of chastity; (5) The propriety of retaining private masses; and (6) The obligation of auricular confession. This statute was repealed in 1549. More authentically called 'The Statute of Six Articles.'

Bloody Sunday, 13 Nov., 1887. Noted for a Socialist riot in Trafalgar Square, London. The Socialists resolved to hold a public meeting in the square, but Sir Charles Warren commanded the police to disperse the crowd. Many severe injuries were received on each side, and one or two fatalities occurred; but it is a mere party exaggeration to call the day 'Bloody Sunday.'

Bloody Sword (The). In Hungary a bloody sword used to be carried through the land to rouse the people to arms in cases of great national danger. Thus Bela IV., in 1246, caused 'the bloody sword to be carried through the land according to ancient custom,' when threatened by inroads of the Mongols. The Scotch sent round a 'fiery cross' (q.v.). The Parisians ring the tocsin.

Bloody Theatre of Eperjes (The), 1684–1687. A permanent scaffold erected in the middle of the town of Eperjes, in Hungary, for the torture and execution of Hungarians suspected of being hostile to the government of Kaiser Leopold of Germany. Thirty executioners, dressed in green uniform, were employed night and day in torturing, mutilating, and beheading the victims. Count Caraffa, a foreign general of sanguinary disposition, was president of the tribunal established at Eperjes for the mockery trial of the accused. It sat from March to the end of the year, and only poverty and obscurity escaped its persecution (Godkin, 'Hist. of Hungary,' p. 234).

Bloody Thumb. This was the brand of the Irish 'National League' (q.v.).

Bloody Tower (The). So called in the reign of Elizabeth from the tradition that the two young princes were murdered there. In the reign of Henry VII. it was called the 'Garden Tower.'

Bloody Tribunal of Eperjes (The), 1684–1687. When Hungary was rescued from the Turks after their disaster before Vienna, Caraffa, a military commander, was appointed to reinstate the Hungarian owners. The first question Caraffa asked was whether the applicant was of the new faith (Lutheranism); if so, he was instantly put to death. This bloody tribunal was abolished by the diet which met at the opening of the year 1687.

Bloody Wedding (The). The wedding of Henri (afterwards Henri IV. of France) with Marguerite (daughter of Catharine de' Medici). So called because it was made the occasion of the wholesale massacre of the French Huguenots, generally called 'The massacre of St. Bartholomew's Eve.'

Blue. The Sikhs wear blue, even blue turbans; but all other Hindûs reckon blue unlucky.

Blue (True). True Blue principles, i.e. Toryism; but in 'Hudibras' we read of 'Presbyterian true blue.'

Sir Stafford O'Brien one night exclaimed in the House of Commons, 'There is no "True Blue" now. There are many Tories, but no "True Blues."'—Sir W. HARCOURT, 24 Oct., 1885.

Blue and Red Hoods (The). 'Mi-partie bleus et rouges,' 1356, during the captivity of Jean le Bon, was the faction livery of the dauphin (afterwards Charles V.). In 1358, on the death of the provost Marcel, this faction fell away. See 'Blue Hoods.'

Blue and White. The Whig cockade, in some counties. Hence the well-known song and tune 'Come wave your blue and white.'

Blue and Yellow (The). The 'Edinburgh Review' is so called from its cover, which is blue with a yellow back.

The Blue and Yellow speaks out with its old directness.—Newspaper paragraph, Jan. 1886.

Blue and Yellow Robes. In China. All the twelve sects wear blue robes in China; but the followers of Lamaism wear yellow robes, the imperial colour, because Lamaism was promulgated by a son-in-law of the emperor.

Yellow is also worn by Buddhist monks of the southern countries.

Bluebeard. So Giles, marquis of Laval, the French general, was called. It is said that he put to death seven of his mistresses 'to aid his incantations with their blood.' This debauched and licentious villain was at last burnt alive at Nantes by order of the Duc de Bretagne, 1440. (Nantes, pronounce Nahnt.)

Blue Bellies. The Federals were so called by the Confederates in the civil war of America, from the light blue cloaks worn by the northern soldiers. See 'Greybacks.'

Blue Blanket (The). The blue standard or banner of the incorporated trades of Edinburgh. When the tradesmen thought themselves aggrieved, they unrolled their standard, and the people used to say, 'Up goes the Blue Blanket;' in other words, the tradesmen are rallying their forces to resist the powers which they think have aggrieved them. It was originally called 'The Banner of the Holy Ghost;' but James III. changed its name into 'The Standard of the Crafts within Burgh.'

Blue Blood and Pigeon's Blood. 'Sangue blò' and 'Sangue colombin.' The blue blood in Venice were the wealthiest of the nobility, termed I Signori; the pigeon's blood were the poorest of the nobility, termed I Barnaboti, from the quarter San Barnabo where they resided.

There was an intervening class sometimes called Morèi di Mézzo.

 The Spaniards are especially proud of their blue blood when they can trace their pedigree to the Goths.

Blue Bonnets over the Border. The reference is to the Covenanters in the year 1640, passing into England against Charles I. The whole of the infantry wore the Lowland blue bonnet.

Blue Book (The), of America, is similar to the English Red Book. It contains lists of all persons under government in the civil, military, and naval departments, including the law offices. Called blue from the blue wrapper.

Blue Books. I. Parliamentary reports, but not statutes. All command-papers, all returns such as import duties, export duties, returns of the names of members of parliament, all official statements, statements of accounts, &c. in Great Britain, whether in a blue wrapper or without a wrapper, are so called. Thin documents have no cover, thick ones have a blue wrapper. Blue is the only colour recognised by the British parliament.

The official colour in Spain is red, in Italy green, in France yellow (livres jaunes), in Germany and Portugal white.

N.B.—The reports sent annually to the colonial secretary by the governors of our colonies are officially called 'blue books.'

II. The blue books quoted by Butler are three books, stitched in dark blue wrappers, which appeared in 1789, 1791, and 1792. Charles Butler wrote the whole of the first and third, and most of the second. They contain scandalous doctrines, which no Catholic would allow. Copies may be seen in the British Museum.

Blue Boy (Gainsborough's). Master Jonathan Buttall (1779) (Gainsborough died 1788). Buttall's father was an ironmonger, 31 Greek Street, Soho, and died 1768. The 'Blue Boy' succeeded to the business, and carried it on till 1796, when he sold it to Sharpe and Coxe. The famous picture of the Blue Boy is in the Devonshire collection.

Blue Cap (The). In England a blue cap with a white border in the civil wars was the 'cap of liberty,' or anti-royalism. Britannia on some coins is represented holding such a cap on the point of her spear.

Blue-coat School (The). A familiar designation of Christ's Hospital; so called from the long blue coat worn by the boys. Founded 26 June, 1553, by Edward VI. (the year of his death).

Blue Cockades, 1780. The badge of the Protestant association. In the Gordon riots everyone who wished to go abroad unmolested wore blue in some part of their dress.

Lord George Gordon appeared in the House wearing a blue cockade. Colonel Herbert, on seeing this, declared that he would not sit and vote in the House while he saw a noble lord with the ensign of riot in his hat; and that if his lordship would not take it out, he himself would step across the House and do it for him. Lord George quietly took the cockade from his hat and put it in his pocket.—HOWITT, Hist of England, George III., p. 249.

Blue Flag (A). A warning of danger in the Roman Empire. Livy speaks of it in his 'Annals.'

Blue Flagellants (The). So called from their blue mantles. See 'Flagellants,' and 'Blancs Battus.'

Blue Friars (The), 1829–1846. A convivial and intellectual society of Plymouth, numbering many men of note. Charles Mathews, the elder, was member and was called 'Brother Prism.'

Blue-gowns. King's bedesmen, or licensed beggars who wore blue gowns. Called in Scotland gaberlunzies. See 'Thiggers and Sorners.'

Blue Hats (The), 1356–1358. The Navarrese party organised by Marcel, provost of Paris, during the captivity of Jean le Bon in England. The object of the provost was to place Charles le Mauvais on the throne. See 'Blue Hoods.'

Marcel, entering the palace without any regard to the dauphin, seized the two marshals and put them to death so close to the prince, that his dress was sprinkled with their blood. 'How now,' cried the dauphin, 'will you shed the blood royal of France?' 'No!' cried Marcel, and so saying he rudely snatched from the dauphin's head the embroidered hat of a pale rose colour, put it on his own head, and clapped his own blue hat on the dauphin's head. Through all the day the provost went about Paris with the dauphin's hat.—HOWITT, History of England, vol. i., p. 395.

Blue Hens. The natives of Delaware, one of the United States of North America. Captain Caldwell, an officer in the 1st Delaware regiment in the American War of Independence, was very fond of game cocks, but maintained that no cock was truly game, unless its mother was a blue hen. As the Delaware regiment was truly game, they were the sons of blue hens.

Blue Hoods. The party badge of Navarre; red hoods, the party badge of Paris; blue and red, the party badge of Charles [V.], when dauphin; white hoods, the party badge of the Burgundians.

Blue Laws. The code of 1660, a compilation of the earliest laws and customs of Connecticut. It is almost verbally copied from the Mosaic Law. After the restoration of Charles II. 'Presbyterian true blue' became a term of derision applied to anything which smattered of Puritanism, and 'blue laws' simply meant puritanical laws, or laws with a blue tinge. These laws inflicted the penalty of death for worshipping any god but the God of the Bible; for speaking disrespectfully of the Bible, Christ, or the Holy Ghost; for witchcraft, adultery, theft, false-swearing, and disobedience to parents. Said to have been drawn up by the Rev. Samuel Peters, but generally supposed to be apocryphal.

Blue-light Federalists. Those Americans who befriended the English in 1812, by giving them blue-light signals.

Bluemantle. One of the four pursuivants of England. See 'Pursuivants.'

Blue Monday. St. Crispin's Day. This is the German 'der blaue Montag.' Not 25 Oct., but holiday Monday, the day of 'blue looks.'

Blue Moon. Once in a blue moon, occasionally, but very seldom. In the second week of Dec. 1883 we had green, purple, and blue moons: on the 7th green, on the 10th blue. The sunset clouds were also unusually brilliant and deep-coloured. 2 Sept., 1883, the sun at Trinidad was blue, and at Panama it was green.

In England the winter 1883-4 was unusually mild and the wind south-west.

Blue Noses. The Nova Scotians are so called from a potato which they rear in great perfection, and term 'Blue Noses.'

Blue Pedigrees. Pedigrees concocted for rich nobodies by professional genealogists. Mr. Wray of Philadelphia tells us ('Notes and Queries,' 23 Jan., 1886, p. 74), that 'genealogical publications are searched for the names of families desiring information, and suitable pedigrees are constructed for them out of the visitations and county histories, and are duplicated by . . . the "blue print" process.'

Blue Ribbon Army, or 'Blue Ribbonites,' or 'Blue Ribboners.' Teetotallers who bear as a badge a small piece of blue ribbon, to remind all who see it that they drink no alcoholic liquor.

Blue Ribbon of the Turf (The). So Disraeli, Lord Beaconsfield, called the Derby. To win the great Derby horse-race is the greatest achievement of the year in the estimation of the turf.

The 'cordon bleu' was the ribbon worn by the knights of the 'St. Esprit,' the highest order in France, as the blue garter is the highest distinction in British knighthood.

Blue Ring (The). This was a sapphire ring which Lady Scrope let down from the window of the queen's chamber to announce to her brother, Robert Carey (afterwards earl of Monmouth) the death of Queen Elizabeth. The moment he caught it he galloped off to Scotland as fast as possible, to be the first to announce the welcome news to the expecting James.

Blue Sisters (The) 1604. The Celestial Annunciades, a religious order instituted by Maria Vittoria Fornari. So called from their blue mantles. The Annunciades of Jeanne de Valois wear a blue simar, but white mantle.

Blue Skins. The Presbyterians were so called after the restoration of Charles II., blue meaning puritanical. Anything smattering of roundheadism, whether laws, institutions, sects, persons, or what not, was called in derision blue, that is, tinged with 'Presbyterian blue.'

Joseph Blake, an English burglar, was called 'Blue-skin' from his complexion. He was executed in 1723.

Blue Stocking Club (The). Established in London in 1780. It was a society of literary ladies which lasted up to 1840. The members were supposed to wear blue stockings, and two ladies (Montagu and Stillingfleet) are said to have given name to the society. Probably it was in imitation of the 'Società della Calza' of Venice (1400–1590).

Similar clubs have been adopted both in Germany and France. Indeed the French 'bas-bleu' is as often heard as the phrase 'blue-stocking' to designate a female literary pedant.

Blue Waiters. At one time waiters were dressed in blue, the badge of servitude, but the badge was discontinued in the reign of James I. Frequent reference to the blue coats of servant men will be found in old plays.

Blues (The). I. 'Les Bleus,' in the Vendean war, were the republican soldiers, so called by the royalists on account of the colour of their uniforms. See 'Whites.'

II. the police, so called from being dressed in blue. Also called the 'Blue Foot-guard.' Of course the 'wit' lies in the allusion to the 'Blue Guards.'

Blues and Greens (The). In Latin 'Venĕti et Prasini.' Charioteer factions at Byzantium. The Venĕta factio wore a light blue livery; the Prasĭna factio wore a leek-green livery (Greek prason, a leek). The Emperor Justinian was a Blue, and the two factions became political. In 532 the Greens revolted, proclaimed Prince Hypatius emperor in the circus, and waylaid Justinian in his palace. Belisarius and Mundus repelled the rebels, but more than 30,000 persons fell in the sedition. Hypatius, being taken, was beheaded and his body thrown into the Bosphorus. This sedition was called the Nika, the rallying word of the insurgents.

Venëtus means Venice blue, the colour of the common soldiers and seamen of Rome. There were two subordinate factions, the white and the red, but the white merged into the blue and the red into the green.

Blues and the Lilacs (The). Two rival court parties in the reign of François I. The Blues were the partisans of Diane de Poitiers, mistress of Henri the dauphin, afterwards Henri II. The Lilacs were the partisans of Madame d'Etampes, mistress of the king. Both king and dauphin had a wife living at the time. Madame d'Etampes was nine years the younger. She died at the age of 67, her rival died at the age of 68.

Blues, Reds, and Whites (The), in the first French Revolution. Balzac tells us in 'Le dernier Chouan:' 'Dans ces temps de discordes, les habitans de l'ouest avaient appelé tous les soldats de la république des bleus,' because their 'premiers uniformes étaient bleus et rouges.' A Bleu, therefore, in 1793, was a republican, in opposition to a royalist or Vendean, who wore the White royal uniform. Dumas tells us, in his 'Vingt Ans après,' that 'blue and red is the livery of Paris.' The French tricolour is the combination of republican blue, the city of Paris, and the Bourbon white.

Bluff City. The city Hannibal, in Missouri (North America).

Bluff Harry. Henry VIII., who affected a bluntess of speech and manner, and delighted in being so called.

Blunden. The thrice-buried Mrs. Blunden. Mrs. Blunden was buried at Basingstoke; but some of the boys of the neighbouring grammar-school, hearing a noise underground, ran to tell their master. The coffin was disinterred, the body was found to be alive. Proper means being applied, life was fully restored, and Mrs. Blunden continued to live for several years. A second time she fell into a trance and was buried, and sounds underground again attracted attention; the coffin was again disinterred, and it was found that the flesh had been gnawed from one of the hands by the teeth of the buried lady. Means were tried to restore life, but without success, and Mrs. Blunden was buried for the third time.

Lazarus and many others were twice buried.

Boabdil. A corruption of Bu-abdad, which is a contraction of Abu-Abdallah. This Moorish prince of Granada was called 'Assaghir' (small, insignificant). His mother Ayesha said of him, when he was driven out of Spain in 1492: 'My son, you have cause to weep like a woman, who defended not your throne either as a monarch or a man.' It was probably this littleness, and not diminutive stature, which procured him the sobriquet of Assaghir.

Board Schools, 1870. National or parish schools under a school board or a board of directors, and supported by rates. Religious instruction forms no part of the curriculum. These schools are under government inspectors and receive government grants per capita, according to a scale of merit given in the inspector's report. Every parish or group of parishes must have either a voluntary school or a board school.

A voluntary school is not supported by a rate, but by voluntary contributions, children's pence, and a government grant. It is inspected by a government inspector, and those connected with the Church of England are also under diocesan inspection.

Board of Admiralty (The). A government department which has the management of all matters concerning the British navy.

Board of Control (The), 1784. A committee of commissioners for managing the affairs of India. Abolished 1858 (21, 22 Vict. c. 106).

Board of Green Cloth (The). Consisting of the lord steward and several inferior officers. Their duty was to punish offenders within the verge of the palace and within 200 yards beyond the gates. So called because the board or table at which they sat was covered with a green cloth. It existed in the reign of Henry I., probably even earlier. Abolished 1849 (12, 13 Vict. c. 101).

Board of Ordnance (The). A government department to which is committed the management of all matters relating to the artillery and engineering corps of the British army.

Board of Trade (The), 1786. Has the control of all matters pertaining to our colonial trade and all matters pertaining to our mercantile marine, all railways in the United Kingdom, the fisheries, harbours, weights and measures, statistics, electric lighting, &c. All charters for incorporation are referred to this board; the Privy Council on education is under its control, &c. The board consists of a president and vice-president, the lord chancellor, the archbishop of Canterbury, the first lord of the treasury, the chief secretaries of state, the speaker, and several others.

It originated in 1660, when Charles I. created a council for trade and a council for foreign plantations; but the present constitution dates from the reign of George III.

Board of Triers (The), March 1653. A committee, one-fourth being laymen, appointed by Cromwell to try or examine the fitness of candidates to hold livings or take part in the church services.

Cromwell also appointed a church board in every county to see that the clergy did their duty, and to remove those who were inefficient or evil examples.

Board of Works (The), 1851. Constituted by the Metropolitan Management Act. It had control over the streets of London, the line of buildings, the fire brigade, the gas, drainage, bridges, parks, and commons; the tramways, artisans' dwellings, slaughter-houses, theatres, and music-halls, &c. The fifty-nine members of the board were elected by the respective vestries; the corporation and city of London used to elect three of them. Abolished 1889.

Boarian, or Borome'an Tribute. A heavy mulct imposed by Tuathal, over-king of Ireland, on the province of Leinster for the infamous conduct of their ruler Achy. This continued from the 2nd to the 7th cent., but was dropped in 693, though the intercession of St. Moling. So called from bo, a cow, because beeves formed the medium of tribute. See 'Fine of Leinster.

The offence was this. Achy married a daughter of Tuathal; but tiring of his wife, he went to Tara and brought home his wife's younger sister as a bride. When the bride discovered that her sister was living, she died of the shock, and the sister pined to death a few weeks after.

'This brutal sacrilege the monarch punished by putting twelve of the Lagenian chieftains to death, and exacting rigorously the Boarian tribute from the province to which they belonged.' T. MOORE, History of Ireland, vii., p. 133.

Boatswain Smith. G. C. Smith, pressed into the British navy in 1796, quitted the service in 1803; became pastor of a Baptist church at Penzance in 1807 (1782–1863).

Bobêche (2 syl.). A famous clown (1815–1825) who drew crowds to a small theatre on the Boulevard du Temple of Paris; his rival was Galimafré. Bobêche takes rank with the Tabarin and the Bruscambille (18th cent.). A comedian or farce-actor is complimentarily called 'un vrai Bobêche' in France. See 'Tabarin.'

Bocasoti. The same as 'Bizocii' (q.v.).

Bode's Law, of the relative distances of the planets from the sun.

Write 4 nine times.

Under the second write 8, and multiply by 2 throughout. Then add.

Thus:

4	4	4	4	4	4	4	4	4
	8	6	12	24	48	96	192	384
4	7	10	16	28	52	100	196	388
Mercury	Venus	Earth	Mars		Jupiter	Saturn	Uranus	Neptune

Between Mars and Jupiter is no planet, but Bode said there must be one in the gap, and the asteroids being discovered proved the correctness of the series.

Taking earth to be 10, the relative distances are (roughly) 3·9, 7·2, 10, 15·2, 27·4, 52, 95·4, 192, 300 (millions of miles).

Boden Scholarships. Four for Sanskrit. Value 50*l.* a year, and tenable for four years in the University of Oxford. Founded by Colonel Boden in 1830 and 1860.

Bodleian Library (The), 1597. The public library of Oxford restored by Sir Thomas Bodley on the site of the old University library, which had been despoiled of its contents in the reign of Edward VI. It has been added to by many magnificent gifts, and now contains above 256,000 volumes and 22,000 MSS. The Bodleian Library is one of the five depositories of copyright books. The corresponding institution in Cambridge is called the University Library.

Refounded by Sir Thomas Bodley (1597–1599). The new building commenced 17 July, 1610, and finished 1613. Augmented by the libraries of Richard Gough and Edmund Malone in 1812; and by that of Francis Douce in 1834.

Boece (Hector), or 'Boethius.' A literary romancer born at Dundee (1470– 1550). In his 'Scotorum Historia,' published in 1526, he has forged the names of forty-five Scotch kings with which he interpolated the Irish list of the Dalriadic rulers (i.e. kings of Argyllshire). See 'Literary Forgeries.'

Bœuf Gras (La marche du). The procession of the prize ox on Shrove Tuesday through the chief streets of Paris, introduced in the reign of Charles VIII. (1483–1498). The ox, with gilt horns and hoofs, a fillet on its head and decorated with ribbons, is led through the chief streets, accompanied by a host of followers dressed in ridiculous costumes, and bands of music playing on ridiculous instruments. The whole is a farcical imitation of Roman priests going to offer sacrifice. The butcher's expenses are paid by donations from ambassadors, noblemen, ministers, and wealthy citizens, on whom he calls to show his ox.

I have seen the procession six or eight times, but probably it is now (1890) shorn of its glory, if not abolished. Shrove Tuesday is called Mardi gras in French.
Bœuf Gras pronounce Buh-grah'.

Bœotian Confederacy (The). The confederacy of the fourteen independent states of Bœotia, with Thebes at the head. The chief magistrates of the league, called Bœotarchs, were elected annually, two for Thebes and one for each of the other states.

The number of Bœotarchs varied as the independent states were not constant; but fifteen may be roughly called the college of Bœotarchs.

Bogomiles or Bogarmitæ, 12th cent. Heretics of Bulgaria, who denied the Trinity, the resurrection, the institution of the sacraments, and holy orders. They were deists. The Emperor Alexis Comnēnus in 1118 burnt to death their leader. (Sing. Bogomil.)

Bog is the Sclavonic for 'God,' and mil is a corruption of miloti, 'have pity on us.'

Bohemian Brethren (The). The followers of Huss of Bohemia, 1457. Their great offence was allowing the cup to the laity, whence they were called 'chalice men.' They subsequently merged into the Moravians or 'United Brethren.' Their platform was: (1) the free preaching of the gospel; (2) the administration of the eucharist in both kinds; (3) the separation of the clergy from all secular pursuits; and (4) the punishment of the clergy by the civil courts.

Böhmenists. See 'Rehmenists.'

Boiling to death. By 22 Henry III., c. 9, it was enacted that poisoners should be boiled to death. The law was repealed by 1 Edward VI. c. 12.

Bolden Book (The). The book containing the survey of the see of Durham, made in 1183 by order of the Bishop de Pusay. So called because the parish of Bolden is the first mentioned in the survey. It begins thus:

Incipit liber qui vocatur Bolden Book, Anno Dominice Incarnationis, 1183.
It is a small folio, and is kept in the auditor's office at Durham.

Bolivia (in South America). So called after Simon Bolivar, who liberated several of the South American provinces from Spain in 1824.

Bollandists. The compilers of the numerous folio volumes of the 'Acta Sanctōrum' (q.v.). So called from Father John Bolland, who with ten coadjutors brought out the first 32 volumes folio, and completed the first series. Reorganised at Brussels in 1837, and the 54th volume was published in 1845. The 57th volume brings down the hagiography to 1855; the 61st to 1875.

The first five vols. contained Jan. in two vols. (1643), and Feb. in three vols. (1658). The 53rd vol. appeared in 1794.
'Les Petites Bollandistes' is a French hagiography by Mgr. Paul Guérin in 17 large octavo vols., the 7th edition of which was published in 1880. The last vol. is all index.

Bolleghe, pl. Bolleghes. The herdsman and his herd in Ireland living on the mountains. The usage is called Bollinge.

Bologna (Treaty of), 1 Jan., 1530. A treaty of peace between Venice and Charles V. Charles abandoned to Venice all his conquests in Lombardy, and Venice gave up to Charles the Neapolitan ports.

Bolton Quarter. Instant death without mercy.

2 May, 1644 Bolton was taken. Colonel R.'s forces routed, and many a sweet saint slain. No quarter would be given, so that Bolton Quarter grew into a proverb.—ISAAC AMBROSE, Media or Middle Things, 1650, p. 72.

Bomba. A sobriquet of Ferdinand II. of Naples and Sicily, so called from his savage bombardment of Messina in Sept. 1848.

Bombalino, or 'Bomba II.' Francis II. of Naples, who bombarded Palermo in 1860. He was the son of Ferdinand II., nicknamed 'King Bomba' (q.v.).

Bombay (in Hindustan). A corruption of the native name into the Portuguese Bom-bahia, the good bay (1509).

Bona Dea. Called by the Romans Fauna, who revealed her oracles to women only, and no man was permitted to be present at her mysteries. There was a similar deity, named Faunus, exclusively confined to the other sex. Publius Clodius, in the house of Cæsar, violated the sanctuary of Bona Dea, and was brought to trial, but he was acquitted by bribery (Cicero, 'Att.' i. 12).

Bonaght (Ireland). An exaction imposed at the pleasure of the lord for the maintenance of his soldiers. There were two sorts, viz. Bonaght-bur and Bonaght-beg. The first was free quarters at discretion, the latter was a money commutation. See 'Coygne and Livery.'

Bonaparte's Egyptian campaign, 1799. Alexandria fell into his hands; he won the great battle of the Pyramids; completed the subjugation of Egypt; passed into Syria, made himself master of Gaza and Jaffa; won the battle of Mount Tabor; returned to Egypt, attacked the Turks at Aboukir, and utterly destroyed their whole army, 25 June, 1799.

Bonaparte's Italian campaign, 1796–7. He was 27 years of age.

11 April, he defeated Beaulieu, the Austrian general, at Montenotte, in Sardinia.

14 April, he won the battle of Millesimo.

15 April, he won the battle of Dego.

22 April, he won a victory over the Piedmontese at Mondŏvi.

10 May, he defeated the Austrian general Beaulieu at the Bridge of Lodi, and entered Milan.

19 June, he occupied Bologna, Ferrara, and Ancona.

3 Aug., he defeated the Austrian general Würmser at Lonato.

5 Aug., he defeated the same general at Castiglione.

8 Sept., he defeated him again at Bassano.

17 Nov., he won the great battle of Arcŏla over Alvinzi, the Austrian general.

14 Jan., 1797, he won the battle of Rivoli over Alvinzi and Würmser.

15 Jan., he won a battle at the faubourg of St. George, near Mantua.

16 Jan., he won a battle near the palace called The Favourite.

16 March, he defeated the Austrians led by the Archduke Karl at Tagliamento.

17 Oct., the treaty of Campo Formio, and in December he returned to France.

He had won 15 battles; added Savoy and Nice to France, the Netherlands and Italy; had obtained vast money compensations, and returned to France laden with treasures of art.

Bonaparte's Forty Days' Campaign. He left Paris 6 May, 1800; marched over the Alps, and reached Aosta 23 May; he entered Milan 2 June; won the battle of Montebello over the Austrians 9 June, and the great battle of Marengo, 14 June; returned to Paris 2 July.

The 40 days count from his arrival at Aosta, 23 May, to his return to Paris, 2 July.

Bones, or St. Hugh's bones. Dice. 'To rattle the bones,' to play dice. The St. Hugh referred to is St. Hugh of Lincoln, whose teeth were knocked out by Jews when he was crucified in mockery of the crucified Saviour. Of course this statement is given only as a tradition, and not as an historic fact.

Bonfire of Vanities (The). In Florence, 1493. Savonarola had such effect by his preaching on the people of Florence, that women, gay gallants, and grave scholars, went in throngs, and threw into a vast bonfire before the gates of the cathedral whole hecatombs of poems, works of fiction, and other works of art, and burnt them, after the example of the men and women of Ephesus (Acts xix. 19).

Bonnet-piece (A gold). A gold coin of James V. of Scotland, and the most beautiful of all Scottish coins. So called because the head of the king is represented wearing a bonnet instead of a crown.

Bonnet Rouge (Un). A red republican was so called from the red cap of liberty worn by him.

Bonnet Vert. Prendre le bonnet vert, to become a bankrupt. Alluding to an old law which compelled bankrupts to wear a green cap. This custom continued down to the 17th cent.

Bononcinists, 1720–1730. A musical faction in London opposed to the Handelists. The Prince of Wales led the Handel party, supported by Pope and Dr. Arbuthnot; the Duke of Marlborough led the Bononcinists, supported by many others of the nobility. For about twelve years the Italian school was so strongly supported that Handel could not resist the tide; but in 1742 his popularity returned.

Bonzes. Priests of Fo, founder of a reformed Buddhism in China. Born about B.C. 1027. He taught the equality of man; the love of others; the love of truth; honest dealing; the sin of murder; abstention from all intoxicating drinks; the love of purity; recompense or punishment after life according to one's deeds. Bonzes live in monasteries.

Book. I. The first book printed in German (1461) was the 'Edelstein' (or 'precious stone') by Ulrich Boner. A collection of fables, tales, and maxims in reproof of evil ways and for the encouragement of piety and virtue.

The first printed book was the Psalter of Mainz, 1457; the next was William Durand's 'Holy Office' ('Rationale divinorum officiorum libris viii distinctum'), printed 1459; the third was Balbis's 'Catholicon, a sort of dictionary, 1460'; then comes the 'Edelstein,' in German.

II. The highest price ever offered for a book was 20,000*l.* It was a Hebrew Bible in the possession of the Vatican. In 1512, the Jews of Venice wished to buy this book, but though Julius II. was greatly pressed for money in order to keep up the Holy League against Louis XII. of France, he declined to part with the volume.

The German Government paid 10,000*l.* for the missal given by Leo X. to Henry VIII., along with the parchment conferring on him the right to assume the title of 'Defender of the Faith.' Charles II. gave these relics to the ancestor of the famous Duke of Hamilton, whose library was sold by Messrs Sotheby, Wilkinson, and Hodge of London.

III. The largest book on one subject is the 'Acta Sanctorum' of the Bollandists, not yet completed (1890). The 51st vol. was published in 1875.

IV. The oldest book in the world is a papyrus containing the proverbs of Ptah-hotep, an Egyptian king, who reigned some 3000 B.C., which was before the birth of Abraham. It has been in part translated by Chabas and others; and may be seen in English dress in J. D. Heath's 'Record of the Patriarchal Age.'

Book of Advertisement (The), 1565. The book containing the canons and articles drawn up by the Court of Ecclesiastical Commission appointed by Queen Elizabeth. The object of the book was to secure uniformity of doctrine and discipline throughout the realm.

Sampson, dean of Christchurch, and Humphrey, regius professor of divinity at Oxford, with many others, refused to conform, and were called Non-conformists.

Book of Common Order (The), 1562. A liturgy drawn up by John Knox for the use of the Scotch church. It was in general use for nearly a century, and contained forms for the Sunday services, for week days, for the sacraments, and for some other occasions. The people took no part in the liturgy.

All saints days were ignored.

Book of Common Prayer (The). Based on the 'King's Primer' (q.v.), was published by Henry VIII. in 1546. In the reign of Edward VI. it underwent two revisions, and 'The Second Prayer Book of Edward VI.' approaches very near to the one now used in the Church of England. In the reign of James I. was introduced a collect in the daily morning and evening service, the prayer for the Royal Family in the Litany, and that part of the catechism about the sacraments. It was revised in 1662, and from time to time special prayers have been introduced which are not now included in the Common Prayer Book.

Cranmer appointed in 1548 twelve commissioners to assist him in compiling the Book of Common Prayer in the reign of Edward VI. They were Goodrich (bishop of Ely), Holbeach (bishop of Lincoln), Day (bishop of Chichester), Skip (bishop of Hereford), Thurlby (bishop of Westminster), Ridley (bishop of Rochester), May (dean of St. Paul's), Taylor (dean of Lincoln), Haynes (dean of Exeter), Redmayn (master of Trinity, Cambridge), Coxe (dean of Christ Church, Oxford), and Robertson (archdeacon of Leicester).

The service books consulted by them were these eleven: the Antiphonārium, the Finale, the Graduale or Grayle, the Legenda, the Manuale, the Missal, the Ordinale, the Pica or Pie, the Pontificale, the Portiforium or Breviary, and the Processionale. Cranmer presided.

Book of Discipline (The), 1560. A digest of the forms by which the reformed church in Scotland was to be governed. Both in doctrine and discipline the church was modelled on the Geneva or Calvinistic plan.

Book of Leinster (The). An Irish MS. compiled 1000–1100.

Book of Mormon (The), 1830. The 'revealed' history of America from its first settlement by a colony dispersed at the confusion of tongues to the 5th cent. of the Christian era. Joseph Smith professed that this information was obtained by him in September 1827 in a volume of metal plates engraved in reformed Egyptian, and discovered by revelation 'on the west side of a hill, not far from the top, about four miles from Palmyra, in the county of Ontario.' As Smith could not decipher the writing, a pair of magic spectacles, which he called his Urim and Thummim, were given to him, and one Oliver Cowdery wrote down on paper what Smith professed to translate. It is said that the 'Book' is a mere plagiary of a MS. romance by the Rev. Solomon Spalding in 1816. Certainly the plates and spectacles have disappeared. See 'Literary Forgeries.'

Book of Sentences (The). By Pierre Lombard (1100–1164). A compilation of the leading arguments of the fathers upon moot points of divinity, arranged and digested under heads. Above 244 commentators have written annotations on this book; among others, Thomas Aquīnas, Guillaume Durand, St. Bonaventure, &c.

Book of Sports (The), 1618. A declaration issued by James I. of England, signifying his pleasure that on Sundays, after divine service, 'no lawful recreation should be barred to his good people.' The sports more especially mentioned were dancing, archery, leaping, vaulting, May-games, Whitsun-ales, morrice-dances, and setting up of Maypoles. The declaration was appointed to be read in the parish churches. In 1633 the declaration was again published. In 1644 the Long Parliament ordered all copies of the declaration to be burned. It was again reprinted in Arber's 'English Garner.'

The following sports were forbidden on Sundays: bear and bull baiting, bowling, and interludes. Those who had not attended church were forbidden to join in the sports, and no one could go out of his parish to join the sports of another parish.

Book of Torgau (The), 1576. A famous confession of faith by the Reformers, the object of which was to produce unity and uniformity among the divergent sects. From this was developed 'The formula of concord' (1580).

Booted Mission (The). 'La Mission bottée,' the dragonnade of Louis XIV. Trench, speaking of the Ephesian Church, refers to 'the French Protestant refugees, who had found shelter from the dragonnades, the "Mission bottée," as it is so facetiously called by some Roman Catholic writers, of Louis XIV.' ('Commentary on the Epistles to the Seven Churches of Asia,' p. 73.)

None of the infinite abuses which might arise from this 'Mission bottée' (as the rude and fierce body of instructors were called, either in bitter sportiveness or contempt) was likely to be diminished by the temper of the officer to whom its direction was entrusted.—SMEDLEY, History of the Reformed Religion in France, vol. iii. p. 250, chap. xxiv., of A.D. 1681.

Boot-jack. John, earl of Bute (1713–1792); a pun on John-Bute, whence Jack-Bute, and by metathesis Boot-jack.

Booth's Expedition (Felix), 1829. He equipped the 'Victory' steamer at his own cost and sent it under the command of Captain Ross to discover whether there is a north-west passage from the Atlantic to the Pacific. Mr. Booth has his name perpetuated in the words Boothia, Boothiana, and Point Felix; and William IV. made him a baronet; but no passage could be discovered. Captain Ross returned in 1832.

Border (The). The frontier of England and Scotland. The Tweed for about sixteen miles, the Cheviot hills for about twenty-five miles, then the Kershope Water (a tributary of the Esk), then the 'Debatable Land' and the river Sark, to the Solway Firth.

Border-thief School (The). Those novelists who took for their heroes border thieves, or for their subjects the adventures of border chiefs. Sir W. Scott and his poetical imitators are meant.

With your Lake Schools, and Border-thief Schools, and Cockney and Satanic Schools, there has been enough to do.—CARLYLE.

The 'Lake School,' such as Wordsworth, Southey, and Coleridge, who 'haunted the lakes of Cumberland' and Westmoreland.
The 'Cockney School,' such as Leigh Hunt, Hazlitt, Shelley, Keats, &c.
The 'Satanic School,' such as Byron, Moore, Bulwer, Rousseau, Victor Hugo, Paul de Kock, and George Sand. So called because they show no deference to the conventionalities of religion and morals.

Border Warrant (A). A warrant issued by a Scotch sheriff or county-court judge to arrest a debtor on the English side, and detain him till he produces bail for his appearance when called on within six months.

Borgites (2 syl.), or 'Bordjites.' A dynasty of Mamelukes in Egypt (1382–1517), which succeeded the Baharites (3 syl.). Every one of these rulers, except Barkuk the founder, was either deposed or met with a violent death. Touman-Bey (the last of them) was hanged by Selim, sultan of the Ottomans.

Boromé (The), or Leinster tribute. An annual tribute paid by the King of Leinster to Tuathal, overlord of Ireland, for causing the death of Tuathal's two daughters, whom he had inveigled into his power under the promise of marriage.

Boromean Tribute (The). See 'Boarian.'

His (Leogaire's) war upon the Lagenians, or people of Leinster, to enforce the payment of the Boromean tribute, seems worthy of notice.—T. MOORE, Hist. of Ireland, xi. 252.

Borough English. The law by which the youngest son is the heir, from the supposition that he is less able to maintain himself than his elder brothers.

Borough-mongers. A term applied by Cobbett to those who were 'mongers' of boroughs; that is, had property in parliamentary seats, which seats they could sell or bestow on whom they thought proper.

Borrome'o (Charles), archbishop of Milan, and Augustin Valerio, bishop of Verona, have won to themselves immortal fame by their intrepidity in visiting the plague-stricken in 1576. This terrible pest depopulated Venice, Verona, Milan, and Trent. The great Titian fell a victim to it. It was attributed to the miasma rising from stagnant water and bad drainage. See 'Plagues,' &c.

We have an Englishman fully worthy of being placed with these philanthropists. During the great plague of London in 1665, Sir John Lawrence, then Lord Mayor, continued the whole time in the city; heard complaints and redressed grievances. The day after the disease was known to be the plague, 40,000 servants were dismissed and turned into the streets, for no one would take them in. Sir John supported them all at first from his own private fortune, till subscriptions came in to help him in his benevolent work.—Journal of the Plague, printed by E. Nutt, 1722.
Query.—Is there a statue to this great man in the City? If not, for the honour of our Lord Mayors, there ought to be. The John Lawrence in Westminster cloisters was a 'short-hand writer.' I can call to mind no public monument to one of the greatest of England's worthies.

Boscobel. So celebrated for the concealment of Charles II., was originally the property of a Mr. Giffard, who built there a small mansion, which he called 'Bosco-bello,' fair wood. When Charles took refuge there the farmer's name was Penderell.

Bosphorus (The). Means the ox or cow ford. So called because Io, transported into a cow, forded or swam across it. So, at least, we are told in Grecian fable.

Bosporic Era (The). Commenced B.C. 297.

Boston Bard (The). Robert S. Coffin, born in Boston, Massachusetts (1797–1857).

Boston Massacre (The), 5 March, 1770. A ridiculously grand phrase for a petty squabble between the British soldiers quartered in Boston and the men employed in Gray's rope-walk. Some of the soldiers mockingly asked to be employed in the rope-walk; a row ensued, which was renewed for two or three days, and at last some of the officers drew up a company of soldiers to overawe the men. The workmen began to taunt the 'lobsters,' and struck one of them. The soldiers fired. Three of Gray's men fell and eight were wounded. The funeral of the three men was made a public protest, and its anniversary was kept for 14 years.

Boston News Letter (The). Appeared 24 April, 1704. It was the first American newspaper.

Boston Port Bill (The), March 1774. A bill by Lord North to take away from Boston (Massachusetts) the customs, the courts of justice, and the government offices, and transfer them to New Salem, in consequence of the rebellion of the Bostonians, especially their wanton destruction of tea to the value of 18,000*l.*, to show their hatred of England.

Boston Tea-party (The), 16 Dec., 1773. Those citizens of Boston who, disguised as Indians, boarded the three English ships, which had just come into the harbour, and threw into the sea several hundred chests of tea, by way of protest against English taxation of America without a representation in parliament.

Botany (Father of). Tournefort (1656–1708).

Botany (Professorship of). In the University of Cambridge, 1724, founded by the university. Stipend 800*l.* a year.

Botany Bay, 1770. So called by Captain Cook, who discovered, on entering the bay, the epăcris (a sort of heath), which, though very brilliant, will grow in the poorest soil.

Bottle Riot (The), 1822. In Dublin theatre. Someone (12 June, 1822) daubed the equestrian statue of William III., on College Green, with lampblack. The Orangemen had been accustomed for many years to whitewash it and decorate it with yellow ribbons on the anniversary of the battle of the Boyne (1 July, 1690). As these pranks caused great riots, the Marquis of Wellesley, the lord-lieutenant, forbade any unauthorised person to interfere with the statue at all. This offended the Orangemen, who clubbed together to mob him in the theatre. During the National Anthem, someone threw a bottle at the marquis; a riot ensued, and some of the offenders were prosecuted; but the bills were thrown out, and when government took the matter up, the jury would not agree, and the prosecution was dropped.

Bottomless Pitt (The). William Pitt (1759–1806), the statesman, a very thin man, with no 'fall' in his back.

Boulden Book (The). A book recording the inquisition made by Hugh Pudsey, bishop of Durham, in 1183, still extant. It shows that the villeins of Bolden held each thirty acres of land, which they paid for partly in service, partly in land, and partly in money. It is valuable for throwing light on the subject of villeinage in England in the 12th cent., and for other incidental information on the social state of the people.

Bourbon Dynasty, of France. Began with Henri IV. the Great, and continued in a direct line to the Revolution. Louis XVIII. and his brother Charles X. were also in the direct line. Louis Philippe was of the Orleans branch.

The Bourbons were descended from the sixth son of St. Louis, brother of Philippe III. The dynasty (with the interruption of the Revolution and Empire) continued from 1589 to 1848.

Bourbon Orleans branch of the Bourbon dynasty. Gave to France one king, Louis Philippe, called Le Roi Citoyen (1773, 1830–1848, died 1850).

Bourguignons (The), 1407. The faction of the Duke of Burgundy (Jean-sans-Peur), opposed to the Armagnacs or Orleanist party, during the imbecility of Charles VI. of France. The cognisance of the Bourguignons was a St. Andrew cross on a red scarf.

The cognisance of the Armagnacs was a St. George's cross on a white scarf.
Bourguignons (pronounce Boor-gwin'-yohn).
Armagnacs (pronounce Ah-man'-yaks).

Bow-street Runners (established 1749). Nicknamed Robin Redbreasts from their scarlet waistcoats. The Bow-street officers were a brave resolute set of men, nimble of foot like a proctor's 'bull-dog,' skilled to run down offenders and 'bring them to book.'

Bowdlerise. To expurgate a book in editing it. Dispatches are bowdlerised by government, or 'edited,' that objectionable statements may be omitted, before the dispatches are given to the public. Bowdler gave to the world an expurgated edition of Shakespeare's works, in which, as he tells us, 'nothing is added to the original text, but all words and expressions are omitted which cannot with propriety be read aloud in a family.' See 'Grangerise.'

Bowdlerite (A). An abridger, so called from Thomas Bowdler (1754–1825). The opposite of a Grangerite (q.v.).

We have also Bowdlerise, Bowdleriser, Bowdlerism, Bowdlerisation, &c.

Bowides (2 syl.) or 'Bouides,' 10th and 11th cents. A Mussulman dynasty, under the califs, in Irak Adjémi, in Persia, offspring of Bouyah of Dilem,

This Bouyah had three sons, viz. Imad-Eddaula, Rockn-Eddaula, and Moez-Eddaula, who rose to sovereign power, reigning at Bagdad and over Persia (932–1055). These three brothers were called the pillars of the state, and under their vigorous reign the language and genius of Persia revived. The Seljuks succeeded them.

The Bouides (2 syl.) were not shahs, but emirs.

Box-days, 1690. Two days (one in the spring and one in the autumn vacation) appointed by the Scotch judges of the Court of Session, when law papers may be filed.

For preventing [private solicitation], and for easeing the leidges themselves, and the lawyers, they . . . have appointed boxes for every one of the lords, to stand on a bank in the Session-house from 8 o'clk till 7 o'clk at night, each box having a slitt in which the informations or bills may be lett in, and cannot be drawn out untill the box be opened; the key whereof is to be kept by every judge himself, and to be committed to no other.

Boxers. There were two schools of boxing during the regency, the Bristol school and the Hebrew school, the chief exponents being Tom Cribb of Bristol and Mendoza the Jew. See 'Broughtonian.'

The chief boxers have been:
Jim Belcher (Bristolian), who had but one eye (champion), and Tom Belcher, his brother; Bendigo; Cohen; Thomas Cribb, the champion; Figg; Gardello, of the Hebrew school; Bob Gregson (the Pot of Pork); Gully; John C. Heenan, the Benicia Boy; Humphries; Gentleman Jackson (Lord Byron was his pupil); Jim Mace; Daniel Mendoza, the Jew; Molineux, the Negro; Oliver; Painter; Randal (the Nonpareil), noted for his pink cheeks; Caleb Rann (Mendoza's favourite pupil, and called the Pink [of Bow]; Richmond; Scroggins, a sailor; Tom Sayers (who fought the Benicia Boy in 1860); Cyrus Smalley (the Sprig of Myrtle), Cribb's favourite pupil; Spring, so called by Cribb, but his real name was Thomas Winter; Sutton; Tomkins; Jem Ward, the Nestor of the ring, &c.
Daniel Mendoza published in 1799 the 'Art of Boxing,' in which he gives particulars of his match with Humphries. The era of boxing was 1719–1860.

Boy Bachelor (The). Thomas [cardinal] Wolsey (1471–1530), of Magdalen College, Oxford. He took his degree before he was fifteen years of age. He told Sir William Cavendish that he was usually so called at Oxford.

Hugo Grotius, 1600, pleaded his first cause when only seventeen years of age; Francis Bacon, born 1561, entered Trin. Coll. Camb. at the age of twelve, and was called to the Bar before he was twenty-one. Edward Herbert matriculated at University College, Oxford, at the age of twelve.

Boy Bishop (The). Mentioned as early as 1290. Prohibited by the council of Sens in 1485. The election of a boy-bishop prohibited in England by proclamation in 1542 (reign of Henry VIII.). The election revived by an edict of the bishop of London, 13 Nov., 1554. Custom abolished by Queen Elizabeth in 1558

The boy-bishop was elected on St. Nicholas's Day (Dec. 6), and the office lasted till Holy Innocents Day (Dec. 28). He was chosen from the cathedral choir or grammar-school, and when elected was arrayed like a bishop, and, attended by his chapter, went about the streets blessing the people in ridicule. He took possession of the church and performed all services except mass.

Boy Bishops. A child of only five years old was made archbishop of Reims. The see of Narbonne was purchased for a boy of ten. See 'Boy Popes.' (Hallam, 'Middle Ages,' vol. ii. p. 248.)

Boy Crusades. See 'Child Pilgrimages.'

Boy Martyr (The). St. Pancras, who suffered martyrdom under Diocletian (293–303).

Boy Patriots (The), 1742. So Walpole, after his fall, called Pitt, Lyttelton, Grenville, and their party of ambitious young men opposed to him and his measures (temp. Geo. II.).

Boy Popes. John XII. was made pope at the age of eighteen (956–963). Benedict IX. was made pope at the age of ten (1033–1054). Both these lads were licentious, extravagant, and profligate. One died at the age of twenty-five, having been pope for seven years, and the other died at the age of thirty-one, having been pope for twenty-one years. See 'Boy Bishops.'

Boys (The). I. So Walpole called the young 'Patriot' faction (1733), at the head of which was the young cornet of horse, William Pitt, the future earl of Chatham. In 1739 Walpole was obliged to bow to the faction, and consent against his better judgment to a war policy, and in 1742 he was compelled to resign.

II. The Irish Land-leaguers (q.v.) are generally called 'The Boys.'

III. See 'Wonderful Boys.'

Boycott (To). To ostracise. A word adopted from a Mr. Boycott, who was ostracised in 1881 by the Irish Land League. The principle is old enough, as the proverbs Damner une boutique, and Damner une ville, will show.

One word as to the way in which a man should be boycotted. When any man has taken a farm from which a tenant has been evicted, or is a grabber, let every one in the parish turn his back on him; have no communication with him; have no dealings with him. You need never say an unkind word to him; but never say anything at all to him. If you must meet him in the fair, walk away from him silently. Do him no violence, but have no dealings with him. Let every man's door be closed against him; and make him feel himself a stranger and a castaway in his own neighbourhood.—J. DILLON, M.P., Speech to the Land League, 26 Feb., 1881.

Boyle's Law. The volume of a portion of gas varies inversely as the pressure (1662). Thus if we double the pressure, the gas will be reduced one-half; if we treble the pressure, the volume of gas will be reduced to one-third, and so on.

Called by Continental writers Mariotte's Law (1676).

Boyle Lectures. Eight lectures in one year in defence of Christianity against heterodoxy, infidelity, or objectors. Bentley preached the first series. Established by Robert Boyle, son of the Earl of Cork (1627–1691).

Brabançons. Bands of mercenaries or brigands, chiefly from Brabant, who overran France, in the middle ages, and committed frightful disorders. John king of England and Philippe (II.) Auguste draughted them off into their armies, and trained them.

Brabant Screen (The), 1720. A caricature in which the Duchess of Kendal, from behind a screen, is supplying Knight, treasurer of the South Sea Company, with money to effect his escape, when the bubble bursts.

Knight, with all the documents, books, and secrets of the directors, effected his escape to Calais. He was apprehended near Liège, and lodged in the citadel of Antwerp; but the States of Brabant refused to give him up, and he was allowed to make his escape. The Duchess of Kendal was the mistress of George I., the reigning king, and the caricature implies that the royal family was involved in the iniquity of the scheme. The Prince of Wales was certainly one of the governors of the Company.

Bracceschi (The), 1409. The party of Braccio, formed into a company on the death of Barbiano. See 'Sforzeschi.'

Bracciolini (Poggio), of Tuscany (1381–1459), secretary to seven popes. Said to be the author of the 'Annals of Tacitus' (q.v.), for which 'forgery' he received from Cosmo de' Medici 500 gold sequins. We are told that the original MS. of Bracciolini's forgery is still preserved in the library of Florence. See 'Literary Impostors, &c.'

If this is true, then the quotations given by Paley and others from Tacitus in testimony of Christ are utterly worthless for they are extracts from the 'Annals': thus 'Christians took their name from their founder, one Christ, put to death in the reign of Tiberius by his procurator Pontius Pilate' is from the 'Annals' xv. 44.

Bradford Law. Hang first and try afterwards. A summary way of dealing with marauders, especially in border laws and in times of general turbulence.

There are many similar expressions: as Lydford Law, Halifax Law, Cupar Justice, Jedburgh Justice, Buralem Club Law, Abingdon Law (q.v.), Mob Law, &c.

Brahminism. It includes a belief in a Supreme Being, the doctrine of immortality, that of a Trinity, and also of an Incarnation. It teaches a belief in a heaven and hell, and of a divine revelation. The Brahmins have their sacred scriptures (viz. the Vedas, the Vedentas, the Upanishads, and the Puranas), and two sacred poems of immense length. The present number of Brahmins is 189,000,000.

Brandanes (2 syl.). The name given to the 1,000 Scotch archers, exceptionally tall and handsome men, who, in 1298, followed Sir John Stewart to the battle of Falkirk. In that fatal engagement, Sir John was slain and the 'Brandanes' were annihilated.

Brandons and 'St. Brandon's day.' Valentine's day is called 'Dominica de brandonibus.' A brandon is a lighted torch, like Cupid's torch of love; and boys used at one time to carry about brandons on Valentine's eve and Valentine's day, collecting largesses.

Bras-de-Fer. François de Lanoue, a Calvinist of the 16th cent., and most distinguished chief after the death of Coligny.

Brasenose College, Oxford, 1509. Founded by William Smith, bishop of Lincoln, and Sir Richard Sutton of Prestbury, Chester. The head-master is called the principal.

The origin of the word is doubtful. There is a brazen nose over the great gateway, a sign, as Anthony Wood calls it; but there is a legend that the site of the college was an old brew-house or brasserie.

Bravest of the brave (The), 'Le brave des braves.' Michael Ney, marshal of France, so called for his services at the terrible battle of Moskowa in Russia, in 1812, which procured him the title of 'duc de la Moskowa' (1769–1815).

Brazen Horses of St. Mark (The). Four horses of gilt bronze removed by the Venetians from the Hippodrome at Constantinople, and placed over the western porch of the Basilica of St. Mark. No one knows the artist or date of these horses. Augustus brought them from Alexandria, after the conquest of Antony, and set them on a triumphal arch in Rome; they were removed by Nero, Domitian, Trajan, and Constantine to other arches. Constantine removed them to Constantinople. When Bonaparte took Venice in 1797 he removed the four horses to Paris, but in 1815 they were restored to Venice, which was allotted to the Austrian Government.

Brazen Wall (The). A horse regiment of Cromwell's republican party, so called because it was never broken. See 'Stonewall Jackson.'

Bread and Cheese. The shibboleth of Tyler's rebels, 1381, whereby he detected Flemish merchants.

Bread-and-cheeseland. Twenty acres of land left by Mary and Elizabeth Chukhurst of Biddenden (in the 12th cent.) for the benefit of the poor of their parish. The rent of this land was to be laid out in bread and cheese, to be distributed on Easter Sunday. The parish poor were to have 270 three-and-a-half pound loaves, with cheese in proportion; and 600 rolls were to be given to non-parishioners.

Breaking Money. To break a piece of money at parting, each keeping a part, was a bond of fidelity at one time among lovers. This came from very remote times, before inns and houses of public accommodation were known. Travellers had then to trust to the hospitality of strangers living on the road, and it was customary at parting to divide some article, such as a white stone or small coin, and for the host and guest each to take a part, that if the host required similar hospitality from his guest, he might claim it by showing the token. In the Revelation of St. John this custom is referred to (ii. 17), where Christ says, 'To him that overcometh will I give a white stone,' so that at the day of judgment he may demand admission into heaven.

> It stares, beckons, points to the piece of gold
> We brake between us.—The Vow Breaker, iii. 1 (1636).

Breast-laws. The common law of the Isle of Man. The code being a jus non scriptum is deposited in the heart or breast of the deemsters and keys (q.v.).

Breda (Compromise of), 1566.
(Peace of), 31 June, 1667, between England, France, and Denmark.

Breeches. See 'Procession of the Black Breeches.'

Breeches Bible (The), 1557. Printed by Whittingham, Gilby, and Sampson. So called because Gen. iii. 7 runs thus: 'The eyes of them bothe were opened. . . . and they sewed figge-tree leaves together and made themselves breeches.' Also called the 'Geneva Bible.'

Breeches Martyrs. O'Brien, M.P. and several other Irishmen imprisoned in 1889 for exciting the Irish to rebellion during the turbulent times of the Land League, refused to put on the prison dress, and went without their breeches, shivering with cold. Ridiculed by the general public as the 'breechless martyrs.'

Breeches Review (The). The 'Westminster Review,' so called from Francis Place, a West-end breeches-maker who had a considerable share both in the property and also in its conduct.

Breffni. Comprised the present Irish counties of Cavan and Leitrim. Cavan was called Breffni O'Reilly; and Leitrim was Breffni O'Ruark.

> Dermot MacMurrogh, king of Leinster, eloped with the wife of O'Ruark of Breffni, who appealed to the monarch.—O'CONNOR, Hist. of the Irish People, p. 48.

Brehon Laws. In Ireland. Unwritten or traditional laws. These laws were reduced to writing about 440. As, not unfrequently, the Brehon laws were repugnant to the laws of God and man, they were abolished in Anglo-Ireland by the Statute of Kilkenny 40 Edw. III., 1366; and the abolition was extended to the whole island by James I.

> Brehon in Ireland meant a 'judge,' and Brehon law was justice administered by the chief of a clan to those of his own tribe. The Brehon sat in the open air on a stone or mound. Spenser calls the Brehon laws 'a rule of right unwritten.' That is, not deriving its authority by written statutes. The writing was simply a record of existing laws. So with the 'common law' of England.

Brennus. No proper name, but a corrupt Cymric word, brenhin meaning 'king.' It was a Brennus who sacked Rome in the days of Camillus, B.C. 390. Another Brennus invaded Greece, and was defeated B.C. 280.

Brethren, Brethrenism, 1832. The Plymouth Brethren call themselves only 'Brethren,' and their religious system they call 'Brethrenism.' They practise no rites and have no ministers. According to the teaching of these Christians, to preach the Gospel is to deny that the Saviour's work is finished.

However, they baptize one another, which is a rite. See 'Brothers.'

Brethren of Good Will (The). See 'Brethren of Social Life.'

Brethren of Our Lady of Mount Olivet, or Olivētans, 1272. An offset of the Benedictines, founded by John Tolomei. The brethren devoted themselves chiefly to teaching and the cultivation of sacred science.

Brethren of St. Alexius. See 'Alexians.'

Brethren of St. George (The), 1472. See 'Brotherhood of St. George.'

Brethren of Social Life (The), 1376. Founded in Holland by Geert Groote and Florentius Radewin, not unlike the subsequent society known as the 'United Brethren' or Moravians. They enjoined a community of goods, ascetic habits, the use of the vernacular tongue in all religious services, and acknowledged no conventual distinctions ('all ye are brethren'). In 1480 they numbered 180 societies.

Brethren of the Christian Schools. 'Frères des écoles chrétiennes,' 1681, instituted at Reims by Canon J. B. de la Salle, for the gratuitous education of children in the elements of religion. The brethren wore a large black robe and square cap. This order survived the Revolution, and was legalised in 1808.

Brethren of the Common Lot (The). See 'Brethren of Social Life.'

Brethren of the Free Spirit, 1065, or 'Fratricelli.' Censured by the Council of Vienna in 1311, and persecuted by Karl IV. in 1369. They took their name from Rom. viii. 2. 'The law of the spirit of life in Christ Jesus hath made us free from the law of sin and death.' Their doctrine was a sort of pantheistic mysticism. They said that all things emanate from God, and will revert to Him again; that rational souls are part of God, that the whole universe is God, that by divine contemplation the soul is converted into the divine essence and becomes free from sin.

Brethren of the Holy Cross (The), 17th cent. The Rosicrucians, said to have been founded by Christian Rosencreutz, who died 1484, and bound his disciples not to make public any of his doctrines till 120 years after his death. The Rosicrucians were credited with possessing the secret of gold-making, keeping lights burning for centuries, and other alchemic secrets.

Brethren of the Passion (The). A company of pilgrims authorised to represent dramatically in cathedrals and other churches religious mysteries, such as the Incarnation, the Crucifixion, the Holy Trinity, the Real Presence, the Resurrection, &c. (13th to 15th cent.).

Brethren of the White Caps, 13th cent. The followers of one Durand, a carpenter, so called because their headgear was of white linen. They bound themselves not to play dice, not to frequent taverns, to wear no affected clothing, to avoid perjury and all vain swearing. They also forbade the lords from taking 'dues' from their vassals.

Bretigny (Treaty of), 8 May, 1360. Between France and England, in which Edward III. renounced all pretensions to the crown of France; abandoned his claim to Normandy, Anjou, and Maine; but, on the other hand, his duchy of Aquitaine (including Gascony, Guienne, Poitou and Saintonge) remained to him, not as a fief, but in full sovereignty; while his new conquest of Calais continued till the reign of Queen Mary a possession of the English crown.

King Jean was taken captive and brought to London, when his ransom was fixed at 8,000,000 gold crowns (about 1,500,000*l.* sterling). When he went to France to collect the money, he left his son, the Duc d'Anjou, as a hostage; but the duke ran away, and Jean returned to London, where he died in 1364.

Breton Club (The), 1789. Founded at Versailles at the instigation of Lafayette by the deputies of Brittany. It was subsequently transferred to Paris, and became the famous 'Club des Jacobins.'

The Breton club was formed because the king (Louis XVI.) over and over again refused to see their deputations, sent to remonstrate against his arbitrary conduct.

Bretts and Scots. Bretts were the remains of the British or Welsh people in Scotland. At one time the 'British' were the chief inhabitants of Dumbarton, Renfrew, Ayr, Lanark, Peebles, Selkirk, Roxburgh, Dumfries, and Cumberland; and this province was called 'Cambria,' 'Cumbria,' and 'Strathclyde.' In the middle of the 10th cent. it was a tributary to England, and continued so into the 12th cent., when Cumberland became a part of England.

The Scots were a Keltic people dwelling in the western and northern parts, and were called the 'wild Scots,' the 'Irishry of Scotland,' and 'Scotch Highlanders.'

The 'Laws of the Bretts and Scots' were abolished by Edward I.

Bretwalda. An Anglo-Saxon chief chosen to command the army (Bretwald, British ruler).

I. Ella of Sussex, 491-514.
II. Ceawlin of Wessex, 584-592.
III. Ethelbert of Kent, 597 to Feb. 616.
IV. Redwald of East Anglia, 616.
V. Edwin of Northumbria, king of all England except Kent, 620 to Oct. 633.
VI. Oswald of Northumbria, 635 to 5 Aug., 642.
VII. Oswy (his brother) of Northumbria, 651 to 15 Feb., 670.
VIII. Egbert of Wessex, 827-837. Also king.
IX. Alfred the Great, 871. Also king.
X. Edgar the Pacific, 958. Also king.

Breviarium Alaricianum, A.D. 506. An abridgment of the Theodosian Code by Alaric II., king of the Visigoths.

Breviary (The), 494. A book containing the canonical hours of the Latin church, viz. Matins, Lauds, Prime, Tierce, Sexte, None, Vespers, and Compline. It is called a breviary because it contains in a brief or abridged form the several offices. An ecclesiastic ought to go through his breviary daily. The original breviary was the work of Pope Gelasius, A.D. 494, but it has been often modified. The Greek breviary is called 'Eucology,' and is more ancient than the Latin, going back to the time of Chrysostom, who died 409.

Originally it consisted of the Lord's Prayer and extracts from the Psalms. Subsequently short readings (lessons) from the Scriptures were added.
∴ The Breviary is quite a distinct book from the Missal (q.v.).

Brian (Boru) king of Munster in the 10th cent. He was slain in the battle of Clontarf on Good Friday 1014.

Bridewell, 1522. Was built by Henry VIII. for a royal palace, for the reception of Karl V. and his retinue, but sometimes the king himself lived there; in 1553 the palace was given by Edward VI. to the city of London for a workhouse and house of correction. In 1666 it was burnt down in the fire of London. Bridewell is the name of the parish, so called from a well dedicated to St. Bride.

Bridge of Sighs (The), or Ponte dei Sospiri, Venice. Connecting the Prigioni Sotterraneo with the judgment hall of the doge's palace. Those who passed over it after their trial were prisoners on their way to execution.

Ruskin says it is renaissance of the 16th cent. After the great fire of 1574 the prisons previously connected with the palace were moved to the other side. Whether Niccolo da Ponte, the doge, who died in 1578, had any connection with the word 'Ponte' in the phrase I cannot determine. The bridge was the work of Jacopo Tatti Sansovino, the architect (1479-1570).

Bridge of Straw, Venice, (The). 'Ponte della Paglia.' One of the bridges which connected the prisons with the doge's palace. So called because when the nobles rode to the council they left their horses at the foot of this bridge in charge of grooms, and they were either stabled or baited, or both.

Bridgewater Canal (The), 1760. From Worsley to Manchester, cut by Brindley under the direction of the Duke of Bridgewater.

Bridgewater Collection (The), 1829. In the MS. department of the British Museum. Collected by the last earl of Bridgewater. Chiefly MSS. relating to French history.

Bridgewater Treatises (The), 1829. Francis Henry Egerton, 8th and last Earl of Bridgewater, placed 8,000*l.* at the disposal of the president of the Royal Society to be paid to eight persons appointed by him to publish 1,000 copies of a work on the goodness of God manifested in his works, from eight standpoints. WHEWELL was appointed to take general physics considered in connection with natural theology. BUCKLAND, geology and mineralogy. BELL, the human hand. ROGET, animal and vegetable physiology. PROUT, chemistry and the functions of digestion. CHALMERS, external nature adapted to man's moral and intellectual constitution. KIDD, on the adaptation of nature to man's physical condition. And KIRBY, the history, habits, and instincts of animals.

Brigandage of Ephesus (The), A.D. 449. A council of Ephesus, which condemned Theodoret, one of the Christian fathers, and defended Eutyches the heresiarch, who maintained that the humanity of Christ was absorbed in his divine nature. The Council was called 'Latrocinium,' the assembly of thieves and robbers.

Briggs's Logarithms. Constructed by Henry Briggs, a contemporary of Baron Napier (1556–1630).

Bright's Disease. A fatty degeneration of the tissues of the kidneys. So called from Dr. R. Bright, who was the first to investigate the character of the disease in 1837.

Brighton of the Riviera (The) or 'Brighton of the South,' Nice.

Brilliant Madman (The). Charles XII. of Sweden (1697–1710). He compelled the Danes to make peace, dethroned the king of Poland, and waged war with Russia for a time with success; but, being defeated by Czar Peter the Great at Pultowa, Sweden fell from her high estate as a first-class power.

Brinvilliers, the poisoner, was Marie Madeleine d'Aubray, marquise de Brinvilliers (1630–1676). She poisoned her father, her two brothers, and a sister. She was tortured, beheaded, and then burnt to ashes in Paris, 16 July, 1676.

Brissot (Jean-Pierre). The French revolutionist (1754–1793); was the first to abandon the use of hair-powder, and was the first victim of Robespierre. He assumed the dress of a quaker, and the name of De Warville.

Brissotins. The followers of Jean-Pierre Brissot in the first French revolution. Brissot was editor of the journal called 'Le Patriote Français,' and was one of the moving spirits of the times. He was a member of the Convention, but was opposed to the Montagnards, which drew upon him the wrath of Robespierre, who caused him to be proscribed 31 May, and he was put to death 31 Oct., 1793.

Bristol Fashion (In). Methodical, in apple-pie order. In the great mass meeting, 18 Oct., 1884, a route of above three miles was observed in one unbroken line. No cheering disturbed the stately solemnity; no one ran to give any direction; no noise of any kind was heard; but on, in one unbroken line, steady and stately, marched the throng in 'Bristol fashion' ('Daily News,' 20 Oct., 1884).

Bristol Riots (The), Sunday, 29 Oct., 1831, on the visit of Sir Charles Wetherell. It was during the excitement of the Reform Bill, which had been thrown out by the House of Lords. Sir Charles, a tory, entered with a cavalcade in a kind of triumph, and the mob rose in rebellion. The bridewell, the new gaol, the Gloucester county prison, several of the toll-houses, the bishop's palace, the mansion-house, the custom-house, the excise-office, and several private houses were set on fire. About 110 persons were killed, and three of the ringleaders were executed. The loss of property sustained was over half a million sterling.

Bristolians or Bristolites (Slyl.). Prize-fighters in the regency, of the Bristol school. Bristol was famous for the three pugilists, Jem Belcher (who had lost one eye), Thomas Cribb (once a coal-porter), and Molineux. The other school of boxers was called the 'Hebrews,' of which Mendoza was the chief exponent. The Prince Regent was a Bristolian, and his brother Frederick, duke of York, was a partisan of the Hebrew rivals. Much to the annoyance of the general public, the Prince Regent actually attached Thomas Cribb to his household. See 'Boxers.'

Britain. The Romans divided it into five parts:

1. Britannia Prima: all the southern counties from Kent to Cornwall.

2. Britannia Secunda: Wales, Hereford, Monmouthshire, with parts of Shropshire, Worcestershire, and Gloucestershire.

3. Flavia Cæsariensis: all between the north of the Thames and the wall of Sevērus, and between the Mersey and the Humber, i.e. Lincoln, Nottingham, Leicester, Cheshire, and part of Shropshire.

4. Valentiniа: Northumberland, part of Cumberland, and the south of Scotland.

5. Maxima Cæsariensis: Lancashire and Yorkshire.

Britain (Little), Aldersgate Street, London. So called from the Earl of Breton, whose mansion stood on the site. Brittany is so-called by Waller.

Britain of the South. New Zealand.

Britannia on the copper coins was first adopted by Charles II. The academy figure of Britannia was Louise de Querouaille, created by the king duchess of Portsmouth. The general design was copied from the coins of Antoninus Pius, in which is a female figure holding a sceptre, and sitting on a rock, the whole encompassed by the word BRITANNIA.

Some say that Britannia is meant for Frances Theresa Stuart, duchess of Richmond; others say it is meant for Barbara Villiers, duchess of Cleveland. The probability in favour of Louise de Querouaille is this: the coinage dates from 1672, and a son by Louise was born the same year, and she was created duchess of Portsmouth in 1673; so that at the time she was the reigning favourite. Querouaille, pronounce Ker-wail.

Britannia Prima. One of the five provinces into which Britain was divided in the reign of the Emperor Sevērus. It included all the country south of the Thames and the estuary of the Severn. It had its own ruler (called præses), who was subject to the præfect or governor-general of the island.

Britannia Rediviva. A birthday ode by Dryden. His Pollio, who was to usher in the Golden Age, was the son of James II. and Mary of Modēna, known in history as that very poor creature called 'The Old Pretender.' Dryden might be a good poet, but certainly he was no prophet.

Britannia Secunda. One of the five provinces into which Britain was divided in the reign of the Emperor Sevērus. It included that part of the island lying between the Severn and the sea, now called Wales. It had its own ruler (called præses), who was subject to the præfect or governor-general of the island.

British Association (The). I. In 1831. To give a stronger impulse and more systematic direction to scientific inquiry; to promote the intercourse of scientific men generally; to obtain more general attention to objects of science, and a removal of whatever impedes its progress. First meeting was held at York.

II. In 1846–1847, for the relief of the starving Irish and Scotch during the potato famine. It was under the direction of Mr. Jones Lloyd (Lord Overstone) and Mr. Thomas Baring, and the collection was 269,802*l.*, to which was added collections made in churches of 209,738*l.*, total 470,041*l.*, of which one-sixth was sent to the highlands of Scotland and the rest to Ireland.

British Columbia, 1859. A territory about 420 miles in length (extending from the Rocky Mountains on the east to the Pacific), with an average breadth of 300 miles from the American frontier northwards. It includes Vancouver's Island.

British Kings. According to the 'Chronicles of the Celtic Kings,' Japhet was the first British king. This is not given as history, but it is worth knowing as a tradition.

British Legion in Spain (The), 1838. The 1,200 men under the command of Colonel Evans which Lord Palmerston permitted to serve the Queen of Spain in the Carlist civil war, by doing which he suspended the Foreign Enlistment Act.

British Lion (The). Richard Cœur de Lion (1157, 1189–1199).

So early were his heroic energies displayed, that he was called 'The British Lion' before he began his reign.—SHARON TURNER, Hist. of England, vol. i. p. 301.

British Museum (The), 1753. Began with the library and curiosities of Sir Hans Sloane, purchased for 20,000*l.*, and deposited in Old Montague House, Bloomsbury (the house was built by the first Duke of Montague for his residence). Townley's collection of marbles was purchased by the nation in 1805; his gems, coins, and bronzes in 1814. The Elgin Marbles were purchased for the nation in 1816; and Blacas's collection of antiquities in 1867. See 'Townley Marbles,' 'Elgin Marbles.'

British Museum Library (The), 1753. The library of Sir Hans Sloane, and the MSS. collected by Harley (earl of Oxford) and his son, were purchased by the British Museum. In 1757 George II. presented to the Museum the 'Royal library,' and the Cottonian library was then transferred thither (the Cottonian library was collected by Sir R. B. Cotton, who died in 1631). In 1823 the splendid library of George III. was presented to the Museum by George IV. In 1847 the Grenville library was bequeathed to the Museum. In 1857 the new reading room was opened, and the military guard was discontinued in 1863.

British North America Act (The), 1867. The instrument of Federation, constituted as the 'Dominion of Canada.'

British Solomon (The). James I. (1566, 1603–1625). Sully called him 'the most learned (not the wisest) fool in Christendom.' The poet Hawes calls Henry VII. the 'British Solomon.'

British Thaumaturgus (The). St. Cuthbert, who died 688.

Broad Bottom Administration (The). From Aug. 1743 to March 1754, formed by Pelham and dissolved at his death. It succeeded the Grenville administration. It was called 'Broad Bottomed' because it included both Whigs and Tories. Lord Hardwicke (chancellor); Pelham (first lord, &c.); Duke of Newcastle and Earl Harrington (secretaries of state); Duke of Devonshire (steward of the household); Bedford and Sandwich (admiralty); Earl Gower (privy seal); Lyttelton, Marquis of Tweeddale, Earl Harrington, Mr. Grenville, Sir John Hynde Cotton, Bubb Dodington, Cobham Hobart, and the Duke of Dorset were the other members. It contained nine dukes, seven of whom were in the cabinet, viz.—Argyll, Bedford, Dorset, Grafton, Montagu, Newcastle, and Richmond. See 'Unionists.'

Broad Church School (The). Of German theology, headed by Neander, a converted German Jew. His 'Universal History of the Christian Religion and Church' has superseded Mosheim's 'Ecclesiastical History.'

Bromsberg (Treaty of), 23 Aug., 1645. Between Sweden and Denmark. In 1643 Oxenstiern, chancellor of Sweden, invaded the duchies of Holstein and Sleswig, because Christian IV., jealous of Sweden, had secretly tried to ruin its trade. After a war of two years, a conference for peace was opened at Bromsberg, through the mediation of France, and in Aug. 1645 a treaty was duly signed. This treaty secured to Sweden exemption from the payment of the Sound duties; and the isles of Gothland and Oesel were ceded in perpetuity to Sweden.

Bronze Age. That period when a people or race use chiefly bronze for tools and weapons. Byron calls the era of Napoleon Bonaparte 'the Age of Bronze.'

Brook Farm. A socialistic society which had its locale in the vicinity of Boston, U.S. Every member contributed to the general fund or paid his quota in manual or other work. The idea was suggested by Margaret Fuller, but the society was organised by the Rev. W. H. Channing. The members boarded in common, dressed most economically, bought at their own stores, and reduced the price of living to the lowest point. The evenings were spent in intellectual amusements or social gatherings. The speculation was an utter failure, and after six years the 'Farm' was broken up. Emerson often visited the Farm, and Hawthorne lived there for twelve months.

Broom (Van Tromp's). Dr. Lingard, in his 'Hist. of Engl.,' viii. 5, tells us that in 1652, while Admiral Blake (supposing the naval operations for the year to be over) had detached a large part of his fleet, Van Tromp came into the Downs with a fleet double the size of that commanded at the time by Blake. A battle ensued, but at night Admiral Blake ran up the river as far as Leigh. Van Tromp insulted the coast as he sought to renew the fight, cruising backwards and forwards from the North Foreland to the Isle of Wight. Intoxicated with his success, he now fastened a broom to the head of his mast to indicate that he had swept the English from the sea; but next year, 18 Feb., Blake met Van Tromp on an equal footing, when the victory rested with the English, the loss of the Dutch being 11 men-of-war and 30 merchant-men.

He gives as his authorities: Heath, p. 235; Whitelock, p. 551; Leicester's 'Journal,' 128; Le Clerc, i. 328, and Basnage, i. 293-301.

Brother Protectors (The). A secret republican society of France and Lombardy, sprung from the Carbonari, after the unsuccessful outbreak of 24 June, 1817.

Brothers and Sisters of the Free Spirit, 13th cent. Sprang up in the Rhine country and spread into France and Italy. As the 'Spirit had made them free,' they claimed perfect civil, moral, and religious freedom. They set aside the marriage tie and acknowledged no church. Their religion was a mixture of pantheism and antinomianism. They were condemned by the synod of Cologne in 1306, and by that of Trèves in 1310.

Brothers of Charity, 1520. Established for visiting and administering to the sick. Approved by Paul V. in 1621, and subjected to the rule of St. Augustine. In Europe they dress in black, in America in brown. See 'Brethren.'

Brothers of the Cross. I. A name adopted by the Jesuits after the society was suppressed by Clement XIV. in 1773. See 'Paccanarists.'

II. The Flagellants. See 'Brotherhood of the Cross.'

Brothers of the Pen (The). A trade-guild at Brussels, in the middle of the 15th cent., for the copying of manuscripts, and their illuminations, hitherto confined to the scriptoria of religious houses. Some twenty years later the introduction of printing revolutionised the literary world of Europe.

Brothers of the Teutonic House of our Lady of Jerusalem (The). The 'Teutonic knights' (q.v.).

Brotherhood of St. George (The), 1472–1494. A short-lived fraternity of arms constituted by Act of Parliament in the reign of Edward IV., and consisting of 13 gentlemen chosen from the four counties of the Pale: for Kildare 4; for Dublin 3, one of which was the lord mayor of the time being; for Meath 4, one of which was the seneschal; and for Louth 2, one of which was the mayor of Drogheda. They met annually to elect a captain on St. George's Day and maintained 120 mounted archers, 40 horsemen, and 40 pages, for the protection of the English border.

Brotherhood of St. Patrick (The), about 1868. An Irish secret society, a branch of the Ribbon association (q.v.), their platform being similar to that of the Fenians. See 'Irish Associations.'

Brotherhood of Thomas à Becket (The), 1300. A merchants' company chartered in 1406 by Henry IV.

Brotherhood of the Cross (The). The Flagellants (q.v.) so called themselves. They wore a cross on their breast, another on their back, and a third on their hat; and took upon themselves to do penance for the sins of the people. All who joined the brotherhood had full forgiveness of sins for 33 days, a day for a year of Christ's sojourn upon earth.

Broughtonian (A). A boxer, so called from Broughton the beefeater, who was the best boxer of his day.

Brown Monarch of Ireland (The). Rotherick O'Conor, called don, dun, or dhu, king of Connaught (1116–1198).

Browne Scholarship, for classics. Value 21*l.*, tenable for seven years. Founded in the University of Cambridge, by Sir William Browne, M.D., 1774. See 'Regius Professor of Greek.'

Browne's Medals (Sir William). (1) For a Greek ode in imitation of Sappho; (2) for a Latin ode in imitation of Horace; (3) for a Greek and Latin epigram. Each medal to be gold, worth 5*l.* For undergraduates in the University of Cambridge. Founded by Sir William Browne, M.D., in 1774. See 'Regius Professor of Greek.'

Brownists, 1580. The followers of Robert Brown, educated at Corpus Christi College, Cambridge. He maintained that the Scriptures ought to be followed in all matters of discipline, as well as in matters of doctrine. That every congregation is a church, independent, and with power to settle its own discipline and government. Whence they were called 'Independents' and 'Congregationalists.'

The Brownists were rigid Separatists, the Robinsonians only semi-separatists. The Brownists, as ultra-puritans, looked on the Established Church as unchristian, and refused communion with it. Thacker and Copping, two Brownists, suffered death.

Bruno (Giordano), 1530–1600. He was burnt to death for what was called 'heresy,' but his heresy consisted in his belief that this earth of ours is not the only part of the universe inhabited by intelligent beings; that the temporal power of the pope is an anomaly; and that thought should be free. In 1889 the Italians, Germans, Swiss, and some others, erected a bronze statue to the 'martyr,' executed by Signor Ettori Ferrari. It stands on a granite pedestal, adorned with bas-reliefs. The ceremony of unveiling took place on Whitsun Day, 9 June; a procession of above 3,000 took part in it, and 200 flags were carried. The statue stands in the Campo dei Fiori, on the spot where Bruno was burnt to death.

Brunswick (Line of). See 'Hanover &c.'

Brunswick Clubs and 'Brunswickers,' 1828. Clubs organised to counteract the Catholic Association (q.v.). Called Brunswick because George III. was most resolute against any concessions to the Roman Catholics. Frederick, duke of York, shared his father's hostility, and so did George IV. Members of these clubs were called 'Brunswickers.' The Duke of Newcastle, Lord Winchelsea, and Lord Kenyon led the way to the formation of Brunswick clubs in England.

The Catholic Association led to a counter-organisation of the Protestants, in the form of Brunswick clubs. This organisation embraced the whole of the Protestant peasantry (of Ireland), north and south, the Protestant farmers, and many of the gentry. They held their regular meetings . . . and had their 'rent' to bear the expense of the agitation.—HOWITT, Hist. of England (year 1828, p. 125).

Brunswick Manifesto (The), 25 July, 1792. A manifesto of the Duke of Brunswick, commander-in-chief of the united armies of Prussia and Austria, sent to put down the French revolution. The duke stated in this foolish and insulting document that he had been sent by the sovereigns of Europe 'to lay Paris in the dust, and to crush the republican vipers under his heel.' Brunswick was thoroughly beaten by the revolutionists.

Bryanites (3 syl.), 1815. The followers of William Bryan, a local preacher, who separated from the Methodist connection, and introduced a more popular element in his scheme of church government. Like the Methodists they are great open-air preachers, and receive the Lord's Supper sitting.

Bryce, or Brice (St.). Bishop of Tours; he succeeded St. Martin about 400, but was driven from his see by the mob, and took refuge in Rome. Subsequently he returned to Tours, where he died in 444. His day is 13 Nov.

Bryce's Day (St.), 13 Nov., 1002. Memorable for the massacre of the Danes in England. They had accepted heavy bribes time after time from Ethelred II. the Unready to quit the kingdom, but always returned again to commit further devastation. At length, by unwise policy (un-ready policy), it was resolved to massacre all the Danes in the kingdom. As might have been expected, this roused the vengeance of the Danes, and next year Sweyn appeared with a more formidable army to avenge his countrymen.

Bubble Act (The), 1719. 6 George I. c. 18; to punish the promoters of bubble schemes. Repealed 5 July, 1825.

Buccaneers, 1526–1697. In French 'Flibustiers.' An association of seamen whose object was to effect landings forcibly on the shores of the New World, locked against them by Spanish guarda-costas. Originally the English and the French united for the purpose, and were afterwards joined by the Portuguese and the Dutch. Thomas Tyson was the first to fit out a fleet which ravaged several of the West India Islands (1526); but the most renowned buccaneer was Henry Morgan, a Welshman. In the reign of William III. the French flibustiers were the sworn enemies of the British buccaneers; and at the treaty of Ryswick, in 1697, all these piratic expeditions were suppressed.

Bucentaur (The). The state barge of the Venetians. A flashy cumbersome 'Lord Mayor's Coach,' some 100 feet long and 21 broad, with 32 banks of oars, manned by 168 rowers. All the fittings were gorgeous in the extreme. It was employed every year when the doge 'married the Atlantic,' and also to conduct guests whom the republic delighted to honour to the doge's palace. See 'Espousal of the Adriatic.'

The barge was broken up by the French when Venice in 1797 fell into the hands of Bonaparte.

Buchanists, 1783. A Scotch sect, extinct in 1846. See 'Buchanites.'

Buchanites (3 syl.), 1776, &c. Followers of Mrs Buchan (née Elspeth Simpson, 1738–1791), a native of Banff. She was called by her disciples 'Our Lady,' and had rather a numerous following, who lived in common, were industrious, and paid their way. They neither married nor were given in marriage, and believed that they would be taken to heaven without dying. On her deathbed she told her disciples she would rise again within six days, ten years, or fifty years, according to the strength of their faith. Andrew Innes was her first disciple, and died at the age of ninety, a few days after the expiry of the 50th anniversary of Mrs. Buchan's death.

Bucharest (Treaty of), 28 May, 1812. Between Russia and Turkey, signed while Napoleon with his grand army was in Russia, and meditating a descent on Moscow.

Buckeye State (The). The State of Ohio is so called because the buckeye tree (æsculus flava) abounds there.

Buckingham House, London. So called from John Sheffield, duke of Buckingham, who built it in 1703. Bought by government for Queen Charlotte, in 1761. It was taken down in 1825, and the present palace raised on the site in the same year, but enlarged by Queen Victoria in 1853.

Buckingham's Flood, Oct. 1483. The Duke of Buckingham, having ratted from Richard III. to the Duke of Richmond's party, set out to join his forces with the other leaders; but there fell such heavy and continuous rains during his whole march from Brecon through the Forest of Dean to the Severn, that the bridges were carried away, and all the fords were rendered impassable. Such rains and floods had not been known in the memory of man; and the inundation of the Severn was called 'Buckingham's Flood.'

Buddhist St. Augustine (The) of Japan. Shodo Shonin, who, in 767, erected the Buddhist temple of Nikko.

Buffon. The supplemental works of Buffon's 'Natural History' are—

Daubenton (1716-1800), the anatomy of animals.
Lacépède (1757-1825), oviparous animals, serpents, whales and fishes. Published 1789.
Gueneau de Montbeillard (1720-1785), birds.
Bonnini (1761-1811), foreign birds. He published an edition of Buffon in 127 vols.
Daudin (1774-1804), reptiles.
Latreille (1762-1833), insects.

Bug Bible (The), 1551. Matthew's bible is so called because verse 5 Psalm xci., 'Thou shalt not be afraid of the terror by night,' is there translated 'Thou shalt not be afraid of the bugges by night.' See 'Bibles.'

Building Act Committee (The Metropolitan). Responsible for the carrying out of the different acts regulating the height of buildings in the metropolis, the materials used in their construction, the thickness of the party walls, and (in cases of theatres and other places of public entertainment) the facilities afforded for ingress and egress.

For these purposes London is divided into 74 districts, each under the charge of a district surveyor appointed by the board, but paid by fees.

Building Bess of Hardwick. She was thrice married. She built a former Chatsworth, the existing Hardwick Hall, and added 'a great parlour,' and the chapel of Sutton Court, in Somersetshire.

Bulgarians (The). The Cathări (q.v.) were so called sometimes from their connection with the Bulgarian Paulicians.

Bull Run. See Appendix.

Bull against Luther (The). By Leo X., 1521. 'In the name of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Ghost, the Blessed Virgin, St. Peter and St. Paul, we do curse him and those who are led astray by him; and we cut off both him and them from all communion of the saints. Cursed be they in prayer, cursed in speech and in silence, in eating and in sleep, in taste, in hearing, and in all the other senses. Cursed in the eyes, the head, and the whole body, from the crown of the head to the sole of the foot. I conjure Satan and his imps to torture them both day and night, till they perish by water, by fire, or the cord.' As this bull was read in the churches, the officiating priest, after the lights had been extinguished, said aloud, 'As I blow out these lights, may the light of life be for ever hidden from their eyes. So be it. Amen and amen.'

See a similar bull in 'Notes and Queries,' 21 Jan. 1852 p. 44.

Bull of Pius V. (The), 27 April, 1570 Commanding all the faithful to break with the Anglican Church, to abandon and dethrone Elizabeth, and to subject England to a foreign invader. See 'Cœna Domini.'

The words ran thus: 'Declaramus Elisabetham hæreticam . . . eique adhærentes . . . anathematis sententiam incurrisse eosque a Christi corporis unitate præcisos . . . prout nos illos præsentium autoritate absolvimus, et privamus eamdem Elizabetham prætenso jure regni allisque omnibus supradictis. Præcipimusque et interdicimus universis et singulis proceribus, subditis, populis, et aliis prædictis, ne illi, ejusve monitis, mandatis, et legibus, audeant obedire. Qui secus egerint, eos simili anathematis sententiâ innodamus.

Bulla Aurea of Hungary, 1222. The Magna Charta of that kingdom, exacted from Andrew II., a feeble, self-willed, worthless king, not unlike our King John.

Bulla Cœnæ Domini. A bull of excommunication and anathema against heretics, read before the people on Holy Thursday. Those offences which are condemned by this bull can be absolved only by the pope.

Buller of Brasenose. John Hughes is so called in Wilson's 'Noctes Ambrosianæ.' Hughes, however, was not of Brasenose, but Oriel College, Oxford.

Bullies. F. J. Gall noticed that all bull-eyed boys are overbearing and quarrelsome. By bull-eyes he meant full prominent eyes. As an historical pun this connects bull-eyes with our word 'bullies,' but whether the connection is of any philological worth is quite another matter. See 'Nab.'

Bulwer Clayton Treaty (The), 1850. Between Great Britain and the United States of North America, respecting the ship-canal between the Atlantic and Pacific Oceans. Signed at Washington. This treaty bears upon the canal through Lake Nicaragua.

Bund (The) of Germany. A confederation of the thirty-five sovereign states, which had every variety of government, from absolutism to democracy, all independent. It was represented by a Diet, q.v.

Bundesrath (The), 1871. The delegates of the confederated governments of the German empire.

The twenty-five states confederated with Prussia are Alsace-Lorraine (taken from France), Anhalt, Baden, Bavaria, Bremen, Brunswick, Hamburg, Hesse, Lippe, Lübeck, Mecklenburg-Schwerin, Mecklenburg-Strelitz, Oldenburg, Reuss (elder branch), Reuss (younger branch), Saxe-Altenburg, Saxe-Coburg and Gotha, Saxe-Meiningen, Saxony, Schaumburg-Lippe, Schwartzburg-Sondershausen, Schwartzburg-Rudolstadt, Waldeck, Würtemburg.

Bills which have passed the Reichstag and Bundesrath, after being signed by the emperor, are binding on all the empire.

Bungtown Coppers (American). Counterfeit English ha'pennies manufactured at Bungtown (now Barneysville), Mass. (Bartlett, 'Dictionary of Americanisms,' 1877).

Buoy (The Mystery of the), 14 Sept., 1854. When the combined French and English army resolved to land on the Crimēa, the spot selected was the 'Old Fort Bay,' i.e. the southern bay; and to prevent confusion a buoy was to be placed in the centre of the bay. The French were to debark on the left of this buoy, and the English on the right. During the night, three French officers placed coloured buoys as the limits for the French landing, taking up the whole south bay, and leaving Admiral Lyons to improvise a new arrangement as a landing place for the English. This was a dodge that the French might be the first to land.

Burchardicum, Burchardic. Beyond dispute. Burchard, who died 1026, bishop of Worms, compiled a huge volume which long enjoyed unbounded repute. It was a 'compte rendu' of edicts and decretals, so admirably set forth that an appeal to his book was considered final. Hence 'Burchardicum' came to mean a dictum beyond dispute.

Burchardicum has not an English timbre, but Burchardism, Burchardic, Burchardise, might be admitted and prove useful.

Burchell (Old). The pen-name of Elihu Burritt, the 'learned blacksmith,' an American linguist and author (1810–1879).

Burdett Riot (The), 1810. This arose out of the arrest of Gale Jones, president of a debating society called the 'British Forum.' The question of debate was, 'Which was the greater outrage upon public feeling: Mr. Yorke's enforcement of the standing order, or Mr. Windham's attack on the liberty of the press on the same occasion?' Sir Francis Burdett moved in the house that Gale Jones should be discharged, as the 'British Forum' was a private debating society; and Cobbett, in his 'Weekly Register,' took Burdett's side of the question. Sir Francis, in a letter published by Cobbett, spoke contemptuously of the House of Commons, and Mr. Lethbridge moved that he should be committed to the Tower. This led to a riot, in which the soldiers were called out, and two men were shot dead. The question now was whether the soldier who killed one of the men should not be tried for murder. Ultimately the contention drifted into this question; Is not the House of Commons so one-sided that it needs a radical reform?

Burdett-Coutts Scholarships. Two for geology in the University of Oxford, each tenable for two years. Founded by the Baroness Burdett-Coutts, 1860.

Bureau. Not unlike our board of Green Cloth in the history of the name. A bureau meant originally a coarse woollen cloth. Hence Boileau says of Damon, the author, 'n'étant vêtu que de simple bureau, passe l'été sans linge, et l'hiver sans manteau.' It then came to mean the cloth on the board table, then the officials who sit at the board.

Bureau d'Esprit. Literary reunions, such as those held in the Hôtel Rambouillet, in the hotel of the Duchesse du Maine, of Madame de Tencin, of Mesdames du Châtelet and du Boccage, of Deffand and Geoffrin, of Madame Doublet, &c.

In the reign of Louis XV. the three 'bureaux d'esprit' were presided over by Madame de Deffand, Mademoiselle de Lespinasse, and Madame Geoffrin. The first embraced the élite of the literati: the second, the leading political reformers; and the last, professed sceptics. Madame Deffand was noted for her caustic wit; Mademoiselle de Lespinasse for the charms of her conversational power; and Madame Geoffrin for her practical benevolence.

Burgess Oath (The), administered in royal boroughs of Scotland, ran thus: 'I protest before God and your lordships that I profess and allow with my heart the true religion now at this present professed within this realm, and authorised by the laws thereof. I will abide in the same and defend it to my life's end, renouncing the Roman religion called popery.' Those who saw no inconsistency in taking this oath were called burghers, those who refused to take it were called anti-burghers.

Burgess Roll (The), 1832. An alphabetical list of the burgesses entitled to vote for municipal officers or borough members, made out by the respective town clerks. There was also for a time another list called the Freeman's Roll (q.v.), but this list is no longer required (5, 6 Will. IV. c. 76, amended by 20, 21 Vict. c. 50).

Burgesses of the Palisades Aliens who sought the sanctuary of fortified towns in the middle ages, especially in Germany, where they were called 'Palburgers.' These aliens were allowed to dwell in the suburbs between the city walls and the palisades which bounded the territory of the corporation. Hence the name. See 'Outburgers.'

It must be remembered that there was a constant collision between the feudal barons and the corporate towns; and therefore offenders of the one sought refuge with the other, and it was a point of honour or policy not to give up the refugee.

Burgh Schools, 1696. Founded by the General Education Act in Scotland. They were of the same character as English grammar schools; of a higher grade than the parochial schools, founded by the same Act, and existing in burghs or towns, managed by the town councils, and supported by grants from the 'Common Good,' i.e. the public funds of the burgh.

Burghers and Anti-Burghers, 1745. Seceders from the Kirk of Scotland. The burghers are those who saw no inconsistency in taking the 'Burgess Oath' (q.v.). Those who refused to take it were anti-burghers.

The two parties were united in 1820, and called the 'United Presbyterians.'

Burgundian Code (The), or 'Loi Gombette,' published in 502 by Gundibald, at Lyons. See 'Gombette.'

Burgundians The). The followers of the Duke of Burgundy, in the early part of the 15th century, opposed to the faction of the united Orleanists and Armagnacs (q.v.). Headed by Jean Sans Peur, duke of Burgundy. He got the Duke of Orleans assassinated at Paris 23 Nov., 1407, and became reconciled with the Orleans family in 1409; but after the marriage of the young Duke of Orleans with the daughter of the Count of Armagnac in 1411, the feud broke out again: the Orleanists and Armagnacs against the Burgundians. The Duke of Burgundy in 1417 led an army to Paris, liberated the queen at Tours, and was by her named governor of the kingdom 10 Jan., 1418; but in 1419 he was assassinated at the bridge of Montereau.

Burkers' Hole. Formerly called 'Nova Scotia Gardens,' a part of Bethnal Green now occupied by St. Thomas's Church and Baroness Burdett Coutts's model lodging-houses. It was the residence of May, Bishop, and Williams, the infamous 'burkers,' who procured subjects for dissection by secret assassination. They were convicted of the murder of a poor friendless Italian boy in 1826. Burke (who gave his name to the words to burke, burker, &c.) used to place a pitch plaster over the mouth of his victim to smother his cries. He was an Irishman, and was hanged in 1829.

Burmese Wars (The). I. 1826. Arakan and Tenasserim were acquired by the treaty of Yandabo, and annexed to our province of Lower Bengal.

II. 1851–1853. Martaban stormed 5 April, 1852; Rangoon stormed 14 April, 1852; Pegu taken 4 June, 1852, and annexed to our province; Prome taken 9 July, 1852.

III. Upper Burmah was annexed to our Indian empire 26 Feb., 1886. The population of this province is about 8,500,000, and the territory (including the Shan States) about 200,000 square miles.

Burnbill. Henry de Londres, archbishop of Dublin, in the reign of Henry III. He fraudulently procured the archiepiscopal estates, and burnt all the deeds by which the lands were held.

Burlington Fine Arts Club (The). London, established 1867.

Burnett Prizes (The). Allotted every forty years to the authors of the two best essays on the 'Evidence that there is a Being all-powerful, wise, and good, by whom everything exists, &c.' First award, 1815, to Dr. William Lawrence Brown 1200*l.*, and the Rev. J. B. Sumner (archbishop of Canterbury) 400*l.*; the next award, 1855, was to the Rev. R. A. Thompson, 1800*l.*, and Dr. J. Tulloch 600*l.* The third award should be in 1895. Founded by Mr. Burnett of Dens, Aberdeenshire. The judges are three.

Burney Collection (The), 1818. In the MS. department of the British Museum. Collected by the Rev. Dr. Charles Burney, and consisting of 520 volumes, chiefly Greek and Roman classics. Amongst these is the Townley 'Homer,' a MS. of the 'Iliad' similar to the 'Odyssey' in the Harleian collection; a Greek MS. of Ptolemy's 'Geography,' adorned with maps of the 15th cent., &c.

Burney Prize (The). For an essay on some moral or metaphysical subject on the existence, nature, and attributes of God. For graduates of the University of Cambridge of not more than three years standing, value 105*l.* annually. Founded by Richard Burney of Christ's College, Cambridge, 1845. See 'Mathematics,' &c.

Burning and Starving Act (The). The Commutation Act passed by William Pitt, greatly reducing the duties on excisable articles, enabling the lawful dealer to compete with smugglers. These smugglers in Galloway and Dumfriesshire, being ruined by the Act, called it the Burning and Starving Act.

Burnt Candlemas (Day), 2 Feb., 1356. The day when Edward III. marched through the Lothians with fire and sword. He burnt to the ground Edinburgh and Haddington, and then retreated for want of provisions. The Scots call the day 'Burnt Candlemas.'

Burnt Pillar (The), or 'Tchernberle Tash.' A column in the centre of the forum of Constantinople. It was raised by Constantine on a pedestal of white marble twenty feet high. The pillar was composed of ten pieces of porphyry, each eleven feet in height and thirty-three in circumference. It was surmounted with a colossal statue of Apollo in bronze, said to have been the work of Phidias. This statue was thrown down in the reign of Alexis Comnēnus.

Burschenschaft, 1813. A secret society of Germany, established by the students for the defence of the country The Grand Burschenschaft of Jena, in Saxe-Weimar, was established 12 June, 1815, and soon absorbed all the others. In 1818 the government declared the association to be illegal, and it gradually dropped off.

Burschen, pl. of, 'Bursch,' a student, and 'schaft, an association.

Burton Arch (The). The marble arch formerly at Hyde Park Corner, in imitation of the arch of Titus at Rome, on the top of which was placed, in 1846, a huge equestrian statue of the Duke of Wellington, the work of Mr. C. Wyatt. This hideous deformity was removed in 1883.

> 'Hail to the statue!' people cry—
> In justice there they fail;
> But let it have the Burton arch,
> If we've the Burton ale.
> Newspaper Epigram, 1846.

Butcher (The). I. Dante, in his 'Purgatory' (canto xx.), makes Hugh Capet say, 'I was the son of a butcher of Paris.' Pasquier told François I. that Dante meant by 'butcher' a formidable warrior.

II. Olivier de Clisson, constable of France (1320–1407), who never spared the life of any Englishman who fell into his hands.

III. John de Clifford, called the 'Black Clifford,' the ninth baron, died 1461.

IV. Ahmed Jezzar, pacha of Acre, which he defended against Napoleon. He struck off the heads of his nine wives at one and the same time (1735, 1775–1804).

Butcher (The Bloody). William Augustus, duke of Cumberland (1721–1765), son of George II., so called for his cruel treatment of the Jacobites, whom he defeated at Culloden, 16 April, 1746. Also called the 'Butcher of Culloden.'

> He (Cumberland) seemed to revel in blood, and to be ambitious of earning the name he there (at Culloden) won of THE BUTCHER. . . . When the wounded had writhed in their agonies all night they were despatched by the bayonets of the Butchers. They were hunted out of their hiding-places in the woods and moors, and massacred in cold blood. Twenty wounded men, who had crept into a farmhouse, were shut up and deliberately burnt in it. The prisoners in Inverness were treated with equal cruelty.—HOWITT, Hist. of England, (George II. ch. xi. p. 525).

Butcher of England (The). John Tiptoft, earl of Worcester, lord deputy, who died 1470. On one occasion, in the reign of Edward IV., he ordered Clapham (one of Lord Warwick's squires) and nineteen other gentlemen to be impaled. This bloodstained leader of the Wars of the Roses was a great patron of Caxton, and one of the earliest scholars of the revival of letters.

Butcher of Vassy (The). François, duc de Guise (1519–1563), was so called by the Huguenots. See 'Massacre of Vassy.

Butchers and Carpenters' Insurrection, 1413. This was the great nsurrection of the White Hoods and White Scarfs. The Butchers or White Hoods were the Burgundian faction; the Carpenters or White Scarfs were the Orleans or Armagnac faction. The Carpenters or White Scarfs prevailed, and after the bloody fray in the Place de Grève, the White Hoods were driven out of Paris, and disappeared.

Butcher's Dog (The). Cardinal Thomas Wolsey, son of a butcher of Ipswich (1471–1530). After he brought Edward Stafford, duke of Buckingham, to the block in 1521, it was wittily said of him, 'The butcher's dog has pulled down the fairest buck in Christendom.'

Many efforts have been made to give Wolsey a more aristocratic birth. One is this: that he was a bourgeois son, and that bourgeois was corrupted into butcher; but there would be no point then in the witticism above referred to. Another is this: that the Emperor Charles V. called Henry VIII. the butcher and Wolsey was the 'butcher's dog'; but Henry was by no means a butcher when a young man, and at the death of Buckingham he was under thirty, and called 'a gentle, merciful, and pleasure-loving prince.' Buckingham was executed in the 13th year of Henry's reign; and Wolsey must have been known before then as a butcher's son, or there would have been no wit in the remark. Skelton, a contemporary, speaking of Wolsey, says he 'was cast out of a butcher's stall,' and William Roy, another contemporary, calls him 'the vile butcher's sonne.'

Begot by butchers, but by bishops bred;
How high his honour holds his haughty head!

Butcher's Shambles (The). An old oak tree in Birkland, a part of Sherwood Forest. It is now a mere shell, but in this tree a butcher named Hooton used to conceal the carcases of sheep or deer till he could dispose of them. There used to be a beam across the tree with hooks, on which three sheep could be suspended. Old men can still (1890) remember this arrangement. In the hollow of this tree fourteen or fifteen persons could stand, and its girth at the height of a man was certainly thirty feet or more; but now half even of the rind is gone, and the other half is a mere shell.

Buttermere (Mary of). Daughter of an innkeeper, called the 'Beauty of Buttermere,' married a man who came to the vicinity for fishing, and passed himself off as the Hon. Augustus Hope. It turned out he was a married man, whose name was Hadfield, a notorious swindler, who was ultimately executed for forgery. At the beginning of the 19th cent. this romantic tale caused a very great sensation. It is said that Mary afterwards married a substantial farmer.

Buttoners (The). A branch of the Strict Mennonites (3 syl.), which split from the general body in 1554, and were so called because they used buttons in their dress instead of hooks-and-eyes. See 'Mennonites.'

Buttons. In China there are nine official buttons worn in the cap, each one denoting a special rank. 1. the plain red; 2. the red figured with the character Shou (longevity); 3. the clear blue; 4. the opaque blue; 5. the crystal; 6. the opaque white; 7, 8, 9. buttons of brass.

By this conquer, A.D. 312. The inscription said to have been annexed to the cross seen in the sky by Constantine when about to encounter Maxentius. According to tradition it was the cause of his conversion to Christianity.

Of course the words were Greek, 'Ἐν τούτῳ νίκα.

Bye Conspiracy (The), 1603. A conspiracy of Roman Catholics, Puritans, and Presbyterians, who thought that James I. would favour their own special religious party, but found that he threw himself entirely into the hands of the High Church of England party. Clarke and Watson, two Catholic priests, were the heads of the conspiracy. Their plan was to seize the king, proclaim Arabella Stuart queen, and to place the government in the hands of the chief conspirators. Lord Cecil was to be put to death, and Watson to be made lord chancellor. The plot was revealed to Cecil, the leading conspirators were tried for treason, and Watson, Clarke, and Brooke were executed. The conspiracy was called the 'Bye' because it was simultaneous with another conspiracy called the 'Main' (q.v.).

Byng (To), or 'make the Byng of the day,' to sacrifice one as a scapegoat. The reference is to Admiral John Byng, who was shot at Portsmouth by sentence of court martial, 14 March, 1757. He was sent to relieve Minorca, besieged by the French, and after a partial action sheered off, declaring that the ministry had not supplied him with a sufficient fleet. The ministry and the public were furious, and Byng was brought before a court martial.

Precisely the same thing occurred in the Crimean war. The ministry and officers were blamed for not taking Sebastopol sooner, and the Duke of Newcastle, minister of war, was made the 'Byng' or scapegoat of the day.

Byzantine Historians (The). Greek historians who lived under the Eastern empire between the 6th and 15th cents. They consist, 1. of historians who continue the history of the Byzantine empire; 2. of general chroniclers; and 3. of authors who wrote on the antiquities, politics, manners and customs of the Romans. The whole of the works were compiled and published by order of Louis XIV., and ran to thirty-six volumes folio (1644–1711).

The most noted are Zonaras, Nicetas Acominatus Choniatès, and Nicephorus Gregoras, who form a complete corpus historiæ to the close of the 15th cent. Then comes Laonicus Chalcondylas, and then follow a host who wrote detached parts of history.

Ca'aba, or 'Kaaba.' A stone which Mahomet removed to Mecca, where it was inserted in the walls of the sacred shrine built by Abraham and Ishmael. The angel Gabriel presented Mahomet with this stone, which was originally a petrified angel, and quite white. It is now black from the kisses of sinners.

The site of this shrine is where repentant Adam stood, after wandering for 200 years, when he received pardon for his disobedience in Paradise.

Cabal' Ministry (The), 1667–1674. A ministry under Charles II., so called because the initial letters of the cabinet happened to form the word cabal: they were Clifford, Ashley, Buckingham, Arlington, and Lauderdale.

The French 'cabale' means a party who seek to gain their object by underhand or unscrupulous means, and the Spanish 'cabala' means intrigue. The word was not therefore first coined from Clifford's ministry, although it was not used in the English language before. Dryden uses the word.

Thomas Clifford (first commissioner of the treasury, afterwards Lord Clifford).
Lord Ashley (chancellor of the exchequer, afterwards Earl of Shaftesbury).
Duke of Buckingham (master of the horse).
Earl of Arlington (secretary of state).
Duke of Lauderdale.

Caballarii. Feudal tenants bound to serve on horseback, equipped with coat of mail. This service implied no personal merit and gave no civil privileges. It was a mere duty or knight's fee.

Cabbala. Jewish tradition said to have been handed down from Moses. The first book, on cosmogony, is attributed to the 7th cent.; but from the 12th to the 15th cent. numerous cabbalistic writings were added, teaching the esoteric meaning of 'the Law,' the method of performing miracles, incantations, &c.

The 'Sohar' (13th cent.) in Aramaic may be called the bible of the Cabbalists.

Cabinet Council. Lord Clarendon says the term originated thus: In the reign of Charles I. the affairs of state were controlled by the Archbishop of Canterbury, the Earl of Strafford, and the Lord Cottington; to these were added 'for ornament' the Earl of Northumberland, the Bishop of London as lord treasurer, and Vane and Windebank (two secretaries) for service and intelligence. The Marquis of Hamilton 'meddled just so far and no further than he had a mind.' These persons made up the committee of state, reproachfully called the junto, but 'enviously' called afterwards the 'cabinet council.' In cabinet councils the royal presence is not necessary, as it is in 'privy councils.' When George I. was king, as he was ignorant of the English language, he took no part in state councils; and ever since cabinet councils have dispensed with the sovereign's presence.

Cabinet Noir (The). The secret offices where all the correspondence of the French nation used to be handled during the monarchy.

Cabi'ri. Ancient Pelasgian deities.

Cabochienne (La), 1413. An ordinance for the reform of the state forced from the Dauphin of France by the White Hoods or Cabochians (q.v.).

Cabochiens (Les), 1413–1422. A gang organised by Jean Sans Peur, duke of Burgundy, and placed under the command of Simonet Caboche, a butcher. It numbered 500 vagabonds, and kept Paris in terror by its massacres and plunder. In 1422 the Parisians rose en masse, fell upon the gang, Jean Sans Peur fled from the city, and the Armagnacs or Orleans faction remained in the ascendent. See 'French Brigands.'

Cacciatori. The Chasseurs of the Alps, or 'Cacciatori delle Alpi.' (Italian, cacciare to hunt, cacciatore a hunter).

We have already referred to Garibaldi as general of the Cacciatori.—HOWITT, Hist. of Engl. year 1859, p. 552.

Caddée or Cadée (The), or 'League of God's House,' 1400–1419. See 'Cadeian, &c.'

Cade (Jack). Ringleader of the insurrection which broke out in Kent, 1450. He was an Irishman, and called himself Mortimer, because he was a natural son of the Duke of York. He marched to London at the head of 20,000 armed men, who encamped at Blackheath, 1 June, 1450. Being slain by Alexander Iden, 11 July, his head was stuck on London Bridge.

Cade's Insurrection. See above.

Cadeian League (The), 1400–1419, i.e. the league of Casa-dei, or God's house; in German, Gotteshausbünd. One of the three unions of the canton of the Grisons.

The other two leagues were the 'Ligue Grise,' formed in 1424; and the 'League of the Ten Jurisdictions,' formed in 1436. All three were admitted into the Helvetic Confederation in 1798.

Cadets of the Cross, 1703. Catholic auxiliaries in the army of Marshal Montrevel, sent to extirpate the Camisards of the Cevennes. Also called 'White Camisards.'

Cadjahs. See 'Dynasty of the Kadjahs,' or Kujurs.

Cadmean Letters. Sixteen Greek letters said to have been introduced into Thebes (in Bœotia) by Cadmus, son of Agēnor, king of Phœnicia. The letters are a, b, g, d, ĕ, i, k, l, m, n, ŏ, p, r, s, t, u. These letters were subsequently increased by 8 Ionic letters, z, ē, th, x, ph, ch, ps, and ō. Simonidēs of Cos is credited with the 4 letters th, z, ph, ch, and Epicharmos the Sicilian with the 4 letters x, ē, ps, ō. The Ionians were the first to employ all the 24 letters, whence the 8 added were called Ionic letters.

Cadmean Victory (A). A victory purchased with great loss. The reference is to the armed men who sprang out of the ground from the teeth of the dragon sown by Cadmus. These men fell foul of each other, and only five escaped with their lives. Hence the Greek 'Kadmeia nikē,' and Latin 'Cadmēa Victoria.' The victories of Boadicea sowed her kingdom with dragon's teeth, and the Romans were roused by them to most vindictive fury Cærite Franchise (The). The franchise of a Roman subject in a prefecture. These subjects had the right of self-government, were registered by the Roman censor as taxpayers, but enjoyed none of the privileges of a Roman citizen. Cærē was the first community placed in this dependent position, whence the term cærite franchise.

Cæsar, as a title, varied in its force. I. The first twelve emperors were all entitled Cæsar in compliment to Julius Cæsar. Thus Octavius or Octavianus Cæsar (better known as Augustus); Tiberius Cæsar; Caligula Cæsar; Claudius Cæsar; Nero Cæsar; Galba, Otho, Vitellius, whose united reigns lasted only one year; Vespasian Cæsar; Titus Cæsar; and Domitian Cæsar.

II. After the death of Domitian, A.D. 96, the word as a title dropped out of use till the reign of Hadrian (14th emp. 117–138), who called the heir presumptive Cæsar.

III. In the reign of Diocletian, A.D. 292, the two emperors of Constantinople and Rome were each styled Augustus, and the two viceroys of Illyricum and Gaul were each styled Cæsar. This arrangement, however, soon dropped after the death of that emperor.

The wife of a Roman emperor was entitled Cæsara, and probably all imperial princes were by courtesy addressed as Cæsar. Czar and Kaiser are modified forms of Cæsar.

Cæsarean Era of Antioch (The). This era began 1 Sept., B.C. 48, to commemorate the victory of Julius Cæsar over Pompey.

Cage (The). The little hut built of sticks, heather, and moss, in a thicket of trees on the rocky face of a high mountain, called Letternilinchk, in Benalder, to which Charles Edward was taken for concealment by Lochiel and Macpherson, after the fatal battle of Culloden (1746).

Cameron had been one of those who assisted Charles Edward to escape, and had lived with him in the 'Cage.'—Howitt, Hist. of England, (George II. ch. xii. p. 549).

Cagliari. Generally called Paul Veronese (1530–1588).

Cagliostro of Literature (The), 1835. Comte de Courchamps, the most unblushing literary thief on record. He stole the two novels of John Potocki, a Polish count, and published them as his own. The 'National' exposed the theft, and ferreted out all the falsehoods of De Courchamps, establishing his infamous piracy beyond a shadow of doubt. Comte de Courchamps called his book 'The Inedited Memoirs of Cagliostro,' and hence the quack of literary quacks was stigmatised with the name of the quack of quacks. See 'Literary Forgeries.'

Joseph Balsamo, the prince of quacks, assumed the title-name of Comte de Cagliostro (1743-1795).

Cagots. A tribe of men in France akin to the gipsies. Some think the word is compounded of Caas-goths (dogs of Goths), and that they are remnants of the Teutons who overran the south of Europe at the fall of the Roman Empire. Others quote the synonyms Caqueux, Cacous, Capos, and Gaffos, meaning 'lepers,' to prove that they were Jewish lepers. They are often called 'Canards,' because they were obliged to carry as a badge 'une patte de canard.'

It is in Brittany that they are called Caqueux. In Poitou, Maine, and Anjou they are called 'Colliberts.' In Auvergne, 'Marrons.'

Cainites (The), 2nd cent. A Christian sect which held that the books of the Old Testament were inspired by the Demiurge, or son of darkness and chaos; and that the real worthies were Cain, Esau, the men of Sodom, Korah, and so on; and the only spiritual apostle was Judas Iscariot, who betrayed Christ lest he should lead men into darkness. These 'heretics' say Judas Iscariot left a gospel, which is the only true one.

Ça Ira (It will succeed). The 'Carillon National' of the French Revolution. The refrain is:

Ah! ça ira, ça ira, ça ira!
Les aristocrates à la lanterne!

Cairns' Act (Lord), 1882. Called 'Cairns' Settled Lands Act,' to allow the sale of entailed estates, but not the 'family mansion.'

Caius College (generally called Keys), in Cambridge University. Originally called Gonville Hall (q.v.); changed in 1353 by William Bateman, bishop of Norwich, into 'The Hall of the Annunciation, &c.'; and in 1558 by the third founder, John Caius, M.D., into 'Gonville and Caius College.'

Calasirians and Hermotybians. The Egyptian military, an hereditary caste spoken of by Herodotos (ii. 166). He numbers the former at 250,000 men, and the latter at 160,000. Their settlements were in Lower Egypt, the Calasirians in eleven nomes and the Hermotybians in five. Herodotos speaks of linen tunics fringed about the legs, οὓς καλέουσι καλασίρις (Coptic kali, a leg). The derivation of the other word is extremely doubtful.

Cala'thumpian (A). A nothingarian, or anythingarian, or what you please in regard to the question 'What religion are you of?' From calathus, a waste basket for all sorts of odds and ends.

Calatrava (Knights of), 1158. A Spanish military order founded by Sancho III. of Castile, when he took from the Moors the strong fort of Calatrava. The mantle is white, decorated with a red cross cut out in the form of lilies.

Calcuith, in Lancashire (The Council of), 785–787. I. By this council a third archbishopric of England was made, viz. Lichfield, and Higbert was appointed primate. The authority and decisions of the first six general councils were also adopted. In 803 Lichfield was again reduced to its original rank of bishopric.

II. A.D. 816, decided that the saint, in honour of whom a church was dedicated, might be pictured on the walls; that no Scotch clergyman shall officiate in an English church, because they refused to admit the primacy of the bishop of Rome; that no private monastic institution shall be allowed; and that baptism shall be by immersion, and not by sprinkling.

Caleb d'Anvers. The pen-name of Nicholas Amhurst, a noted political writer who conducted a paper called the 'Crafteman,' and died in 1742 in most miserable circumstances.

Caledonia. A name given by the Romans to that part of Scotland lying between the Forth and the Clyde; so-called from the tribe of the Caledonii. The name disappears in the 4th cent., and the people of Scotland began to be called Picts (to the east) and Scots (to the west). In more modern times Caledonia is a poetical name for Scotland.

What the Romans called Caledonii were the Celyddones, i.e. dwellers in the woods.

Caledonia. The Irish race of kings in Caledonia are said to have been—

Constantine I. king of Scotland.

Caledonian War (The), A.D. 208. When the Roman emperor Sevērus was sixty years old, he went with his two sons, Caracalla and Geta, into Scotland to repel an invasion. He marched to the northern extremity without meeting an enemy, but it cost him the loss of 50,000 men. At length the Caledonians sued for peace, but the moment the Roman legions were withdrawn they were up in arms again. While Sevērus was preparing to extirpate the Caledonians, he died.

If Ossian is historic, it was Fingal who opposed Severus, and Caracalla is called by Ossian 'Caracul, son of the king of the world' (Poems, I. p. 175). Strange that Ossian should call Antoninus by a nickname not used even in Rome till four years after the war!

Calendar. The French Republican calendar was the work of Fabre d'Eglantine and M. Romme.

Autumn months: Vendémiaire, Brumaire, Frimaire.
Winter months: Nivôse, Pluviôse, Ventôse.
Spring months: Germinal, Floreal, Prairial.
Summer months: Messidor, Thermidor, Fructidor.

1. Wheezy, Sneezy, Freezy.
2. Slippy, Drippy, Nippy.
3. Showery, Flowery, Bowery.
4. Wheaty, Heaty, Sweety.

Calenders, 13th cent. The 'Purists,' a species of Moslem hermits, founded by Youssouf, an Arab of Andalusia. They have no fixed abode, but lead a vagrant life under the vow of poverty. They have proved themselves dangerous sectaries, who have always taken an active part in all Oriental revolutions. See 'Santons.'

Calends. See 'Dict of Phrase and Fable,' p. 132.

Ausonian Calends (Ausoniæ Calendæ), the Roman Calenda.

Greek Calends (Græcæ Calendæ), never; there were no Greek Calends.

Intercalary Calends (Intercalares Calendæ), February.

Calends of Janus (Jani Calendæ), New Year's day (Statius).

The Women's Calends (Fœmineæ Calendæ), the 1st of March (Juvenal, ix. 53)

Tristes Calendæ, pay-day. The Romans paid on the 1st of every month.

Calif. The successor of Mohammed the prophet, both in temporal and spiritual power. At first there was but one calif, whose empire was called the califate, which for three centuries exceeded the Roman empire in extent; but in 970 there were three califates, viz. one at Bagdad, one at Cairo, and one at Cordōva.

In 1031 the califate of Cordōva ceased.

In 1158 the calif of Bagdad fled to Egypt before the sword of the Mongula.

In 1517 the Turks conquered Egypt, and the sultan thus became the one and only calif.

In 800 Tunis and Fez made themselves independent for a time, and in 821 Taher established for a time an independent califate at Khorassan.

Calif of the West (The), A.D. 756. So Abd-el-Ramah, founder of the Cordōva califate, styled himself (781–787). This califate lasted till 1031.

The calif of Bagdad was then called Calif of the East. Since 1517 the sultan has been the only calif.

California (U.S. America). The inhabitants are called 'gold-hunters.'

Caligula. Caius, son of Germanicus, and successor of his uncle Tiberius, in the empire of Rome. So called because he wore the caliga or clouted shoe of the common Roman soldier. The caliga was a close shoe, studded with nails, and bound on the foot and ankle by straps. It was not worn by the superior officers, but Caius was an insane fool.

Caligātus meant 'a common soldier,' one of the rank and file. It was this monster who said Oh, that all the Roman people had but one neck, that I might decapitate Rome at a blow!'

Calixtins (The), or 'Calixtines' (3 syl.), 1424. Bohemians in the Hussite war. These were for the most part the gentry and better classes. So called because they insisted on retaining the calix or cup in the Eucharist. The priests had only very recently withheld the cup from the laity. The more violent party were called Ta'borites (3 syl.).

Calixtines' Confession of Faith (The).

1. The Word of God ought to be freely and regularly preached thoughout all Bohemia.

2. The Eucharist ought to be administered to all communicants.

3. The clergy ought to follow no secular occupation.

4. All crimes ought to be punished by those in lawful authority, whether committed by clerks or laymen.

Call of Abraham (The), B.C. 1921. The command from God to Abraham to leave the land of his birth and sever himself from his relations, friends, and neighbours, who were idolaters, and to go afar off to live among strangers, that he might be the founder of a people which would serve God and abjure idolatry. He was 75 years old at the time; the land he left was Ur of the Chaldees; the land he went to was Canaan, 'the land of promise;' and the son of promise was Isaac, father of the twelve patriarchs.

Call of the Abbasides (3 syl.). Abu Moslem, A.D. 750, the founder of the Abbaside califs, who removed the seat of empire from Damascus to Bagdad.

Call of the House (A). An imperative summons to every member of parliament to be present in his place, when the sense of the whole house is deemed necessary.

In 1820 such a call was made to pass an opinion respecting the trial of Queen Caroline. On the day appointed the Speaker (in the House of Commons) calls over the names of the county members first, and then of the borough members, both in alphabetical order. Absentees are committed to the custody of the serjeant-at-arms.

Callias (Peace of), B.C. 371. Between Sparta, Athens, and their allies. Thebes was excluded. Callias was the Athenian representative.

Callippic Cycle (The). Meton's cycle corrected by Callippus, B.C. 330. In B.C. 432 Meton set up a column in Athens which recorded that 235 lunar months corresponded to 19 solar years. This was too long, and made an error of nearly a day and a half in a century. Callippus discovered that a year consists of 365¼ days, and proposed a cycle of 76, or 4 Metonic cycles ($19 \times 4 = 76$). A further correction was made in 1512, whereby the error of a day requires the lapse of 3,000 years.

Callippic Period (The). Began with the new moon of the summer solstice, B.C. 330.

Calojoannes. John II. (Comnēnus), emperor of the East, so called from his extremely handsome person. Reigned 1118–1143.

Calottistes (3 syl.), or 'Le régiment de la Calotte,' in the time of Louis XIV. A society of satirists, headed by Torsac and Aimon, who sent a 'calotte' (or small cap) to any public character who had exposed himself to ridicule. The 'calotte' was worn by monks over their tonsure, and was to cover the 'weak part of the head' of the receiver. The armorial bearings of the Calottistes consisted of various symbols of folly, and their motto was 'C'est régner que de savoir rire.'

Calvary (A). A chapel with a cross, generally placed, in Catholic countries, on an eminence, or at the meeting of two or more roads. The calvary of Montmartre and of Mont Valérien, near Paris, are well-known examples. The latter still attracts many persons during Holy Week. The approach to a calvary is called the 'Via Dolorosa,' and at each stone which marks a station a prayer should be said.

A little farther on . . . is a colossal wood-carved calvary, and beside it a small but very rich chapel.—OUIDA, Bimbi, The Nürnberg Stove.

Calvinism, 1561. The religious tenets of John Calvin of Picardy. They are generally called the five points: (1) Predestination and reprobation; (2) original sin; (3) particular redemption; (4) irresistible grace; (5) the perseverance of the saints.

Calvinist. A Christian whose tenets are Calvinistic. See 'Calvinism.'

There are Calvinistic Baptists, Calvinistic Methodists, Welsh Calvinists, and even in the Episcopal Church there are some few of a Calvinistic tendency.

Calvinistic Methodists, 1741. A body which seceded from Wesley, especially on the doctrine of election. Whitefield was the leader of the Calvinistic Methodists. After Whitefield's death they divided into two; (1) Lady Huntingdon's Connexion, and (2) the Tabernacle Connexion.

Calvin's Daily Offices. For family prayer, as well as for morning and evening services, in the reformed churches. It was used in the reformed churches of France after their organisation in 1555. Various modifications have been introduced from time to time. It was at one time much used in Scotland, and John Knox died repeating words of Calvin's 'Daily Offices.'

Camal'dolites (4 syl.). See below.

Camaldulensian Order (The). 'Camaldules,' or 'Camal'dolites' (4 syl.), 1010. A very austere religious order first established in the vale of Camaldŏli by Romuald, a Benedictine monk; and approved by Alexander II. in 1072. The order is almost extinct.

Camarilla (A). A royal clique, junto, or secret council, composed of the sovereign, the priests, and the intriguing ladies of the court. It was for a long time part of the Austrian government. Some of the sovereigns of France and England too had their camarillas.

Cambray (League of), 1508. Between the pope, Louis XII. of France, and the Duke of Ferrara, 'to blot out the Republic of Venice from the map of Europe.' The Venetians, however, bribed off the pope, who promised to break up the league. To this end he made a compact with the Swiss to chase the French out of Lombardy; and then Venetia, Spain and England joined the league, which was called 'The Holy Alliance' (1513).

Cambray (Peace of), or 'Paix des Dames,' 5 Aug., 1529. Between France and the Kaiser. So called because its terms were settled by two ladies, viz. the mother of François I. on behalf of France, and Margaret of Austria, the aunt of Karl V., on behalf of Germany. By the terms of this scandalous treaty, François stipulated to renounce the lordship of Flanders and Artois; to pay 400,000*l.* for the ransom of his two sons; to abandon Venice and all his other allies to the vengeance of Karl V.; and to marry Eleonore, sister of the emperor.

Cambria, Wales. The Welsh call their country 'Cymru,' 'Cymro' is a Welshman, 'Cymraes' a Welsh woman, 'Cymraeg' the Welsh language, and 'Cymruain' the adjective Welsh.

Cambria, or Cumbria, was also the country of the Bretts or Welsh in Dumbarton, Renfrew, Ayr, Lanark, Peebles, Selkirk, Roxburgh, Dumfries, and Cumberland, which formed a separate kingdom.

Cambridge Colleges. N.B.—The head of King's is a provost, of Queen's a president, and of all others a master.

HOSTELS

Ayerst Hall	1884
Cavendish College	1876
Selwyn College and Ridley Hall	1882

In 1873 Girton, and in 1880 Newnham, colleges for ladies.

Cambridge Platonists (The). The Whig party opposed to the Oxford Anglicanism of which Laud was the exponent. The leaders were Whichcote, Cudworth, Henry More, Culverwell, Rust, Glanvil, and Norris. They succeeded the puritan divines, and were succeeded by the school of Sherlock, Law, and Paley, who in turn gave way to the evangelical school of Berridge, Milner, and Simeon; and still later came the school of Trench and Hallam.

Camden and Powis Medals. For a poem in Latin hexameters. Founded by the Marquis of Camden, chancellor of the University of Cambridge, and called, from 1841 to 1866, the Camden Medal. On the death of the marquis, the Earl of Powis, high steward of the University, continued the medal, since called the Powis Medal. For undergraduates of not more than two years' standing.

Camden Professorship of Ancient History (The), in Oxford University. Stipend 600*l.* a year. Founded by William Camden, Clarencieux King of Arms, in 1622.

Came with a lass and will go with a lass (It). The words uttered by James V. of Scotland on his dying bed, when informed of the birth of a daughter.

'God's will be done. It came with a lass and will go with a lass.' Marjory Bruce, daughter of Robert Bruce, married Walter, the 6th steward of Scotland, and this alliance eventually brought the crown into the Steward family (called Stuart in French). The daughter born to James V. on his death-bed was Mary (Queen of Scots), whose son James removed to England, and called himself James I. of England and VI. of Scotland.

Camel-driver of Mecca (The). Mahomet the prophet of Arabia (570–632).

Camel People (The). So the Arabs call the inhabitants of the Sahara. The inhabitants of the towns of Barbary they call the Gold people, and those of the Tell, or cultivated lands, they call the Silver people.

Caméléon. A nickname given in France to Thiers the historian (1797–1877). See 'Attila le Petit.'

Cameron Highlanders (The). The 79th regiment in the British service, raised by Allan Cameron of Erroch in 1793.

Now called the Queen's Own Cameron Highlanders.

Cameronians (The). I. Scotch Covenanters, 1680. So called from Richard Cameron, who was slain at Airdsmoss, Ayrshire, 20 July, 1680. Richard Cameron disowned Charles Stuart (II.) for having violated the Engagement (q.v.), and his brother James as a papist. He collected some six-and-twenty horse and forty foot, which he called 'the host of Israel,' was attacked and fell. His followers hold the perpetual obligation of the Solemn League and Covenant (q.v.); they stoutly resisted the introduction of the English Church into Scotland, and continued to preach in the open air in violation of the Act against 'Field Conventicles' (q.v.). The party still exists in Ireland and North America, but is very small.

Graham of Claverhouse, viscount Dundee, has obtained dishonourable notoriety for his slaughter of the Cameronians.

II. The Scottish Rifles. Originally formed from the Glasgow Cameronian guard raised in 1786 from the followers of Richard Cameron, the puritan preacher. The first battalion is the 26th foot, and the second battalion the 19th.

Camisards (The), 1688. Calvinists of the Cevennes, who, after the Revocation Edict, took up arms under their leaders Cavalier and Roland, and defeated the French troops sent against them by Louis XIV. again and again. At last the Duke of Berwick extirpated them and desolated the whole province of the Cevennes in 1705. Called Camisards from the camise or smock which they wore. Clement VI. said they were 'a cursed brood from the execrable race of the Albigenses.'

Dr. Emms died 22 Dec., 1707, and the Camisards of England staked their reputation that he would return to life on 25 May. Guards were set over his grave; but it is needless to add that Dr. Emms slept on the sleep which knows no waking.

N.B. Any military surprise by night is a Camisade. Thus the taking of Pontoise in 1419 was a camisade, and the battle of Pavia in 1524 commenced with a camisade.

Camp of Boulogne (The), 1802. Preparations made by the Consul Bonaparte, at Boulogne, for the invasion of England. It contained a vast number of gunboats and flat transports, military stores and munitions of war; but it came to nothing.

Campbell's Acts. Two Acts of Parliament introduced by Lord Campbell (9, 10 Vict. c. 93) 1846, and (20, 21 Vict. c. 83) 1857, against the sale of obscene publications, prints, &c.

Campbellites (3 syl.). Reformers of New America, 1823, so called from Alexander Campbell of Bethany, U.S. He was a Baptist; protested against all creeds, and professed subjection to the Bible only. The Campbellites reject all school theological terms and doctrines attached to names such as Regeneration, Trinity and Trinitarian, Unitarian, Calvinism, Arianism, Arminianism, using only the words and phrases of Scripture. They baptize by immersion, and employ the word immerse instead of baptize.

Campo-Formio (Peace of), 17 Oct., 1797. In which Austria recognised the Rhine as the boundary of France; and ceded to that nation Milan, Mantua, and the Netherlands. France, on the other hand, restored to Austria the city of Venice, Istria, Dalmatia, and the left bank of the Adige.

Campus Martius. A vast plain to the west of Rome where was a temple of Mars. Here the assemblies of the people were held, here magistrates were elected, and here the young Romans held their athletic sports. In the latter times of the republic porticoes, triumphal arches, and magnificent public monuments were erected round the Campus Martius. At Paris a vast plain was laid out in 1770, which was called the Champ de Mars; it is south-west of the city, between the Ecole Militaire and the river Seine. And here in 1815 was held the federation of the Champ de Mai.

Champ de Mars (pronounce sharnd Marz), Champ de Mai (pronounce sharnd May).

Canadian O'Connell (The). Papineau, leader of the democratic party of Lower Canada, in the rebellion of 1836. He was made attorney-general when the two Canadas were united in 1840.

Canal Navigation (Parent of). Francis Egerton, 6th earl and 3rd duke of Bridgewater (1729–1803).

Candiotes (3 syl.). Natives of Candia or Crete.

Candle Hymn (The). The hymn sung at the kindling or lighting of the lamp at sunset.

Just then the voices of the singers . . . concentrated themselves . . . into an evening or 'candle hymn.'—PATER, Marius the Epicurean, chap. xxi.

Candlemas Day, 2 Feb. The feast of the Purification of the Virgin Mary, observed by Catholics with a procession of lighted candles. On this day the candles required for the services of the ensuing year are consecrated.

In Scotland Candlemas-day is one of the four term days, for the payment of rents, interest, taxes, &c. The other three term-days are Whitsunday, Lammas-day, and Martinmas-day.

Candle Rent. A rent given for an out-let or out-drift before the passing of the Enclosure Act in 1811. Those who liked met at a given time and place, and perfect silence was exacted. An inch of candle being lighted, one of the party named what he would give for the plot, and laid a shilling near the candle. If another would give more he stated it, and laid a shilling near the candle, returning the deposit to the first bidder. This went on till the candle had burnt out, and the last depositor rented the land at his own price for the year.

Canicular Period (A). 1,461 Egyptian years, which began with the heliacal rising of the dog-star. Also called a Sothic Period.

The first Canicular period was B.C. 2785. In 1460 Egyptian years, the sum of the deficits of the Canicular years equals one entire year. See 'Dog Days.'

Cannonade of Valmy (The), 20 Sept., 1792. The attack of General Kellermann on the Duke of Brunswick at Valmy was so called, because as many as 20,000 cannon shots were exchanged between the French and Prussians.

Not above 400 men on either side were slain in this battle, notwithstanding these 20,000 cannon shots. In Kellermann's army were the young Duke de Chartres (Louis Philippe), and his brother the Duke of Montpensier, then only 17 years of age. Kellermann was afterwards created by Napoleon 'duc de Valmy'; and on his deathbed he requested to be buried in the field of Valmy.

Canon (A). A cathedral dignity (Greek 'kanôn,' a rule), originally a Cenobite living under a certain rule, as the rule of St. Augustine, the rule of St. Francis, the canonical rule, &c. By the rule of Chrodegang (763) canons were bound to manual labour, silence, and confession twice a year. Later on the canons formed the bishop's council, and were paid by the bishops. The dean and canons of a cathedral form what is called 'the dean and chapter.' See 'Canons.'

Canon Law (The). 'Corpus Juris Canonici' (1151), a body of rules for ecclesiastical government compiled by Gratian, an Italian monk, from Scripture, the Latin Fathers, the decrees of general councils, decretals, and bulls; together with the decrees of Gratian, the decretals of Gregory IX. &c., the Clementine constitutions, and the Extravagants of John XXII. (20 in number), drawn up by John Lancelot in the time of Pope Paul IV. (1555–1559). See 'Civil Law.'

In 1603 Convocation was ordered to draw up a new body of canons, and 141 canons were decided on, which make the present code of ecclesiastical law in England. They were compiled by Bancroft from the articles, injunctions, and synodical decrees published in the reigns of Edward VI. and Elizabeth.

Canonical Hours (The Eight). Four great (in capitals), and four little (in italics).

MATINS or Nocturns before break of day. On festivals and Sundays they consist of 3 psalms, 3 anthems, and 3 lessons.

LAUDS, at dawn. They consist of 5 psalms, 2 or more capitules (i.e. Scripture extracts), prayers, and canticles.

Prime, at 6 o'clock in the morning, called the first hour of the day.

Tierce, at 9 o'clock in the morning, called the third hour of the day.

Sext, at mid-day or noon, called the sixth hour of the day.

Nones, at 3 o'clock in the afternoon, called the ninth hour of the day.

VESPERS, at sunset, or after 3 o'clock. They consist of 5 psalms, a capitule or extract from Scripture, a hymn, the Magnificat, one or more anthems, and prayers.

COMPLINE, at bed-time. Consisting of confession, one lesson, 3 psalms, one anthem, one capitule, one short 'response,' the Nunc Dimittis, and prayers.

Canonical Obedience. The obedience which the inferior clergy owe to the diocesan bishop, which bishops owe to the metropolitan, and the metropolitans to the pope in the Roman Catholic Church.

Canons. Means rules (Greek kanôn). The 'Canons of the Church' are the laws and regulations of ecclesiastical discipline, the decrees and decisions of the councils, and the creeds to which Christians should conform. See 'Canon.'

Canons (The Book of). In Scotch history. A code of the rules for the guidance of the Scotch Church, prepared by the Scotch bishops, in obedience to the command of Charles I.; revised by Laud, and confirmed by letters patent 23 May, 1635. The influence has been to widen the breach between the Scotch and Anglican Churches.

Canons Apostolic. A collection of ecclesiastical laws attributed to St. Clement, a disciple of Peter the apostle. This tradition requires proof; the probability is that these canons are of Eastern origin, and of the 3rd or 4th cent.

Canons Penitentiary. Rules enjoined on penitents for different sins, drawn from different councils, papal rescripts, and the writings of the Fathers.

Canons Regular of St. Geneviève, 1615. Confirmed 1622 by Gregory XV.

Canons Regular of St. Victor, 1113. Established in Paris by Guillaume de Champeaux, abbot of St. Victor.

Canons of Scripture. Those books of the Old and New Testament contained in our ordinary Bible, regarded by the church as authentic in contradistinction to the Apocryphal Books.

The books accepted by the church are called the canonical books.

Canons of the Church of England (The). Agreed upon in the synod held in London 1603–4. They are 141 in number.

Canonical obedience means obedience to these canons of the Anglican Church.

Canons of the Mass (The). Secret or inaudible words, and certain ceremonies employed by the priest between the Sanctus and the Pater, in which interval the elements are consecrated. Attributed to St. Jerome and Pope Sevērus.

In the Protestant Common Prayer Book this part of the communion service begins with 'We do not presume to come to this Thy table. . . .'

Canons of the Saints. A catalogue of the saints recognised by the Catholic Church. Hence canonisation, i.e. insertion of a name in the canon of saints; and to canonise is to insert the name in the list or canon.

Canossa. 'Has the Czar gone to Canossa?' This was part of a leader in the 'Standard' newspaper in Nov. 1887, referring to the visit of the czar to Berlin to visit the Emperor of Germany, with whom relationships had not been friendly. The meaning is, 'has he gone to eat humble pie?' Canossa, in the duchy of Modēna, is the place to which Kaiser Heinrich IV. went in the winter of 1076–7 to humble himself before Pope Gregory VII. (Hildebrand).

Canōsa, or Cannæ, in the south of Italy, is quite another place.

Canteen (A). A licensed store within a barrack, under the superintendence of a committee of officers and the charge of a sergeant. Here the best ale, beer, porter, tea and coffee, tobacco, with ginger-beer, soda-water, flour, bacon, bread, butter, and sweets, together with tapes, needles, buttons, marbles, tops, and a hundred other things are sold at less than half the price they would cost in any shop, and all of the very best quality. These canteens are very profitable, and the surplus is applied to the reduction of the cost of other charges to the men.

Canter of Coltbridge (The). 1745. The retreat of the dragoon picquets, immediately the Highlanders under Charles Edward fired their pistols. These rascal dragoons, not waiting to return the fire, rode off towards Coltbridge, nearer to Edinburgh. Fowkes and Gardiner now ordered a retreat, and the men went helter skelter through New Town towards Leith. Still dreading an attack, they made off to Preston, six miles further, and stopped not till they reached Dunbar. This is certainly one of the most dastardly actions on record.

Canterbury Riots (The), 1838. Caused by a Cornishman, named John Nicholl Thom, who went to Kent, and passed himself off as Sir William Courtenay. He said he was the Messiah, invulnerable, and immortal. Strange as it may appear, hundreds of respectable persons followed him. At length the military being called out the 'lunatic' was shot. No such absurd delusion and infatuation had been known for cen turies.

Cantred (A), of land contained 100 towns; so that an Irish cantred (says Ware) corresponded to the Saxon hundred. In the registry of Duisk Abbey, Connaught is said to contain only twenty-six cantreds (i.e. 2,600 towns).

Canuleian Law (The), B.C. 445. A law projected by Caius Canulēius, a Roman tribune, to allow patricians and plebeians to intermarry, and legitimise their offspring. This wise law utterly broke down the absurd caste of old Rome.

Canute the Great (995, 1016–1035).

Canute was called 'the Great' from the extent of his dominions (six kingdoms); he was called 'the Brave' for his military prowess; he was called 'the Rich' from his wealth and liberality, and 'the Pious' for his devotion.

Canute's Law, or 'Cnut's Law.' The laws enforced by King Canute, and the mode of government which then prevailed.

When the people clamoured for Canute's law, they meant that they wished to be governed in the same way as Canute governed the nation (1014-1036).

Cap. See also:—

Blue cap (republican)	Phrygian cap
Cardinal's red hat	Pope's cap
City flat cap	Purple caps (religious virgins)
Episcopal cap
Greek cap	Square caps
Green cap (bankrupt's)	Statute caps
Mortar-board	Yellow cap (Jews' badge)

Cap of Liberty (The). In the French Revolution was not like the cap worn by manumitted slaves in Roman history, but a red cloth Phrygian cap, properly with two pointed ends behind. The annexed engraving is taken from a 25 centime-piece in the year 3 (i.e. 1794–1795). See 'Phrygian Cap.'

It was and still is called 'Le bonnet rouge.' 'Bonnet' means a woollen cap, 'mortier' a velvet one.

Cap of Liberty (The). Worn in the Roman states by manumitted slaves; was made thus, according to a coin of Brutus, after the death of Cæsar. It was made of red cloth, and those who wore it were called 'pileāti,' i.e. wearers of the 'pileus.' In revolutionary émeutes at Rome the pileus was sometimes hoisted on a spear. After the murder of Cæsar, Brutus and his rebels adopted the red cap as a token of their republican sentiments.

The pileus was commonly worn at games and festivals. The sick also wore it as more convenient than the 'galērus' or the broad-brimmed 'petāsus.'

Cap of Maintenance (The). One of the regalia of state belonging to the British sovereigns, and carried before them at the coronation and other national solemnities. Caps of maintenance are also carried before the mayors of several cities in England. It is made of crimson velvet lined with ermine, and has two points behind. Most of the reigning dukes of Germany and various families of the British peerage bear their crests on a cap of maintenance.

'Mantenementum' (says Ducange) means 'administratio'; and the cap of maintenance, without doubt, is the symbol of administrative power.

Caps (The), 1738–1771. The popular faction of Sweden under Frederick and Adolphus Frederick. They upheld the treaty with Russia, and wore the Russian cap as a badge of their proclivities; they were also friendly to England. The opposite faction were called the Chapeaux or Hats, and wore the French 'chapeau' as their badge, to show their French proclivities. They wanted to roll back the government into an oligarchy. The leader of the Caps was Count Horn; the leader of the Hats was Count Syllenborg. Gustavus III.

prohibited the names and broke up the factions, 1771.

Gustavus courted the Caps, that is, the citizens and the people, and thus received the services of the burgher guard of the capital. The Caps were only too ready to assist in pulling down the haughty and oppressive aristocracy.—HOWITT, Hist. of Engl., 'George III.,' chap. iv. p. 95.

Carlyle says: 'Faction of Caps, that is night-caps, as being somnolent and disinclined to France and war. Seldom has a valiant nation sunk to such depths.'

Capability Brown. Lancelot Brown, the landscape gardener, was so called from his constant use of the word in regard to the sites submitted to his skill (1715–1783).

Bute . . . employed Capability Brown (1771) . . . to sound Chatham as to a coalition.—HOWITT, Hist. of Engl., 'George III.,' chap. iv. p. 87.

Capetian Dynasty (The). The third race of French kings (987–1848). In 1270 the Philippine or elder branch succeeded, and in 1328 the younger branch, called the Valois. In 1848 Louis Philippe abdicated, and the line ended.

Huguet Capet appeared in public in an abbot's cope, for he was abbot of St. Martin de Tours, but never crowned. He was called Capet-us, which means one who wears a capot, or abbot's cope. In 1792 the monarchy was interrupted by the First Republic. In 1804 Napoleon I. became Emperor of the French. The monarchy was restored in Louis XVIII., Charles X., and Louis Philippe. In 1848 the Second Republic was introduced. From 1852 to 1873 the Empire was restored in Napoleon III., after whose captivity the Republic was again restored.

Capitoline Games (The), A.D. 86. Instituted by the Emperor Domitian to commemorate the saving of the Capitol by the sacred geese when Rome, B.C. 390, was invaded by the Gauls.

Capitularies. The laws of the Frankish kings are so called because they are subdivided into 'capitula' or chapters. Ducange says any laws reduced into a code may be so called; but the most famous are the Capitularies of Charlemagne (827) compiled by the Abbot Angesius of Fontenelles (3 syl.), and those of his son Louis le Débonnaire.

Capitulation Resolution (The), 1612. Granting absolute religious liberty and equality, because the estates of Austria, leagued in the Union of Horn, refused otherwise to do homage to Mathias, the new kaiser. Ferdinand II., who succeeded Mathias in 1619, wholly disregarded the capitulation, and acted on the motto, 'Better a desert than a country full of heretics.'

Capitulation of Dantzig (The), 26 May, 1807.

Capon Tree (The). An oak on which six followers of Charles Edward were hanged on Tuesday, 21 Oct., 1746, viz. Colonel James Innes, Peter Lindsey, Ronald Macdonald, Thomas Park, Peter Taylor, and Michael Delard. Called the Capon Tree because under it the judges and their retinue regaled themselves with capons on their way from Newcastle to Carlisle. The tree no longer exists.

Cappel (Wars of), 1529, 1531. These were religious wars between the adherents of Zwingli the Swiss reformer and the Catholics. The Zürichers sided with Zwingli, but the Catholics of Lucerne, Schwyz, Uri, Unterwalden, and Zug opposed them. On 11 Oct., 1531, in a conflict at Cappel, in Switzerland, Zwingli the reformer was slain.

The war of 1529 was patched up by a peace.

Capriana (Peace of), 1441, between Venice and Milan. Celebrated by the marriage of Sforza with Bianca, only child of Filippo Maria Visconti, duke of Milan.

Captain Cobbler. An insurgent leader in 1536, who with Dr. Mackrel headed a rising in Lincolnshire. Some 20,000 followers presented a petition to Henry VIII. complaining of extortion and misgovernment. The King replied: 'Ye are presumptuous—the rude commons of one shire, and that the most brute and beastly of the whole realm—ye would rule your prince whom ye are bound to obey and serve with your lives, your lands, and your goods. Mind your own business and leave government to your betters.' Captain Cobbler (Melton) and Dr. Mackrel, with thirteen others, were executed.

'Captain' Grant, sometimes called 'Cooney.' A famous Irish burglar, executed 29 Aug., 1816. He was profusely liberal, most polite, and an incomparable dancer. He never injured anyone except in self-defence, and on no account allowed those who paid him blackmail to be robbed of anything. He was a great favourite with Irish farmers, and a welcome guest at every fair. His first operations were in Queen's County, his last in the county of Wexford

'Captain Grant' being surprised by the military, was committed as 'Cooney.'

Captain Moonlight, 1878. The name assumed by some unknown leader of Irish Fenians, who wrote threatening letters to those who resisted or refused to join their league. The following was received in May 1889 by a tenant on the Kenmare estate for being on friendly terms with the bailiff.

Fenian Lodge, Castle Island.

. . . I give you till Tuesday evening to let the people know you repent mending a cooler, receiving the milk and butter, and taking tea with 'Gloster.' If you don't ask pardon . . I will take your life within a week. . . .

(signed) CAPT. MOONLIGHT.

A diagram below of a coffin, a rifle, and a skull with cross-bones. (See 'Irish Associations.')

Captain Rag. Edmund Neale Smith, the poet (1668–1710), so dubbed at Oxford.

Captain Swing (1830–1833). An assumed name adopted by the writer of threatening letters to those who used threshing instruments instead of flails. As the letter was generally followed by the burning of ricks, the 'captain' was called 'Swing the Rick-burner.' There was a life published by Carlile, Fleet Street, of 'Francis Swing, the Kent burner,' in 1830, pp. 24. Another, published by Rooke & Varty, Strand (? 1831), called 'The Life and Death of Swing the Rick-burner.'

Captains of Liberty, 1270–1291. Oberto Spinola and Oberto Dona of Genŏa, who seized the supreme power from the podesta, and ruled the state for 21 years. Under them was a magistrate called the Abbate del Popolo.

Captivity of the Popes (The), 1309–1377. The time that the popes held their court and resided at Avignon, instead of Rome. It was followed by 'the Great Schism of the West,' when there were two or more popes, one at Rome and one at Avignon or Basel (Bâle).

Boniface VIII. anathematised Philippe IV., le Bel, of France; whereupon the king seized him, and the pope, angry and vexed, fretted himself into a fever and died. Philippe then secured the papal chair for Bertrand de Goth (Clement V.), on condition that he stigmatised the memory of Boniface, assisted in suppressing the Knights Templars, and consigned to the king for five years the tithes of all the church property in France. In order to carry out these conditions Clement V. took up his residence in Avignon. The time that the popes resided in France is called 'the seventy years' captivity.'

Captivity (Popes of the). (1) Clement V. (1305–1314), who removed his court from Rome to Avignon.

(2) John XXII. (1316–1334). Louis of Bavaria set up Nicholas V. in opposition to John, but John called him antipope, and succeeded in imprisoning his rival.

(3) Benedict XII. (1334–1342).

(4) Clement VI. (1342–1352),

(5) Innocent VI. (1352–1362).

(6) Urban V. (1362–1370).

(7) Gregory XI. (1370–1378), who removed his court back to Rome in 1376.

These are not anti-popes. The anti-popes followed the popes of the captivity. See 'Anti-popes,' p. 81.

Capucins, or 'Capuchin Friars,' 1528. Reformed Franciscans established in Italy by Matteo Baschi; established in France at Meudon in 1585; in Spain 1606. So called from the cappucio, capuche, their head-dress. See 'Franciscans.'

Capulets and Montagues (3 syl.), or Capuletti and Montecchi. Two noble families of Verŏna, whose feuds have been rendered familiar by Shakespeare's tragedy of 'Romeo and Juliet,' 1303. Dante in his 'Purgatorio' (VI.) alludes to the same. The story of Romeo and Juliet forms one of Bandello's famous tales (1554).

Caput (The). The council of the Senate in Cambridge University, consisting of the vice-chancellor, one doctor in each of the three faculties, and two masters of arts. This caput represents the senate. A muster, called a 'congregation,' is held once a fortnight. A measure passed or licence granted by the Caput is called a Grace, and a Grace for a degree, duly signed by the prælector of the college to which the candidate belongs, is called a Supplicat.

Caqueux. So the Cagots (q.v.) are called in Brittany.

Caracalla. A Roman emperor (211–217), so called because on his visit to Gaul he brought home a number of Gaulic garments, called caracalla, which he both adopted himself and compelled all about his person to adopt also. Caracalla's name was Bassiānus, and he was usually called Antoninus.

The caracalla was like what we now call a frock coat, much more convenient than the Roman toga.

Caracci of France (Le). Jouvenet (1647–1707), being paralysed on the right side, he painted with the left hand.

Caracci School of painting. See 'Incamminati.'

Caraites (Kara-ites), 8th cent. Those Israelites who reject the authority of the Talmud. Those who admit it are called Talmudists. They were textualists, confining their faith to the text of scripture, and rejecting tradition.

Caravats. The Ribbonmen of Tipperary, Kilkenny, Cork, and Limerick. Organised in 1808. See 'Irish Associations.'

The Caravats had been called 'Pauddeen Gar's-men,' till one of their number, prosecuted (in 1810) by the Shanavests for burning the house of a man who had taken land over his neighbour's head, was hanged, and Pauddeen Gar declared he would not leave the place of execution till he saw caravat about the fellow's neck.—BROWNE, Narrative of State Trials in the Nineteenth Cent. (1882), vol. i. p. 400. (Quoted in 'Notes and Queries,' 1882, p. 446.)

Carbonari (The). 'The charcoal burners,' 19th cent. A secret political and 'religious' society of Italy, having for its object the expulsion of Austria and the establishment in Italy of a democracy. It spread into France in 1818, where it aimed at the downfall of the restored Bourbons. The society was organised into companies of twenty called vendita, and the central assembly was called the alta vendita; and the united lodges, the republic. The name originated with the Guelfs, who, in order to elude the Ghibellines (masters of Italy), met in the woods in the cabins of the charcoal-burners.

It is said that the Carbonari established themselves in the Forest of Ardennes as far back as A.D. 445, but in the reign of Charlemagne became incorporated with the French nation. They were noticed at Naples in 1527 as a dangerous political association, and Pope John XXII. tried to put down their gladiatorial contests.

Carbonarism, or 'The Rule of the Carbonari,' 1808. Scarcely known till 1815, when Maghella, the Genoese, established affiliated lodges in Naples and the Roman States. The ostensible object of the society was the suppression of vice, the real object the establishment of republicanism. The initiated, called Good Cousins, were divided into apprentices and masters. In 1821 Paris was made the head-quarters, but the society was called 'The Associated Patriots.' After the July revolution (1830), a split was made in the society; the French portion called itself the 'Charbonnerie Démocratique,' and the Italian portion called itself 'Young Italy.' See 'Santa Fedists.'

The lodge of the Carbonari was called 'a hut.' Inside was 'the place for selling charcoal;' outside was 'the forest.' The political opponents were called 'Wolves.' Carbonari meant 'charcoal-burners.' All the insurrections between 1819 and 1822 were instigated by the Carbonari. The 'Secret Association of the Holy Faith' (q.v.) declared war to the knife with the Carbonari.

Carders, 1808. The Ribbonmen of East and West Meath, Roscommon, and part of Mayo. See 'Irish Associations.'

Cardinal Canons. Canons attached, in cardinali, to a church, as a priest is to a parish.

Cardinal Carstairs, 1649–1715. Born at Cathcart near Glasgow; was no cardinal, but a great friend and adviser of the Prince of Orange. It was by the advice of William Carstairs that William planned his invasion in 1688. He was made chaplain to William III., and it was from his enormous influence in church and state that he was popularly called Cardinal Carstairs.

Cardinal de l'Ignominie (Le). Cardinal de Loménie, finance minister of Louis XVI. He was so hated by the people that they burnt him in effigy. He took the oath to the civil constitution of the clergy, and being proscribed by Robespierre and sent to prison, died in 1794, as it is supposed, by his own hand.

Cardinal Mass, 'Missa Cardinalis.' A mass 'quæ in ara cardinali celebratur.' See 'Mass.'

Cardinal's Red Hat, 1244. Directed to be worn, instead of mitre, by Innocent IV., in the Council of Lyons. Twelve cardinals were then created in honour of Christmas day. As 25 Dec. was called the 'Sun's annual birthday,' and red was the symbolic colour of the sun, the reason and connection are obvious. The notion of martyrdom is wholly erroneous.

Galerus cardinalium rubeus, iis ab Innocentio IV. primum concessus in Concil. Lugd. ann. 1244, in pervigilio Natalis Domini, creatis 12 cardinalibus. —DU CANGE, vol. iii. p. 780.

Cardinalists, 1643. Adherents of Cardinal Richelieu when Cinq Mars headed the royalist faction to assassinate him.

Cards. P. A. Prince, in his 'Parallel History' (vol. i. p. 673) says: Cards were the invention of the Spanish Moors, and represented the seasons. Two colours represent the two equinoxes, and the four suits the four seasons. Spring was designated by a rose (now a diamond); summer by a trefoil (a club); autumn by an acorn (a spade); and winter by a cup (now a heart). There are twelve court cards to represent the twelve months and 52 cards to represent the 52 weeks in a year.

After the expulsion of the Moors, the Spaniards changed the original symbols, and made the four suits represent the four castes or grades of society—Chori, the ecclesiastics (called by the French cœurs, hearts); Spada, swords, the military rank (corrupted into spades); Dineros, coins to represent the merchant class (our diamonds); and Basta, clubs to represent the agricultural class. There are traces both in India and Egypt of this quadripartite division of society.

The French call spades pique, i.e. pikemen; clubs they call trêfle, i.e. clover; diamonds they call carreaux, i.e. square pavements.

In French cards the four kings are representatives of the four kingdoms: France, Judæa, Macedonia, and Rome. Thus Charlemagne (hearts) stands for France; David (spades) for Judæa; Alexander (clubs) for Macedonia; and Cæsar (diamonds) for Rome. In English packs hearts stand for England; spades for France; clubs for the pope; and diamonds for Spain.

In the reign of Charles VI. of France the four queens represented Isabeau (clubs), the queen-mother; Jeanne d'Arc (spades); the queen herself was hearts; and Agnes Sorel was diamonds.

The four knaves were Hogier the Dane, La Hire, Lancelot, and Hector de Galard.

Carême. A perversion of Quaresme, which is a French contraction of Quadragesima (Qua'r'es'm'), the season of Lent which begins with Ash Wednesday, forty days before Easter.

Caricaturists (English). It is said that Hogarth and Cruikshank are our best; that Gillray exaggerated, and animal Rowlandson was a humourist; it was elegant Leech; Bunbury ('H.B.') was gaseous; 'genteel' Sayer was vulgar; Collet stupid; and that Seymour excelled in cockney foolery. John Doyle was the reputed author of the 'H.B.' sketches in 'Punch.'

Carizmians (The), or 'Chorasmins,' or 'Kharizms,' or 'Khovaresmians,' inhabitants of Kharizm or Chovaresm in Turkestan, south of the Aral. From 994 to 1231 this province was independent, and in 1193 the Carizmians ruled over Persia. Genges-Khan overturned the dynasty. A dynasty of Carizmians reigned in Delhi from 1213 to 1398, when it was succeeded by the Patans.

Carl X. of Sweden, 1622, 1655–1660. First of the 7th dynasty, called Deux-Ponts, succeeded his cousin Christina, who had abdicated.

Father, John Casimir; mother, Catharine (daughter of Carl IX., and sister of Gustavus Adolphus); wife, Hedwig; son, Carl XI.

Contemporary with Cromwell and Louis XIV.

Carle Sunday. The Sunday before Palm Sunday, from an ancient practice of eating carlings (gray peas) fried in butter, with pepper and salt, on that day. Perhaps the more orthodox food would be hallowed beans fried. See 'Sunday.'

It will be remembered that Twelfth Day was the bean feast, and the person who drew the bean was bean king for the nonce.

Carlists (The), 1833, of Spain, adherents of Don Carlos, brother of Ferdinand VII. Up to 1830 the Salic law prevailed in Spain; but Ferdinand VII., having no child except a daughter, announced that the succession would in future pass to both male and female. He thus set aside the succession of his brother Carlos for Isabel, an infant girl not three years old. Carlos resisted, and a civil war ensued from 1833 to 1839. In 1845 Don Carlos abandoned his claim, and died at Trieste in 1855 at the age of 67.

Don Carlos the younger (Count of Montemolin), after an unsuccessful struggle, was arrested in France, 1839, and renounced his claim. He also died the following year.

In 1871 the nephew of young Carlos renewed the struggle, but after five years' desultory fighting, he fled to France, and the contest ended.

 The 'Pragmatic Sanction' of Austria made Maria Theresa the heir of Karl VI. and set aside the Duke of Bavaria, who raised a civil war.

Carlo Khan, 1784. A name given to Charles James Fox from a popular caricature during the progress of his first India Bill. Fox is represented as the Great Mogul riding into Delhi on an elephant; Lord North and Burke are represented as leading the elephant. Burke has a trumpet, to indicate that he is Carlo Khan's trumpeter. It is supposed that Fox aimed at being khan or dictator of the East Indies, and this supposition is supported by a bill which, in 1783, he brought before parliament.

Carlovingians (The), 715–987. The 2nd French dynasty. So called from Charles (Carolus) Martel, maire-du-palais, and son of Pepin d'Héristal.

 Charles Martel, king 715–741; his son Pepin le Bref, 752–768; Charlemagne, 768–814, who was king of France and emperor of the West. He was succeeded by Louis le Débonnaire, 814–840.

In 840 a separation took place; the French kings were CHARLES LE CHAUVE, Louis le Bègue, Louis III., and Carloman, CHARLES LE GROS, Charles le Simple, Louis d'Outremer, Lothaire, Louis V. called Le Fainéant, 986–987.

The emperors were Lothaire, Louis his son, CHARLES LE CHAUVE, CHARLES LE GROS, Guy of Sopeto, Lambert, Arnould of Carinthia, Louis son of Boson, and Berenger, 906–924.

The kings of Germany were Louis the Germanic, Louis the Young, CHARLES LE GROS, Arnould of Carinthia, and Louis the Infant, 899–911.

The kings of Italy were for the most part the same as the emperors up to Louis son of Boson; but then follow Hugh of Provence, Lothaire, Berenger II., and Adelbert, 950–961.

Carlowitz (Peace of), 26 Jan., 1699. Between Venice, Kaiser Leopold, and the Turks. By this treaty the Turks ceded to Germany Hungary, Transylvania, and Sclavonia; and Turkey ceded to Venice the Morēa, in honour of Morosini, surnamed Peloponnesiacus. This peace was effected by the mediation of England.

The Turks reconquered the Morea in 1715, and it was made part of the kingdom of Greece in 1830.

Carmagnole. I. A revolutionary dress worn in France, especially during the reign of terror. It consisted of a blouse, a red cap, and a tricoloured girdle.

Blouse, pronounce blāze.

II. A street dance, in which men, women, and children promiscuously took hold of hands, danced in a ring, ran butting down the street, broke into small parties, and danced vehemently like Bedlamites, till ready to drop.

III. A song, 'Madame Veto' (q.v.), the refrain of which was 'Dansons la Carmagnole! Vive le son, vive le son du canon!'

IV. Sometimes red republicans were called Carmagnoles, and M. Barère designated the speeches made against Marie-Antoinette as 'Des Carmagnoles.'

V. Bombastic and fanatical reports of the successes and glory of the French arms. These were tried in the Franco-Prussian War (q.v.), but were found to be wind-bladders.

Carmagnole, pronounce kar-man-yole.
The word is from Carmagnola, in Piedmont, the great nest of the Savoyards, noted for their street music and dancing.

Carmathians (The), or 'Carmathites'. (3 syl.), A.D. 890–951. The followers of Carmath, the Mussulman reformer, who called himself 'the guide, the director, the demonstration, the Word, the Holy Ghost, the camel, the herald of the Messiah, and the representative of Mahomet, John the Baptist, and Gabriel. He relaxed the duties of ablution, fasting, and pilgrimage, allowed the indiscriminate use of wine and food, and enjoined the daily repetition of fifty prayers. His twelve apostles by the success of their preaching seemed to threaten Arabia with a revolution. The Carmathians were a secret society united and concealed by an oath of secrecy.

Carmelites (3 syl.), 1171. One of the four orders of begging friars and nuns founded by a Calabrian monk on Mount Carmel in Syria, and established in England in 1240. They dress in white and are called 'White Friars' from the colour of their dress, as the Dominicans are called 'Black Friars,' and the Franciscans are called 'Grey Friars.' The Carmelites abstain from animal food.

St. Theresa in 1540 established a reformed order called the Carmes-déchaussés, or Barefooted Carmelites. See 'Monastic . . . Orders.'

Carmental Gate (The), or Carmentālis Porta. One of the eight gates of Rome, very celebrated because it was the gate through which the Fabian clan (consisting of 306 men) passed, when the patricians rejected their agrarian law. They were all cut off by Veientines, and the gate was nicknamed Scelerata or cursed.

Carmenti Portæ dextro via proxima Jano est;
Ire per hanc noli, quisquis es: omen habet.
OVID, Fasti, ii. 201.

Carmes. See 'Carmelites.'

Carolin Books (The). Containing the judgments of the general council of the bishops of the West on certain religious questions which were mooted in the time of Charlemagne, especially the desirability of having pictures and images in churches as aids to devotion. Alcuin induced Charlemagne to submit the question to a general council, and the practice was condemned. See 'Iconoclasts.'

Carolina. So called in 1562 by Jean de Ribault in honour of Charles IX. of France, whose envoy he was. He settled in the south, but in 1565 the colony was massacred by the Spaniards. In 1663 some English settled there, and renewed the name in compliment to Charles II. of England, who granted the whole country to eight English adventurers. The nicknames of the North Carolinians are tar-boilers, tar-heels, buffaloes, and tuckoes; of the Southerners weasels.

Caroline of Brunswick. The divorced wife of George IV., and mother of the Princess Charlotte. It was Bergami, her chamberlain, with whom the queen's name was so slanderously connected.

Carolus. A silver coin worth ten deniers, struck in the reign of Charles VIII. of France (1483–1498). It bore the letter K, the initial of Karl. Hence the phrase 'Il a des Carolus'—he has lots of money. This word is quite common in French comedy, and is called sometimes a carle, charle, or carlo.

The English Carolus was what we now call a sovereign. It was a gold coin struck in the reign of Charles I.

Carosse à cinq sous, 1662. A French omnibus introduced by Colbert. Seven were started, each containing eight seats, and they were compelled to start at fixed times whether full or not. Three started in Paris from the Porte St.-Antoine, and four from the Luxembourg.

The modern omnibus, 'Entreprise Générale des Omnibus,' was established in 1827; and Shillibeer introduced the omnibus into London three years later, in 1830; the fare was 6d.

Carpenters' and Butchers' Insurrection (The), 1413. This was the great insurrection in Paris of the White Scarfs and White Hoods. The Carpenters or White Scarfs were the Orleans or Armagnac (Ar-man'-yak) faction; the Butchers or White Hoods were the Burgundians. The Carpenters prevailed, and after the bloody fray in the Place de Grève, the White Hoods were driven out of Paris and soon wholly disappeared.

Carpet-bag Régime (The), 1866–1876. When the Southern States of America were practically disfranchised after the rebellion, there grew up swarms of adventurers who went down to the Southern States and organised the negro voters, who got elected to all the chief offices, plundered the state treasures, contracted huge state debts, and stole the proceeds. Government in the South Carolina and Mississippi states was a mere caricature. When, in 1876, President Hayes refused the 'carpet-baggers' the protection of Federal troops, the régime fell to pieces, and the rule fell again into the hands of the whites.

Carpocratians (The). Disciples of Carpocrătês, who flourished under Hadrian (A.D. 130) at Alexandria. Carpocrătês taught that the world was made by angels; that Jesus was the son of Joseph and Mary, and that his body after his burial remained in the grave; he denied the doctrine of the resurrection of the body, but seems to have believed in the transmigration of souls.

Carrickshock Affray (The), 1832. An anti-tithe affray. A number of writs against defaulters having been issued by the court of exchequer, the process-servers, with a strong body of police, proceeded on their mission with secrecy and dispatch; but the Irish were in waiting, and suddenly a vast number armed with 'pitch-forks and scythes attacked the yeomen.' A terrible hand-to-hand fight ensued, and in a few minutes eighteen of the police, with their commanding officer, were slaughtered; the remainder fled. The coroner's verdict was 'wilful murder,' but not one single conviction was obtained.

Carrier of Europe (The). Denmark, which lets out for hire her merchant ships and men to foreign states.

Carrier's Battues, 1794. A device by Carrier for clearing Nantes of persons suspected of being disaffected towards the republic. Some 500 persons were placed on a bridge near Nantes (1 syl.), and shot down by cannons.

Carrier's Vertical Deportation, 1794. A scheme devised by Carrier to clear Nantes of persons suspected of not being red republicans. He confined 150 persons at a time in the hold of a ship, and drowned them in the Loire by scuttling the vessel. We are told that the number of persons thus 'deported' amounted to 32,000.

Carroll (Lewis). The pen-name of C. Lutwidge Dodgson, author of 'Alice in Wonderland,' 'Through the Lookingglass,' 'Phantasmagoria,' 'Hunting the Snark,' &c.

Carrousel. A species of tournament at one time very common and very popular in all the courts of Europe. It was not known in France till the reign of Henri IV. (1589–1610); but there were such sports in Italy before that time. The most famous carrousels in history were that of Louis XIII., and the two given by Louis XIV. in honour of Mademoiselle de la Vallière (one in Paris, 1662, and the other at Versailles in 1664). The 'Place de Carrousel' in Paris is the place where these fêtes were usually held. In 1750 a revival of the carrousel was attempted at Berlin, and in 1828 the cavalry school at Saumur held one in honour of the Duchesse de Berry. The Eglinton tournament was the last carrousel held.

Running with a lance at the pasteboard head of a Turk, or cutting it down with a sword, or firing at it with a pistol, were favourite tests of horsemanship in France.

Cartesians. Partisans of René Descartes, the French philosopher (1596–1650). Gisbert Voët charged him with atheism, and some of his books were placed in the Roman 'Index,' especially his 'Meditations.' Descartes said he could find only one thing that was not doubtful, and that was that he existed because he thought (cogito, ergo sum). From this he inferred that whatever 'thought' must also exist, hence God must exist. Now spirit cannot act on matter without a concursus on the part of God, the true cause of the action of mind on matter.

It is absurd to call Descartes an atheist. He was not orthodox, but a God was absolutely essential to his system. Of course, his axiom is a petitio principii. Why not 'ambulo, ergo sum'?

Carthu'sians (The), 1084. A monastic order founded by Bruno of Cologne. So called because their chief institution was at Chartreuse (in Latin Cartūsia), near Grenoble, in France. Their establishments, wherever situated, were called 'Chartreuse Houses,' corrupted into Charter Houses. They were introduced into England in the reign of Henry II., A.D. 1180. They adopted, in a great measure, the Benedictine rule, with additional austerities.

The Carthusian Rule was as follows:
To fast all Lent till six at night; never to eat meat at any time; and three days a week to fast on bread, salt, and water.
Each monk to have a separate cell, where he was to sleep and take in silence his solitary meals.
Every monk to wear a hair-shirt at all times.
All to work at agriculture, to be hospitable, and given to works of charity.

Cartoon of Pisa (The), by Michel Angelo. It represented some soldiers bathing, and suddenly disturbed by the appearance of the enemy. It was torn to pieces by Baccio Bardinelli out of envy of the young artist. An old copy of this cartoon is in the possession of the Earl of Leicester.

Carus Greek Testament Prizes. In the University of Cambridge, 1853. Two prizes of books, raised by subscription in honour of the Rev. William Carus, Fellow of Trinity.

Casa de Pila'tos. In Seville. It is a Moorish house said by tradition to have been removed from Jerusalem by angels. Murray's 'Handbook for Spain' tells us 'it was built (1533) in imitation of Pilate's house at Jerusalem by Fredrique Enriquez de Ribera, in commemoration of his having performed the pilgrimage to Jerusalem in 1519.' Others say it was built by Moorish captives for a duke of Medina Cœli. See 'Santa Casa.'

Cassation (Court of). France. For quashing the decision of other courts (casser, to annul). The only question this court has to decide is whether the tenor of the law and its administration have been correctly observed by the court from which the appeal is made.

Cassin'ians. In Latin Cassiāni. A law school which took its name from Cassius Longīnus, governor of Syria, A.D. 50. He wrote ten books on the civil law, and was a follower of the Sabinians (q.v.), or imperial party.

Caste. In India, a social class, to each of which certain pursuits are limited by the Laws of Manu, B.C. 900.

1. The Brahmans or sacerdotal class, which 'issued from the mouth of Brahma.'

2. The Chuttree or military class, which 'sprang from the arm of Brahma.'

3. The Baïs or mercantile class, which 'sprang from the thigh of Brahma.'

4. The Sudras or servile class, which 'sprang from the foot of Brahma.'

The Parïahs and Chandalas are nobodies, or worse, for it is pollution to be touched by such 'scum of the earth'

Castle (The), Dublin. The town residence of the lord-lieutenant. It is the headquarters of the principal public departments, and contains an armoury, an arsenal, and a chapel. Here are the offices of the chief secretary, who is practically the prime minister of the lord-lieutenant or viceroy, but he has nothing whatever to do with the police. His office is divided into two departments, each presided over by one of the two permanent under-secretaries. The lord-chancellor of Ireland and the law officers of the crown have offices in a wing of the castle. Prosecutions are initiated in the law-rooms of the Castle, and both the attorney-general and the solicitor-general of Ireland have their offices here.

Cat (The). So James I. used to call Chief-Justice Sir Edward Coke (1549–1634), noted for his 'Commentary on Littleton's Treatise on Tenures.' James called him 'the Cat,' because he always fell on his legs when he got into trouble. Thus, in 1616 he was removed both from his office of chief-justice and the council, because he refused to favour certain views of Villiers (the king's new favourite) on money matters; but in 1616 he married his youngest daughter to Villiers' brother, and was restored. Again in 1621 (27 Dec.) he was imprisoned in the Tower for supporting the privileges of the Commons, but was liberated 6 Aug., 1622.

Cat Hoax (The), 1815. When Napoleon was about to depart for St. Helēna, some wag in Chester had a number of handbills distributed, stating that the island was so overrun with rats that 16*s.* would be given for every full grown tom-cat, 10*s.* for every full-grown tabby, and 2*s.* 6*d.* for every kitten able to feed itself. The city on the day fixed was crowded with men, women, and children carrying cats. A riot ensued, the cats broke away and infested the private houses; 500 were killed, others were drowned, and many infested the neighbouring sheds and barns for many weeks afterwards. See 'Cats,' p. 152.

Catamaran' Admiralty (The), 1804. The English Admiralty which employed a catamaran to destroy the French flotilla at Boulogne.

The catamaran referred to was a machine invented by Fulton to be sent against an enemy's ship with a view of blowing it into the air. The machine employed on this occasion blew itself up with the commander and thirteen sailors, amidst the jeers of the French and the sarcasms of our own people. This was the first and last time that such a machine was employed by our navy.

Cateau Cambre'sis (Peace of), 2 April, 1559. Between France, England, and Spain, called in French history La Paix Malheureuse, because, after 65 years of war in Italy, the French had to renounce all their conquests in that peninsula and also Corsica.

Catechumens' Mass, 'Missa Catechumenōrum.' The part of the liturgy which precedes the 'Missa Fidēlium,' i.e. the consecration of the elements and the communion. That is the epistle and gospel, after which the catechumens were dismissed, the deacon saying 'Si quis non communicat, det locum.' See 'Mass.'

Caterans (Scottish history), outlaws, freebooters. Thus Sir Robert Graham, the outlaw who murdered James I. at Perth, was the leader of a band of caterans. (Gaelic, ceatharnach, a soldier.)

Iron stanchions on the lower windows . . . to repel any roving band of gipsies, or resist a predatory visit from the Caterans of the neighbouring Highlands.—Sir W. Scott, Waverley, chap. viii.

Cath'ari, 'Cathărès,' or 'Cathărists' (about A.D. 255), similar to the Waldenses (12th cent., latter part). A plain, unassuming, harmless, and industrious race of Christians, who placed their religion in faith, and entertained supreme reverence for the Bible. They rejected the dogmas of apostolic succession, purgatory, and papal supremacy; accepted only two sacraments; believed in only one Mediator, and therefore disavowed the advocacy of the Virgin Mary and of saints, and disbelieved in masses for the dead, the adoration of images and relics, and, of course, in indulgences also; and set their faces against second marriages. Sometimes called Bulgarians, sometimes Patarenes or Paturines, sometimes Popelitans or Poplicans, and in the Low Countries Piphles.

The word Cathări is the Greek katharoi, puritans. Their religious tenets were very similar to those of the 'Poor Men of Lyons,' and the Waldenses. Probably they rejected infant baptism, but it is a gross slander to call them Manichæans. Of course they were persecuted as Luther was in later times.

Catharine's College (St.). In Cambridge University, founded by Robert Wodelarke, D.D., chancellor of the University, 1473.

Familiarly called Cat'a.

Catharine de' Medici of Africa (The). Sophonisba, queen of Numidia (died B.C. 203).

Catharine de' Medici of China (The). Voo-chee, who married Kao-tsong. As François I., the father-in-law of Catharine de' Medici, was called Le Père des Lettres, so Tae-tsong, the father-in-law of Voo-chee, was called the 'Solomon of China,' and the greatest patron of letters of all the emperors of the celestial kingdom. As Catharine, on the death of her husband, ruled her sons like puppets, so Voo-chee ruled her son, and usurped the whole power. As the conduct of Catharine demoralised society and impoverished France, so Voo-chee demoralised and impoverished China. As Catharine alienated from her all France, so Voo-chee exhausted the patience of her subjects, who at last deposed her. See also 'Catherine.'

Cathedra Petri means Roman supremacy, or the supremacy of the Church of Rome, 'founded' by St. Peter. Hence the Church of Rome is styled 'Ecclesia Apostolica.'

Cathedral Beard (The). A long square-cut beard peculiar to ecclesiastics.

The fashion of his beard was just, for all the world, like those upon Flemish jugs, bearing in gross the form of a broom, narrow above and broad beneath.—BULWER, The Artificial Changeling, 1653.

Cathedral Builders of Florence. Arnolfo, Giotto, Ghiberti, Donatello, Brunelleschi, and Agnolo.

Cathedrals of the New Foundation. Those to which Henry VIII., after the dissolution of the monasteries, gave a new dean and chapter.

Catherine of Aragon. Wife of Prince Arthur and afterwards of Henry VIII. of England, was lineal descendant of John of Gaunt, whose fourth child and second daughter married Alfonso V. of Castile. See also 'Catharine.'

John of Gaunt; his daughter Joanna married Alfonso V. of Aragon, and their son was Juan II. of Aragon.
The son of Juan II. was Ferdinand V., who married Isabella of Castile, and the daughter of Ferdinand and Isabella was Katharine or Catherine, who first married Arthur (eldest son of Henry VII.), and then his younger brother, Henry VIII., by whom she was divorced.

Catholic Association (The), 1824. In Ireland. Abolished by Act of Parliament in 1825. It still existed in 1828, when the Brunswick clubs were formed; but after the passing of Catholic emancipation the association dissolved itself, 1829.

Catholic Emancipation, 1829 (10 Geo. IV. c. 7). The repeal of all laws which disqualified Roman Catholics from the enjoyment of civil rights and the free disposal of their property The Corporation and Test Acts had been repealed in 1828. In 1832 Jews were admitted to their elective franchise, in 1845 were admitted to municipal offices, and in 1858 were made eligible for seats in Parliament.

Catholic Epistles (The). Those seven epistles of the New Testament, not addressed to particular churches or persons. They are the Epistle of James, the three Epistles of John, the Epistle of Jude, and the two Epistles of Peter. Originally only 1 John and 1 Peter were accepted as apostolical, but in the 4th cent. the other five epistles were read as 'lessons,' and therefore received as canonical epistles.

The 2 and 3 John are anything but 'catholic.'

Catholicos. The primate of the Armenian Church, and of the Christians of Georgia and Mingrelia.

Catilines and Cethēgi (The). Conspirators who hope to mend their fortunes by rebellion. Cethēgus was one of Catiline's crew, a kind of O'Donovan Rossa of ancient Rome.

The intrigues of a few impoverished Catilines and Cethēgi.—MOTLEY, Dutch Republic.

Catnach Press (The). The press which published 'last dying speeches and confessions,' with accounts of executions of notorious criminals, such as Thurtell and Greenacre, Bishop and Williams, Fauntleroy and Corder. So called from 'Jemmy' Catnach, the printer of 'patter songs' and 'last dying speeches and confessions,' &c. One of his chief assistants was John Morgan, the 'last of the Catnach bards.'

Cato (The Polish). Thaddeus Reyten, deputy of Novogrodek, who in 1773 resisted the partition of Poland.

Cato the Younger. Sir John Barnard (1685–1764), the firm and upright patriot. A statue was erected to him in the Royal Exchange, afte which he never transacted business within the edifice, but always in the front of it.

Cato-street Conspiracy (The), 22 Feb., 1820. A conspiracy devised by Arthur Thistlewood to assassinate Lord Sidmouth, Lord Eldon, Lord Castlereagh, and all the other cabinet ministers at the great ministerial dinner to be given at the house of Lord Harrowby. One of the conspirators was to call with a note, and then the rest were to rush in and put the ministers to death. This done the conspirators were to fire the cavalry barracks by throwing fireballs into the straw-sheds. Then they were to take the Bank and the Tower. Two spies, Edwards and Hidon, kept the ministers well posted in all the plans. Thistlewood and four others were executed on May day (1820).

The conspirators met in a stable in Cato Street, near Edgware Road, London.

Catochiens, 1413. French rebels so called from their leader Catoche, a butcher. Like the Jacquerie (1357), they insisted, amidst blood and rapine, on stamping out the privileged classes and abolishing royalty in France.

Catskin Earls. Earls who wore catskin trimmings instead of ermine—that is earls prior to 1520, as Shrewsbury, Derby, and Huntingdon.

Some period subsequent to 1520, the catskin trimmings of earls was changed to ermine. The earls, however, created before that period were allowed to wear their catskin trimmings. The only ones existing are those of Shrewsbury, Derby, and Huntingdon.—Notes and Queries, 5 Sept., ix. 214.

Cats' Raffael (The). Gottfried Mind of Berne, in Switzerland (1768–1814). See 'Cat,' p. 150.

Caucasians (The). An ethnological division adopted by Blumenbach, including all the inhabitants of Europe (except the Fins); with the Hindûs, Persians, Assyrians, Arabians, Jews, and Phœnicians, of Asia; and in Africa, the Egyptians, Abyssinians, and Moors.

Dr. Prichard says this division includes two separate groups; language, not the form of the skull, being now considered the philosophical basis of ethnological groups.

Caucus, 1774. A meeting got together at Boston (Massachusetts) by Samuel Adams to resist the British Government and especially the Boston Port Act (q.v.). He induced thirty persons to join him, and appointed a committee of five to meet the provincial committees of Philadelphia 1 Sept. The scheme was kept a profound secret from the government, and 500*l.* was voted for the expenses of the delegates. The committee met in a calker's shed in Boston, called a calk-house, hence calk-hus, Caucus. See 'Patres Patriæ.'

Caudine Forks (The). 'Furculæ Caudinæ,' two mountain gorges near the town of Caudium, in ancient Samnium, where the Roman army was entrapped by Pontius in the second Samnite war (B.C. 321). Four legions under Titus Veturius and Spurius Posthumius, locked in these gorges by the Samnites, were obliged to surrender. They passed, as was customary, under the yoke. Terms were made by the Roman consuls, but the senate basely repudiated them. The consuls were sent back prisoners to Caius Pontius, the Samnite general, but he refused to accept them.

The phrase has become proverbial for a strategic trap.

Cauldron of Slaughter (The). In the Teutoberger Wald, where the Roman legions under Varus were cut to pieces by the Germans under Hermann in the reign of Augustus.

Cautionary Towns. Briel, Flushing, Rammekens, and Walcheren, which were placed in the possession of Queen Elizabeth (1585), as security for the payment of troops furnished by her to the Netherlands. Only one-third of the sum was ever refunded; but the 'Cautionary' towns were delivered back 14 July, 1616.

Cavaliere. In Venice was a title given to a noble who had been an ambassador. He wore a gold star embroidered on his robe. Thus Antonio Foscarini, ambassador to the court of France, was on his return to Venice in 1662 styled a 'cavaliere.'

Cavaliers and Roundheads, 1641. The royalists and puritans in the reign of Charles I. The royalists wore their hair long, flowing over their shoulders; the puritans cropped their hair short, and were called crop-haired or 'Roundheads.' The terms sprang up 25 Nov., 1641, on the return of Charles I. to London, when the parliament greeted him with a 'remonstrance' on his evil doings. The royal party had long hair falling in ringlets over their shoulders, the remonstrants wore their hair cropped short, studiously avoided all ornaments, and affected a very sober style of dress.

Cavalry (The British) is divided into mediums, heavies, and light cavalry.

The mediums consist of 13 regiments; the heavies of 2 regiments; and the light of 13.

(1) The mediums contain the 7 regiments of Dragoon Guards (numbered 1, 2, 3, 4, 5, 6, 7); 5 regiments of Lancers (numbered 5, 9, 12, 16, 17); and the 6th Inniskilling Dragoons.

(2) The heavies consist of the 12th Royal Dragoons and 2nd Royal Scots Greys.

(3) The light contains the 3, 4, 7, 8, 10, 11, 13, 14, 15, 18, 19, 20, 21 Hussars.

There are no Light Dragoons now.

Cavendish College. In Cambridge University. Founded by the County College Association, and named from William Cavendish, duke of Devonshire, chancellor of the University at the time, 1882.

The chief objects are (1) economy; (2) to train for schoolmasters; (3) to enter at a somewhat younger age.

Cavendish's Creed (Mr.), 1769. 'I do, from my soul, detest and abjure, as unconstitutional and illegal, that damnable doctrine and position, that a resolution of the House of Commons can make, alter, suspend, abrogate, and annihilate the law of the land.' This was spoken in reference to Mr. Wilkes, who was returned to parliament time after time by the freeholders of Middlesex, but not allowed to take his seat.

A little more than a century later a similar contest arose between the Commons and Mr. Bradlaugh, junior member for Northampton. Ostensibly the cause of objection to Mr. Bradlaugh was his slighting the obligation of the required oath; but the real objection was his unorthodox opinions disseminated, like those of Wilkes, in a journal.

Cavendish Experiment (The). To discover the weight of our earth. Cavendish makes it 5·480 times the weight of water, and the total weight to be 6,000,000,000,000,000,000,000 tons (i.e. 6,000 trillions).

Cavendish Laboratory (The). For physical researches. Founded in Cambridge by William Cavendish, duke of Devonshire, Chancellor of the University from 1861 to Cavour Federation (The). 'La Federazione Camillo Cavour,' July, 1888. A political association in Italy for carrying out the great programme of Camillo Cavour: viz. monarchy, liberty, progress, and a parliamentary government. It may be called a progressive Tory policy, similar to the Primrose League in England.

Caxton Society (The), 1845–1854. For the publication of the literature of the middle ages. It published 16 vols. Named in honour of William Caxton (1412–1491), the first English printer.

Caymes Castles or 'Cayms Castles (Caym = Cain). Monasteries were so called by Wyclif.

Wyclif called monks 'devil's kitchens.'

Ceada. The deep pit into which the Spartans threw criminals condemned to death.

Cecilite Order. Founded by Lord Adelbert Cecil. The tenets resemble those of the Plymouth Brethren.

Celestial Empire (The), China. The emperor is called 'the Son of Heaven.' The first hypothetical sovereign was Puon-ku, i.e. Highest Eternity, and the second was Tien-hoâng = emperor of Heaven. Then followed Ti-hoâng = emperor of the earth; and then Gine-hoâng = emperor of the race of man.

Celestial Indexes. So the Irish round towers were called by some Irish annalists. Whence it is supposed their object was astronomical observations connected with sun-worship.

Celestial Judgments ('Breathe Neimidh'). The code of Forchern, A.D. 40, was so called by the Irish. It was a digest of the ancient laws greatly venerated.

Celestians. Pelagians (q.v.), so called from Celestius, a disciple of Pelagius (5th cent.). Condemned by the Council of Carthage in 412, and again in 430 by the Council of Ephesus.

Celestines (The), 1254. A religious order, a branch of the Benedictins founded by Pietro da Morone (Celestine V.). Suppressed in 1778. The 'Quai des Célestines' of Paris was so named because the chief house of the Celestines was behind the arsenal on the Quai called after the order. They adopted the Rule of St. Benedict.

Cellamare's Conspiracy, 1718. This was a conspiracy to outwit the Quadruple Alliance, by ousting Philippe, duc d'Orléans, from the regency of France, and giving it to Felipe V. of Spain. Cellamare was the Spanish ambassador at Paris, and acted on the instructions of Alberoni. The conspiracy being discovered, Cellamare was conducted to the frontiers, and others concerned in the plot were sent to the Bastille.

Cellites (2 syl.) or 'Celli.' Lollards, Matemans, Alexians or Brethren and Sisters of Alexius, who rose in Antwerp about 1300, and were admitted by Sixtus IV. amongst the religious orders in 1472.

Nullus Christianus ad fana, vel ad petras, vel ad fontes, vel ad arbores, aut ad cellas [i.e. lucellos, groves], vel per trivia luminaria faciat, aut vota reddere præsumat.—St. Audoenus, Life of St. Eligius, bk. ii. chap. 15.

Celts or Kelts (The). A race which at one time peopled almost all Western Europe. They possessed France, much of Germany, most of Spain and Portugal, Ireland, Wales, Cornwall, and Brittany. The Celts of France were called Gaels (Gauls), those of Britain and Belgica Cymri. Druidism was properly Cymric. After the Saxon and Danish invasions England largely became Teutonic, and after the Norman Conquest still more so.

In Ireland and the Highlands of Scotland we still find Gaels; but in Wales and Low Brittany we find Cymri. Kelt and Gael are mere varieties of the same word Kelt-ai, Galat-ai, Gall-i, Gaul, Gael.

Cenchi (The), 1293. A faction in Florence opposed to the Donati. So named from two powerful houses. At first both these factions were Guelfs, but later on the Cenchi were Ghibellines, and the Donati Guelfs.

In Pistoia, an ally of Florence, there were two similar factions called the Bianchi (= Cenchi, Ghibellines), and the Neri (=Donati, Guelfs). Dante the poet, though of the house of Donati, joined the Bianchi, and had his house pulled down over his ears.

Cenchi, pronounce Chen'-ke.

Central Committee of Insurrection (The), 1792. A committee of five (afterwards nineteen) federates which sat daily in one of the Jacobin clubrooms. The object of these five villains was to assassinate the king (Louis XVI.).

Their names were Vaugeois (grand vicar), Debessé of La Drôme, Guillaume of Caen, Simon (editor of newspapers, a native of Strasburg), and Galissot of Langres. These five were soon joined by fourteen others, such as Santerre, Camille Desmoulins, and Danton, &c.

Central Committee of the Communists (The), 1871. The insurgents' government, in opposition to the Republic with M. Thiers at the head, appointed after the Franco-Prussian war. It had nine sub-committees to superintend the several departments of finance, public instruction, foreign affairs, home matters, the army, the municipalities, and so on. The Hôtel de Ville was the seat of government. It lasted nine weeks, when it was stamped out by Marshal Mac-Mahon, with much bloodshed.

Centuria'ni. So the primitive Christians were called from their cointures or broad belts by which they were distinguished.

In ista autem Babylonia habitant . . . multitudo christianorum, qui dicuntur Centuriani . . . quia cingulum portant latum, vestimentum per quod recognoscuntur ab aliis.—Ordericus.

Cercle de Bourgogne (Le). The duchies of Brabant, Limbourg, and Luxembourg; the Franche Comté; the Comté Palatin; the counties of Flanders, Hainaut, Namur, Artois, Holland, and Zealand; the marquisate of Antwerp; and the seignory of Mechlin.

Ceremonial (The). The service book for the pope, embracing all that pertains to the various functions of his office. See 'Pontifical.'

Cerinthians (The). Followers of Cerinthus contemporary with the apostles. He maintained that Jesus was a proper man, the son of Joseph and Mary, but that, at baptism, God sent the first of the Æons named Christ, in the shape of a dove, upon him. He further taught that this Æon left the body of Jesus before death on the cross, for the Christ could not die, though the man Jesus, like other men, was mortal. Cerinthus considered the Mosaic law binding on all Christians.

According to Cerinthus the Saviour referred to this Æon when on the cross He cried, 'My God (or Æon), my God, why hast Thou left or forsaken Me?'

Cerinthus, the heresiarch, wrote a book on the millennium. Dionysius of Alexandria says ('On Promises,' book ii.)

that 'Cerinthus affixed the name of John to his forgery.'

Irenæus ('Against Heresies,' book i.), says that 'John the apostle once entered the public baths, but ascertaining that Cerinthus was within the same building, he (John) rushed out of the door, not enduring to be under the same roof with Cerinthus; and, as he fled, he cried to his companions, "Flee! Flee! Let us flee, lest the bath fall in, for Cerinthus is within."'—EUSEBIUS, book iii. 28.

Certiora'ri. A writ issued from a superior court to an inferior one to remove a cause depending in it. The writ commands the judges &c. of the inferior court 'to certify,' i.e. return, the records of the depending cause, that the party may be 'more fully assured,' or may have more speedy justice.

Cessation (The), 1645. In the Irish rebellion (q.v.), Charles I. being at war with the Parliamentarians, was greatly in want of money, and under hope of obtaining a subsidy from Ireland, commanded the Marquis of Ormond to treat with his Majesty's subjects in arms, and agree with them for a cessation of hostilities for one year. This was called the king's new and favourite expedient. The Irish insurgents granted the king 30,000*l.*, one half in cash and the other moiety in beeves. Never did any project encounter such a storm of opposition, indignation and rage, as broke out in Great Britain and Ireland at the proclamation of the cessation, especially from the English and the Scotch.

Cestui que trust (A). A person for whose benefit a trust is created. For example: if A founds and endows a professorship at Cambridge University, the professor who receives the endowment is the cestui que trust. Or, if A founds a church, the vicar is the cestui que trust, or, in old French, the fidei commissaire.

Chain of Silence (To shake the). In the tribal assemblies of the Scots in Ireland. It is mentioned in the celebrated Eric Fine case of the children of Turenn, cited in an article on the 'Ancient Irish Eric Fine' by R. R. Cherry, in the 'Law Magazine and Review,' No. 255 (Feb. 1885).

A celebrated contention between Goll and Finn MacCumhail had risen to such a pitch, that it could only be appeased by the intervention of the bards, who, shaking the Chain of Silence between the chiefs, succeeded in calming their strife.—T. MOORE, Hist. of Ireland, viii. p. 135.

Chaldaic Targums. Paraphrastic versions of the Old Testament in Chaldee for the use of the Jews, who, after the captivity, did not understand Hebrew (Neh. viii. 3). The oldest and best is that of Onkelos on the pentateuch, in the 3rd Christian cent. Next in value and age is that by Jonathan Ben Uzziel on the prophets.

Chaldee MS. (Translation from an ancient). A skit published in 'Blackwood's Magazine' in 1817. The authors were Hogg (the Ettrick Shepherd), Professor Wilson, and Mr. Lockhart. It really is a chronicle of the strife of Whiggism and Toryism in Edinburgh. The following persons are introduced: John Ballantine, Blackwood and Constable (publishers), Sir David Brewster, Professor Jameson, Lord Jeffrey, Professor Leslie, J. G. Lockhart, Henry Mackenzie (novelist), Macvey Napier, Professor Playfair, Sir Walter Scott, Charles Kirkpatrick Sharpe, Fraser Tytler, and Professor Wilson.

Chalk Sunday. The first Sunday in Lent is so called in Ireland from the common practice indulged in by young women on that day, of chalking the backs of young men who have not plighted troth to any one. See 'Sunday.'

Chamanism, or 'Shamanism.' A religious cult which spread among the Samovedes (3 syl.), Bouriates (3 syl.), and in the islands of the Pacific. The chief doctrines are that God is one whose habitation is the sun, and under whom are a host of ministering angels and genii, benevolent and malignant. The great evil spirit they call Chaïtan, and their priests they call chamans. The priests carry a horse's tail as a talisman. Their women, they say, have no souls; certainly they have no modesty.

Chamber of Liquidation (The), 1686. Erected by Carl XI. of Sweden for the purpose of liquidating the public debt by raising the nominal value of money, without increasing its real worth. Thousands were reduced to poverty by this arbitrary act.

Chamberlain (The Lord). A member of the privy council with a salary of 2,000*l.* a year. He has control over all the officers and servants of the royal chambers, except those of the bedchamber; over the physicians, surgeons, and apothecaries of the royal household; over the musicians, comedians, trumpeters, and messengers; over all tradesmen and officers employed, and over the state robes. All theatres in towns in which there is a royal palace must be licensed by him, and no new play can be acted without his licence. He issues also all royal invitations.

N.B. The lord great chamberlain is quite another officer. See below.

There is a vice-chamberlain, whose salary is 924*l.* a year.

Chamberlain (The Lord Great). An hereditary officer who has the government of the palace of Westminster. At coronations and state trials or banquets the fitting-up of the hall devolves on him; and when the sovereign goes to parliament he delivers the sword of state to any member of the administration he thinks proper, to be borne before the sovereign, he himself walking on the right-hand side. During the sitting of Parliament he has charge of the House of Lords, and issues tickets of admission on the opening or prorogation of parliament. The lord chamberlain is quite another officer, not hereditary, but dependent on the choice of the chief minister or premier of the time being.

Chamberlainars in Scotch history were courts of justice held by the chamberlain in the royal boroughs. There lay appeal from this court to the 'Court of the Four Boroughs' (q.v.)

Chamberlaine's Riot, 1288. Thomas Chamberlaine, a gentleman of fortune, under pretence of holding a tournament, assembled a number of associates at Boston, in Lincolnshire; their secret understanding being a raid on the town during a fair. In order to create confusion the conspirators set the town on fire, broke into the booths, and carried off the goods. Chamberlaine was arrested and hanged, but refused to implicate any of his companions (Edw I.)

Chambre à crucer, the torture chamber. It was a chest lined with sharp stones or nails, in which the victim was fastened up.

Chambre Ardente (La). 'The lighted chamber.' A court for the investigation of 'heretics' established in 1525 by François I. Also an extraordinary commission nominated in 1680 by Louis XIV., to judge Brinvilliers, La Voisin, and La Vigoureux (Italian exiles). Also the chamber under the regency, in 1716, to verify the accounts of the fermiers généraux. So called because they were quite dark and lighted only by torches.

The 'Chambre Ardente' of 1680 is also called 'La cour des poisons' (the court for the poisoners); and the 'Chambre Ardente' of 1716 is also called 'La chambre du visa' (the court of the endorsements).

Chambre Introuvable (La), 7 Oct., 1815. The French 'Mad Parliament' (q.v.), only the reverse of our house so called. It was ultra-royalist, and in its zeal for the aristocracy and clergy it tried to roll back the government into the ancient régime or the state before the revolution. It pronounced the banishment of all the conventionnels who voted for the death of Louis XVI., and went to such outrageous extremes that Louis XVIII. was obliged to dissolve it 5 Sept., 1816.

Chambre des Députés (Le), 4 June, 1814. The French House of Commons. It took the place of the Corps Législatif of the French empire, and at the accession of Napoleon III. the term Corps Législatif was restored (1852). It consisted at first of 430 members; was increased 'in the monarchy of July' to 459 deputies, but reduced to 200 deputies, 5 Sept. (1814). At first the office was for five years, and one-fifth retired annually; each deputy must be at least forty years of age, and pay a direct contribution of 1000 francs (40*l.*). But after 1830 the age required was reduced to thirty years, and the contribution to 500 francs (20*l.*). The king called the assembly every year, and if he dissolved it he must reassemble another within three months.

The upper house was called the 'Patrie' or Chambre des Pairs' (q.v.), which in 1852 was replaced by the Senate.

Chambre des Pairs (Le), 4 June 1814. The French House of Lords. The peerage abolished in 1789 was restored by Louis XVIII., and the Chambre des Pairs formed, with the Chambre des Députés the French legislature. In 1831 hereditary peerages were abolished and peers were named by the king. The Chamber of Peers was abolished in 1848 and in 1852 was replaced by a Senate.

Chambre du Visa, 1716. To verify and endorse the accounts of the fermiers généraux of France.

Chambres de Réunion (Les), 1679 Commissions formed by Louis XIV. to search into the ancient dependencies of the countries ceded to France by the treaties of Westphalia, Aix-la-Chapelle, and Nimeguen (2 syl.): viz. Vaudemont, Saarbourg, Saarbruck, Salm, part of Luxembourg, Homburg, Deux-Ponts, Montbéliard, Wissemburg, Strasbourg, and part of Alsace Inférieure. The Peace of Ryswyk (1697) compelled him to restore a large part of these acquisitions; but he retained Strasbourg and Alsace.

Champ de Boulogne (Le), 1803–4. The wonderful preparation of Bonaparte at Boulogne for an invasion of England. A large army was collected, and above 2,000 flat-bottomed vessels, built for transports, were moored at Boulogne, Etaples, and Ambleteuse. When all was ready the descent was deferred to the spring of 1804. In the meantime other matters diverted the attention of the First Consul, and in 1804 he was crowned emperor, so the invasion came to nothing.

The Column of Boulogne commemorates this 'Champ de Boulogne.'

Champ, pronounce sharn, the r silent.

Champ de Mai, or 'the Field of May.' After A.D. 755 the Champs de Mars were held in May. June 1, 1815, was held in Paris, in a large campus martius, the famous assembly called the 'Champ de Mai' during the 'Hundred Days' when Napoleon proclaimed, in the presence of the deputies, the electoral colleges, and the army, L'Acte additionnel aux constitutions de l'Empire. See below.

It was called 'the Field of May,' but was held 1 June.

Champ de Mai, pronounce Sharnd May.

Champ de Mars, or 'the Field of March.' A grand general assembly of Frank warriors held from time to time in Gaul from the 5th cent. till the time of Charles le Chauve (877), when all trace of them disappears. The objects of these conventions were twofold: (1) that of military reviews in which the freemen came to pay homage to their chief and bring their annual gifts; and (2) consultative deliberations upon what expeditions should be made, what should be done for the defence of the nation, and what laws should be passed for the better government of the state. From 755 these assemblies were held in May. See above.

Napoleon I. announced a Champ de Mai to be held in the great plain called the Champ de Mars ['Sharnd Marz'] of Paris, on 26 May; but it was not held till 1 June, 1815. The object was to proclaim L'Acte additionel aux constitutions de l'Empire.

Champagne Speech (The), 1767. A speech made by Charles Townshend, chancellor of the exchequer, after a dinner party in his own house, which astonished the whole country.

Horace Walpole says it was 'a torrent of wit, parts, humour, knowledge, absurdity, vanity, and fiction, brightened by all the graces of comedy, the happiness of allusion and quotation, and the buffoonery of farce.' He adds that it gave him the most singular pleasure he ever enjoyed.

Champion of the Cross (The). Prince Edward (Edward I. of England), who led a crusade (1269–1272). So called mainly from the wound he received from a poisoned dagger. The Emir of Jaffa pretended to be converted, and sent a letter to Edward, but while the prince was reading it the messenger stabbed him. The tradition is that Eleanor sucked the poison from the wound, but like so many other pretty stories, this is only a troubadour's tale.

Chancellor (The), of our Universities. The nominal head, but his duties are deputed to the vice-chancellor (q.v.). The first chancellor, in Oxford, elected for life was John Russell, bishop of Lincoln, in 1483. In Oxford the chancellor is elected by the House of Convocation (q.v.), in Cambridge by the Senate (q.v.). In both cases the office is practically held for life. The chancellor is expected to be present at his installation and on occasions of a royal visit.

The chancellor has power to deal with all offences, short of mayhem and felony, between members of the university.

. Mayhem is mutilation of an arm, leg, finger, eye, or fore-tooth. It takes no cognisance of a broken nose or broken jaw, or loss of an ear.

Chancellor (The Lord), 1078 Head of the Court of Chancery; lord keeper, holding the royal signet, which it is his duty to impress on all documents issued in the name of the sovereign. The lord chancellor is the highest lord in the realm; he appoints all justices of the peace, is a privy councillor, and ex-officio Speaker of the House of Lords. He is keeper of the king's conscience, visitor of all royal hospitals and colleges, and patron of all royal benefices, which in the king's book are stated to be not more than 20*l.* a year. He is also guardian of infants and lunatics, and has the general superintendence of all charitable foundations in the nation.

Chancellor of Scotland (The). Had duties in Scotland similar to those of the lord high chancellor of England; but on the union of the two kingdoms in 1707 the office was abolished, and the lord high chancellor of Great Britain is chancellor of both kingdoms.

Chancellor of a Cathedral (The). An officer who superintends the arrangements for the celebration of the religious services. The chancellor of a diocese is quite another officer.

Chancellor of the Diocese (The). Vicar-general to the bishop. An ecclesiastical judge appointed to assist the bishop in questions of ecclesiastical law, and to hold his courts for him. He may be a layman, but must be a doctor of the civil law.

Chancellor of the Exchequer (The). The highest finance minister of the British government.

Chancellor of the Order of the Garter (The). An officer who seals the commissions and mandates of the chapter, &c.

Similarly there is a chancellor to every other military order.

Chancellor's Classical Medal (The). In the University of Cambridge, 1751. Two gold medals. First given by his grace Thomas Holles, duke of Newcastle. See 'Regius Professorship of Greek.'

Chancellor's English Medal (The). For English heroic verse. A gold medal for any undergraduate of the University of Cambridge. Founded (1812) by the Duke of Gloucester, chancellor, and continued by his successors in the office. In Oxford this competition is called the Newdigate (q.v.).

Chancellor's Medal for Legal Studies. In the University of Cambridge. First awarded in 1857. Instituted by Prince Albert, chancellor of the University. See 'Regius Professor of Civil Law.'

Chancery (The Court of), 1070. Next in power to the House of Peers. It exercises jurisdiction in cases of equity, to abate the rigour of common law. Its head is called the lord 'chancellor' (q.v.).

Called 'Chancery' from the cancelli or lattice-work to keep off public intruders.

Chandos Clause of the Reform Bill (The), 18 Aug., 1831. That tenants at will (i.e. from year to year) paying an annual rent of 50*l.* have a county vote, regardless of the tenure by which the land is held, or the interest derived from it.

Chang or Shang Dynasty (The), B.C. 1766–651. The second Imperial dynasty of China, of the semi-historic period. It gave twenty-eight emperors, whose chief city was Yang-tching. The 17th emperor of this dynasty (Poan-keng) changed the name of the dynasty to that of Yn, in which city he held his court (B.C. 1401–1373).

Chanzos. Poems of love and gallantry by the Provençals or troubadours of France. Those of war and chivalry were called 'Sirventes.'

Chapeaux (Les), 1738–1771. The oligarchical party of Sweden, in the reigns of Frederick and Adolphus Frederick. So called because they adopted the French chapeau as their badge, to show their French proclivities. They were bitterly averse to the late treaty with Russia, and openly avowed their desire to recover all the provinces which had been ceded to the czar. The faction opposed to the Chapeaux or Hats were called the Caps (q.v.). The leader of the Hats was Count Syllenborg. The leader of the Caps was Count Horn.

The Hats were composed chiefly of the remains of the late king's military officers and servants; and entertained principles favourable to the old system of administration.

Chaperons. Many popular factions have been distinguished by the colour of their hoods. The 'chaperon rouge' was the Paris colour, the 'chaperon blue' was the Navarre colour. In 1356 the commune of Paris adopted a 'red and blue hood.' In 1379 the workmen of Gand in their revolt against the Duke of Burgundy adopted 'white hoods.'

Chapter of Mitton (The), or 'White Battle.' Between the English and the Scotch, 20 Sept., 1319. See 'White Battle.'

Chapter-house (The). A house contiguous to a cathedral or collegiate church, where, in Catholic times, the monks and canons of monastic establishments, with the dean and prebendaries, used to meet for the management of their society. They are now used for the dean and chapter as their official chamber.

Char'egites, (3 syl.). Moslem fanatics, who classed themselves with the free-born Arabs, and disclaimed the yoke of subordination and reason. These enthusiasts agreed that there would be no peace and unity till Ali, Moawiyah, and Amron (viceroy of Egypt) were dead; so three of their number were told off and furnished with poisoned daggers to despatch the three. The viceroy of Egypt escaped, because the assassin mistook the deputy for the viceroy, and slew the wrong person. Moawiyah (prince of Damascus) was wounded, but not killed. Ali, the calif, received a mortal wound from the third assassin in the mosque of Cufa.

Charge of the Light Brigade (The), or 'Death charge of the 600 at Balaclava' 26 Sept., 1854. It was the 13th Light Dragoons, the 17th Lancers, the 11th Hussars commanded by Lord Cardigan, the 8th Hussars, and the 4th Light Dragoons. The Russians were advancing in great strength to cut off the Turkish force from the British. Lord Raglan sent an order to Lord Lucan to advance, and Lord Lucan, not understanding what was intended, applied to Captain Nolan, who brought the message, and Nolan replied 'There, my lord, is your enemy.' Lucan then gave orders to Lord Cardigan to attack, and the 600 rode forward into the jaws of death. In twenty minutes 12 officers were killed and 11 wounded; 147 men were killed and 110 wounded, and 325 horses were slain. The blunder must be shared by Lord Lucan, General Airey, and Captain Nolan. However, never victory was more glorious to the devoted men than this useless charge. 'It was magnificent, but it was not war.' When Lord Cardigan rallied the scattered remnants, and said 'My men, someone has blundered,' they replied, 'Never mind, my lord, we are ready to charge again, if it is your lordship's command.'

Charing Cross. Not from chère reine in honour of Eleanor, the 'dear queen' of Edward I., for it was so called before Edward's time. In the Close Roll, 6 Rich. II., p. 1 (1382), we read that the custody of the falcons 'at Charryng, near Westminster,' was granted to Simon Burley, who was to receive 12*d.* a day from the Wardrobe.

Charitable Corporation Fund (The), 1731. A horrible swindle which numbered on the board six members of Parliament and several noblemen. The scheme was to lend money to the poor upon small pledges at 5 per cent. interest. When the capital reached 600,000*l.* the board decamped with all the money. It was a most disgraceful transaction.

Charity (Brothers of), 1520. A religious order instituted to relieve the indigent, ratified in 1621 by Paul V. Another order called 'The Sisters of Charity' was instituted by Vincent de Paul, 8 Aug., 1655.

Charlemagne. A French compound for Charles-magnus. Called by the Germans Karl the Great, or Karl I The English usually adopt the French compound (born 742, king of the Franks 768–814, emperor of the West, 800–814). He was the third and youngest son of Pepin le Bref. Charlemagne was the founder of the Carlovingian dynasty, which followed the Merovingian in 'France' and was succeeded by the Capetian.

Pronounce shar'-le-mah'n'.

The pedigree runs thus from father to son: Pepin d'Héristal; Charles Martel (his son); Pepin le Bref (his son); Charlemagne.

The son of Charlemagne was Louis le Débonnaire, and his grandson was Charles II. le Chauve.

Charlemagne, emperor of the West and king of France, was son of Pepin le Bref (742, 771–814). His nine wives were

1. Hamiltrude, a poor Frenchwoman, who bore him several children.
2. Desiderata, who was divorced.
3. Hildegarde (died before him), daughter of Hildebrand, count of Suabia, mother of Charles (king of Italy) and of Louis le Débonnaire.
4. Fastrade, daughter of Count Rodolph the Saxon (died before him).
5. Liutgarde the German (died before him).
6. Maltegarde.
7. Gersuinde the Saxon.
8. Regina.
9. Adalinda.

Charlemagne (The Second). Karl V. of Spain and Austria, called by the French Charles-quint (1500, 1519–1556, abdicated, and died 1558).

Charles. For those of Germany see 'Karl,' of Sweden 'Carl,' of Spain 'Carlos,' of Italy 'Carlo.' See also 'Charlemagne.'

ENGLAND.

Charles I. of England. Son of James I., born at Dunfermline, in Scotland (1600, 1625–1649); beheaded for treason against his parliament by making war upon their army. He married Henrietta Maria, daughter of Henri IV. of France. His sons Charles and James succeeded to the crown, and his daughter Mary married William II. of Orange.

His style was: Charles D.G. of Great Britain, France, and Ireland, King, Defender of the Faith, &c.

The chief battles were Edgehill (Warwickshire) 23 Oct., 1642, won by Rupert and lost again; Newbury (Berkshire) 20 Sept. 1643, in which Charles lost his general Cary, lord Falkland. Marston Moor (Yorkshire) 2 July, 1644, in which Cromwell defeated Prince Rupert; and Naseby (Northamptonshire) 14 June, 1645, won by Fairfax and Cromwell. This victory closed the contest.

The servants who followed the body from London to Windsor were Herbert and Captain Anthony Mildmay, his sewers; Captain Preston; Joyner, the king's cook; and Murray, his coachman, who drove the hearse.—TIGHE and DAVIS, Annals of Windsor.

Charles II., of ENGLAND. Son of Charles I., born 1630, dates his reign from 1648–9, restored Saturday 29 May, 1660, died 1685. Married Catharine or Katerine, Infanta of Portugal, had no legitimate offspring, but many children by mistresses.

His style was: Charles D. G. of Great Britain, France, and Ireland, King. Defender of the Faith. Head of the Anglican and Hibernian Church.

Wife, &c. of Charles II. His wife was the Infanta Katerine of Portugal; but his wandering fancy fell on Nell Gwynne; Davies; Roberts; Louise Renée de Querouaille, created duchess of Portsmouth; Barbara Villiers, created duchess of Cleveland, &c. These women were thrown in his way for political ends, answered their purpose, and were successively supplanted by others. Probably, Nell Gwynne came the nearest to his true affection, if such a volatile heart was capable of such a passion.

Charles II. was a traitor to his country, being the mere tool of Louis XIV.; a man of the loosest morals; a 'heretic' under false colours; and faithless in every stage of life. We have had some bad monarchs, but it would be hard to find one worse than Charles II.

Escape of Charles II. After the battle of Worcester, 8 Sept., 1651, he first went to White Ladies, in Staffordshire, but the family being away, Mr. Giffard disguised him as a servant, and he remained all the next day with Richard Penderell at Boscobel, near White Ladies. At night they tried to reach the house of Mr. Wolfe, Shrewsbury, and next day returned to Boscobel. Being told that the soldiers were searching for him, he concealed himself, with Major Carlis, in a polled oak, and at night sought refuge seven miles off in the house of Mr. Whitegreave Next day Mrs. Lane, the sister of Colonel Lane, took him as a groom to Bristol. From Bristol he went to Lyme, riding before Mrs. Judith Connesby, and thence to Bridport, and from Bridport to Shoreham, where (17 Oct.) he embarked on a merchant vessel and was landed at Rouen.

Issue of Charles II. (none by his wife).

James, duke of Monmouth, by Lucy Walters.

Charlotte, countess of Yarmouth, by Lady Shannon.

Charles (duke of Southampton), Henry (duke of Grafton), George (duke of Northumberland), and Charlotte (countess of Lichfield), by the Duchess of Cleveland (Lady Castlemaine, or Mrs. Palmer, née Barbara Villiers).

Charles, duke of St. Albans, by Nell Gwynne.

Charles, duke of Richmond, by the Duchess of Portsmouth (Louise de Querouaille). (Pronounce Koo-rah'e.)

Mary, countess of Dumbarton, by Mary Davies.

FRANCE.

Charles II. (le Chauve), of FRANCE (823, 840–877), grandson of Charlemagne.

Father, Louis I., le Débonnaire; Mother, Judith of Bavaria; Son, Louis II., le Bègue. He died while Alfred the Great was king of England.

Charles I. was 'Charlemagne' (q.v.).

Charles III. (le Simple), of FRANCE (879, 887–929). Posthumous son of Louis II., le Bègue, and brother of Louis III.

Charlemagne (Charles I.); whose son was Louis I., le Débonnaire; Louis's son was Charles II., le Chauve, whose son was Louis II., le Bègue.

Louis II., le Bègue, had two sons, viz. Louis III. and Charles III. From the latter the line was continued in his son Louis IV., &c.

Charles IV., (le Bel), of FRANCE (1294, 1322–1328). Third son of Philippe IV., le Bel, and last of the Capetian dynasty.

Contemporary with Edward II., who was his brother-in-law, having married Isabelle, 'the she wolf of France.'

Hugues Capet; Robert, his son; Philippe I., his son; Louis VI., his son; Louis VII., his son; Philippe II., his son; Louis VIII., his son; Louis IX., his son; Philippe III., his son; Philippe IV., his son; whose three sons were Louis X., Philippe V., and Charles IV. See 'Fatal Three.'

Charles V. (le Sage), of FRANCE (1337, 1364–1380). Grandson of Philippe V., and third of the Valois line.

Father, Jean II., le Bon; Mother, Bonne, daughter of the blind king of Bohemia slain at Crécy; Wife, Jeanne, daughter of the Duc de Bourbon.

Contemporary with Edward III. and Richard II. of England.

The Valois line was from Philippe III., son of St. Louis [IX.], whose second son was Charles de Valois.

Charles VI. (le Bien-aimé), of FRANCE (1368, 1380–1422). An imbecile, who resigned his kingdom to Henry V. of England, after the battle of Agincourt. He was the fourth of the Valois line.

Father, Charles V.; Mother, Jeanne, daughter of the Duc de Bourbon; Wife, Isabelle of Bavaria. One of his daughters, Isabelle, married Richard II. of England, and another, Catherine, married Henry V., and afterwards Owen Tudor of Wales.

Contemporary with Richard II., Henry IV., and Henry V. of England.

Charles VII. (le Victorieux), of FRANCE (1403, 1422–1461). So called because he succeeded in wresting France from the hands of the English. His first success was due to Jeanne d'Arc.

Father, Charles VI., the Imbecile; Mother, Isabelle of Bavaria; Wife, Marie d'Anjou, daughter of Louis II. of Naples; Son, Louis XI.

Contemporary with Henry VI. of England.

Charles VIII. (l'Affable), of FRANCE (1470, 1483–1498), last of the Valois line.

Father, Louis XI.; Mother, Charlotte of Savoy; Wife, Anne of Brittany. All his children died young.

Contemporary with Edward V., Richard III., and Henry VII. of England.

Charles IX., of FRANCE (1550, 1560–1574), of the Valois-Angoulême line. Notorious for the St. Bartholomew slaughter (q.v.).

Father, Henri II.; Mother, Catharine de' Medici; Wife, Elizabeth, daughter of Maximilian II. of Austria; no issue.

Contemporary with Elizabeth of England. His mistress was Marie Touchet, who afterwards married François de Balzac, whose younger daughter was the Marchioness of Verneuil, mistress of Henri IV. It was Henri IV. who made the anagram on the name of 'Marie Touchet,' Je charme tout.

CHARLES V. had two sons, CHARLES VI. and Louis duc d'Anjou.

The elder branch of the Valois line, viz. CHARLES VI.; CHARLES VII., his son; LOUIS XI., his son; CHARLES VIII., his son; no surviving issue.

The younger branch or second son of CHARLES V., viz. Louis, duc d'Anjou; Louis, duc d'Orléans, who had two sons, viz. Charles, duc d'Orléans, and Jean, comte d'Angoulême.

First take Charles, duc d'Orléans: his son was LOUIS XII., no son.

Next take Jean, comte d'Angoulême: his son was Charles, duc d'Angoulême, whose son was FRANÇOIS I.; then comes HENRI II., his son, who had three sons, all crowned, viz. FRANÇOIS II., CHARLES IX., and HENRI III., with whom the dynasty became extinct. See 'Fatal Three.'

Charles X., of FRANCE (1757, 1824–1830; abdicated and died in 1836). The fourth son of Louis the Dauphin, grandson of Louis XV., and last of the Bourbon dynasty. The only king of France who reached his 80th year.

Father, Louis the Dauphin; Mother, Marie Leczinska; Wife, Maria Theresa of Savoy; Son, Henri [V.] never crowned, lived at the castle of Frohsdorf in Austria, where he died in 1883. His eldest son Louis-Antoine married Marie-Thérèse (his cousin, daughter of Louis XVI.), 'the modern Antigone.'

Contemporary with George IV.

Charles X., on abdicating, assumed the title of Comte de Marnes. He first retired to Holyrood in Scotland, then to Hradschin near Prague, and lastly to Göritz, where he died.

The Bourbons: HENRI IV.; LOUIS XIII., his son; LOUIS XIV., his son, died 1715; [Louis, le grand dauphin, his son, died 1711; Louis, duc de Bourgogne, dauphin, his son, died 1712]; LOUIS XV., his son, died 1774 [Louis, the dauphin, died 1765], leaving three sons, LOUIS XVI., LOUIS XVIII., and CHARLES X. See 'Fatal Three.'

(Louis XVII., the son of Louis XVI., le Martyr, was never crowned, but as he survived his father he received the empty title, like Henri V. (see above), and Napoleon II.).

Charles le Téméraire or the Bold, duke of Burgundy (1433–1477). 'Bold' he was not; foolhardy or self-willed would be nearer the mark.

Charles's Law (1787). The volume of a gas under constant pressure expands when raised from the freezing to the boiling point, by the same fraction of itself, whatever be the nature of the gas.

Citizen Charles lived 1746 1823. This law is also called 'Dalton's Law,' who published it in 1801, and 'Gay-Lussac's Law,' who published it in 1802. Charles did not publish it at all, but it is mentioned in his Memoir.

Charlotte (The Princess), daughter of George IV. Her mother's name was Caroline (afterwards the wife of George IV.); her husband was Prince Leopold of Saxe-Coburg (afterwards King of the Belgians). She was married 2 May, 1816, at Carlton House. Her town residence was Camelford House; and her country residence was Claremont, not long ago the property of Lord Clive. She was born 7 Jan., 1796, and died in childbirth 6 Nov., 1817. The name of her accoucheur was Croft.

Charte Constitutionnelle (of France), 1814. Granted by Louis XVIII., and re-formed in 1830 after the abdication of Charles X.

Charter of Community (A). A charter of corporate rights, a French term. See 'Chartered Towns.'

Charter of 1830 (France). The charter granted by Louis-Philippe when he was made King of the French. This was a modification of the Constitutional Charter granted in 1814 by Louis XVIII. Its chief item was changing the line of monarchs into the family of Louis-Philippe, Duc d'Orléans, and his decendants.

M. Guizot said: 'The Charter of 1830 would be transmitted to future generations as an inviolable deposit; and would secure for France the alliance of order and liberty, the most invaluable co-heritance which a nation could receive' (1847).

Charter of Liberties (Henry I.'s), 1100. This charter was the re-establishment of the laws of Edward the Confessor. Magna Charta is for the most part a mere renewal of the same.

Charter of Louis XVIII. (The). See above, 'Charte Constitutionnelle.'

Charter (The People's), 1838–1848. It consisted of these six items: (1) Manhood Suffrage, (2) Annual Parliaments, (3) Stipendiary Members, (4) Vote by Ballot, (5) Electoral Districts, and (6) No Property Qualifications for members. It was drawn up by William Lovett, a working man, but the preamble was written by Mr. Roebuck, M.P. In 1848 the monster petition was taken to the House of Commons in three cabs, but being examined, was found to contain the name of the Duke of Wellington 15 times, with whole strings of fictitious names, such as Snub-nose, Hook-nose, Long-Nose, Short-nose, &c. It was a complete failure, and brought the Chartists into such ridicule that the society fell to pieces. See 'Chartists.'

Their first petition was presented to Parliament by Attwood, 14 June, 1839.

Charter-house (The). A corruption of Chartreuse, i.e. Carthusian house —in Aldersgate Street. It was originally founded by Sir Walter de Manny, in 1371, as a monastery; but, on the suppression of monasteries in 1537, it was used by Henry VIII. as a depôt for his nets and pavilions. It was next sold to the Duke of Norfolk, and sundry other persons. In 1611 Thomas Sutton bought it for 13,000*l.* of Lord Suffolk, and endowed it with the revenues of more than twenty manors, lordships, and other estates, for eighty poor brethren over 50 years of age; and the free education of forty-four boys, 'sons of poor gentlemen,' admitted at the age between 10 and 14.

The following were educated at this school: Dr. Barrow, Judge Blackstone, Addison, Sir Richard Steele, John Wesley, Bishop Thirlwall, George Grote, Thackeray, Sir Charles Eastlake, and many others. Removed to Godalming, Surrey, in 1872.

Charter Schools (The), 1733. In Ireland. Schools chartered by government for the education of the Irish poor on the principles of the Established Church. Grant withdrawn in 1832. See 'Incorporated Society for Promoting English Protestant Schools in Ireland.'

Chartered Towns. According to feudal law, towns (like all the rest of the soil) pertained to the feudal lords; and the inhabitants, together with their shops and houses, were the property of these lords; but when a town was chartered it was emancipated and set free. It then chose its own magistrates, had its own guild, its own police, and its own bye-laws. The bailiff or steward hitherto appointed by the feudal lord to collect his dues was then superseded by a mayor and other civic officers, elected by the townsmen. The feudal lord had no longer any legal authority in the town, which was wholly governed by its own magistrates and the king.

Louis VI. (1108–1137) was the first to grant charters of community in France; but Henry I. in 1100 granted such charters in England, and probably Edward the Confessor did the same.

Charters of Inspeximus or of 'Vidimus.' Charters reciting previous charters and confirming them, with the addition of some new privilege. 'Inspeximus' or 'Vidimus,' i.e. we have inspected or seen the old charter, and confirm it.

Chartists. Organised 1838, but the word was in use in 1832. The most seditious speakers were Stephens (a dissenting minister), Oastler, and Feargus O'Connor. Charles Ernest Jones, barrister-at-law, was also a great Chartist advocate (1819–1869).

The Rev. Joseph Rayner Stephens, of Hyde, Chester, was in 1839 imprisoned in Knutsford gaol for 18 months.

For the six points see above, 'Charter (The People's).'

Chartist Constitution (The). It contained six items. See under 'Charter (The People's).' The Chartists intended to march to the House of Commons on 10 April, 1848, to place Feargus O'Connor in the chair, and pass their charter; but the whole scheme fell through.

Chartist Convention (The), 1839. Also called by them the 'National Convention' (q.v.).

Chartist Riots in Birmingham (The), 1838. Of these riots the Duke of Wellington said in the House of Lords: 'I have seen as much of war as most men; but I have never seen a town, carried by assault, subjected to such violence as Birmingham has been in one single hour by its own inhabitants.'

Chartist Riot at Newport (The), 29 Sept., 1839. Led by John Frost (linendraper, a magistrate), Williams, and Jones. Upwards of twenty persons were killed in this riot. The three leaders were condemned to be hanged. Sentence of death was commuted into transportation for life; but in May 1856 the three were pardoned and returned to England.

Chartreux. A religious order, called in English 'Carthusians' (q.v.). La Grande Chartreuse is a celebrated French monastery in the department of Isère, which owes its origin to St. Bruno, who settled there in 1084. The monks were despoiled in the revolution of 1789.

Chasidim, i.e. Pietists. I. Those who resisted the efforts of Antiochos Epiphănês and his successors to lure the Jews into idolatry.

II. Jewish ascetics who studied the Kabbala, and sought by mortifying the flesh to come into closer communion with God and his angels.

III. In 1750 Israel Baal Shem pretended to work miracles, and the revived Chasidim became numerous, but at his death in 1760 they died out again.

IV. In 1760, among the Jews of the Ukraine. The sect spread rapidly through Poland and other parts of Russia. They are very strict observers of the law; believe in the miracles of their saints, and in their power of curing bodily ailments.

Joyfulness is insisted on by these Pietists, but it is said to tend to Epicureanism.

Chasles Forgeries (The). M. Chasles, a member of the French Academy of Sciences, gave out that he had bought 27,000 MSS. for 5,000*l.*, but would not tell where, 'lest others should go and spoil his market.' Amongst these MSS. was a correspondence from Alexander the Great to Aristidês, several letters from Attila, king of the Huns, and from the widow of Martin Luther. Several also from Judas Iscariot to Mary Magdalene, and from Lazarus to St. Peter. What, however, more nearly concerns Englishmen was a faded yellow MS., purporting to be letters from Pascal to Sir Isaac Newton, to prove that Newton had pilfered his system of gravitation. The tale was that this MS. belonged to the Abbey of Tours; came into the possession of Comte de Boisjourdain, who in 1791 was wrecked on his way to America. The MS. was sold, and the purchaser gave it to M. Chasles. Another letter was produced from Galileo, stating that the discovery had been made known to him. A committee was formed to examine into the matter, when a poor tool named Vrain Lucas was discovered to be the forger, and, after conviction, was severely punished. See 'Literary Forgeries.'

Chassepot Rifle, 1866. A breech-loading rifle invented by M. Chassepot, and adopted by the French government. It was largely used by the French in the Franco-Prussian War, 1870–1871.

Chasseurs de Vincennes, or 'Tirailleurs,' i.e. sharp-shooters, 1835. A corps in the French army organised by the Duke of Orleans, and armed with the new rifle. They were first garrisoned at Vincennes; but now a whole battalion has been organised.

Chaste Week (The). Hebdomăda Casta. The week preceding Lent; so called because the faithful vowed in that week to observe inviolable chastity throughout the coming Lent.

Chateaubriand (Edict of). In France, 27 June, 1554. Published by Henri II., renewing the persecution of the Huguenots, and referring cases of 'heresy' to the civil as well as to the ecclesiastical judges. The edict prohibits all books of an unorthodox tendency.

Chatterton (Thomas). 'The marvellous boy.' A literary impostor. He began in 1768 to produce poems which he professed to be from the pen of Thomas Rowley, a monk of the 15th cent. Chatterton was born at Bristol, and committed suicide (1752–1771). See 'Literary Forgeries.'

Chattertonian Controversy (The), 1770. This controversy was whether the poems said by Thomas Chatterton to be Rowley's were forgeries or not. Rowley was said by him to have been a priest of Bristol in the reigns of Henry VI. and Edward IV. The forgery was exposed by the poets Mason and Gray. The wonder is how anyone the least acquainted with the literature of the period referred to could be deceived. Modernise the spelling, and the deception is manifest. The boy, however, was a true poet and great genius.

Chaucer of Artists (The). Albert Dürer, of Nürnberg (1471–1528), called by his countrymen the 'prince of artists.'

A contemporary artist was Lucas Kranach (1472-1553), famous for his portraits of Luther, Melanchthon, and other reformers. These portraits are as celebrated as the portraits of Charlemagne and his successors by Albert Dürer.

Chaucer of France (The). Clément Marot, valet to François I. (1484–1544).

Chaucer of Scotland (The). William Dunbar (1465–1530). His 'Thistle and Rose,' an allegory, celebrates the marriage of James IV. (the Thistle) with Margaret, daughter of Henry VII. (the Rose), and is a rich specimen of poetical allegory worthy the bard of Woodstock.

Chaucer's Inn, the 'Tabard,' was burnt down in the Great Fire of London, 1666. Rebuilt and called the 'Talbot' or 'Dog' till 1873, when it was converted into a gin-shop.

Chaumont (Treaty of), 1 March, 1814. A treaty of alliance against Napoleon, between Great Britain, Austria, Prussia, and Russia. The allies bound themselves to pursue without relaxation war against France, till Napoleon consented to renounce all the acquisitions made by France since the commencement of 1792, and to abandon all interference with any state except France.

Chauvinism originally meant extravagant admiration of Napoleon; but now it means jingoism. Chauvin is a character in Scribe's Soldat Laboureur, an intense admirer of Napoleon Bonaparte.

Cheapside Knight (The). Sir Richard Blackmore, who resided at Sadlers' Hall, Cheapside, and was knighted by William III. (1650–1728).

Chefs Plaids (The). The parliament or general assembly of Sark, convened by the 'Seigneur' (q.v.). The members consist of the seneschal, the prévot, the greffier, and the tenants of the forty farms.

Chelsea Philosopher (The), or 'The Sage of Chelsea.' Thomas Carlyle (1795–1881); he was born at Ecclefechan, in Dumfriesshire, but settled in Chelsea.

Chemistry (Father of French). Arnaud de Villeneuve (1238–1314).

Chemistry (Professorship of). In the University of Cambridge, 1709; founded by the University. Stipend, 500*l.* a year.

Cherubim. Ezekiel's cherubim is identical with the four standards stationed at the four sides of the Tabernacle in the Wilderness: the Lion for Judah, Man for Reuben, Ox for Ephraim, and the Flying Eagle for Dan (Gen. xxx. 14). According to Dante the Cherubim inhabit the Fixed Stars, and the Seraphim the Primum Mobile. See 'Evangelical Symbols.'

Cheruscan League (The), A.D. 9. A league of German tribes each side of the Weser to drive out the Romans from their territory. Hermann, called in Latin Arminius, was chosen chief; and succeeded in destroying the army of Varus, and driving the Romans beyond the Rhine.

Chestnut Bells. In 1886, in New York, and some other large cities in the United States, the gallery gods carried little bells into the theatres, and rang them when a stale witticism (or 'chestnut') was uttered by the actors. These bells soon became a stale nuisance, and were called 'chestnut bells.'

Chestnut is an Americanism for a stale joke or witticism.

Chevalier de St. George (The), 1708. The name and title assumed by James the Pretender, just as he was about to cross over to Scotland as its king. This son of James II. is generally called the 'Old Pretender.' See 'Warming-pan.'

His son was Charles Edward (Stuart), the 'Young Pretender,' who, on the death of his father, laid claim to the throne of Great Britain; but, being signally defeated at Culloden in 1746, he fled to the continent.

 He assumed the name of Betty Blake, an Irishwoman, when he escaped to Skye, accompanied by Flora Macdonald. The sum of 30,000*l.* was set on his head.

Chevalier sans peur et sans reproche (Le). The Chevalier de Bayard (1476–1524). Like Horatius Coclès, the Roman, he defended alone a bridge (Garigliano) against a whole army; and, like Fabricius, he rejected with indignation the offer of a villain to poison Pope Julius II., with whom he was at war.

Chevaliers de Livonie (Les). The same as the 'Frères de la milice du Christ,' or the 'Chevaliers Porte-glaive' (q.v.).

Chevaliers du Poignard (Les), 28 Feb., 1791. Certain royalists who, being alarmed at the attack of the French mob on the prison of Vincennes (called the Second Bastille), rushed to the Tuileries to defend the king and royal family. La Fayette, with his guards, searched the courtiers, and took from them a large basket full of poniards, daggers, pistols, and sword-canes. The courtiers were very roughly handled. Marat declared in his journal, L'Ami du Peuple, that 5,000 poniards had been manufactured against the patriots; but, after a strict search, only thirty-six were found in the whole city, and those belonged to persons engaged in the slave-trade. See 'Day of the Poniard.'

Chevaliers Porte-glaive (Les). In Latin 'Ensiferi,' 1201. A religious military order founded by Albert d'Apeldorn, bishop of Livonia, to subdue countries still pagan. They were first called 'Les Frères de la milice du Christ,' and were sometimes called 'Les Chevaliers de Livonie.' They wore a white robe with two red swords on the breast. In 1237 the order was amalgamated with the Teutonic Knights, and remained so till 1525, when the original order was reconstructed.

Chevy Chase. A British ballad based on the story of the battle of Otterburn, Aug. 1388. This battle was declared by Froissart to have been the bravest and most chivalrous ever fought in his day. The two chieftains were Percy and Douglas; and, if the ballad so named can be trusted, Douglas was slain by an English arrow, which pierced his heart, and Percy was slain by Hugh Montgomery. Probably a mere tale. (Chevaucher, to ride; chevauchage, a riding out; chevauchée, chased.)

Chicard. A French harlequin, so called from Mons. Chicard, the originator. His costume consists of a helmet, a postilion's wig, a flannel shirt, and cavalry trousers. His arms are half-bare, and his hands are thrust into buff gloves with large cuffs.

Chichele Professorships (The). One for International Law, and one for Modern History, in Oxford University. Formed out of five suppressed fellowships in All Souls, 1854. Stipends, 750*l.* a year each.

Henry Chicheley, or Chichele, archbishop of Canterbury, founded All Souls College in 1437.

Chicken (The). Mr. Michael Angelo Taylor was so called because, in the debate on the Westminster scrutiny in 1785, he said, 'I always deliver my legal opinion in this house with great diffidence, because I am young—a mere chicken in the profession of the law.'

Chief Secretary of Ireland (The). Practically the prime minister of the lord-lieutenant. He advises and directs the viceroy, and is responsible to parliament for every act of the Irish Administration; but to the viceroy belongs the prerogative of pardon. The chief secretary is president of the Local Government Board, and can be called to account for every detail connected with the poor law. As head of the civil service he can be interrogated in parliament upon well nigh everything which takes place in Ireland; the police (both the Royal Irish Constabulary and the Dublin Metropolitan Police) are not under him, both being self-governed. The chief secretary's office has two departments, each presided over by one of the permanent under-secretaries.

Child of Fortune (The). So Napoleon called Marshal Masséna after the battle of Rivoli, 14 January, 1797, and created him 'duc de Rivoli.'

Child of Hale. John Middleton, the giant, born at Hale, in Lancashire, in 1578. His height was 9 feet 3 inches. Dr. Plott tells us that John Middleton wanted only 6 inches to equal Goliath in size.'

Goliath was 6 cubits and a span.

Child of the Cord (The). The prisoner summoned to appear before the Vehmgerichte (q.v.), who was always dragged bound before the tribunal. If found guilty the president said to him: 'Prisoner . . . I devote your neck to the rope, your body to the birds of prey, and may God have mercy on your soul.' He was then dragged bound out of the court and hanged on the nearest tree. See 'Free Bench.'

Child Pilgrimages (13th cent.). A religious epidemic which broke out in Europe in 1212, but the last boy crusade was in 1459. Threats and persuasions, love and fear, had no effect upon the boys, who wept day and night, pined, and trembled in every limb. There was no difference in the social scale, the children of counts and barons ran away from home as well as the sons of shepherds and tradesmen.

Childermas, or 'Holy Innocents' Day,' 28 Dec. In commemoration of the children slain by Herod.

The coronation of Edward IV. was put off till the Monday, because the preceding day was 'Childermas Day.'

Children's Crusade (The), 1212. Preached in France by Stephen, a peasant boy, and in Germany the same year by Nicholas, also a peasant boy. Some 90,000 children left their mothers and schoolmasters in the spring 'to rescue the Holy Land from the infidels,' and ships were placed at their disposal. The French contingent embarked at Marseilles in August; part perished the same month by shipwreck on the island of San Pietro, and the rest were sold into slavery to Mohammedans. The German contingent reached Genoa in August, and was utterly dispersed by various disasters before the next spring.

Children's Employment Commission (The), 1841. To inquire into the employment of children in mines, cotton mills, and other industries. In 1842 they laid before Parliament a statement of the employment of children in coal-mines which greatly shocked the moral sense of the country, and Lord Ashley took the subject up.

Children of Rebecca, 1843 Welsh rioters whose object was to destroy toll-gates. So called from Gen. xxiv. 60. Laban said to Rebecca or Rebekah, 'Let thy seed possess the gate of those that hate thee.'

Chiliasm. The belief that Christ will come to earth and rule the world from Jerusalem for 1,000 years. The Latin word 'millennium' means the same thing. The Revelation of John is the chief authority of the Chiliasts.

Papias, Justin Martyr, Irenæus, Tertullian, and Lactantius were Chiliasts, but Origen was opposed to the notion. Papias, bishop of Hierapolis, says, in the millennium 'every vine will bear 10,000 branches, every branch 10,000 shoots, every shoot 10,000 sprigs, every sprig 10,000 bunches, every bunch 10,000 berries, and every berry 26 times 25 gallons of wine; and if a saint comes to pluck a berry it will cry out, "Pluck me, O saint! I am better for being plucked, praise the Lord."'

The Fifth Monarchy Men were, of course, Chiliasts, only they maintained that the golden age had begun, and that they were of it.

Chilly Saints (The Three). St. Pankratius, St. Liberatus, and St. Servatius, whose anniversaries are the three cold days of May the 11th, 12th, and 13th. Some substitute St. Mamertus for St. Liberatus.

Chiltern Hundreds. There are three, viz. Stoke, Desborough, and Bonenham or Burnham. At one time the Chiltern Hills between Bedford and Hertford, &c., were covered with beech trees, which formed shelter for robbers; so a steward was appointed by the crown to put down these marauders and protect the inhabitants of the neighbourhood from their depredations. The necessity of such watch and ward has long since ceased, but the office remains; and when a member of parliament wishes to vacate his seat, one way of doing so is by accepting the office of steward of the three Chiltern Hundreds. Being thus advanced to a government office, his seat is ex officio vacated. Immediately the member has effected his object he resigns his office again. The gift is in the hands of the chancellor of the exchequer. In 1842 it was refused to the member for Reading. This acceptance began in 1750.

Similar crown offices are the Stewardship of the Manor of Poynings, of East Hendred and Northstead, and the escheatorship of Munster. The holder of these sinecures is party to a contract between the crown and certain hypothetical contractors. One farthing suffices to make the contract.

Chiminage. Toll for passing through a forest. Those who carried brushes, timber, bark, or coal on their backs to sell, paid no chiminage. Also called 'pedagium' (French chemin, a road or way, chiminus reginæ).

Chimney-tax. 'Hearth-money,' or 'Chimney-money.' A tax of 2*s.* a chimney levied by 13, 14 Car. II. c. 10 (1662), but abolished by 1 Will. & Mary, c. 10 (1689).

Chinese Bible (The). Compiled and partly composed by Confucius, divided into five books:—

1. Called the Yih-King, a treatise on cosmogony.

2. Called the Shu-King, the acts and maxims of Yaou, Shun, and other ancient kings held in religious veneration.

3. Called the Shi-King, which contains 311 sacred poems.

4. Called the Ee-King, or book of rites, containing maxims and directions for everyday life and all conditions of men.

5. Called the Chun-tsien, a history of Confucius's own times.

Chinese Cæsar (The). Kao-hoang-ti, founder of the Han dynasty, one of the most illustrious that ever occupied the Chinese throne (dynasty lasted B.C. 202–A.D. 226).

Chinese Wars (The) with Great Britain. The First War 1834–1842; the Second War 1855–1858. The cause of the first war was the prohibition of the opium trade by the Chinese Government. When this prohibition was disregarded the British boats were fired on from the Chinese forts. Commissioner Lin was sent to adjust the dispute, and his first demand was that all the opium in store, whether in factories or boats, should be given up to him to be burnt. This was done. Then Lin forbade all trading whatsoever between Great Britain and China. This provoked hostilities, and after several successes the British attacked Nanking; whereupon the Chinese concluded a treaty of peace 26 Aug., 1842, in which Hong Kong was ceded to Britain.

The Second War broke out (1855) in consequence of the bad faith of the Chinese, who violated the treaty. The English now demanded free access to Canton, and, this being refused, they proceeded to besiege that city. A second treaty of peace at Tientsin was at once concluded, and the war ceased in 1858.

The first treaty of peace stipulated (1) the surrender of Hong Kong; (2) 21 million dollars [about 5 millions sterling] for war indemnity; (3) free trade between Britain and China, and (4) the following to be open ports, in each of which a British consul was to reside, viz. Canton, Amoy, Foo-chow-foo, Ningpo, and Shanghae.

Napoleon, by the Berlin Treaty (q.v.), boycotted Great Britain as the Chinese did, and both attempts failed. Any individual may refuse to deal with any other, but no one has a right to enforce that prohibition on another against his will.

Chivalrous Madman (The). James IV. of Scotland (1473, 1488–1513), slain at Flodden Field.

Cholera [Morbus]. An epidemic which appeared in Bengal, the Isle of France, and the Ile de Bourbon in 1818, 1819, and 1820. It appeared in Sunderland 26 Oct., 1831, in Edinburgh 6 Feb., 1832, and in March had reached Dublin. In Paris the deaths between March and Aug., 1832, were 18,000. It raged in Rome and in the Two Sicilies, Genoa, and Berlin from July to Aug., 1837. In 1848, 1849 it again appeared in England, and the death-rate of September was 3,183, and from 17 June to 2 Oct. it was 13,161. In 1866 it appeared again in Great Britain, and in fifteen weeks above 5,000 persons in London were carried off by it. It returned to Germany in 1883, 1884.

Chopping with the Whittle. An ancient tenure. 'Walter de Aldeham holds land of the king in the More in the county of Salop by the service of paying to the king yearly at his Exchequer 2 knives [whittles], whereof one ought to be of that goodness that it would cut, at the first stroke, into the middle of a hasle rod of a year's growth, and of a cubit in length. The same service ought to done in the middle of the Exchequer in the presence of the treasurer and barons on the morrow of St. Michael; and the said whittles are to be delivered to the Chamberlain for the king's use.' Blount, Ancient Tenures, 1815.

Chorbishops, or 'Chorepiscopi.' Suffragans, or rural bishops, delegated by the diocesan. In 846, at the Council of Sens, Andrad Modicus was appointed chorbishop; but in 849 the Council of Paris deposed all the chorbishops of France.

Pronounce Kor-bishops.

Chouans. I. First Period. Were bands of insurgent royalists who, during the first French Revolution, organised a reactionary movement against the Blues (or Republicans). The original Chouan was Jean Cottereau, a maker of sabots, near Laval, who turned smuggler. He was called Chouan, or screech-owl [chathuant], because he rallied his men, or warned them of danger by imitating the cry of that bird, and all his gang went by the name of Chouans. In 1791 several 'trees of liberty' were destroyed in Brittany, and other outrages were fomented by seditious priests. In 1792 an insurrection was planned by the Marquis de la Rouarie, under the sanction of the two brothers of Louis XVI. The marquis entered into communication with Jean Cottereau, who, with his Chouans, carried on successfully a guerilla war with the Blues, till he fell, 28 July, 1794.

II. Second Period. George Cadoudal was the next leader of the Chouans, or royalist insurgents of Brittany. He was born in 1771 near Auray, where his father was a miller. He was captured by the Blues in 1794, but made his escape, and became more active than ever in the royalists' cause. Annoyed at the dissensions of the Vendean generals, he organised an army in which no aristocrat was permitted to hold command. So brave, so well drilled, and so well officered was this Chouan army that General Hoche was unable either to subdue or to disperse it. In 1799 George Cadoudal was the soul of the conspiracy to overthrow the First Consul (Bonaparte), but on the 18 Brumaire he was forced to renounce the war, and took refuge in England. In 1803 he joined Pichegru's plot against the First Consul, but the conspiracy being discovered, Cadoudal was apprehended and put to death, 25 June, 1804.

III. Third Period. Many petty spurts of Chouannerie broke out after 1799, when George Cadoudal was obliged to give up the struggle. In 1803 it ceased for a while. In 1814–1815 it again started into life on both banks of the Loire, but Lamarque stamped it out. In the July Revolution (1830) the Duchesse de Berry tried to revive Chouannerie on behalf of the Duc de Bordeaux, but it was soon crushed out by the energetic measures of M. Thiers.

Chouans, pronounce Shwahng.

Chouannerie. Guerilla warfare by volunteers on behalf of a royal cause. The word is from Chouans, the insurgents of Brittany, who rose on behalf of Louis XVI., and also against the First Consul (Bonaparte). Sometimes the word means devotion to the kingly cause in France, as chauvinism means enthusiastic devotion to Napoleon I. and the Imperial cause.

Chow, or Tchow dynasty (The). The third Imperial dynasty of China. It gave 34 sovereigns, and lasted 866 years (from B.C. 1122 to 256). Yn was the seat of government. This dynasty is called that of the 'Kings Combatant,' being a period of almost unvarying contention and feudal strife.

Confucius and Mencius, the Chinese philosophers, were both born under this dynasty.

Chremonidean War (The), B.C. 268 or 263. When Athens was taken by Antigŏnus Gonātus. So called from Chremonidēs, the Athenian, who distinguished himself in the defence of the city.

Christ (Knights of), 1318. A military order, founded in Portugal by King Dionysius; also founded in Brazil in 1813.

Christ (Order of), 1205. In Livonia, instituted by Albert, bishop of Riga. The popes also confer the 'order of Christ.'

(Dr. Geikie, 'Life of Christ,' i. p. 559.)

Bunsen shows, on the authority of Irenæus, that Jesus was born some fifteen years before the time assigned, and that he lived to be about fifty years of age.

Basnage, the Jew, in his 'Hist. des Juifs,' placed the birth nearly a century sooner than A.D. 1.

According to Luke ii. 1-7, it was about A.D. 12.

Christ Church, 1526. Founded by Cardinal Wolsey. The most aristocratic and wealthy of all the colleges of Oxford. The head-master of this college only is called the Dean.

Christ's College. In Cambridge University, founded by the Lady Margaret, countess of Richmond and Derby, mother of Henry VII., in 1505.

The founder of St. John's College also. Surely this college ought to be Christ College, as Christ Church in Oxford. What would be said of Trinity's College, Peter's House, or Corporis Christi College? Bishop Latimer, Milton, and Cudworth were of this college.

Christ's Hospital (The Blue-coat School), London, 1553. Founded by Edward VI. (the year of his death).

Called Blue-coat from the blue woollen coat fastened round the waist with a narrow red leather girdle. The boys wear yellow breeches and yellow stockings, bands, and a very small blue worsted cap.

Christadelphians (The), 1st cent. Brethren of Christ, not brethren in Christ. Revived by Dr. Thomas in the 19th cent. The immortality of the soul, the theory of hell, the devil, disembodied spirits, and the Trinity they utterly disbelieve; but the millennium they believe in fully. The Holy Ghost is not a distinct person, they say, but simply the instrumental power of the Father. And Jesus Christ is God, only because the Spirit of God dwelt in Him fully and without measure. Dr. Thomas died in 1871, but the Thomasites continue still.

Christian Advocate (The). In the University of Cambridge, 1789; founded by the Rev. John Hulse, of St. John's College. In 1860 converted into the Hulsean Professor of Divinity (q.v.).

Christian Brethren (The), 1525. An association chiefly of London tradesmen and citizens, who smuggled over and circulated the Gospels and Epistles translated by Tyndale, and reprinted at Cologne or Worms the tracts of Wyclif and Luther.

Christian Charity (Knights of), 1578. Instituted by Henri III. of France for the benefit of poor military officers and maimed soldiers. It resembled our 'Poor Knights of Windsor' (q.v.).

Christian Cicero (The). Lactantius, first of the Latin fathers (q.v.). About 250–330. Converted 301.

Christian Club (The), 1768. A political union in the borough of Shoreham, where the burgesses agreed to sell their borough to the highest bidder, and share the proceeds equally. Called the 'Christian' club because, like the early Christians, they agreed to have all things [i.e. the proceeds of the bribe] in common.

Christian Connexion (The), 1800. Chiefly in the United States of America. They recognise no leader, no creeds, no forms of prayer. The Bible is their code, and each man is his own interpreter. Their great law is universal toleration. The general creed is this: There is one God; Christ the Son of God is the Mediator between God and man. The Holy Ghost is the power and energy of God. Of course the table of communion is open to all who choose to attend.

Christian Eloquence (Founder of). Bourdaloue (1632–1704). Especially famous for his 'Lent Sermons.'

Christian Era. It was Dionysius 'Exiguus,' in the 6th cent., who introduced the felicitous custom of dating from the birth of Christ. He, however, was incorrect in fixing the Nativity after the death of Herod; and indubitably it was not in December, but either in the spring or autumn.

Irenæus (ii. 22, 5) tells us that Jesus was between 40 and 50 when he was put to death, but the general opinion is that he was between 33 and 34 years of age.

(See Josephus, 'Ant.' xvii. 1. 1, and Eusebius, i. 6.)

(On the authority of Irenæus Jesus was 50 at his crucifixion.)

In regard to the month of the Nativity, Eusebius places it in January; Anger and Winer in the spring; Scaliger in Oct.; Bengel, Idler, Irenæus, Petavius, and Usher in Dec.

The Christian Era, suggested by Dionysius Exiguus, began to be used A.D. 526. Christmas Day was celebrated in the reign of Antoninus Pius (138–161), and the festival is attributed to Telesphorus. (See 'Dec. 25.')

Christian Era (The). This era begins Jan. 1, A.D. 1, or A.U.C. 753. First used by Dionysius Exiguus in 526. Introduced into Italy in the 6th cent.; into France in the 7th cent.; ordained by the Council of Chelsea in 816. Not generally used in Spain till the 11th cent.; not in Portugal till 1415; not in the Eastern Church till 1458.

Called the 'Year of Grace'; the Year of the Incarnation'; 'Annus Trabeationis'; and sometimes 'Recapitulatio Dionisii' [sic]. It is generally thought that A.D. 1 should be A.D. 4, in order to bring in Herod the Great, who died that year; but the government of Cyrenius, mentioned by Luke, requires an adjustment in the opposite direction, as he was proconsul of Syria 4–5, according to the calculation of Dionysius.

Christian Fathers (The), 3rd cent. Irenæus, Pantæus, Clemens Alexandrinus, Tertullian (Latin), Minucius Felix (Latin), Hippolytus, Origen, Gregory Thaumaturgus, Cyprian, and Methodius (10 altogether). See 'Doctors.'

Christian Forgeries (The). Of Brahmanic writings printed in French at Yverdun, in 1778, imposed even on Voltaire. A Carmelite missionary justifies the forgery, as the object was laudable. Origen thought that a good aim or end justifies the means. See 'Literary Forgeries.'

Christian Sen'eca (The). Joseph Hall, bishop of Norwich (1574–1656).

Christian of the Cleek, 1335, &c. A Scotchman who, in the early part of the reign of Edward III., used to catch men with a 'cleek,' or hook, for food. Sir Walter Scott gives us a heartrending picture of the miserable condition of the people who saved life by devouring their fellows.

Christians. Believers in Christ were so called first at Antioch in apostolic times. In modern times the sect so called own no name or founder but the Lord Jesus.

The following sects keep the word with a difference: Christian Believers, Christian Brethren, Christian Connexion, Christian Disciples, Christian Elmsites, Christian Israelites, Christian Mission, Christian Teetotallers, Christian Temperance Men, Christian Unionists, The Free Catholic Christian Church, The Free Christians, The Free Christian Association, The Free Evangelical Christians, The Free Grace Gospel Christians, The Rational Christians, The Unitarian Christians, The United Christian Church, The Universal Christians, The Christians of St. John (q.v.), The Christians of St. Thomas (q.v.), &c.

Christians are subdivided into three general categories:

1. Those who admit the authority of tradition and of the Pope, as Roman and Greek Catholics.

2. Those who acknowledge some authority besides the Bible: The Greek Church, which acknowledges the authority of the patriarchs of Constantinople, Jerusalem, Antioch, and Alexandria. The Russian Church, which acknowledges the Czar as 'head of the Church.' The Chaldæan Church, or Nestorians; the Monophysites or Eutycheans, as the Copts, Jacobites, and Armenians.

3. Those which acknowledge no authority except the Bible. They are (a) Unitarians, (b) Trinitarians: as the Arians and Socinians; the Anabaptists, the Anglican Church or Church of England, Arminians, Baptists, Calvinists, Congregationalists, Enthusiasts, Episcopalians or those Protestants who have an order of Bishops, Evangelicals, Hernhütters, Huguenots or French Calvinists, Lutherans, Mennonites, Methodists, Moravians, Mormons, Mystics, Nonconformists, Presbyterians, Puritans, Quakers or Friends, Remonstrants, Shakers, Swedenborgians, Wesleyans, Zwinglians, &c. These and many others will be found under their distinctive name.

Christians of St. John (The), 1st cent. A sect which recognised John the Baptist as their head. They repeated their baptism annually; denied the divinity of Christ; attributed a body to God; called Gabriel God's son, and declared that God created the world by the instrumentality of Gabriel and 50,000 angels. At death, they asserted that the soul went to different spheres.

Christians of St. Thomas (The), A.D. 883. Said to have been founded by Thomas the Apostle. In 883 ambassadors of Alfred visited the shrine of the founder in the neighbourhood of Madras. They were then governed by the bishop of Angamala, who exercised jurisdiction over 1,400 churches and 200,000 souls. In 1500 the Portuguese inquisitors accused them of the Nestorian heresy, and after a fierce persecution Malabar was reduced under the dominion of the Pope of Rome. They remained sixty years in this servitude (1599–1663), when, the Portuguese empire being shaken, the Malabar Christians asserted their independence and relapsed into their Nestorianism (q.v.).

The 'Thomists' were Roman Catholics. The disciples of Thomas Aquinas were quite another class of Christians.

Christi'na of Sweden. Crowned under the title of 'king,' was born 1626, reigned 1633–1654, abdicated, and died 1689. She was the daughter of the great Gustavus.

Christinos and Carlists, 1833, &c. In Spanish history. The partisans of Donna Maria Christina (regent for her daughter, Isabella Maria II.) and Don Carlos, brother of the late king. A salique law had been passed in Spain by Felipe V., but was repealed by Carlos IV., as he had only a daughter. Don Carlos claimed his right of succession, on the salique law. His partisans were called Carlists, and for seven years a tedious guerilla war ensued. It was renewed 1873, and ended in 1876.

Christmas Day. Now held on 25 Dec. The early Christians held it, some in May, some in April, and some in June. It could not have been in December, as shepherds would not be in the fields watching their flocks by night in that month. Most likely it took the place of the Yule-feast and Roman festivals held during the winter solstice. The festival of the Nativity was introduced at Antioch in 375, but in the forged Isidorian Decretals (q.v.) Telesphŏros (who lived in the 2nd cent.) is said to have instituted it.

The Puritan Parliament abolished the Christmas festival; and the decoration of churches and houses was made an act of sedition.

Christmas Day, 1684. Eight of the British sovereigns were all living.

1. Richard Cromwell, born 4 Oct., 1626–1712.
2. Charles II., born 29 May, 1630–1685.
3. James II., born 14 Oct., 1633–1701.
4. William III., born 4/14 Nov., 1650–1702.
5. Q. Mary II., born 30 Apr., 1662–1694.
6. Q. Anne, born 6 Feb., 1664–1714.
7. George I., born 28 May, 1660–1727.
8. George II., born 30 Oct., 1683–1760.

(See 'Notes and Queries,' Dec. 28, 1889, p. 505.)

Christmas Eve. Sir Walter Scott says, 'On Christmas Eve the mass is sung.' Strictly speaking, this is not correct, as no mass is celebrated on the vigil of Christmas Day, or indeed on any vigil; but it is usual in Rome to celebrate a midnight mass, i.e. a mass in the small hours of the morning of Christmas Day. The service may commence before midnight, but it cannot be finished till after midnight. It is absolutely necessary that the elements be taken in the morning, i.e. between midnight and midday. On Christmas Day or any other day any number of masses may be said in a church at different altars by different priests, but no priest should celebrate more than one mass in a single day. This is not strictly observed.

Christmas Prince (A). A Lord of Misrule.

The High and Mighty Prince, Henry, prince of Purpoole [? Poole Park], archduke of Stapulia and Bernardia [Staples and Barnard's Inn], duke of High and Nether Holborn, marquis of St. Giles and Tottenham, count palatine of Bloomsbury and Clerkenwell, great lord of the cantons of Islington, Kentish Town, Paddington, and Knightsbridge.—Notes and Queries, 17 March, 1888 (quoted from the 'Book of Christmas,' by T. K. Harvey, 1836).

Christopher North. The pen-name assumed by John Wilson (1785–1854).

Christot'okos, Theot'okos, Theoph'oron. Nestorius (5th cent.) taught that Mary was not θεοτόκος (mother of God), but only χριστοτόκος (mother of Christ), for God cannot be born of a woman. Jesus of Nazareth he called θεοφόρον (possessed of God). These distinctions were condemned by the Council of Ephesus in 431.

Chronicle of St. Neots (The). The Chronicle of Asser is so called because it was discovered in the monastery of St. Neots.

Asser, bishop of St. David's, Wales, died 910. His chronicle goes down to 893, and has been continued by other hands.

Chronicles of Denis (The), or 'Chronicles of France.' The lives of St. Louis (IX.) and his brothers (Robert, Alphonse, and Charles), and the sons of St. Louis, Philippe III. le Hardi, and Robert de Clermont (the root of the Bourbon dynasty of France). It was written by Guillaume de Nangis, who died in 1300, and was a Benedictine monk of St. Denis.

Suger (1092–1152), the wise minister of Louis VII. le Jeune, is called the precursor of the Chronicles of St. Denis. [Pronounce Sahn Dnee.]

Chronology (Father of). Scaliger the younger (1540–1609).

Chrysostom, or Golden-mouth. John, patriarch of Constantinople, was so called, but not till long after his death. His oratory was very attractive, appealing more to the feelings and passions than to the reason (347–407).

Dion, the rhetorician, was surnamed Chrysostom before the patriarch (A.D. 50-117).

Chupattie Mystery (The), Feb. 1857. Just before the Indian mutiny, a native policeman entered a village of Oude, carrying two chupatties, or cakes, and ordered the person who took them to make ten more and distribute two to the five contiguous villages. In a few hours the whole country was alive with watchmen running from place to place with these cakes. The mystery has not yet been solved, but two facts are known: (1) that soon all India was in mutiny; and (2) that five centuries previously a similar distribution of cakes in China led to the mutiny which overthrew the dynasty of the Moguls.

Church (Orders of the). The sacrament of orders is only one; but it is divided into seven grades in the Roman Catholic Church.

I. Latin Church: Seven clerical orders (or grades): Ostiarius, exorcist, reader, acolyte, subdeacon, deacon, priest. The last three are called the greater orders; the other four are called the lesser orders. The priesthood completes the grades; the dignitaries being only priests.

Subdeacons have been classed with the higher orders only since the time of Innocent III. (1198–1216).

Bishops, priests, and deacons are said to be of divine institution.

The five orders of ostiarius, exorcist, reader, acolyte, and subdeacon are human institutions, which (we are told) have existed from apostolic times.

Ten clerical orders. Those who insist that there are ten clerical orders in the Latin Church reckon these three amongst the grades: the tonsure, the office of precentor, and episcopal consecration.

II. Greek Church: Either Four clerical orders: reader, subdeacon, deacon, and priest;

Or Eleven. Those who maintain that there are eleven clerical grades in the Greek Church recognise the following: sexton, confessor, singer, ostiarius (or doorkeeper), exorcist, acolyte, reader, subdeacon, deacon, priest, and bishop.

III. Anglican Church: Three clerical orders: deacon, priest, and bishop.

Church-ale. A wake to commemorate the dedication of a church. These revels consisted of drinking and sports, especially dancing.

In 1634 Denham issued an order in the western circuit to put an end to the disorders attending church-ales, bid-ales, and clerk-ales.—HOWITT, Hist. of England (Charles I. ch. iii. p. 159).

Church Army (The), 1882. A home missionary society for the conversion of the masses by out-door and in-door meetings, and by personal influence.

Church Catechism (The). Strype assigns it to Nowell ('Ecc. Mem.' ii. 368); but Churton, in his 'Life of Dean Nowell,' attributes it to Poinet, afterwards bishop of Winchester (pp. 403, 407). The 'Church Catechism' must not be confounded with what is called 'Cranmer's Catechism' (q.v.), which was originally German.

Church-cess (Ireland). Same as church-rate in England, for the general expenses connected with the parish (Protestant) church, such as clerk's salary, washing the surplice, cleaning the church, buying the sacramental bread and wine. Levied in Ireland on Catholics as well as Protestants, and in England on dissenters as well as church-goers. Church-rates abolished 1868 (31, 32 Vict. c. 31); but the Irish church-cess was abolished in 1833. It amounted to 80,000*l.* a year. See 'Irish Church Temporalities Bill.'

Church Cities. In feudal times, were those built on church lands; and in these the abbot or bishop was chief magistrate. Generally speaking these cities were much more free than 'Ducal Towns' (q.v.).

Church Education Society (The). In Ireland, 1839. Supported wholly by voluntary subscriptions. This society was started by those who disapproved of Mr. Stanley's 'National Schools' (q.v.), because religious instruction was disallowed, and because any person, of any persuasion, at certain hours, might give special instruction to the children whose parents sanctioned it. The Church Society insisted that the Bible should be taught, and that religious instruction should be given to the children in conformity with the principles of the Established Church.

Church Forgeries. Mosheim says (vol. ii. 17): 'Acts of councils, records, epistles, and whole books were forged by these zealous fanatics [the monks], in order the more easily to rob and plunder the credulous, on whom they imposed their glaring and fraudulent absurdities.' See 'Literary Forgeries.'

Church-scot. The same as church-rate, a tax levied as far back as 692 for the repair of churches, and the supply of what was needful for divine worship. It was paid at Martinmas, according to a rate made at Christmas. In case of failure to pay the rate, a fine of twelve times the amount was imposed. In 1868 Mr. Gladstone virtually abolished parish church rates by making the payment voluntary.

Church Temporalities Act (The). Ireland, 1834 (3, 4 Will. IV. c. 37). Investing the revenues of the suppressed bishoprics of Ireland (about 50,000*l.*) in the Board of Ecclesiastical Commissioners, to be applied by them to the erection and repairs of churches, church-rates, and other ecclesiastical purposes. The archbishoprics of Cashel and Tuam were reduced to bishoprics, the total number of sees being 10, instead of 21 as heretofore, with 2 archbishops instead of 4.

The suppressed sees were Ardagh, Clogher, Clonfert with Kilmacduagh, Cork with Ross, Dromore, Elphin, Kildare, Killala with Achonry, Ossory, Raphoe, Waterford with Lismore. Value in 1833 of the 11 sees, 61,521*l.* Of these Clogher was 10,560*l.* a year, and Elphin 9,484*l.*

There are now (1890) 4 Catholic archbishops and 24 Catholic bishops in Ireland.

Church of Christ (The). See 'Disciples.'

Cicero (The British). William Pitt, earl of Chatham (1708–1778).

Cicero (The Christian). Lucius Cælius Lactantius (died 330). Tutor of Crispus, son of Constantine.

Cicero (The German). Johann Sturm, printer and scholar (1507–1589).

Cicero of France (The). Massillon, bishop of Clermont (1663–1742). The conclusion to his sermon called 'The Day of Judgment' is sublime and harrowing.

Cicero of Germany. John elector of Brandenburg (1486–1499).

Cicero of Latin Christianity (The). Augustine (354–430).

Cicero of the British Senate. George Canning (1770–1827).

Cicero's Mouth. Philippe Pot, prime minister of Louis XI. (1428–1494).

Cicero's Murderer was Popilius Lænas.

Cid el Campeador (4 syl.). Don Roderigo Ruy Diaz de Bivar [i.e. Roderic, son of Diego of Bivar], a nobleman of Castile (1040–1099).

'Cid' is an Arabic word meaning lord, and 'campeador' = champion.

Cid'aris. The head-dress of Persian monarchs, not unlike the French cap of liberty, or Phrygian cap. Only the king is allowed to wear the top of the cap erect. The cidaris of Darius was blue and white, or purple and white (Quintus Curtius, book iii. ch. 8, and vi. chap. 6).

Cimbri. The inhabitants of the Chersonesus Cimbrica. Confederated with the Teutŏnês, they invaded the Roman dominions, and were overthrown by Marĭus in the battle of the Campi Raudii, B.C. 101.

Cimbrian Panic (The). B.C. 105. A Roman panic after the annihilation of five armies by the Cimbrians. This panic rose to its climax after the terrible defeat of Cæpio, the consul in Gallia Narbonensis.

Cimburgis Lip (The). A protruding under-jaw, with a heavy lip indisposed to shut close, often called the 'Austrian Lip.' It came from Kaiser Maximilian I., and was inherited from his grandmother, Cimburgis, a Polish princess, who married Kaiser Friedrich III.

Cimon (Peace of), B.C. 447. Which brought to a close the hostility between Persia and Greece.

This treaty of peace was made by Anaxicrătês, not Cimon, who had lately died.

Cincinna'ti (The), or 'Cincinnātuses,' 1783. An order in the United States of N. America, established by the officers of the anti-British army 'to perpetuate friendship, and to raise a fund for the relief of the widows and orphans of those who fell in the War of Independence.' Their badge is Cincinnatus receiving the ensigns of dictator, and the motto is 'Omnia reliquit servare rempublicam.'

Cinerarians, 'Cinerarii.' So Christians were called by their enemies, because they reverenced the ashes or bones of the dead.

Reliqua SS. Mirac. S. Ursinari, sumptis de concineratione sanctissimi corporis in sepulcro ejus duobus dentibus. Hinc 'cinerarios' catholicos appellabant heretici.—DU CANGE, vol. ii. p. 619, col. 2.

Cinq Mars (Conspiracy of), 1642 A conspiracy secretly fomented by the king himself, Louis XIII., 'to get rid of Richelieu, whose domineering spirit was most hateful to him. Those who favoured the conspirators were called 'Royalists,' the adherents of Richelieu were called 'Cardinalists.' The object of the conspiracy was to dismiss Richelieu and make Cinq Mars chief minister. The plot being discovered, and it being known that Cinq Mars had made a treaty with Spain, the leading conspirators were arrested. Cinq Mars and other noblemen were beheaded; the Duc de Bouillon was deprived of his principality, which was confiscated to the throne; and the infamous Duc d'Orléans turned king's evidence.

Richelieu brought to the block at least six noblemen: Marillac, Cinq Mars, De Thou, Châlais, Bouteville, and Montmorency.

Cinque Centisti. Those Italian artists of the 16th cent. who formed the Cinque Cento school. See 'Seicentisti,' and 'Trecentisti.'

Cinque Cento (2 syl. each), 500. Used to designate the style of art which rose in Italy after 1,500.

The Golden Age of Italian art, containing the immortal five, who all died after 1500, viz.:

Leonardo da Vinci	who died	1520
Raphael	"	1520
Correggio	"	1534
Michel Angelo [Michelagnolo]*	"	1564
Titian	"	1576

* His name was Michel Angelo Buonarroti.

 In literature Italy produced at the same period:

Machiavelli	who died	1527
Ariosto (Orlando Furioso) ...	"	1533
Tasso (Gerusalemme Liberata)	"	1595

All these, except Tasso, were born in the century before, so that many use the word 'Cinquecento' to denote the sensuous school that followed the immortal five—a school which borrowed their subjects from heathen mythology.

Pronounce Chin-kwa Chento.

Cinque Ports (The). Incorporated in 1212 by King John. The five ports are Dover, Hastings, Sandwich, Romney, and Hythe. Three other ports, viz. Rye, Winchelsea, and Seaford, were subsequently added. The governor is entitled lord warden.

Cinque in English is pronounced Sink.

Circê of the Revolution (The). Madame Roland (1754–1793). The most fascinating woman of the period. As she was led to the guillotine she exclaimed, bowing to the statue of Liberty, 'O Liberty, how many crimes are committed in thy name!'

Circle of Popilius (The). The necessity of explaining your intentions without hesitation or delay. The tale is that Popilius was sent by the Roman Senate as envoy to Antiochus, king of Syria, and was commissioned to forbid the king making war on Egypt, or harassing the children of Ptolemy. Antiochus replied that he would think about the matter, when Popilius drew a circle round the king, and said: 'Prince, you must reply before you leave this circle.' Antiochus, taken by surprise at this boldness, replied at once, 'Tell the Senate I will do what they demand of me.' Having so said, Popilius saluted him, and offered him the friendship of the Roman people.

Circle of Stennis (The), or 'Circle of Odin.' A circular hole in one of the huge Standing Stones of what is called the Orcadian Stonehenge. This Standing Stone was at one time used by rustics for plighting troth. The lovers joined hands in this hole, and swore by Odin to be faithful to each other. This plight is called the 'promise of Odin,' and making the plight is 'taking the promise of Odin.'

We were wedded after the ancient manner of the Norse, our hands were clasped in the circle of Odin, with ... vows of eternal fidelity.—Sir W. Scott, The Pirate, chap. xxxiii.

Circles of Germany (The). Departments or districts. In 1387 Kaiser Wenceslaus divided Germany into four circles, viz. (1) Saxony; (2) the Rhine provinces; (3) Austria, Bavaria, and Suabia; and (4) Franconia and Thuringia.

In 1438 Kaiser Albert II. increased the number to six, each of which had a right to be represented on the diet or national assembly. The circles were: Franconia, Bavaria, Suabia, Westphalia, Upper Rhine, and Saxony.

In 1512, under Maximilian I., the number of circles was increased to ten, viz. Austria, Bavaria, Burgundy, Franconia, Lower Rhine provinces, Upper Rhine provinces, Lower Saxony, Upper Saxony, and Westphalia.

Each circle had an ecclesiastical and lay prince, with a military chief.

At the Reformation the circles were divided into Catholic, Protestant, and Mixt. The Catholic Circles were Austria, Bavaria, and Burgundy; the Protestant Circles were those of Upper and Lower Saxony; and the Mixt Circles were the other five. In 1806 the division into circles was broken up by the 'Confederacy of the Rhine.'

Circular Coin. 'When English coin is made circular the prince of Wales shall be crowned in London.' This 'prophecy' is attributed to Merlin. In 1281 Edward I. issued a new coinage of round halfpence and farthings, and forbade the penny to be divided into four quarters. David, thinking this to be the thing predicted, invaded England 22 March, 1282, and, being joined by Llewellyn, brought Edward I. into the field and led to the conquest of Wales. In 1284 Edward's son was born at Carnarvon, and was presented to the Welsh as the 'prince of Wales.' When Llewellyn's head was placed on the Tower of London it was crowned with a willow-wreath in derision of the 'prophecy.' The circular coin and coronation of the Welsh prince synchronised, but the prophecy brought about its own accomplishment.

Circumcellians (The), or 'The Circumcelliones,' A.D. 317. A kind of 'Salvation Army' organised by the Donatists, which marched from town to town with staves in their hands, to redress wrongs, and propagate their own religious views. They set slaves at liberty, released debtors from prison, and called themselves 'The Saint's Chiefs.' They were very zealous, and courted martyrdom, but were at last put down by the magistrates. (Lat. circumcello, to beat about, to go about. Excello, to excel, is to go beyond others).

The leaders were called Captains; the 'soldiers' (who were peasants) carried huge clubs called Israelites; their war-cry was 'Praise be to God.'

Circumspecte Agatis (The Statute of), 13 Edw. I. st. 4 c. 1, A.D. 1285. Defining more strictly the power of the clergy, and directing the bishops to see that the parishioners kept their parish churches in repair.

The statute is called 'Circumspecte Agãtis,' from the first two words.

Cirrhæan War (The), B.C. 595–586. This was the First Sacred War. See 'Sacred War.'

Cisalpine Republic (The), 1797. Bonaparte, after the battle of Lodi, organised two states in Italy, one on the south and the other on the north side of the river Po. These two states were united next year into one under the title of the Cisalpine Republic, with Milan for the capital.

Cistercians, 1098. Reformed Benedictines, founded by Robert, abbot of Molême, in Burgundy, who retired with some twenty monks to Citeaux, in the diocese of Châlons. His order rapidly increased, and acquired the form and privileges of a religious republic, which exercised a sort of dominion over other monastic orders. The Cistercians were great graziers and wool-growers.

Cities of Great Britain.
Aberdeen, the granite city.
Birmingham, the midland capital.
Brighton, the queen of watering-places.
Edinburgh, the modern Athens.
Liverpool, the modern Tyre.
Manchester, Cottonopolis.
Worcester, the faithful city, so called from its motto: 'Floreat semper civitas fidelis.'

Brighton is often called 'London-super-mare.'

Citizen King (The). 'Le roi citoyen.' Louis Philippe of France (born 1773, reigned 1830–1848, died 1850). He was a member of the Jacobin Club, the son of Philippe Egalité, and one of the leaders of the revolutionary party. As a king he was most despotic and autocratic.

Servius Tullius of Rome was called the 'People's King.'

Cittadini (The). The Venetian bourgeois, between the popolari and gentiluomini.

City Flat Cap (The). The cap of Edward VI.'s reign, similar to the cap of the Blue-coat Boys. Subsequently called the Statute cap (q.v.). See 'Cap.'

City of Brotherly Love (The). A translation of Philadelphia, the chief city of Pennsylvania, U.S. of America.

City of David (The). Mount Zion, the fortified part of Jerusalem, where David had his palace.

City of Elms (The). New Haven, Connecticut, the streets of which are thickly shaded with elm-trees.

When happier days shall return . . . the South . . . will rear a monument of gratitude in the beautiful City of Elms, over the ashes of her greatest benefactor (Eli Whitney).—Edw. Everett, 1861.

City of Magnificent Distances (The). Washington, chief city of the U.S. of America, intersected with fifteen avenues from 130 to 160 feet wide. It was designed to cover a space of four and a half miles long by two and a half wide.

City of Notions (The). Boston, Massachusetts, 'the metropolis of Yankeedom.'

City of Peace (The). I. Jerusalem. The word Salem means peace. Jesus,

'King of the Jews,' was called the 'Prince of Peace' (Salem).

II. Bagdad, the capital of the Abbassides (3 syl.).

The calif retired from Bagdad, and established his residence at Samara on the Tigris, about twelve leagues above the City of Peace.—GIBBON, ch. lii.

City of Rocks (The). Nashville, in Tennessee.

City of St. Mark (The). Venice.

City of Spindles (The). Lowell, in Massachusetts, the largest cotton city of the U.S. of America.

City of Victory (The). Cairo, which means victory. The Arabic name is El Kahira (the Victorious). Founded 969 by Gohar, lieutenant of Moez (the first Fatamite kalif).

City of the Golden Gate (The). San Francisco in California.

City of the Seven Hills (The). Both Rome and Constantinople stood on seven hills.

City of the Seventy Isles (The). Venice.

City of the Straits (The). Detroit, which means a strait. It is situated on the west bank of the strait connecting Lake St. Clair with Lake Erie.

City of the Violated Treaty (The). Limerick, in Ireland; so called from the repeated violations of the treaty signed Oct. 1691, granting to Roman Catholics the same privileges in the exercise of their religion as they enjoyed in the reign of Charles II.

Years of unjust and vindictive penal laws show that the name, 'City of the Violated Treaty,' was well bestowed.—KNIGHT.

City of the Violet Crown (The). Athens. Aristophanês (Equites, and Acharnians) calls it ἰοστέφανος. Ion [meaning a violet] was a representative king of Athens, whose four sons gave names to the four Athenian classes. It was Ion's city, the city of the violet, the city of King Ion or king of the Violet Crown.

Similarly, Paris, the city of Louis or Lys, is the city of the lily.

[Pitt] loved England, as an Athenian loved the City of the Violet Crown.—MACAULAY.

Civil Era of Constantinople (The). This era began 1 Sept. B.C. 5508.

Civil Jewish Era (The). This era began Oct. B.C. 3761.

Civil Law (The), or 'Corpus Juris Civilis.' A collection of the laws, edicts, and imperial decrees of the Roman Empire; first compiled by private individuals, afterwards by Theodosius, A.D. 438, and finally by Justinian, A.D. 533. It comprises (1) The Institutes or first principles of Roman Law; (2) The Digest or Pandects in 50 books, being the opinions of eminent lawyers; (3) a new Code or collection of Imperial Constitutions in 12 books, and (4) the Novels, or new constitutions of succeeding emperors. This body of laws was unknown in feudal times till a copy was discovered at Amalfi, in Italy in 1130, and produced a greater effect on the laws, pursuits, and characters of the Middle Ages than any book ever published before or since.

The Corpus Juris Civilis, with certain modifications, restrictions, and additions, is still an authority in our Ecclesiastical, Admiralty, and University Courts.

Civil List (The). The yearly sum of money granted by the British government for the support of the household of the reigning monarch and the dignity of the crown.

It used to include the royal household, the privy purse, the royal palaces, the salaries of the chancellor, judges, great officers of state, and ambassadors, the incomes allowed to the several members of the royal family, secret service money, pensions, and other irregular claims. The army and navy, with the interest of the national debt, have been separate charges since the accession of James I.

At the beginning of the reign of Victoria the Queen surrendered the hereditary revenues of the crown, and received from parliament a yearly stipend of 385,000*l.*, with 1,200*l.* a year for pensions 'to those who have just claims on the royal bounty.' Her Majesty pays her own household, but all other national expenses are paid by parliament as separate items.

Civil Marriage Act. 6, 7 Will. IV. c. 85. 17 Aug., 1836. Provided for the celebration of marriage without religious service, before a registrar, or with religious service in any certified place of religious worship, leaving it optional with the parties concerned to be married, as aforetime, in a parish church.

by licence, or after banns. By this Act marriage is constituted a civil compact consummated before witnesses, with or without religious service.

Civil Oath (The), 13 July, 1790. Taken in the Champ de Mars, first by Lafayette on behalf of the National Guards, then by the President of the Assembly, and then by the king himself (Louis XVI.), who said 'I, king of the French, swear to use all power delegated to me by the constitutional law of the State to maintain the Constitution (q.v.) decreed by the National Assembly, and accepted by me.' The oath taken by Lafayette and the President was: 'We swear to be faithful to the nation, the law, and the king. To maintain with our utmost power the Constitution decreed by the National Assembly, and to remain united to all Frenchmen by the indissoluble bonds of fraternity.'

Champ de Mars, pronounce Sharnd Mars.

Civil Service (The). The duties rendered by those in government appointments, and paid for by the State. The whole list would be over 15,000 names, including the officers of the royal household, the officers of the House of Lords and House of Commons, all such offices as the Treasury, Home, War, Foreign, Admiralty, Post, &c. (but not policemen, postmen, and such other employés as receive weekly wages). In 1855 a law was made for the examination of candidates for the Civil Service, who enter generally as clerks and rise by seniority, the age at entrance being between eighteen and twenty-five, and the first year's stipend about 80*l*. Of course the more important departments are not included.

The Civil Service Estimates are between seven and eight millions sterling annually.

Civil Wars of Rome (The). In their widest extent they began with Tiberius Gracchus, and terminated with the election of Octavius Augustus to the empire, B.C. 133–31. In a more limited sense, they mean the contest between Caius Marius and Cornelius Sylla, or Sulla (B.C. 88–78).

The original cause of the civil war was the struggle between the oligarchy and the democracy of Rome. This struggle lasted till Sylla restored the Senate to sovereignty; but this sovereignty was soon disturbed by Julius Cæsar.

Clan-na-Gael (The), 1870. An Irish Fenian organisation founded in Philadelphia, and known in secret as the 'United Brotherhood.' Its avowed object is to secure 'the complete and absolute independence of Ireland from Great Britain; and the complete severance of all political connection between the two countries, to be effected by unceasing preparation for armed insurrection in Ireland.' See 'New Departure.'

In 1883 Alexander Sullivan was elected one of the three heads of this murder club. His colleagues were Colonel Michael Boland, and D. C. Feely (or, as some say, Michael Kirwin). To this club the dynamite outrages in London are due, the designs to murder the Queen's ministers, and all the outrages of 1883 connected with 'Home Rule' (q.v.).

Clare College, Cambridge, 1326. This is University Hall, founded by Richard Badew, chancellor of the University. It was destroyed by fire, and on its restoration by Elizabeth de Clare, countess of Ulster, changed its name to Clare Hall; since 1857 called Clare College.

Clare Election (The), 1828. An epoch in the history of Ireland. Daniel O'Connell was elected M.P., although, being a Catholic, he was disqualified from taking his seat. So popular was he, and so powerful the Catholic Association, that the Duke of Wellington (the premier), and Sir Robert Peel (leader of the House of Commons) did not dare to resist the movement; and in 1829 Sir Robert brought in his bill for Catholic Emancipation, which was carried.

The Clare election was the harsh prelude to Catholic Emancipation and civil equality.—HOWITT, History of England (year 1828, p. 125).

Clarenceux King-of-arms. English herald of the southern provinces. That of the northern provinces is called Norroy (q.v.). Clarenceux king-of-arms, like Garter king-of-arms, was first appointed by Henry V.

Clarendon, in Wiltshire (The Council of), A.D. 1164. It comprised the king (Henry II.), the 2 archbishops, 11 bishops, 40 of the higher nobility, and a host of barons. It was convened in consequence of the conduct of Thomas Becket, and its judgments are comprised in the 16 canons called 'The Constitutions of Clarendon' (q.v.).

Clarendon Press (The). University of Oxford. The building was erected by Lord Clarendon, partly out of the profits of his 'History of the Rebellion,' 1713–1830. On the south side Bibles and Prayer-books are printed, on the north side general literature. Ten delegates have the management of the press, the vice-chancellor being one. The corresponding foundation in Cambridge is the Pitt Press (q.v.).

Clarisses, or 'Poor Clarisses,' 1224. Founded by St. Francis of Assisi, and placed under the charge of Clara, or Clarissa, of Assisi, his favourite nun. See under 'Franciscans.'

Clarty Hole. Muddy hole or slough, the site of Abbotsford, on the south bank of the Tweed, the residence of Sir W. Scott.

Claude (The English). Richard Wilson (1713–1782).

Clayton-Bulwer Treaty, 1850. See 'Bulwer-Clayton,' &c.

Clean-the-Causey Riot, 1515. The street riot between the rival factions of Angus and Arran. The former represented the Douglas party, and the latter the Hamiltons. The partisans of the Earl of Angus were swept from the causeys or streets like dirt.

Cleanest City in the World (The). Broeck, in Holland. It is 'painfully clean and neat.'

Cleanse the Causeway (The Battle of), 1522. A skirmish between the Douglases and Hamiltons in the High-street, Edinburgh. The Douglas party occupied the High-street, and attacked their opponents as they issued in disorder from the narrow closes or lanes. The Hamiltons were driven out of the city, leaving upwards of 70 men dead.

Their strife had been appeased since the battle of Cleanse-the-Causeway, and Arran drew out his forces in support of Angus, and not in opposition to him.—Sir W. Scott, Hist. of Scotland, xxii.

Clear the Causeys. See 'Cleanse the Causeway' and 'Clean the Causey.'

Clearing-House (The), 1775. A building in Lombard Street, where debit and credit cheques from different banks are balanced by transfer tickets. These tickets are white and green; the white being used when the bank has to pay a balance to the Clearing-house, and the green when it has to receive one. By this means transactions to the amount of several millions daily are settled.

There is a Railway Clearing-house in Seymour Street, London (adjoining the Euston Station), which enables different companies to carry on a through traffic. The Railway Clearing Act was passed in 1850. Most large commercial cities have clearing-houses.

Clem's Day (Old). St. Clement's day, the blacksmiths' day (23 Nov.). St. Clement is patron saint of blacksmiths, as St. Crispin is of shoemakers, St. Winifred of bakers, St. Louis of barbers, St. John Port Latin of booksellers, St. Lucy of candle-makers, St. Joseph of carpenters, St. Christopher of ferrymen, St. Peter of fishermen, St. Sever of fullers, St. Eloy of goldsmiths, St. William of hatters, St. Yves of lawyers, St. Arnold of millers, St. Florian of mercers, St. Cloud of nailers, St. Luke of painters and sculptors, St. Cosmo of doctors, St. Sebastian of pinmakers, St. Gore of potters, St. Nicholas of seamen, St. Gwendoline of shepherds, St. Hubert of sportsmen, St. Peter of stonemasons, St. Goodman of tailors, St. Urban of vintners, St. Boniface of wheelwrights, St. Blaise of woolcombers &c. &c.

Clementi'na. A spurious account of the journeys of Clemens Romānus with the Apostle Peter. The Apostolic Canons and Constitutions attributed to him are also spurious. Clemens is said to have died in 102. See 'Literary Forgeries.'

Clementine Liturgy (The). The oldest liturgy extant. It directs that two deacons shall stand, one on each side of the altar, holding their fans of vellum, fine linen, or peacock's feathers, to wave off the flies, and prevent their defiling the sacred elements. See 'Liturgy.'

Clementine Museum (The), of the Vatican, 1773. Founded by Clement XIV. It was improved by Pius VI., and then called Museo-Pio-Clementino.

Clementines (The). Nineteen discourses, preceded by two letters. One of Peter to James, bishop of Jerusalem, and the other of Clement to the same. The discourses are spurious Christian stories, but the work was esteemed next to the Holy Scriptures. There is no reason to believe it to have been the work of Clemens Romānus. On these fictitious homilies rests the sole evidence that St

Peter ever was in Rome. See 'Literary Forgeries.'

What is usually understood by Clementines is the third part of the Decretals of Raimond de Pennafort, a continuation of the text (q.v.) together with the rescripts since Boniface VIII. Undertaken by the order of Clement V. The Clementines of Clement I. are homilies, and wholly apocryphal. The Clementines of Clement V. are 'constitutions,' decrees, or rescripts of Roman pontiffs, forming the seventh volume of the Decretals. The Extravagantes Joannis (XXII.) form what was the 'Extravagantes Communes' of the Corpus Juris Canonici.

Clementines and Urbanists, 1378. The followers of Clement VII., pope in Avignon, and Urban VI., the simultaneous pope in Rome. France and Spain were Clementines. The split lasted fifty-one years, during all which time there were always two popes.

Cleomen'ic war (The). The war waged by Cleomĕnēs III., king of Sparta (225–222), against the Achæans, aided by Antigonus Doson, king of Macedonia. Cleomenēs was completely defeated at the battle of Sellasia, B.C. 222, and in B.C. 220 put an end to his life.

Cleopatra's Needles. Two obelisks of the time of Thothmes III., who reigned in Egypt some 1,500 years before Cleopatra was born.

Clerical Titles. The English clergy first assumed their honorary titles at the beginning of the 18th cent. Every clergyman is called 'Reverend.' Addressed in letters by strangers 'Rev. Sir.' An archbishop is styled, 'Most Reverend Father in God,' or 'The Most Reverend Arbp. of —.' Addressed as 'Your Grace,' 'May it please your Grace.' A bishop is styled 'The Right Reverend Father in God,' or 'The Right Reverend the Bishop of —.' Addressed as 'My Lord.' Deans are called 'The Very Reverend the Dean of —.' Addressed in letters 'Mr. Dean,' or 'Dear Mr. Dean.' Archdeacons are called 'The Venerable.' Addressed in letters by strangers 'Rev. Sir.'

The title of Canon was assumed by canons and honorary canons in the last quarter of the 19th cent. They are addressed as Canon —, or the Rev. Canon —. See 'Church Orders.'

Cler'ici Regula'res (4 syl.). Monks ordained to the priesthood, and who lived in monasteries (10th cent.).

Cler'ici Secula'res (4 syl.). Parish clergymen who lived in their own houses and might marry (10th cent.).

'Clericis Laicos' (The Bull). I. 1074. By which Gregory VII. forbade prelates to receive investiture from secular princes. This bull gave rise to the long contention about investitures.

II. Of 1160. Directed against Kaiser Friedrich I.

III. Of 1227, 1246. Directed against Friedrich II., Barbarossa.

IV. Of 1263. Directed against Manfroi, king of Naples.

V. Of 1294. Issued by Pope Boniface VIII., forbidding Edward I. and all other princes, under pain of excommunication, to tax church property without permission from Rome. In 1296 Edward, in defiance of this bull, did tax church property, and that severely; nay, more, he outlawed all those ecclesiastics who refused to pay the levy, and then confiscated their whole property.

VI. Of 1327, 1346. Directed against Ludwig of Bavaria.

Clerk of Assize. A salaried officer attached to each circuit, who accompanies the judge at the assizes, to issue subpœnas, orders, writs, and other processes.

Clerk of the Pipe. An exchequer clerk for making out leases for crown lands, sheriffs' accounts, and so on. The Pipe Office was abolished in 1833.

The office is so called (says Lord Bacon) because the whole receipt of the court is finally conveyed into it by means of divers small pipes or quills, as water into a cistern.

Clerks in Oxford University. Students on the foundation, received at reduced fees. These foundations belong to the five colleges: Magdalen, Merton, New College, Queen's, and Wadham. See 'Bible Clerks,' 'Sizars,' 'Servitors.' At Jesus College, Oxford, there are three 'clerks' not on the foundation.

Clerk-ales. A festive meeting in the house of the parish clerk, celebrated with drinking, dancing, and sports.

The ordinary amusements (1632) in country parishes were church-ales, clerk-ales, and bid-ales.—T. V. SHORT, D.D., Hist. of the Church of England, p. 392.

Climacteric Years. Certain years in the life of man which were at one time considered to be turning-points in his health and fortune. They were 7 and its multiples. The Grand Climacteric was 63, which consists of 3 times 3 multiplied by 7, all 'sacred' numbers.

Clinic Baptism. Baptism administered to a clinicus, or one on a sick-bed. No clinicus could enter holy orders.

Clinicus. One who has received clinic baptism—that is, one who has been baptized on a sick-bed.

Cliquot. The sobriquet given by Punch to Frederick William IV. of Prussia (1795, 1840–1861), who was fond of champagne with the 'Cliquot' brand.

Clog Almanac (The). A square stick of some hard wood about 8 inches long, which might either be hung up in a room or be fitted into a walking-stick. It was a 'perpetual almanac,' showing the Sundays and other fixed festivals. Used in Denmark, and brought to England by the Danish invaders.

Close Communionists, or 'Strict Communionists.' Those Baptist dissenters who admit no one to partake with them of the Lord's Supper who is not one of their special persuasion. Dr. Doddridge says, 'They most inconsistently avow that they hope to sit all together in the great Marriage Supper of the Lamb, but refuse to sit together at the table of a little Bethel.'

Closelings, 1687. Private conferences in which James II. sought to win over men of influence and men in office to aid him in the abolition of the Test Acts, which excluded Catholics from office. He said, of course, men must act as they think proper, but, at the same time, they could not expect to continue in his favour or employ while they acted in direct violation of his wishes. The Lords Derby, Thanet, Shrewsbury, Lumley, and Newport, with Vice-admiral Herbert and many others, at once resigned their respective offices.

Closter Seven (Convention of), 10 Sept., 1757. Concluded with the French by the Duke of Cumberland, but disavowed by the British parliament. By this most disgraceful compact Hanover was left in the hands of the French, and it was agreed that England and France should take no further part in the Seven Years' War.

Clothier of England (The). Jack of Newbury—that is, John Winchcomb—the greatest clothier in England in the reign of Henry VIII. He kept 100 looms in his own house at Newbury.

Cloveshoo, in Kent (The Council of), 747. Called by Cuthbert, archbishop of Canterbury, in deference to a request of Pope Zacharias. It was decided in this Council that bishops should visit their dioceses every year; that the people should be taught the Creed and the Lord's Prayer in the vulgar tongue, and have the two sacraments explained to them; prayers for the dead were enjoined. The great historical value of this council is, however, that there is no indication that the English Church was at the time under submission to the See of Rome, although Wilfrid, an ultra-partisan of the Roman pontiff, and friend of Cuthbert's, was certainly present.

Club (The), 1689. A league of discontented Whigs in the Scotch Convention of Estates, at the beginning of the reign of William and Mary. The leaders were Montgomery, the Lords Annandale and Ross, and the factious Sir Patrick Hume. These clubbists caused for a time great trouble. They opposed every measure which the ministers introduced in the Scotch 'Convention of Estates,' refused all supplies, and claimed for the convention a veto on the nomination of Scotch judges, by which they put a stop to the business of the Court of Session. They tried to ruin the Dalrymples, and succeeded in carrying an act to incapacitate all who had served James II. from holding office under the new sovereigns. The government of Scotland was at a deadlock; both the legal and legislative business was at an end. The object of the clubbists was to compel the king to give them posts in the government of Scotland. By the end of the year their influence declined, and the nation insisted that business should be obstructed no longer.

Club des Enragés (Le), 1789. A political club which acted with the Breton club (q.v.) at the outbreak of the Great French Revolution. When the States-General was about to be convened, these two clubs vehemently insisted that the Tiers Etat should outnumber the other two orders together.

Club Monarchique (Le), 1790. A nickname of the 'Feuillants Club' (q.v.).

Club Parliament (The), 1426. So called because, arms being prohibited, the retainers of the barons appeared with clubs on their shoulders. This prohibition was made in consequence of the brawls of the Duke of Gloucester and Cardinal Beaufort. See 'Parliaments.'

Club of Equality and Freedom (The), 1793. A Scotch club in sympathy with the French revolutionists.

Club of '89 (The). A branch of the Jacobin Club (q.v.). It held its meetings in the Palais Royal. Lafayette, Bailly the mayor of Paris, the Abbé Sieyès, and Mirabeau were members of this club. Though called the 'Club of '89,' it was not founded till 1790. It was nicknamed Le Club Monarchique, being friendly to the monarchic constitution. It changed its quarters from the Palais Royal to a convent of the Feuillants, near the Tuileries, and was then known at 'The Feuillants.'

Clubbists. See above, 'The Club.' 1689.

Clubmen, 1644. A society formed for self-defence against Maurice's and Goring's armies in the west. They were yeomen and others, who armed themselves with clubs to resist military marauders. They were not political, and being between two stools, were befriended by neither. The king's party hated them because they hindered their movements; and the parliamentary party called them 'traitors to the commonwealth' because they opposed the depredations of Fairfax's army. They were strong in numbers (some 10,000 in all), but want of discipline was their weakness. Their badge was a white ribbon.

The republican party had cause to be suspicious if it is true that 'after the battle of Naseby there was found on Sir Lewis Davis a royal commission for raising clubmen to aid the king's party.'

Cluniac Order (The), or 'Cluniacs,' 942. A branch of the Benedictine monks reformed by Odo abbot of Cluny, in Normandy. Introduced into England by William earl of Warren, in 1077.

Coal Burner (The). Edmund king of Sweden (1026–1051) was called Kolbrenner because he enacted 'If anyone injures his neighbour's goods, he shall have goods to the same value burnt in a coal-fire.'

Coalition Ministry (The). The ministry formed under Lord North and Charles James Fox, from 5 April, 1783, to 19 Dec. same year.

Also the Aberdeen Administration, 28 Dec., 1852, to 30 Jan., 1855.

Coalitions against France.

First coalition 1793, made by England and all the powers of Europe, except Sweden and Denmark. Napoleon Bonaparte won the battles of Montenotte, Milesimo, Dego, Mondŏvi, Lodi, Lonato, Castiglione, Bassano, Arcŏla, Rivoli, Tagliamento. The Treaty of Campo Formio was made 17 Oct., 1797.

Second coalition 1799, by Russia, Austria, England, Naples, Portugal, Turkey, &c., a year and a half after the Treaty of Campo Formio; 1800 famous for Bonaparte's 'Forty Days' Campaign,' in which he won the battles of Montebello and Marengo; and Moreau won those of Hochstädt, Hohenlinden, and Traun. Peace of Luneville, 9 Feb., 1801.

Third coalition 1805, consisting of England, Austria, Russia, and Sweden. Napoleon won the battle of Austerlitz. Peace of Presburg, 26 Dec., 1805.

Fourth coalition 6 Oct., 1806, to the Treaty of Tilsit, 8 July, 1807, consisting of Prussia, Saxony, Great Britain, and Russia. Napoleon won the battles of Schleitz (9 Oct.), Saalfeld (10 Oct.), Jena and Auerstadt (14 Oct.), Potsdam (16, 17 Oct.), Berlin (28 Oct.), Eylau, the most bloody of all his victories (8 Feb., 1807), Heilsberg (10 June), and Friedland (14 June, 1807).

Fifth coalition of April 1809, to the battle of Wagram (6 July, 1809). Napoleon won the battle of Ingolstadt (20 April), Eckmühl, in Bavaria (22 April), and Wagram (6 July).

He was wounded in the heel at Ratisbon 23 April; was defeated by the Archduke Karl at Aspern 21 May, and at Essling 22 May; and was excommunicated by the pope 10 June, 1809.

Sixth and last coalition, consisting of Prussia, Russia, Austria, Sweden, and Great Britain, 3 March, 1813 to the banishment of Napoleon to St. Helena, 18 Oct., 1815.

Napoleon won the battles of Lützen 2 May, 1813, Bautzen (in Saxony) 19 May, Wurschen 20 May, Hochkirchen 21 May, Dresden 27 Aug. (here Marshal Moreau was slain), St. Dizier 27 Jan., 1814, Brienne 29 Jan., Champ-Aubert 10 Feb., Montmirail 11 Feb., Château-Thierry 13 Feb., Champ-Aubert (a second time) 14 Feb., Méry-sur-Seine 24 Feb.; and after his escape from Elba he won the battle of Ligny 16 June, 1815.

He lost the battles of Leipzig 16, 18, 19 Oct., 1813; Rothière 1 Feb., 1814; Laon 9 and 10 March, Quatre Bras 16 June, and WATERLOO 18 June, 1815.

Coastguard. A force originally established to prevent smuggling. In 1856 it was placed under the Admiralty, and is now divided into eleven districts, each under a captain of the navy, and the whole under a commodore. The number is 4,000.

Coat and Conduct Money. Money required for the equipment and transport of the militia. This tax was extorted by Charles I. ('Fairfax Correspondence,' vol. ii. p. 2.)

Cobden Prize (The). For an essay on political economy. For members of the University of Cambridge who have not graduated more than three years. Value 50*l*. Founded by the Cobden Club in 1876. See 'Political Economy.'

Cochrane-plack. Debased coin issued in Scotland in the reign of James III. by Cochrane, the royal mason, on whom the king conferred the earldom of Mar, lately made vacant by the murder of the king's brother. When Cochrane was told that the base coin would certainly be called in, he answered incredulously, 'Yes, on the day when I am hanged.' But so it turned out—Cochrane was hanged, and the Cochrane-plack was called in.

Cockade City (The). Petersburg, in Virginia.

Cockburn's Act. The Act of Sir Alexander Cockburn in 1853 to abolish 'list offices,' set up after the Act of 1845 to abolish sweepstakes. In list offices money was staked in advance on an adventure, and they proved to be most disastrous of all the methods of gambling, especially among clerks, shopboys, and servants, who were induced to rob their employers under the promise of certainly winning.

Though betting-houses were abolished in 1853 (16 & 17 Vict. c. 119), yet Tattersall escapes the law because he himself has direct personal interest in a bet, like a 'bank'; and gentlemen there bet with each other freely, without any interference whatever. No bet can be recovered as a debt in any court of law. They are 'debts of honour' only. Gambling was prohibited by law even in the reign of Henry VIII. (1541).

Cock Lane Ghost (The). Near West Smithfield, London, 1760–1762. The Duke of York, with Lady Northumberland, Lady Mary Coke, Lord Hertford, and Horace Walpole, all in one hackney-coach, drove to the 'haunted house,' while the rain fell in torrents. The house was crammed full, above fifty people having crowded into the room, lighted with one tallow candle, and stayed from seven till half-past one in midwinter, to witness the knockings and scratchings of the ghost, which refused to make any manifestations. But such a company tells plainly what hold the imposition had taken on the public. The case was this: Kent, a broker, having lost his wife, was visited by his sister-in-law Fanny, with whom he fell in love. They took lodgings with Parsons, parish clerk of St. Sepulchre's, and each made a will leaving all to the survivor. Fanny died suddenly, and Parsons gave out that Kent had murdered her. In proof of this, certain knockings and scratchings were heard every night in the chamber lately occupied by Fanny, and these were attributed to her ghost. When questions were asked 'the ghost knocked once to signify yes, twice to signify no, and scratched to indicate displeasure.' Parson's daughter, a child of 12, took a board into her bed, and made these knockings and scratchings, which for many months set all London agog, and even made matter for sober history.

Cock-pen Tree. A large hollow oak in that part of Sherwood Forest called Birkland, from the number of silver birches. In the hollow of this tree game cocks were penned for the Shrove Tuesday sports, to keep them well out of the way of dunghill poultry. The tree is now called 'The Major,' or the 'Major's Oak,' from Major Rooke, the antiquary.

This tree is very large, fifteen persons can be packed inside it. The bole grips the earth with a circumference of 90 feet; 6 feet above the ground its girth is 80 feet; and its branches cover a circumference of 240 feet. It stands in a part of the forest belonging to the Earl Manvers, and is almost always called the 'Major Oak.'

Cockpit, Whitehall, the Privy Council Office. Also a locality where persons lived, for George duke of Albemarle died 'at his apartment in the Cockpit;' and the Princess Anne, we are told, 'left the Cockpit' to live 'at Zion House.'

After the Restoration, the Treasury Board sat at a place called the Cockpit.—COX, Inst. of Eng. Govern. ii. vii. 682 (1863).

Cockpit of Europe (The). Belgium is so called because it has been the site of more battles than any nation in Europe.

Cocles, or Horatius Cocles, of Horn. John Haring, of Horn, who defended the Diemerdyke against 1,000 Spaniards, and made his escape unwounded by either spear or gun.

Cocles, or Horatius Cocles, of the Tyrol, 1793. Alexander Davy Dumas, father of the novelist, who, at Brixen, defended the passage of a bridge on which Dumouriez's success wholly depended.

Code Henri (The). That is the code of Henri, king of Hayti (1767, 1811–1820). Joining the black insurgents against the French, he became head of the Haytian army in 1806, president of Hayti for life in 1807, and king of Hayti in 1811. He was a giant in stature, and his courage was indisputable.

Code de Napoléon (Le), 15 Mar., 1803 to 17 Sept., 1804. A French code of laws regulating all that pertains 'aux droits civils, à la personne et à la propriété des citioyens.'

There are several other codes used in France, as Le Code de Commerce, Le Code de Procédure Civile, Le Code d'Instruction Criminelle, Le Code Pénal, Le Code Rural, Le Code Forestier, Le Code de la Pêche fluviale; all except the last two are Napoleonic codes. There are also Le Code Militaire, Le Code Maritime, Le Code de l'Enregistrement, &c.

Code Noire (Le). That is, a code of laws for the negroes in the French colonies, made by Colbert, in the reign of Louis XIV.

Code of Lanego (The). An excellent code of laws drawn up at Lanego, in Portugal, by order of King Alfonso I. (1139–1185).

Code of Melrose (The). A collection of laws compiled at Melrose Abbey; the work of many learned jurisconsults, appointed for the purpose by David I. of Scotland, who reigned 1114–1143.

Codex Alexandri'nus. Long supposed to be the oldest MS. of the Bible extant. It is preserved in the British Museum, and was published in facsimile under the care of Charles Godfrey Woide, in 1786 (London). It contains all the New Testament, except Matt. i., xxv. 5; John vi. 50, viii. 52; and 2 Cor. iv. 13, xii. 6. This valuable MS. was found in Alexandria, and was presented to Charles I. in 1628 by Cyril Lucar, at one time patriarch of Alexandria. It is in four vols., size 10 in by 13, in double columns, and in uncial or capital letters. The Codex Vaticanus (q.v.) is older. See 'Sinaitic MS.'

Supposed to be of the 5th cent., towards the close.

Codex Argen'teus, or rather 'Argenteus Codex.' A MS. of the Gospels in Mœso-Gothic, by Ulfilas bishop of the Goths (348–388). It was discovered by Arnold Mercător, in the abbey of Werden, and taken to Prague in 1597, where it remained till 1648, when it was captured and presented to Christina of Sweden. Finally, it was presented to the University of Upsala in 1662 by Count Magnus Gabriel de la Gardie. Called Argenteus, or the Silver MS., from its silver letters.

Codex Augiensis. Purchased by Richard Bentley, and presented, after his death, to Trinity College, Cambridge, by Thomas Bentley. It contains most of the Pauline Epistles, in Greek and Latin.

Codex Basiliensis. A MS. copy of the four evangelists, with a few gaps, attributed to the close of the 10th cent. Belonging to the library of Basel, or Basle.

Codex Bezæ, or 'Cantabrigiensis,' A Bible MS. of the middle of the 6th cent., once in the possession of Beza, and sent by him as a gift to the University of Cambridge. It contains the Gospels and the Acts. Edited in 2 vols. folio by Thomas Kipling in 1793.

Codex Claromonta'nus. Containing the Pauline Epistles. This MS., which belongs to the latter half of the 6th cent., was edited in facsimile by Tischendorf in 1852 (Lips.)

Codex Coislinia'nus. Belonging to the Imperial Library of Paris. It is a MS. of the 6th cent.

Codex Cyprius. Formerly Colbertinus. Containing the four Gospels. The MS. belongs to the 9th cent.

Codex Damasce'nus. A Greek MS. of the Old and New Testament, with the Epistle of Barnabas and part of 'Shepherd' of Hermas. It was discovered in 1889 by M. Papadopulos in the vaults of the Arabic library of Damascus.

From the extremely meagre description given of this new-found MS., it seems to be a copy of the Sinaitic Codex. The doubt might easily be settled by referring to the 'Shepherd,' which in the Sinaitic MS. lacks the conclusion.

'Codex Diplomat'icus Sicili'æ,' 1791. A literary forgery, by Abbé Giuseppe Vella, who confessed his frauds, and was sentenced to fifteen years' imprisonment. He died 1814. See 'Literary Forgeries.'

His other book is Libro del Consiglio di Egitto, 1793.

Codex Dubliniensis. A palimpsest belonging to Trinity College, Dublin. It belongs to the close of the 6th cent., and was edited in facsimile by Dr. Barrett in 1801.

Codex Ephra'imi. The Parisian palimpsest, so called because over the original Bible MS. some treatises of Ephraim the Syrian have been inscribed. It is preserved in the Royal Library at Paris. Edited in facsimile by Tischendorf, 1843 (Lips.) Latter part of 5th cent.

Codex Sinait'icus. A Greek MS. of the Old and New Testament, with the Epistle of Barnabas, and part of the 'Shepherd' of Hermas, discovered in 1859 by Tischendorf in the Convent of St. Catherine. This codex, supposed to belong to the 4th cent., is one of the oldest in the world. In 1868 it was acquired by the Imperial Library of St. Petersburg.

Codex Theodosia'nus. A recueil of the Roman laws since the reign of Constantine, reduced by the order of Theodosius II., and promulgated in the East in 438. Valentinian III. introduced the codex into the West.

Codex Vaticanus. The oldest MS. of the New Testament, containing the four gospels, the Acts, the Catholic Epistles, and the Pauline Epistles. A facsimile of this MS., comprising the LXX. version of the Old Testament, was issued at Rome (edited by Cardinal Mai), and published in 1858, 4 vols. folio. Called 'Vaticānus' because it is preserved in the Vatican Library at Rome. Its date is supposed to be of the 4th cent. It does not contain the Revelation of John the divine. Copies are to be found in all the chief libraries of Christendom.

This MS. contains 700 leaves of the finest vellum, about a foot square, bound together.

It is very doubtful which codex is the older, the Vaticānus or the Sinaiticus. The secretary of the Bible Society (18 April, 1890) writes to me that the latter is 'regarded as the oldest MS. of the New Testament.'

Cœ'nobites (3 syl.). Those who lived in community, having all things in common. The locality where they dwelt was called the Cœnobium, and the first was built by Pachomius in Egypt A.D. 340. The cœnobium was subsequently called a 'monastery,' and the Cœnobite a 'monk.' It was St. Basel who reduced monachism into a system A.D. 378.

Of course the word is compounded of the two Greek words κοινός, Stos common life, or living in common), in contradistinction to Anchorites or Hermits, who lived solitary lives.

Cœur de Lion, 'Lion's-heart.' Richard I. of England (1157, 1189–1199). Probably so called from his generosity, magnanimity, and bravery.

It is said by the troubadours that Richard acquired the name of Lion's-heart from a contest he had with a lion, like David, the son of Jesse, and in the contest, thrusting his mailed arm down the lion's throat, he tore out its heart.

Cogito, ergo sum. Because I think, therefore I must exist. Descartes's axiom (1597–1650). He argued thus: 'I think, but thought cannot proceed from nothing; if therefore I think, I must be something.' Pushing the argument further back, as ex nihilo nihil fit, if something cannot proceed from nothing, and I myself am something, there must be a something from which I proceed, and that something is God.

Of course the fallacy of this argument is patent, for it makes cogitation the proof of what is required to be proved, and Descartes (3 syl.) is hopelessly involved in a vicious circle. Ice is cold, therefore there is such a thing as ice.

Descartes furthermore said: 'I can think of eternity and infinity, subjects beyond a finite mind; and as no man can think beyond himself, man must possess a soul, "spark of the Deity." But can a man think of either eternity or infinity? Does he not think instead of time without dimension, and the finite multiplied?'

Cognac (Treaty of), 22 Mar., 1526. Between Leo X., François I., Henry VIII. of England, Venice, Florence, and Switzerland.

Cognizances of English Kings. The Cross of St. George has been the royal badge since its introduction by Edward III., but all the kings up to the time of Henry VII. (inclusive) had their private cognizance also.

STEPHEN, a sagittary.
HENRY II., an escarbuncle.
RICHARD I., JOHN, and HENRY III., a star above a horned crescent.

EDWARD I., a golden rose.
EDWARD II., a castle, in allusion to his mother's arms (Castile).
EDWARD III. had several badges, as a falcon, the ostrich feather, a griffin, and the stump of a tree.
RICHARD II. adopted the stump and the falcon, but added the hart couchant, the peacock, and the sun behind a cloud.
HENRY IV., the ermine, the eagle, and the panther crowned.
HENRY V., a lighted beacon, an antelope and swan chained, with crowns round their necks.
HENRY VI., the antelope, panther, and double ostrich feather.
EDWARD IV., the falcon within a fetterlock, the rose and sun, a white hart, a white wolf, and a sable dragon and bull.
EDWARD V., the falcon and fetterlock.
RICHARD III., the rose and sun, a white boar; or boar and thorn-tree.
HENRY VII., a hawthorn bush crowned, a greyhound, the red dragon of Wales, a portcullis, red and white rose combined.

Coiffure à la serviette (La). A head-dress devised by Léonard, hairdresser of Marie Antoinette. It consisted of a coarse whity-brown table-napkin twisted into the hair amidst real vegetables, such as artichokes, cabbage-leaves, carrots, turnips, and radishes.

Coincidences—

I. The fall of Robespierre was 1794, which added together = 21. Now add the two together thus, 1794 + 21 = 1815, the fall of Napoleon.

II.-1815 added together = 15, which two added together, thus 1815 + 15 = 1830, the fall of Charles IX.

It would be remarkable if 1902 were to complete the triad so striking in French history.

III. It is curious about Louis Philippe. The year of his birth, or the year of the queen's birth, or the year of his flight, added to the year of his coronation, will give 1848, the date of abdication (this is another French triad—q.v.). He was born 1773; his queen was born 1782, and his flight was 1809; the sum of each is 18. And 1830 + 18 = 1848.

IV. Charles I., Louis XVI. each contains 8 letters.

Charles was decapitated January, Louis was guillotined January.

The sum of the day of the month in each case is 3. Thus Charles was executed January 30, Louis January 21.

The sum of the year in each case is 20. Thus 1649 = 20; and 1793 = 20.

Hence, finally, the entire summation is identical, 8 letters in the names, month January, sum of the days of the month 8, sum of the year 20; and total 31 + January.

V. Louis XIV. The number 14 is the sum of the figures of his age, 77 = 14; the sum of the figures which make the date of his coronation 1643 = 14; and the sum of the figures which make the date of his death 1715 = 14.

Coining Machine of the Revolution (The). The guillotine, so called by Fouquier Tinville, the public accuser, because the wealthy were always suspected when money was needed.

Cold shade of the aristocracy (The). It was Colonel Napier, in his 'History of the Peninsular War,' who said the people were doomed 'to wither in the cold shade of the aristocracy.'

Cold Year (The), 1614.

Collar of Tomar (The). A golden torque which Malachy, monarch of Ireland, took from the neck of a Danish chieftain whom he had conquered.

> Let Erin remember the days of old,
> Ere her faithless sons betrayed her,
> When Malachy wore the collar of gold
> Which he won from the proud invader.
> T. MOORE, Irish Melodies.

Collection des Deux-Ponts (La). A collection of the Latin classics published at Deux-Ponts, or Zweybrücken in Bavaria, towards the close of the 18th and in the first quarter of the 19th cent.

Colliberts. So the Cagots (q.v.) are called in Poitou, Maine, and Anjou.

Colloquy of Poissy (The), 1561. A synod of Catholics and Calvinists held at Poissy to settle the religious controversies by which France was molested. The end of this colloquy was to make each party more fiercely hostile than before, and their animosity broke out into a desolating religious war.

Collyrid'ians (The), or 'Collyridian Christians,' A.D. 373. Heretics abundant in Arabia, who invested the Virgin Mary with the name and honours of a goddess. They were so called because they offered to the goddess virgin a κολλύρα or cake. The heresy was carried from Thrace to Arabia by some women.

Colonisation of Ulster (The), 1610. A measure introduced in the reign of James I. for the pacification of Ireland. It was a vast measure of spoliation. Two-thirds of the north of Ireland was confiscated to the crown, and the land was allotted to Scotch and English settlers. The Corporation of London undertook the colonisation of Derry. Without doubt this 'plantation of Ulster' was a brilliant success; but its injustice has not even yet been condoned by the Irish.

An attempt was made, in 1889, to 'colonise' evicted farms, in Ireland, by English and Scotch tenants.

Coloquint'ida (St.). So Charles I. was called. Coloquintida is colocynth (or 'bitter apple'), which is extremely bitter and nauseous. To say Charles was to the Levellers a Coloquintida is about equivalent to saying he was to them 'a very bitter pill.' See Clarendon's 'Rebellion,' book iii. p. 91 (Oxford edit. 1839). In 2 Kings iv., 'Death in the pot,' or 'wild gourds,' is in the old versions translated 'coloquintida,' whence the Levellers obtained their comparison.

The Levellers styled him [Charles I.] an Ahab and a Coloquintida, a man of blood, and the everlasting obstacle to peace and liberty.—HOWITT, Hist. of Eng. (Charles I., chap. vi. p. 284).

Colora'do (U. S. America). So called from Rio Colorado or coloured river (Red River) which falls into the Vermilion Sea. The inhabitants are nicknamed Rovers.

Colossus of Danish Literature (The). Baron Ludwig Holberg (1684–1754). One of the greatest authors of comedy that ever lived. He was also an historian and satirist.

Colossus of the 19th cent. (The). Napoleon Bonaparte (1769–1821).

Colours for Church Decorations.

White for festivals of our Lord, for Easter, and for all saints except martyrs.

Red for martyrs, for Ash Wednesday, the last three days of Holy Week, and Whitsuntide.

Blue for all week days after Trinity Sunday.

Blue or green, indifferently, for ordinary Sundays.

Violet, brown, or grey for Advent and Lent.

Black for Good Friday.

Colours for the Days. An effort was made in France to introduce letter-paper of a special colour for each day of the week.

For Sunday, a delicate mauve.

Monday, pale green.

Tuesday, pink.

Wednesday (an unlucky day), sombre grey.

Thursday, blue.

Friday, white.

Saturday, straw-colour.

Colours in China.

Yellow is the imperial colour, restricted to the emperor and his sons. Symbolical of faith.

Purple is the colour worn by the emperor's grandsons.

Red is the symbol of virtue, truth, and sincerity.

Vermilion is the colour in which imperial edicts are written.

Black denotes guilt and vice.

White denotes moral purity. The colour of mourning indicative of hope.

Colours. See 'Military Colours.'

Colston's Day, or 'The Colston Day,' 13 Nov. The anniversary of the birth of Edward Colston (1636–1721), merchant, and M.P. for Bristol (1710). He founded and endowed schools and almshouses in Bristol, and on the anniversary of his birthday the four following societies dine together:—

The Colston, established 1726.

The Dolphin, established 1749 (the Colston crest is two dolphins).

The Grateful, established 1758.

The Anchor, 1769.

Large sums of money are collected at these dinners for annuities to aged persons, relief for lying-in women, apprenticing boys, and money gifts. In 1886 the subscription amounted to 3,534*l*.

Columbia. America is so called from Columbus, who discovered it. A part is still called British Columbia. It was called America from Amerigo Vespucci, the pilot who accompanied Alonzo de Ojeda in 1499 and published an account of the voyage. This book first made the New World popularly known.

Columbia, Columbia, to glory arise,
The queen of the world, and the child of the skies.
Dr. T. DWIGHT.

Hail, Columbia, happy land!
JOSEPH HOPKINSON, 1789.

Column of Antoninus (The). At Rome; made of marble, 176 feet high, in memory of the Emperor Marcus Aurelius Antoninus. Like that of Trajan, this column is covered externally with spiral bas-reliefs representing the wars carried on by this emperor. As Sixtus V. caused the original statue of Trajan to be supplanted by that of St. Peter, so he caused the original statue of Antoninus to be supplanted by that of St. Paul.

The spiral staircase has 10€ steps, and the column has 56 windows to let in light. This pillar is very inferior to Trajan's Column. The column in the Piazza Colonna at Rome, called the Pillar of Antoninus, is really one raised by the senate to Marcus Aurelius, after his victory over the Marcomanni.

Column of July (The), 1832. Paris. Made of bronze, erected on the Place de la Bastille, to commemorate the Revolution of July (q.v.), 1830, when Charles X. abdicated. It is surmounted with a statue of Liberty standing on one foot. In 1840 the bodies of the victims of that revolution, which had been thrown into a ditch, were disinterred. A monster hearse being provided, 50 coffins (each containing ten bodies), drawn by 24 black horses, were buried in the vault under this column.

Column of the Place Vendôme (The), 1806–1810. Paris. Made of bronze, erected in honour of Napoleon I., and containing, in a spiral, pictorial representations of his victories in a series of bas-reliefs, 900 feet long, and terminating with the battle of Austerlitz in 1805. This magnificent column, made of cannons taken from enemies, the facsimile of Trajan's famous column, was surmounted with a statue of Napoleon himself.

On 17 May, 1871, it was hurled to the ground by the Communists out of hatred to Napoleon III. It was re-erected in 1874, but the statue of Napoleon was replaced with another standing on one leg, infinitely inferior in every respect to the original one.

Columns. See 'Pompey's Column,' 'Trajan's Column.'

Columns of Hercules (The). Two large pyramidal columns set up by the Phœnicians as lighthouses and landmarks, dedicated one to Hercules (the sun) and the other to Astarte (the moon). By the Greeks and Romans the two pyramidal mountains at the Straits of Gibraltar, viz. Calpe and Abŷla, the former in Europe and the latter in Africa, were termed Columnæ Herculis from their resemblance at a distance to the Phœnician columns.

Calpe (2 syl.), Ab-y-lah, i.e. Ce-n'-ta.

Combat of the Thirty (The). 'Le Combat des Trente,' 1351. Thirty Bretons against thirty Englishmen. It was the defiance of Jean sire de Beaumanoir to the English chatelain of Ploërmel. Eight of the English being slain, the combat was brought to a close. It is said that Beaumanoir, exhausted by fatigue and heat, drank the blood which flowed from his wounds. See 'Battle.'

Combative Kings (The). The dynasty of Tcheou-kue of China, from the tenth to the third cent. B.C., when China was broken up into a multitude of minor states always at war with each other. In B.C. 247 Thsin-chi-hoang-ti (of the dynasty of Tsin) united all the states under one sovereign; pushed back the Moguls; and built the Great Wall.

Combination Laws (The), 1860. The Statute of Labourers enacted 'that all alliances [combinations] of masons, carpenters, and other artificers,' be annulled and declared unlawful. Abolished in 1824, since which times Trades-Unions (q.v.) have become very general. See 'Criminal Law Amendment Act.'

Comedy (Father of French). Molière (1622–1673).

Comité de Surveillance, 1792. A committee in the French Revolution whose function was to examine the denunciations received by the Committee of General Safety. After the butcheries of 2 Sept. this committee drew up an address, recommending all the communes in France to follow the same example. See under 'Committee.'

This address was signed by Duplain, Panis, Sergent, Lenfant, Marat, Lefort, Jordeuil, administrators of the Comité de Surveillance, constituted at the Mairie, 2 Sept. 1792.

Commandery (A). A district containing estates with a revenue annexed, belonging to a military order, and governed by a knight-commander, or the whole body of knights subject to a knight-commander, as the Commanderies of Malta, of St. Lazare, of Calatrava, of Alcantara, of St. Bernard, and of St. Antony. Till 1267 Commanderies were called Preceptories.

Commenda, or 'Ecclesia Commendāta.' A living commended by the crown to the charge of a clergyman to hold till a person is duly provided for it. It may be either temporary or perpetual.

Commendam (In). A living is held

'in commendam' when (to prevent its becoming void) it is committed (commendatur) to the charge of a clergyman till it can be conveniently provided with a pastor. Thus when a rector or vicar is made a bishop his benefice becomes void from the moment of consecration, but, being 'commended' to a commendatory, the bishop retains the income till his successor is provided.

Commendators. A Scotch term meaning secular persons upon whom church benefices are bestowed. The livings are commended, i.e. entrusted to their care and keeping. They are, pro tempore, trustees of the priories, abbeys, or dioceses committed to them. The living thus held in trust was called a commendatory.

Commendatory Abbot (A). Was a secular clerk provided by the pope to enjoy the fruits of an abbey, generally for life, without being saddled with clerical duties.

Commendatory Letters. Letters written by one bishop to another on behalf of a clergyman or layman going to the diocese.

Commenda'tus [pl. Commendāti]. In baronial times was a person who lived under the protection of some great man. He was a voluntary vassal, and paid voluntary homage for the sake of protection.

Commerce (Father of English). Edward III. (1312, 1326–1377).

Commissaires de la Commune (Les), 10 Aug., 1792. A title assumed by Danton, Tallien, Billaud-Varennes, and Collot d'Herbois, who usurped on this day the municipal functions of Paris.

Commissary (The). In the University of Cambridge. An executive officer appointed by the chancellor by letters patent to hold a court of record for all privileged persons and scholars under the degree of M.A.

Commission (The Parnell), 1889. See 'Parnell,' &c.

Commission of Innocency (The), 1663. A commission appointed by the Duke of Ormond, lord-lieutenant of Ireland, to inquire into the guilt or innocency of those Catholics whose estates had been forfeited by Cromwell. The cases were so numerous that the session was limited, and only a fourth of the cases were adjudicated. The other three-fourths (about 3,000 in number) were stripped of their estates whether they were innocent or not.

Commission of Inquiry (The), 1623. A commission appointed by James I. to examine into the titles of holders of land in the province of Leinster and the adjoining districts. The commission adjudged 82,500 acres of land to be crown land, and James tried to plant it with Englishmen and Scotchmen, as he had done Ulster.

Commission of Twelve (The), 1793. An extraordinary board appointed by the National Convention to watch over the commune, arrest those who interrupted the business of the house, and to judge traitors. It forthwith arrested Hébert; whereupon a riot ensued, and the Convention was obliged to dissolve the commission.

Commissioners of Delinquency, 1650. Commissioners appointed after the rebellion of Ireland to decide what lands were forfeited by the rebellion, and what Catholics were entitled to receive compensation. Those Catholics who in the lifetime of Charles I. had served the king against the rebels, and would be entitled to retain any part of their estates, were to resign that part and receive an equivalent in the waste lands of Connaught; but no Catholic, under any condition, was to reside in any town or within a certain fixed limit of a town. There were commissioners to decide on the qualifications of Catholics, others to arrange the details of those to be transplanted to Connaught, and others to receive and hear claims. The first sat in Athlone, the second in Loughrea, and the third in Dublin.

Commissioners of Innocency. See 'Commission of Innocency.'

Commissioners of National Education (The). In Ireland. 1838. The board appointed to carry out the plan of national education introduced by Mr. Stanley, chief secretary. See 'National Schools, Ireland.'

The first commissioners were the Duke of Leinster, Archbishop Whately, Archbishop Murray, Rev. Dr. Sadlier, Rev. James Carlile (Presbyterian), A. R. Blake (Catholic), and Robert Holmes (Unitarian).

Commissioners of Parliament. Part of the civil government of Cromwell, appointed to grant commissions by letters patent, and to examine into the legality of those holding any public office. In Ireland their chief duty was to adjust and apportion among the claimants confiscated estates.

Commissioners of Trust (The), 1647. Twelve persons appointed by the general assembly of confederates and Protestants in Ireland to guard the treaty, and vested with powers to levy soldiers, raise money, and perform all acts of supreme authority in Ireland. The arrangement fell through because the king was beheaded before he had signed it.

The Catholics were granted by the treaty freedom of religion, seminaries for the education of their children, admission to Parliament, and an amnesty for the late rebellion.

Committee of Estates (The), 1640. A committee appointed by the Scotch Parliament which had been prorogued by Charles I., but which refused to obey, declaring the warrant to be informal. They instantly voted a tax of 10 per cent. on rents, and 5 per cent. on interest of money, and appointed a Committee of Estates to act in the place of the king in giving assent to their measures.

Committee of Evils (The), 1625. A committee of the House of Commons in the second year of the reign of Charles I. for the remedy of grievances and abuses. The Committee of Grievances brought forward to the notice of the house what were national grievances, and the Committee of Evils suggested remedies. Thus the Committee of Grievances complained of purveyance [collecting provisions at a set price], tonnage and poundage, and so on; and the Committee of Evils, attributing these grievances to the Duke of Buckingham, insisted on his being punished.

Committee of Grievances (The), 1626. A committee of the House of Commons to check the encroachments of the young king Charles I. It was especially directed against the Duke of Buckingham, the king's favourite, whose insolence, extravagance, incapacity, and licentiousness were a great scandal.

Committee of Murder (The), 1690. A committee appointed by the Whigs, in the reign of William and Mary, to inquire into the concern of sundry individuals in the deaths of Lord Russell, Algernon Sidney, and others of the Whig party. John Hampden (grandson of the great patriot) and John Howe were the most violent, and would have inundated the nation with blood if William had not stoutly resisted the persecution.

Committee of Nine (The), 6 April, 1793. The Committee of Public Safety (q.v.) in the French revolution. It consisted of nine members.

Committee of Public Safety (The). 'Le Comité du Salut Publique' formed in the French revolution, 6 April, 1793, by a decree of the Convention. For a year it was omnipotent, and had under it the 'Revolutionary Tribunal,' the 'Revolutionary Committees,' and the Committee of General Security.' It originally consisted of nine members chosen from the Convention, the leaders being Danton, Barère, and Cambon. Three more were added in June; and, after the fall of the Girondists, Robespierre and Carnot belonged to the committee. It was this committee which inaugurated the Reign of Terror, and filled France with scaffolds. It was broken up 27 July, 1794. See 'Committee of the Two Kingdoms.'

Revolutionary committees and Committees of General Safety were also appointed in every commune of France. The former to receive denunciations and the latter to look after the police.

Committee of Purchases, 1792. A committee of Frenchmen, under Bidermann, the banker, and consisting of Jews and speculators, whose function was to make bargains for the army under Dumouriez and pay the soldiers. The soldiers were paid in cash, but all bargains were paid for in assignats. All emigrants were plundered of their money, jewels, furniture, and works of art; and the people of Belgium were treated as aristocrats. Plunder and robbery were thus made a very profitable trade.

Committee of Religion. I. 1626. A committee of the House of Commons, in the second year of Charles I., to put down the growth of popery, which had become aggressive from the large suite of Roman Catholics introduced by the queen. The committee presented its report 25 Feb., 1629. It complained that the bishops licensed the circulation of books favourable to popery. It advised that such books as those of Mainwaring and Montague should be burnt; that candlesticks should be removed from communion-tables, now impiously called high-altars; that pictures, lights, and images should be removed from churches; that crossing and turning to the east in prayer should be forbidden; that better and more learned men should be preferred to church livings; and better provision be made for the supply of holy ministers to the several parishes.

II. 6 Nov., 1640, a committee of the whole house appointed by the Long Parliament for providing preachers, and removing ministers of scandalous character.

Committee of Safety. I. In the civil wars of Charles I. was a supreme council which sat in the Painted Chamber, Westminster. Pym was president, and among the members were Lord Saye and Sele, Sir Harry Vane, Harry Marten, Selden, St. John, and others.

II. Oct. 1775. A committee formed from the congress convened by Governor Gage at Salem, and adjourned by the 'patriots' to Concord, a town about 25 miles from Boston. Here a standing committee was appointed, which assumed the name of 'The Committee of Safety,' with authority to call out the militia when they thought it necessary for the defence of the province. The French afterwards adopted the same idea in their Comité du Salut Publique.

Committee of Secresy (The), 6 Jan., 1721. A committee appointed by the House of Commons to examine into the South Sea Company's failure. The committee was appointed merely to soothe the angry feelings of the public. The directors in the service of the crown were discharged 11 Jan., and the rest were examined before the House of Lords. Knight, the company's cashier, absconded 22 Jan., was imprisoned at Antwerp, 8 Feb.; escaped, and was pardoned 18 Oct. the same year. It was not till 1 June, 1733, that an inquiry into the conduct of the company was made in the House of Lords. Broderick was chairman of the committee, and Jekyll, Molesworth, &c. were members put upon it.

Committee of Supplies (The), 1774. To purchase ammunition, ordnance, and other military stores, when the Committee of Safety (q.v.) thought it advisable to call out the militia in defence of the province of Massachusetts.

Committee of Twelve (The), 1793. A committee appointed by the Convention, through the influence of the Girondists, to watch over the designs of the commune and to arrest those persons who were dangerous to the public peace. The Twelve were the sworn enemies of the Jacobins.

Committee of the Protestant Interest (The), 1780. Formed to resist any relaxation of the penal code against the Catholics. The synod of Glasgow was especially rancorous, but the synod of Edinburgh favoured measures of relief.

Committee of the States, 1777. Appointed by Congress to sit during their recess. It consisted of one delegate from each state; nine to form a quorum. This committee exercised such powers as Congress thought fit to vest them with.

Committee of the Two Kingdoms (The), Dec. 1643. So the Committee of Public Safety was called, when Scotland joined the Parliamentary party. This was after the death of Pym. It was again called into active service in 1647.

Committee of the whole House (A). All the members of the House of Commons in attendance, presided over by a chairman for the nonce instead of the Speaker. After a public bill has been printed and distributed to the members, it is read for the second time and then 'committed.' When the day for 'committing' has arrived, the Speaker moves 'that I do now leave the chair,' and the bill is read clause by clause, and line by line, till every part has received the approval of the house, and then the Speaker resumes his chair to receive the report.

Committees of Correspondence, 1779. To carry out reform in Parliament; organised in twenty-one counties, and in the towns of York, Bristol, Cambridge, Nottingham, Newcastle, Reading, and Bridgwater. The chief promoters of these committees were Lord Rockingham, in Yorkshire; Lord Shelburne, in Buckinghamshire; Lord Mahon (son-in-law of Chatham), in Kent; the Duke of Richmond, the Marquis of Carmarthen, Sir George Savile, Edmund Burke, and Charles James Fox.

In 1780 Committees of Correspondence were organised by the Protestant Association in numerous towns to resist any relaxation of the penal acts against the Catholics. The anti-Catholic furore culminated in the Gordon riots.

Committees of General Security, or 'Comité de Sûreté Générale' (1793). Appointed by the Convention to act under the Committee of Public Safety to look after the police.

Common Good (The). A Scotch phrase meaning the public funds of a burgh.

Common Prayer Book (The). Was drawn up chiefly by Goodrich bishop of Ely, and Ridley bishop of Rochester. Their coadjutors were Skyp bishop of Hereford, Thirlby bishop of Westminster, Day bishop of Chichester, Holbeach bishop of Lincoln, Dr. May dean of St. Paul's, Dr. Taylor dean of Lincoln, Dr. Haynes dean of Exeter, Dr. Redmayne dean of Westminster, Dr. Cox the king's almoner, and Dr. Robertson archdeacon of Leicester. In the communion office there were added the Archbishop of York and the Bishops of Durham, Worcester, Norwich, St. Asaph, Lichfield, Salisbury, Carlisle, Bristol, and St. David's.

Common Recovery. A legal fiction practised in the reign of Edward IV. for cutting off entails. The estate being forfeit to the crown was granted to a person by private agreement. This person brought an action against the grantor for unjustly claiming such estate. Of course the suit was permitted to go by default, and the entail, being declared lost, the fee simple of the property recurred to the possessor, to be disposed of as he thought proper.

Common Sense, 1776. A pamphlet by Thomas Paine, then living in Philadelphia, urging the Americans to claim independence. It ridiculed the idea of a small island, 3,000 miles off, ruling the immense continent of America, and threatening three million men, more vigorous and more virtuous than their would-be enslavers. This spark was sufficient to rouse the Americans, who at once signed their Declaration of Independence.

Commoners. The ordinary students of the University of Oxford, called 'pensioners' in the University of Cambridge.

In the University of Cambridge 'Fellow Commoners' are pensioners who dine at the Fellows' or Masters' table. They are generally married men, noblemen, and elderly men. They wear a gold tassel on their cap instead of a silk one, and have the privilege of paying higher fees.

Commons' King (The). The Commons' King of Rome was King Servius Tullius, sixth king of Rome. His mother was a captive taken at Cornubium, and became the female slave of Tanaquil, wife of Tarquin I. Servius was by birth a slave also, but married the king's daughter and succeeded to the throne.

Louis Philippe of France was called 'Le roi citoyen.'

Commons Spiritual (The). The Proctors of Convocation, who, in the reign of Richard II., were elected as knights of the shire were.

Commonwealth, or Free State, 19 March, 1649. So the government of the United Kingdom was called, as soon as it was constituted after the execution of Charles I.

Commonwealth (The). Lasted in England eleven years (1649–1660). During which period, Cromwell was Lord Protector for about four and three-quarter years (16 Dec., 1653, to 3 Sept., 1658), and was styled 'his highness.' During the Commonwealth, the recognised government superscription ran thus: 'Keepers of the liberties of England by the authority of Parliament.'

Commonwealth of Babina (The), 16th cent. A society founded in Poland in the time of Sigismund Augustus, last male heir of the house of Jagello (1548–1572), so called from Babina, the place of meeting. They had a regular mock government, under king, senate, and magistrates. The executive was elected from something which appeared ridiculous in the member elected. Thus, an officious man was made archbishop, a disputatious one was made speaker, a boaster was made commander-in-chief. To decline to serve was to be outlawed. Thus every foible was held up to observation, and Babina was a word of terror. Without doubt the society did a vast amount of good. It gradually died out.

Commorantes in Villa. Graduates of the University of Cambridge, not on any of the college staffs, but members of the Regent's House (called the White Hoods). When the university was reorganised in 1858, the term was abolished and the Regent's House formed part of the Senate.

Commune of Paris (The), 14 July, 1789. A municipal revolutionary board, which took the place of the 'Conseil de Ville' and held its sessions in the Guild Hall (Hôtel de Ville). It had the supreme government of the city, the appointment of the civil officers, and the magisterial duties. It was presided over by a provost—Chaumette was the first provost, and the next was Robespierre, at whose fall the commune was abolished (27 July, 1794).

Com'munes (2 syl.). Chartered towns were so called in France. The first was the commune of Mans, in 1066.

Commu'nes (3 syl.). A supplement, in five books, to the Corpus Juris Canonici, being the Extravagantes of popes subsequent to John XXII. Not unfrequently called 'Extravagantes Communes.'

Communion Service (The First), 1548. By a committee of bishops and other clergy, appointed by Cranmer. It made auricular confession optional; appointed that the eucharist should be given in both kinds; that the Host should not be elevated; that the chief part of the service should be in English; that the bread should be of the same form and kind as heretofore; and that the words used should be those printed in our Common Prayer Book, now in use.

Communism. A scheme for associating men and women together without recourse to the laws of social and political economy, usually resorted to. The representatives of communism are Robert Owen, St. Simon, Fourier, Proudhon, and Enfantin.

(1) Owen published his scheme in 1813, and tried it in 1825, at Orbiston, in Lanarkshire. This scheme failed, and in 1843 he opened his 'Harmony Hall,' in Hampshire; but this also was a failure.

(2) St. Simon established a corporate society at Menilmontant, but Louis Philippe charged it with immorality and irreligion. The readers were imprisoned and the commune dissolved.

(3) Fourier established his 'phalanstery' at Rambouillet, but it proved a total failure.

(4) Proudhon is noted for his axiom, 'La propriété, c'est le vol,' 1848, and for his Banque du Peuple, 1849, which had for its object the suppression of capital. It was closed by authority, and Proudhon fled to Geneva.

(5) Enfantin, a partisan of St. Simon, advocated the abolition of marriage ties, and was prosecuted on the grounds of public decency. See 'Socialism,' 'St. Simonianism,' 'Supreme Father.'

Communists (The). A secret society, which the report of the Government of Zürich, 1844, says was then in existence in Switzerland. Its object was 'the enfranchisement of all humanity; the abolition of property, of heritage, of money, of wages, of laws, and of punishments.' They also insisted on an equal distribution of labour and enjoyment. See 'Communism.'

Commutation Act. See 'Tithes Bill.'

Comneni (The), or 'The Comnēnians.' A family of Roman origin which furnished six Byzantian emperors, one Heraclēan, and three of Trebizond. The six of Constantinople are: Isaac (1057–1059), Alexis I. (1081–1118), John (1118–1143), Manuel (1143–1180), Alexis II. (1180–1183), and Andronicus (1183–1185), who was dethroned.

The one of Heraclēa was David, grandson of Andronicus.

Alexis III., who founded a dynasty at Trebizond, which lasted from 1204 to 1462.

The rest of the Comnēni migrated to the Morea and Corsica. Napoleon used to claim descent from these Comneni.

Comorbans, or Corbes. Lay dignitaries who held in Ireland church lands. If not dignitaries, they were called Erenachs. Like lay-abbots, they appropriated to themselves the revenues, leaving the clergy the fees and tithes. (From the 9th to the 17th cent.)

Compagnacci (The). A set of foolish youths in Florence, during the palmy days of Lorenzo de' Medici; who, laying aside all sense of shame, gave themselves up to every sort of wickedness, emulating each other in the depths of naughtiness to which they could attain.

Compagnies (Les). Often called 'Les grandes compagnies.' Bands of troops composed of different nations, and led by a general whose device was 'L'ami du Dieu et l'ennemi du tout le monde.' See 'Companions' League,' 'Condottieri.'

One of them called himself 'The enemy of God, of pity, and of mercy.'

Companions' League (The), 1360. A confederacy of the mercenary troops disbanded by Edward III. after the battle of Poitiers (1356). The league mustered 40,000 soldiers, and fought several pitched battles with the French troops. In 1366 they joined Dugueselin's army levied to aid Henry da Trastamare against his brother Pedro the Cruel. This league was a confederacy of Les grandes compagnies (q.v.).

Companions of Jehu (The). The Chouans, a royalist faction in France in 1800. Louis XVIII. being Jehu, whose 'companions' were bound to aid him in 'cutting off, root and branch, all who had taken part in the assassination of his royal brother' (Louis XVI.). See 2 Chron. xxii. 7.

Company of 1789 (The). The club of the Feuillants was originally so called. Its platform was the support of the constitution against the ultra party. They took the constitution of England for their model. On 28 March, 1791, the club was forcibly dispersed by a raging mob.

Company of St. George (The), 1379. A company of adventurers under Alberic di Barbiano. This company was a most famous school of great generals from its formation to the 16th cent.

Compassionate Allowance. A government gratuity to the widows and children of those in the British army slain in the Crimean War (1855–1856).

Compassionate Brothers (The), 1540. Founded at Seville, in Spain, by the Portuguese John di Dio, who had served in Africa under Charles V. They obtained their funds by begging. Their chief functions were nursing the sick and reforming immoral women. The brothers were laymen under no rule till 1572, when the pope subjected them to the rule of St. Augustine.

Competitive Examination for the Civil service, introduced in 1855. Every candidate is required to pass first a preliminary examination.

Compitalian Lares. Gods who presided respectively over the several quarters of the city (Rome). Compĭtum was the place where two or more roads met, as Trivium was the place where two or more streets met. It was customary with the Romans to erect altars, shrines, and small temples at these spots, as Roman Catholics used to erect on such spots crucifixes. The Larês Compitalês were the deities who presided over cross roads (Propertius, iv. 3, 54). Varro tells us the word compĭtum comes from the verb competo, to agree in one.

Complaint (The), 1450, or, in full, 'The Complaint of the Commons of Kent.' The petition of grievances presented by John Cade, calling for administrative and economical reforms, a change of ministry, a more careful expenditure of the royal revenue, and the restoration of freedom of election, which had been broken in upon both by the crown and by the great landlords.

Compline. The last of the eight daily services of the Catholic Church and of the four greater ones. At bed-time. The word means complete. See 'Canonical Hours.'

Complutensian Polyglot Bible (The), 1502–1517. Printed under the patronage and at the expense of Cardinal Ximenês at Complūtum (i.e. Alcala de Henarês in New Castile, about nineteen miles from Madrid, in Spain).

Comprehension (A), 1670. A decree by Leighton to pacify the Scotch clergy irritated by the Act against Field Conventicles (q.v.). It required that they should attend presbyteries as they were established before the year 1638. The bishops were required to waive their claim of a negative voice, and all who pleased were to be at liberty to protest against it. (See Lingard, ix. 4.)

Compromise (The), 1567. The league between the Protestants and Catholics of the Netherlands, headed by the Prince of Orange, the Count Egmont, and the Count Horn, to put down the Inquisition, introduced into their country by Philip II. of Spain. The Duchess of Parma, who governed the country, gave way to the storm, and abolished the Inquisition; by which wise concession she broke up the league.

Compur'gators. Twelve persons who swore that they believed an accused person who pleaded 'not guilty' to be innocent of the crime charged against him. The finding was called 'compurgation.' This basis of our common jury system existed in the Saxon times, and is generally placed to the credit of Alfred the Great.

Comte's Three States. The theological state, the metaphysical state, and physical state. 'Chacun de nous, en contemplant sa propre histoire, ne se souvient-il pas qu'il a été successivement, quant à ses notions les plus importantes, théologien dans son enfance, métaphysicien dans sa jeunesse, et physicien dans sa virilité?' In the infancy of thought the mind attributes changes in phenomena to the overruling will of some divinity which shapes them. In the next stage the mind attributes changes of phenomena to some hypothetical abstract principle. In the third, or mature stage, the mind clings to facts, and attributes phenomena to those agencies which experience or experiment teaches us to have been in operation.

Comuneros, 1520–1521. A Spanish party opposed to the appointment of Karl V. of Germany to the Spanish crown. Padilla, a young nobleman of Toledo, was at the head of the insurgents. They were defeated by the royalists at Villalar in 1521, and Padilla was executed. This civil war is called the 'Guerra de las Comuniades.'

Conacre System (The). The system of subletting small patches of land, consisting of from 1 to 5 acres, for a single potato crop. Thus, in Ireland, a landlord of, say, 100,000 acres, would farm it to a middleman, and live in England or abroad. The middleman will divide this large tenement into several smaller ones, which he will let out to tenants, say from 100 to 500 acres each. These tenants will sublet a part (say in parcels of from 10 to 50 acres) to other tenants; and, lastly, these farmers will 'conacre' small patches to some peasant to grow on it a crop of potatoes for the current year. So that sometimes six or eight persons under the landlord make a profit of the land, and the last occupant pays at the rate of 8*l.* or 10*l.* per acre for his little patch of land.

Conception of the Virgin Mary (The), or 'Festum Beatæ Mariæ de Adventu,' 8 Dec. Instituted 1356.

There is an order of nuns, which was founded in 1484, entitled 'The Conception of Our Lady.' Their dress is a white gown, a blue mantle, and a scapulary.

Conceptualism. Abelard's tertium quid (q.v.).

Concord of Madrid (The), 1526. Extorted by Karl V. from François I., his captive. François consented to give up all claims to Flanders and Artois, the possession of Naples, Milan, Genoa, and all other Italian territories, to deliver the dauphin and Duc d'Orléans into the hands of Karl as hostages, and bound himself to return into captivity if these conditions were not fulfilled within four years. François also promised to marry Queen Eleonora (sister of Karl V.), to restore Bourbon and the rest of the rebels to their estates and honours, to pay Henry VIII. all the money which Karl owed him, to lend Karl his whole navy, with 500 men-at-arms and 6,000 foot soldiers, to put down the princes of Italy, and to use his influence with the King of Navarre and Duke of Gueldres to get Karl appointed heir to their dominions. The pope absolved François from his obligation to observe this scandalous exaction.

Concordat of 1801 (The). Between Pius VII. and Napoleon Bonaparte, then first consul. It put an end to the anarchy introduced by the revolution in the Gallican Church, and re-established the French hierarchy. The appointment of bishops was left in the hands of the temporal power, but their institution was reserved to the pope.

A new division of the dioceses of France was made. The appointment of curés or vicars was left to the bishops. Napoleon said to Cabanis: 'Do you know what this Concordat really is? It is the vaccination of religion. In fifty years there will be no more religion in France than small-pox.'

Concordat of 1855 (The). Between Pius IX. and the Emperor Francis Joseph of Austria. This concordat was abrogated in 1870.

Concordat of François I., A.D. 1515. A repeal of the Pragmatic Sanction, which the pope had condemned, and the substitution of a compromise. By the Pragmatic Sanction the independence of the Gallican Church was secured, and its freedom from all papal encroachments; by the Concordat the pope and king made a partition of the spoil. The king appointed to vacant bishoprics within six months; if the nominee was objected to by the pope, three months more were allowed, and if then the appointment was objected to, the pope made the appointment. By this foolish arrangement annates or first fruits were again rendered to the pope. Of course the French parliament and council greatly objected, but the king carried his point.

Concordat of Vienna (The), 1448. Drawn up by Kaiser Friederich III., and approved of by Czar Nicholas V., establishing the canonical election, abolishing the Acts called 'Provisiones' for curbing the arbitrary power of the crown, abolishing pontifical expectatives, determining in what cases the pope could dispose of German benefices, and substituting a tax spread over two years for annates.

Concordat of Worms (The), 1122. Between Pope Calixtus II. and Heinrich V. of Germany. This instrument put an end to the long contention about investitures. The pope recognised the right of the monarch to give temporal investitures, and reserved to himself the right of spiritual investitures.

A concordat is a contract between the pope and a temporal potentate to fix their respective rights in matters pertaining to the Church and State.

Condignitism. A doctrine taught by Thomas Aquinas (1224–1274), who contended that man in his natural state cannot so live as to merit or earn God's grace; but that with Divine assistance he could do so, and render himself worthy (condignus) of salvation. This sort of merit is called the 'merit of condignity.'

The 'merit of congruity' is the possibility of so ordering our lives as to deserve grace, and with the desert, of course, follows the grace. See 'Congruism.'

Condottie'ri. Either free-lances, or bands of adventurers, who for hire entered the service of anyone who would pay them. Hawkwood's condottieri hired themselves into the Venetian service in the 14th cent., and were called the English condottieri. A condottiere is not a captain or leader of a band, but a free-lance, or a company of free-lances under a leader. Thus Hawkwood collected a band of condottieri, and made the best bargain he could with those who were willing to pay for their services. At the same time Francesco Sforza was a condottiere; so also Angelo de la Pergola, Nicolo Piccinino, and Guido Torello were noted condottieri.

Of course the word condottie're means a captain or leader, and condottieri those under a leader.

Confarrea'tion. A species of marriage in ancient Rome; so called because the chief ceremony was partaking of the panis farrĕus (bread made of spelt) in the presence of ten witnesses. This was the highest form of marriage; and certain offices in the state, such for example as the Flamen Diālis, could be held only by those who were born of parents thus married.

Our bridecake is a relic of the panis farreus.

Confederacy of Delos (The), B.C. 477. A league to place Athens, instead of Sparta, at the head of Greece, chiefly brought about by the treason of Pausanias. Called the Confederacy of Delos, because the deputies of the allies were to meet annually in Delos in the temple of Apollo and Artĕmis.

Confederate Catholics (The), 1641. An Irish secret society formed in Ulster, where 50,000 Englishmen were assassinated. 'Husbands were cut to pieces in the presence of their wives; children's brains were dashed out before their parents; women were brutally violated, and driven naked to perish in the woods. Some were burned; others drowned for sport; many were buried alive. The contest was that of Catholic against Protestant; and the rebels, believing that Charles I. really befriended them, called themselves 'the king's army,' and claimed to be acting on the king's commission. See 'Irish Associations.'

Confederates (The), 1861–1865. The Southern States of North America, in the American civil war, consisting of South Carolina, Georgia, Florida, Virginia, North Carolina, Alabama, Mississippi, Louisiana, and Texas. These states were utterly opposed to what was called the Garrison school, which considered American slavery a scandal. Sumner and Seward took up the question, and organised an anti-slavery party. The Southerners confederated, and resolved to separate from the Union, the federalists or unionists armed to preserve the Union. As the war went on the slavery question was thrust to the forefront. The Southerners were vanquished, slavery was abolished, and the Union was preserved.

Confederation (The Irish), 1846. Formed by the Young Ireland party when it separated from the old Repealers, led by Daniel O'Connell. The meetings were held in the Music Hall, Abbey Street. See 'Irish Associations.'

Confederation of Bar (The), 1768. Formed by the Catholics of Poland against the dissidents (q.v.). It was dissolved in 1773.

Bar is a town of Podolia. The confederation was supported by Russia. See 'National Confederacy of Poland.'

Confederation of the Rhine (The), 1806. The German states confederated by Napoleon. As allies of France each state was bound to furnish a contingent to the French army. In 1808 the number of Germans yielded 120,000 men to Napoleon's call. Bavaria and Würtemburg allied themselves to France in 1805, and in reward of this unpatriotic conduct these electorates were raised into kingdoms. In 1806 fourteen other German princes signed an act of alliance, and in 1808 other princes did the same. After the disaster of Moscow in 1813 the confederation broke up, and the German princes allied themselves against their common enemy.

The fourteen were, the Elector (now called the Grand-Duke) of Baden, the new Grand-Duke of Cleves (Napoleon's brother-in-law), the Landgraf (now called Grand-Duke) of Hessen-Darmstadt, the Prince of Nassau-Usingen, the Prince of Nassau-Weilburg, the Prince of Hohenzollern-Hechingen, the Prince of Isenberg-Birstein, the Prince of Liechtenstein, the Duke of Aremberg, the Count of Lagen. Subsequently, the Duke of Würsburg, the King of Saxony, the King of Westphalia, the Duke of Mecklenburg, and some other small princes.

Conference (The), 1661. Held at the Savoy, in the residence of the Bishop of London (Dr. Sheldon). Four months were awarded to it (25 March–25 July). Between twenty-one Episcopalians and twenty-one Presbyterians. After long dispute, the nonconformists reduced their grievances to these eight: The sinfulness

1. Of wearing a surplice.
2. Of the cross in baptism.
3. Of calling the baptized regenerate.
4. Of kneeling at the Lord's Supper.
5. Of administering the Lord's Supper to the sick and impenitent.
6. Priestly absolution.
7. Returning thanks promiscuously in the Burial Service.
8. Subscription to the Thirty-nine Articles.

Conference of London (The), 1826. A diplomatic congress held in London to determine on the fate of Greece.

Confession of Augsburg (The), 1530. A summary of faith drawn up by Melanchthon, and presented to the Emperor Charles V. at the Diet of Augsburg. This confession is based on 'The Articles of Torgau' (q.v.), and contains twenty-one articles on doctrine, and seven on practical matters. They very much resemble the Thirty-nine Articles of the Church of England.

Torgau, pronounce Tor-gow.

The last 7 are these:—22: of both kinds, see Art. xxx.; 23: of the marriage of priests, see Art. xxxii.; 24: of the sacrifice of the mass, see Art. xxxi.; 25: of oral confession; 26: of distinction of meats; 27: of conventual vows; and 28: of the authority of bishops. Compare also the 21 Articles of the Confession with the Articles of the Church of England, viz.: 1: of God with Art. i.; 2: of original sin with Art. ix.; 3: of the Son of God with Art. ii.; 4: of justification with Art. xi.; 5: of preaching with Art. xxiv.; 6: of obedience; 7, 8: of the Church with Art. xix. xx.; 9: of baptism with Art. xvii.; 10: of the Lord's Supper with Art. xxviii. xxix. xxx.; 11: of confession; 12: of penance; 13: of the use of the sacraments with Art. xxvi.; 14: of church government with Art. xx.; 15: of church order; 16: of secular government with Art xxxvii.; 17: of Christ's second coming; 18: of free will with Art. x.; 19: of the cause of sin with Art. ix.; 20: of faith and good works with Art. xii. xiii.; and 21: of the worship of saints.

Confession of Bâle (The), 1534. The first Helvetic confession of faith, drawn up by Zwingli in 1530, was so called because it was ratified at Bâle.

Confession of Brandenburg (The). The confession of faith drawn up in the city of Brandenburg by order of the elector, with a view of reconciling the tenets of Luther with those of Calvin, and to put an end to the disputes occasioned by the Confession of Augsburg.

Confession of Bullinger (The). The Expositio Simplex of Heinrich Bullinger, the successor of Zwingli, at Cologne, 1566.

Confession of Emden (The), 1562. By the Belgian reformers.

Confession of Würtemburg (The), 1551. A Lutheran confession of faith.

Confession of Zwingli. In 1523 the government of Zürich invited the Protestants and Catholics to a conference, in the hope of adjusting their religious difficulties. Zwingli drew up his arguments under sixty-seven heads, and the council gave their vote in his favour. These sixty-seven articles he afterwards submitted to François I. of France, and called them his Confession. They are worthy to be compared with the twenty-eight articles of the Confession of Augsburg, drawn up by Melanchthon, or the Thirty-nine Articles of the Church of England.

Confession of the Druses (The), 11th cent. (1) The Unity of God. He manifested himself to man seven times, the last being in the person of Hâkim; (2) there are five superior ministers who have all manifested themselves to man—the chief of them were Hamza and Christ; (3) the transmigration of souls; (4) Hâkim shall by-and-bye reign on earth, and all its kingdoms shall be subject to him; (5) the seven points are truth, mutual aid, renunciation of all other religions, belief in one Hâkim (as God), contentment, submission, and separation from heretics.

Confessions of the Reformed Churches. (1) The Helvetic Confessions, as that of Basel in 1530, and that of Bullinger, called Expositio Simplex, in 1566; (2) the Tetrapolitan Confession in 1531; (3) the Gallic Confession in 1559; (4) the Palatine, or Heidelberg, Confession in 1575; and (5) the Belgic Confession in 1559. See each of these in loco.

See also 'Westminster Confession of Faith.'

Confessor of the Household. One of the twelve royal chaplains, whose office it is to read prayers every morning to the family, to visit the sick, to prepare communicants, and give advice on points of religion to those who desire information.

Confirmatio Charta'rum, 25 Edw. I. A.D. 1297. By which Magna Charta was directed to be allowed at the common law, all judgments contrary thereto were declared void, copies of the charter were directed to be read in all cathedral churches twice a year, and sentences of excommunication were denounced against all those who infringed the charter.

Conflans (Treaty of), 1465. A treaty of peace after the battle of Montlhéry (q.v.).

Confrères de la Congrégation de Notre-Dame de Miséricorde, 1223. A religious order instituted in Barcelona by Pierre de Nolasque, a Frenchman, for the redemption of slaves. Till 1308 it was chiefly supported by the laity. The members went barefoot.

Confucianism. Called 'Yu,' the orthodox, or state, religious system of China, devised by Confucius.

The other two systems are Taoism (Rationalism), and Fo or Buddhism. Confucius is Kŭng-fu-tsu, Kŭng the philosopher. His three chief books are (1) The Lŭn-yu or sayings; (2) the Ta-hio or Great Lesson; and (3) the Chŭng-yŭng, or doctrine of the mean.

Congé d'élire (A), 25 Hen. VIII. c. 20, A.D. 1534. A licence sent to the chapter to elect one of the persons named by the crown to a vacant bishopric. If the chapter refuses to elect within twenty days, it incurs the penalty of præmunire.

Pronounce cŏnjay day-leer'.

Congesta Mendve'dii. A collection towards the history of Denmark by Eric VI. or VIII. (Mendvedius), 1274, 1286–1319.

Congested Districts of Ireland. Those parts of Donegal and Kerry which are mere mountain or bog lands. The population is so thick that, even if cabins and holdings were free, the people could not earn a living.

Dillon says he 'would include Leitrim, Galway, Roscommon, and western half of Cork also' (April 1890). A line drawn down the map fifteen miles from the sea would about enclose this area.

Congregation (The), 1559. A name assumed by the Protestants of Scotland in the regency of Marie de Guise. The leaders, called the 'Lords of the Congregation' (q.v.), pledged themselves to see the 'Solemn League and Covenant' (q.v.) carried out.

The Duke of Châtelherault abandoned the congregation [reform party]. In this predicament the Lords of the Congregation made still more impassioned appeals to Cecil.—HOWITT, Hist. of Eng., vol. ii. p. 405.

Congregation de Propaganda Fide (The). A Board of high church dignitaries in the Catholic Church which consult on the propagation of the Catholic religion throughout the world.

Congregation of France. See 'Génovéfains.'

Congregation of Relics (The). A board of high Catholic dignitaries whose duty it is to enquire into the genuineness of supposed relics.

Congregation of St. Maur (The), 1621. Reformed Benedictines.

Congregation of the Holy Office (The). The congregation at Rome to which the direction of the tribunal of the Inquisition is subject. It was established in 1542 by Paul III., and consists of twelve cardinals, a commissary, several 'theologians,' 'consulters,' and 'qualifiers' whose duty it is to report on each case for the information of the cardinals. See 'Holy Office.'

Congregation of the Index (The). A committee appointed by Pope Pius V. to read books and state which should be prohibited to Catholic readers. Those prohibited were published from time to time in what was called the 'Index.' We find the following prohibited: Milton's 'Paradise Lost,' Goldsmith's 'History of England,' Bacon's 'De Augmentis Scientiarum,' Locke 'On the Human Understanding,' Cudworth's 'Intellectual System,' Whately's 'Logic,' 'Little Henry and his Bearer' (a child's tale), Gibbon, Robertson, Sismondi, Hallam, J. S. Mill, Addison, Kant, parts of Descartes, Malebranche, Fleury, Fénelon, Dante; all Calvin's Luther's and Voltaire's works; all works of heresiarchs on any subject whatsoever, and every book which threw doubt on Catholicism.

Congregation of the Lord (The), Scotland, 1557. Consisted of a band of Protestants who met at Edinburgh. They were led by the Earls Argyll, Morton, and Glencairn. They covenanted to stand together in mutual defence of faithful ministers, gospel truths, and the holy sacraments. The Established Church was styled 'The Congregation of Satan.'

The Book of Common Prayer of Edward VI. was ordered to be used in the parish churches of Scotland.

Congregation of the Oratory (The), 1558. Founded by Philip de Neri. Confirmed by the pope in 1575. Established in France in 1611 by Father de Berule. Introduced by Newman into England in 1847.

Congregation of the University of Oxford (The), 1854. Consists of the heads of colleges, professors, examiners, and university officials, with all members of the Convocation who have resided 140 nights within a mile and a half of the university. Duties are, to deliberate and vote on statutes proposed by the Hebdomadal Board (q.v.), and to submit their deliberations to the House of Convocation (q.v.) to be accepted or rejected as the case may be.

Congregation of the Visitation (The), 1610. Under the rule of St. Augustine, founded by the Baroness of Chantal at Annécy. Confirmed by Urban VIII. in 1626.

Congregations of Aids (i.e. 'de Auxiliis'). Began 2 Jan., 1598. Polemical consultations or conferences between the Dominicans and the Jesuits. The fourth was held in 1601, opened in Jan. and closed in July. The last began 14 Sept., 1605, and went on to 1 March, 1606. Paul V. in Aug. 1607, prohibited its renewal.

Congregationalists or 'Independents,' 1580. Those dissenters who maintain the right of each separate congregation to choose its own minister and lay down laws for its own government. They are all trinitarians and pædobaptists, and thus differ from the Unitarians and the Baptists.

Called Independents because each congregation is independent, and admits neither bishops, elders, nor any other board, not of their own choosing, to interfere with their choice of ministers or church government. Mr. Robinson or Mr. Jacob founded the sect.

Congregationists, 1557–1638. The Scotch reformers. The whole body was called the Congregation; but from 1638, when they bound themselves by oath to adhere to the Solemn League and Covenant (q.v.) the reformers were called Covenanters. Not unfrequently the Congregationists are called Covenanters also, but this is not strictly correct.

In the spring of 1562 Elisabeth became engaged to the support of the Huguenots . . . against their government as she had supported the Covenanters of Scotland.—Howitt, History of England, vol. ii. p. 418.

Congress. The American Senate and House of Representatives. The Senate is elected for six years, the President for four years, and the Representatives for two years.

Congress of Carlsbad (The), 1819. For regulating the affairs of Germany.

Congress of Laybach (The), 1820. For deliberating on the condition of Spain, Portugal, and Naples.

Congress of Vienna (The), 2 Oct., 1814, to 23 March, 1815, at the close of the great war. By this congress the Cape of Good Hope, the Mauritius, Malta, and Corfu were assigned to England; Finn land and Poland to Russia; Lombardy and the Venetian States to Austria; Saxony, Franconia, and Swedish Pomerania to Prussia; Tuscany to the Archduke Ferdinand; Genoa to the King of Sardinia; Parma and Placentia to Marie Louise, the wife of Napoleon; Norway to Sweden; and the Two Sicilies to Ferdinand VI. of the Bourbon dynasty.

Congress of the United Colonies (The), 10 May, 1775. The style assumed by the second congress of Philadelphia, in revolt from Great Britain. They issued a prohibition of the export of provisions to any British colony or fishery, or of any supply to the British soldiers in Massachusetts, or of the negotiation of any bill drawn by a British officer. See 'Thirteen United Colonies.'

Congress's Own, 1776. Hazen's Canadian regiment, kept up by recruiting in the States. It was on the side of the Americans in the War of Independence.

Congruism. A doctrine taught by Duns Scotus (1265–1308), who maintained that man in his natural state can so regulate his life as to deserve God's grace, and this natural fitness or congruity for grace obliges the Deity to grant it. See 'Condignitism.'

Molinism (q.v.) is a modification of this.

Conjuration de l'Epingle Rose (La), 1816. A French secret society which 'prit pour signe de ralliement une épingle rose.' See 'Society of the Black Pin.'

Pronounce: Con-ju-rah'-se-on'g dla-pănn-gl, &c.

Connecticut (U.S. America). So called from its river of the same name, which enters the state about twenty miles north of Hartford. The nickname is 'the Wooden Nutmeg State,' or 'Nutmeg State,' from a trick played by one of its 'cute ones, who sold imitation nutmegs made of wood as real nutmegs, and realised by his dishonesty a pot of money.

Connétable [Lord High Constable of France]. First appointed by Henri I., from which reign to that of Louis XIII. he was the highest dignitary of the crown. In times of war he was commander-in-chief of the army, with absolute power; even the king himself at such times was wholly under his commands. In peace he was war minister, and took precedence of all other ministers of the crown. The office was abolished in 1627, but was nominally restored by Napoleon I. in favour of his brother Louis. The most noted of the Connétables were:—

Châtillon (1250–1329) under Philippe le Bel and Louis X.

Du Guesclin (1814–1380) under Charles V.

Clisson the Butcher (1320–1407) under Charles VI.

Bourbon (1489–1527) under François I.

Montmorency (1493–1567) under Henri II., François II., and Charles IX.

Lesdiguières (1543–1626) under Henri IV. and Louis XIII.

Conqueror (The), 1027, 1066–1087. In English history means William I., duke of Normandy, who conquered Harold II. in the battle of Senlac, and obtained the English crown thereby.

Conqueror of the Danes. Brian Boru, monarch of Ireland. It was in the battle of Clontarf, 1014, that the Danes in Ireland were so utterly defeated that they never more made head in that island; but such as remained mixed with the natives and became one people with them. Brian was assassinated on the day of conquest, aged 88.

Brian has been made a parallel to our Alfred the Great, but in moral greatness never king equalled our Alfred.

Conrad. See Konrad.

Con's Half, and Mogh's Half. Con of the hundred battles was king of Meath, and Mogh Nuad was king of the province of Leinster. Mogh overcame Con in ten fights, and claimed half of Con's kingdom.

Conscript Fathers. 'Patres Conscripti.' After the expulsion of Tarquin a new element was introduced into the Roman Senate. The new senators were called conscripti, while the original 300 patricians were still called patres. So that the senate then consisted of patres et conscripti, and was addressed by speakers as patres, conscripti, or conscripts, fathers, perverted into the compound word Conscript Fathers.

Conseil des Anciens (Le), 23 Sept., 1795–10 Nov., 1799. In French history. Consisted of 250 members, whose function was to elect the directors, and to ratify or reject the resolutions of the 'Conseils des Cinq-cents' (q.v.). One-third of the council retired annually. Both these councils were created by the constitution of Year III. (q.v.). Each member must be at least forty years of age, married or a widower, and have been a householder for fifteen years. They sat in the Tuileries.

Conseil des Cinq-cents (Le), 28 Sept., 1795—10 Nov., 1799. One of the two councils created by the constitution of Year III. (q.v.). It consisted of 500 members, elected for three years. Each member must be at least thirty years of age, and have been a householder for ten years. This assembly proposed the laws, which were then submitted to the 'Conseil des Anciens' (q.v.). They held their sessions in the Salle de Manège (rue Rivoli).

Conseil d'Etat (Le), of Year VIII. (1799). Modified in 1814, 1815; reorganised by the law of the 19th July, 1845; greatly modified by the constitution of 1848 and by the law organic of 1849; but in 1852 it was restored to its original state. It is an assembly of magistrates to prepare the laws and give advice on all questions of national importance. It consists of councillors, masters of requests, and auditors; and is divided into six sections, viz. the legislative section, the section of foreign affairs, the section du contentieux, de l'intérieur, de l'instruction publique, and the section des cultes.

Conseils des Prud'hommes (Les). Municipal tribunals to arbitrate in disputes between masters and workmen. The council is composed of merchants, master-workmen, common workmen, and manufacturers, all elective except the president, who is named by the government. In all disputes not exceeding 200 francs (8*l.*) their judgment is final. There was such a Council at Marseilles in 1452, called the Prud'hommes Pêcheurs. Louis XI. in 1464 established such a council at Lyons. In 1806 was established a modern council at Lyons, and similar ones have since been instituted all over France. In 1844 a council of Prud'hommes was organised for the metal trade, and in 1847 for manufacturers of all sorts of tissues, chemists, and all other trades. In 1853 these councils were recognised by law.

Prud'hommes, according to Bouillet, is from the Latin prudens homo, but Scheler disputes this.

Conservative and Radical. These terms were substituted in 1832 for Tories and Whigs; it was soon after the passing of the Reform Bill. The partisans of Sir Robert Peel adopted the appellation, and gave out that their platform was to conserve or maintain the constitution against the inroads of democracy, which were 'destructive.' Radicals are those who would eradicate, or pull up by the roots, the monarchy, and establish instead a democracy, or republic. The term 'Radical' is older than that of Conservative, being applied in 1818 to the party headed by Henry Hunt and Major Cartwright, who advocated a radical reform; but since 1832 its meaning has been changed. The Tories were averse to change, the Conservatives were willing to amend, the Whigs would preserve the monarchy, the Radicals would convert it into a democracy.

Lord Eldon always manfully adhered to the old word Tory; the word respected, time honoured of his party, under which for near two centuries they had so gallantly defended the altar and the throne—talking rather contemptuously of the upstart appellation of 'Conservatives,' among whom, he foretold, would be introduced some very lax notions of religion and politics.—Lord CAMPBELL, Lives of the Chancellors, xvii. p. 580.

Conservatoire, or 'Conservatorio.' An Italian school for the study of music, its advancement, and purity. In Naples there was at one time three such schools, and in Venice four. In 1818 the Neapolitan conservatoires were reduced to one, called the Real Collegio di Musica, and the Venetian schools were similarly reduced. In 1808 a grand Conservatorio was founded at Milan. In 1842 a school for music was established by Mendelssohn at Leipsic; and one was founded at Cologne in 1849.

In 1784 was established a similar school called L'Ecole Royale de Chant, &c.; and in 1793 was founded the Institut National de Musique, which in 1795 was changed into the Conservatoire de Musique.

Consiglio Maggiore (The). The lower house of legislature in the republic of Florence, which in the time of Savonarola consisted of 3,200 members, divided into three sections, each of which held office for six months. This council did not originate laws, but had the power of veto, and voted without discussion. All laws were proposed by the Signoria, were discussed by the upper chamber, called the Ottanta, and were then sent to the great council to be accepted or rejected.

Consistoires Isra'élites (Les), 15 March, 1808 (France). Reorganised 5 May, 1844; distinguished into the Consistoires Départmentaux and the Consistoire Central, which sits in Paris.

Consistorial (A). In the Protestant communion of France means an assembly for the regulation of all things bearing on the discipline and temporalities of the Protestant churches. It appoints pastors and supplies vacancies. In the Calvinist communion a synod consists of five consistorial churches. In the Lutheran communion five consistorial churches constitute an Inspection. In Strasburg there is a General Consistory, which has authority over all other consistories and inspections. In Paris, since 1852, has been instituted a 'Conseil Central' of the two churches.

Consistorial Phrases. Certain Bible phrases learnt by Catharine de Medicis with which to beguile the Consistorials who had joined the Huguenots. These were common in her mouth: To approve of the counsel of Gamaliel; Beautiful are the feet of those who preach the Gospel of Peace; the king she called the Lord's anointed, or the image of the living God; I call the Eternal to witness; Before God and His angels.

Consistorialists, 1574. French malcontents of the tradesmen and merchant class, as opposed to the nobles, magistrates, and councillors of towns. Many of the clergy were Consistorialists. These malcontents were very unwilling to take up arms, but once in the battlefield they insisted on sufficient guarantees for the 'liberty of the reformed church. The nobles, on the contrary, were ever ready for a compromise if they benefited thereby. The malcontents were Catholics, but many joined the Huguenots so long as they found it to their advantage to do so.

Consistory (A). In Roman history. A secret council of the Roman emperors (Consistorium).

Consistory (The). In Church history, the college of cardinals or council of the Pope. There is a public and a secret consistory. The public consistory meets in the great room of the palace of St. Peter, and the pope in his pontifical robes, seated on a throne, and attended by his court, presides. In this court judicial causes, the canonisation of saints, &c., are determined. The secret consistory is held in the chamber called the 'Chamber of Papogay' (q.v.), and only cardinals are admitted. In this court the election of cardinals and bishops is determined.

Consistory Court. The prætorium of a diocesan bishop, held in his cathedral, for the trial of ecclesiastical matters arising within his jurisdiction. The judge is the bishop's chancellor, or his commissary, and the appeal is to the archbishop of the province.

In Scotland a large portion of the Consistory Court of Edinburgh was transferred to the courts of the sheriffs by 11 Geo. IV. and 1 Will. IV. c. 69.

Consolati. The Consoled, a name by which the Waldenses (q.v.) are sometimes called, on account of the consolation and peace of mind which they derived from their views of gospel Christianity.

Consolidated Fund (The), 1787 (27 Geo. III. c. 13). The union of the Aggregate, General, and South Sea Funds. In 1816, that of Ireland was combined with it. This fund is pledged for the payment of the whole interest of the national debt of Great Britain and Ireland.

Consolidation Acts. Acts of Parliament which combine different provisions of separate clauses into one act. Thus we have—

The Companies' Clauses Consolidation Act of 1845 (8, 9 Vict. c. 16).

The Lands' Clauses Consolidation Act of 1845 (8, 9 Vict. c. 18).

The Railways' Clauses Consolidation Act of 1845 (8, 9 Vict. c. 20).

This is done to save the repetition, in each special act, of the clauses introduced.

Consols. The different government stocks consolidated into one fund. The Consolidated Annuity Act was passed in 1757.

Conspiracy of Pazzi (The). The Pazzi was the rival power of the Medici in Florence. Lorenzo de' Medic. used all his efforts to keep his rivals out of power, and Sixtus IV., the pope, who hated the Medici, leagued with Francesco Pazzi and Salviati (archbishop of Pisa) to murder Lorenzo and his brother, and place the Pazzi in the chief offices of Florence. The plan was to murder the two brothers while bent in adoration at high mass. The elevation of the host by the Archbishop of Pisa was to be the secret sign of the attack. Bandini was to murder the younger brother, and two ecclesiastics were to despatch Lorenzo. The younger brother, Giuliano, was murdered, but Lorenzo escaped, and the conspirators were all put to death.

Conspiracy of 1618. Well known to English readers by the tragedy of 'Venice Preserved' by Otway (1682). The Abbé St. Real says that the Duke d'Ossuna, the Marquis de Bedmar, and Don Pedro di Toledo, governor of Milan, concerted a plan for the destruction of Venice, and entrusted to Pierre and Renault the chief execution. On the eve of its maturity, Antoine Jaffier, a French captain, one of the conspirators, peached, and the conspiracy was dissolved. Pierre and forty-five of his accomplices were drowned, and Jaffier, being found to hold communications with the conspirators whom he had denounced, was drowned also.

Belvidera is a wholly imaginary character. Pierre was not stabbed by Jaffier, and Jaffier did not kill himself. Breaking on the wheel was a punishment wholly unknown in the Republic of Venice. Probably the whole conspiracy was altogether a mare's-nest.

Constance (Treaty of), 1183. A model of future treaties between the German empire and the North Italian states. By this treaty, signed by Frederick Barbarossa, after his defeat at Legnano in 1176, the Italian cities were confirmed in their independence; they had the right of declaring war, of coining money, &c. See Hallam, 'Middle Ages,' vol. i. p. 355.

Constantine of Gaul (The). Clovis was sometimes so called, as Gibbon informs us (465, 481–511). Constantine was the father of the Christian Church in the East, and Clovis was the father of the 'Orthodox' Church in Gaul.

Constantine Cross (A).

The inhabitants of Dakôta were treated to a sublime . . . display on the morning of 9 January, 1889, at nearly the time of sunrise. Three gorgeous prismatic columns . . . shot up from the verge of the prairie into the heavens in intense brilliancy, equalling the light of the sun itself. . . . These prismatic columns extended one-third of the way to the zenith, and at the upper end gradually blended with the sky. What made the phenomenon remarkably striking was that the centre column assumed the form of a cross, from a small cloud which hung directly athwart the centre, and was illuminated by the light of the sun, still below the horizon, and forming the transept of the figure of the cross.—The Leeds Mercury (quoted in 'Notes and Queries,' 22 Jan., 1889, p. 483).

Constantinople (Convention of), 1784. Between Catherine II. of Russia and the Porte, confirming to Russia the sovereignty of the Crimea.

Constituent Assembly (The), 27 June, 1789. 'L'Assemblée Constituante.' The name assumed by the National Assembly (q.v.) after it was joined by the Duke of Orleans and forty-seven other members of the aristocracy, with a large number of the clergy. So called because the work they set themselves to perform was to get France a constitution.

In 1848 the Legislative Assembly of France was again called L'Assemblée Constituante, because it set itself to give France another constitution, a democratic republican one, with a four-years president and universal suffrage. It met 4 May, finished its labours 4 Nov., on 12 Nov. proclaimed the republican constitution, and gave place to the Legislative Assembly.

In the first of these were three parties, the right, the left, and the centre. The right were the ministerial party, the left the republican party, the centre the moderate party, or trimmers.

Constitution (A). The cudgel carried by a Muscadin (q.v.).

Constitution de la République (La). I. 26 Feb., 1848–14 Jan., 1852. The Second Republic of France. This constitution was even more democratic than that provided by the Acte Constitutionnel (q.v.). Every Frenchman in France, who had attained the age of 21, was an elector, and everyone who was 25 years old was eligible to be a deputy in the National Assembly, which consisted of 900 members. There was only one assembly, the members of which were elected by universal suffrage, the age of 21 being the one and only restriction. The motto of this constitution was 'Liberty, Fraternity, and Equality.'

II. 18 Feb., 1871. This was the fifteenth change since the reign of Louis XVI.,

30 Sept., 1791. Represented by a president and National Assembly.

The National Assembly nominally consists of 700 members, but as any deputy can represent more than one constituency, the number does not exceed 670.

Constitution Française (La), 30 Sept., 1791. Decreed by the National and Constituent Assembly, and accepted by Louis XVI. It was monarchical and representative. The previous form of government was thenceforward called the 'Ancien Régime.' In 1793 the Acte Constitutionnel (q.v.) introduced a purely democratic government, called the 'Constitution of '93' (q.v.).

Constitution of '93 (The) The constitution given to France by the 'Acte Constitutionnel' presented to the nation by the Convention 21 June, 1793, and based on the sovereignty of the people, and the indivisibility of the republic. On the death of Robespierre in 1794 the Thermidorians had the chief power, and set about abolishing the Constitution of '93, and on 24 June, 1795, they created an executive director, assisted by two councils.

Constitution of the President (The), 14 Jan., 1852. See 'Constitution of the Second Empire.'

Louis Napoleon was elected president of the French Republic 10 Dec., 1848; he re-established universal suffrage 2 Dec., 1851; he was made president for ten years, by plébiscite, 20, 21 Dec. 1851; the Second Empire was established 7 Nov., 1852; Louis Napoleon was elected emperor by plébiscite 21, 22 Nov., 1852; and he assumed the title of Napoleon III. Dec. 2, 1852.

Constitution of the Second Empire (The). Much the same as that of the president, 14 Jan., 1852. It consisted of an emperor, a senate, and a legislative chamber. The senate consisted of 150 members chosen by the emperor, and each member had a stipend equal to 1,200*l.* a year. The deputies of the corps législatif were elected for six years by universal suffrage, and received a salary equal to 100*l.* a month during the time of session. In case of a dissolution, a new corps législatif was to be in sessions within six months. The number of deputies fluctuated with the population, each of the eighty-nine departments having one representative for every 35,000 inhabitants. There was also a council of state composed of the emperor, all members of the imperial family, a president, vice-president, and about 150 councillors; acting as a high court of appeal. In 1870 the emperor resigned the right of proposing laws, and made himself a 'constitutional emperor.'

Constitution of the Second Republic (The), 13 Feb., 1871. M. Thiers being the first president and minister of war, with a stipend of 2,000*l.* a year. See 'Constitution de la République,' II. (Thiers, pronounce Tear.)

Constitution of Year III. (The), 24 June, 1795—24 Dec., 1799. This form of government was adopted in France after that called 'The Constitution of '93,' which after the reign of terror was impracticable. The legislative power was vested in two houses, called the Council of Elders and the Council of 500. The former contained 250 members. The executive was entrusted to five directors, called the Directory. All laws were to emanate from the 500, the elders rejected or ratified them, and the directors saw that they were carried out.

Constitution of Year VIII., 24 Dec., 1799—2 Aug., 1802. It vested the power of government, in France, in 3 consuls, 60 senators, 100 tribunes called the tribunate, and 300 legislators called the corps législatif.

The 1st and 2nd consuls were to hold office for 10 years, the 3rd for only 5. The 1st consul was almost absolute. In 1802 the consular office was for life. In 1814 the conservative senate became the 'Chamber of Deputies.' In 1807 the tribunate was suppressed, and the corps législatif was addressed by the Conseil d'Etat.

In 1814 the corps législatif was replaced by the Chamber of Deputies. During the 'Hundred Days' the Chamber of Deputies was called the 'Chamber of Representatives;' in 1815 it was again called the 'Chamber of Deputies;' and in 1852 it resumed its name of the corps législatif.

Constitution of Year X. (The), 2 Aug., 1802—18 May, 1804. Bonaparte was made consul for life, and the entire executive power was vested in his hands. The act which established this constitution was the Sénatus-consulte organique de la constitution (Year X).

Constitution of Year XII. (The), 18 May, 1804—4 June, 1814. Conferring on Napoleon I. the title of emperor. The act which created this constitution was the Sénatus-consulte organique de l'Empire Français (Year XII).

Constitutions were the edicts of the Roman emperors. The first compilation of these edicts was by Theodosius the younger, from Constantine to A.D. 438; but the great compilation was the Imperial Constitutions of Justinian, A.D. 529.

See 'Apostolical Constitutions.'

Constitutions (The). That is, the Constitutions of Clarendon (q.v.).

The pope advocated the side of the primate [i.e. Becket], and condemned 'the Constitutions.' —PINNOCK, Analysis of the Early Church, p. 82.

Constitutions of Clarendon (The), 1164. Sixteen ordinances agreed to in the General Council assembled by Henry II. at his palace of Clarendon, Wiltshire. The objects of these ordinances were to define the limits between civil and ecclesiastical jurisdictions, to abolish the abuses arising from the encroachments of the popes, and to limit the papal patronage and jurisdiction in the realm.

These enactments provide that the clergy shall be amenable to the king's courts; that no appeal shall in any case be carried from the king's courts to the pope; that no dignitary of England shall quit the kingdom without the king's permission; that no officer or tenant of the crown shall be excommunicated without the king's sanction; that presentations to all royal livings shall be with the king; that the revenues of vacant livings still accrue to the crown; that all bishops shall be made by the king's writ; and before consecration every nominee shall pay homage and fealty to the crown.

Constitutions of King Half (The). Regulations for pirates: (1) No one to wear a sword more than an ell long; (2) each pirate must be able to encounter twelve ordinary men; (3) no boys or women to be made prisoners; (4) no wounds to be bound till after the lapse of twenty hours. (Bartholinus, 'De Causis Contemptæ a Danis Mortis,' book ii. 9.)

Constitutions of Otho (The), 1237. Passed by a council held in London by Otho, the papal legate, forbidding the clergy to keep concubines 'openly in their houses,' or to visit them 'openly, to the great scandal of religion.' The same constitutions forbade the clandestine marriages of priests, which were declared to be very common.

Constitutional Agitation Act (The), 1792. A mere mask to mislead the loyalists of Ireland, by giving out that Irish agitation should be carried on by constitutional means.

It is a plan that has proved eminently successful in preventing the Government from grappling with the beginning of sedition . . . it is a game of masked sedition.—Irish Seditions, 1792-1880, p. 84.

Constitutional Assembly of Rome (The), 30 March, 1848. A republican assembly of deputies established in Rome by the triumvirate Mazzini, Armellini, and Suffi.

Constitutional Charter (The), 4 June, 1814. Given by Louis XVIII. to France. It established a representative government, composed of two houses, one of hereditary peers (a house of lords) and the other of elective deputies (a house of commons). The franchise he restricted to persons above 30 years of age who paid annually at least 12*l.* of direct taxes.

He thus disfranchised about three and a half millions of his subjects.

Constitutional Society (The), 1769. A society founded by Horne Tooke and Wilkes for supporting the Bill of Rights. In 1775 Lord North commented sharply on the conduct of this society, and Tooke was prosecuted for circulating letters of the society denouncing the skirmish of Lexington (America) 'as a bloody murder on our own part of British subjects.' The society voted the sum of 100*l.* for the relief of the widows and children of those who fell at Lexington on the American side.

Constitutionalists The), 1814, of Spain. The Exaltados or radicals were so called, because they wanted to restore the constitution given to Spain in 1812, but abolished by Ferdinand VII. in 1814.

In 1820 Ferdinand swore adherence to the constitution, and for two years matters went on more smoothly; but then civil war broke out afresh, Louis XVIII. interfered, and for many years Spain, from one cause or another, was in almost ceaseless broils.

Consubstantialists (The). Those who maintained what was called the homo-ousion, i.e. that the Father, Son, and Holy Ghost are all of the same nature. Aristotle says the stars are consubstantial or homo-ousian. So men are consubstantial or homo-ousian.

Consulate (The), of France, from 10 Nov., 1799–18 May, 1804. See 'Constitution of Year VIII.'

Continental System (The). A pet system of Napoleon's to ruin England by ruining her trade. He prohibited any nation over which he had control or influence to trade with Great Britain; he enjoined that every subject of the British kingdom who set foot on the continent should be accounted a prisoner of war, and all British merchandise be considered lawful prize. The folly of boycotting England was this: as Great Britain was the best customer of these continental nations, they ruined their own commerce in seeking to ruin that of England.

The first announcement of this system was made 9 Feb., 1801; the 'Berlin decree' was made 21 Nov., 1807. Austria acceded to the system 24 Nov., 1807; Sweden 17 Sept. 1809; the Roman States in Dec. Russia relaxed 31 Dec., 1810. Strenuous efforts were made by France to enforce the system in 1812, but after the Moscow expedition in the autumn of that year the system was wholly abandoned.

Continental Troops (The), 1775. A body of men maintained by the united colonies of North America, in the War of Independence, and placed under George Washington. The continental troops must not be confounded with the provincial militia.

Continual Council (The). Certain great prelates and lords, who combined together in the reign of Edward I. to control the king and overpower the parliament. Edward II. tried to oust them by choosing his council from men of inferior rank, but the 'continual council' then formed themselves into a standing committee of bishops, earls, and barons, for the government of the realm, and drew up certain 'articles of reform,' which transferred the power of the crown into the hands of the 'Lords Ordainers,' as the committee called themselves. Edward II. resisted for a time, but was ultimately compelled to take some of the most powerful of the barons into his privy council.

Contra-Remonstrants, or 'Anti-Remonstrants,' 1611. The Calvinists, or Gomarists(q.v.), who opposed the Remonstrants or Arminian party. This party became more violent after the Synod of Dort, 1619.

It is said that the Socinian bias of Vorstius greatly weakened the Arminian party.

Conventicle Acts (The). I. The First, 16 Car. II. c. 4 (1664). By this act, every person found at any dissenting meeting, where more than five persons were present, was punishable by fine, or three months' imprisonment. For a third offence a person might be transported for seven years.

In 1670 (22 Car. II. c. 1) this act was enlarged. Children above 16 years of age were to be fined 5*s.* each for attending such meetings for the first offence, and 10*s.* for every subsequent offence. The preacher was to be fined 20*l.* for the first offence, and 40*l.* for every subsequent one. The master of the house where the meeting was held was to be fined 20*l.* for each offence. Repealed by the Toleration Act, 1 Will. & Mary, c. 18 (1689).

II. The Second, 1670 (22 Car. II.). By which it was furthermore enacted, that all incumbents who had been admitted by the kirk-sessions and lay-olders during the interregnum in England must receive a presentation from the patron of the living, and be instituted afresh by the bishop of the diocese, under pain of deprivation. In consequence of this law 350 parishes were declared vacant.

Convention Nationale (La), 10 Aug., 1792. Succeeded the 'Assemblée Législative.' The first sessions held 21 Sept., when royalty in France was abolished, and France was declared a republic. 17 Jan., 1793, they condemned Louis XVI. to death. 1 Feb., 1793, they declared war against England, Spain, and Holland. 5 Oct., 1793, they introduced the Revolutionary Calendar. 16 Oct., 1793, they condemned to death Mary Antoinette. 31 Oct., 1793, they condemned to death twenty-one of the Girondin deputies. 5 April, 1794, they condemned to death Danton, Camille Desmoulins, and several members of the club of the Cordeliers. 27 July, 1794, they outlawed the two Robespierres and their chief partisans. 31 May, 1795, they suppressed the Revolutionary Tribunal. 22 July, 1795, they concluded peace with Spain. 26 Oct., 1795, they passed a decree of general amnesty, and declared its sessions terminated. They met in the Tuileries. Chief members were Brissot, Collot d'Herbois, Condorcet, Couthon, Danton, Gensonné, Marat, Péthion, Robespierre, St. Just, Tallien, and Vergniaud.

Convention Parliament (The). I. 1660. The first parliament after the restoration, consisting of both houses. It was not called together by order of the sovereign, but was merely convened by Monk. Passed an act restoring the ancient general constitution of kings, lords, and commons, and was legalised by Charles II. The Convention Parliament was certainly the most bloodthirsty and infamous of all the parliaments in the annals of English history. Even John Milton, the immortal poet, was condemned by it to death; but the fame of his great genius saved him, and England was spared the scandal of so great a shame. First met 25 April, 1660; dissolved 29 Dec., 1660.

II. 22 Jan., 1689, dissolved 29 Jan., 1691, under William III. (prince of Orange). Conferring the crown on William and Mary. See 'Parliament' and 'Geneva Convention.'

Convention of Cintra (The), 30 August, 1808. This was really the convention signed at Torres Vedras, when Junot agreed to quit Portugal; but the despatch of Sir Hew Dalrymple, inclosing a copy of the treaty, was dated from Cintra, 13 miles from Torres Vedras. Sir Arthur Wellesley was so disgusted with the treaty that he requested to be recalled.

The French ought to have been made to disgorge all their spoil. The Russian fleet ought to have been given up to England; and Junot, with his army, ought to have been forbidden to take any further part in the war.

Convention of Estates. The Scottish Parliament was so called between the removal of a king from Scotland and the Union. Convention is a word applied to a parliament not summoned by the king. Sometimes spoken of as 'The Estates,' and sometimes as 'The Convention.'

Convention of St. Cloud (The), 3 July, 1815. A military convention signed at St. Cloud by Davoust, Wellington, and Blücher, to put an end to further hostilities. The next day the allies entered Paris for the 2nd time, and Louis XVIII. followed on the 8th.

Convention of Sempach (The), 1393. The act of confederation between the Swiss and the Austrians. The two memorable battles of Morgarten and Sempach, won by the Swiss, had lowered the pride of Austria, who concluded peace with Switzerland for twenty years.

Convention of the Irish Rule (The). According to their own circular, the object of this association was 'to promote the confederation of every body in America, and, if possible, in the whole world, to advance the welfare of a wretched, oppressed, plundered, and misgoverned people [the Irish], and to awaken the long-suspended conscience of a powerful and brutal foe [the English].'

Converters, or 'Propagators of the Faith,' 1630. Missionaries, or rather ambulating controversialists — monks, Capuchins, and Recollets (q.v.)—with others of meaner sort, paid for every convert they made to the Catholic faith.

Fénelon says many were cordwainers, brokers, tailors, itinerant grinders, and little shopmen, who, without any study, abandoned their trade to convert the Huguenots; but they drew down upon the Converters universal contempt by their ignorance and fanaticism.

Convertisseur. A title given to Pélisson, the great converter of the French Huguenots in the reign of Louis XIV. In 1677 Louis devoted a secret fund for the conversion of these 'heretics,' the price paid per head was about 5*s.* (6 livres), and Pélisson was the chief instrument in distributing this fund.

The French livre = a franc. The livre tournois was a little less, but in each case 20 sous = 1 livre. The exact deficit of the livre tournois was: 81 such livres were equal to 80 francs.

Convocation, 12th cent. An assembly of the archbishops, bishops, and canons, summoned by the king's writ for the purpose of assessing themselves in levies of taxes. Subsequently other church questions were discussed in these meetings, but the crown had the power of proroguing and dissolving them. In 1665 the clergy gave up the power of taxing themselves, and Convocation lost its raison d'être. Now, Convocation consists of two houses; in the upper house sit the prelates; in the lower house deans, archdeacons, canons, and proctors. Both are mere debating societies without one jot of authority.

In the Convocation of York the same distinction exists, but the business has generally been conducted in one assembly (1890).

Convocation. In England. A synod of clergymen dating from 8 Hen. VI. c. 1, A.D. 1429. Reconstituted by 25 Hen. VIII. c. 19, A.D. 1533, but greatly changed in the reign of Queen Elizabeth, A.D. 1600.

The Convocation of Canterbury was then made to comprise all the bishops of the province, who compose the upper house. While the lower house consists of 22 deans, 53 archdeacons 24 proctors of chapters, 44 proctors of the parochial clergy, and one precentor (of St. David's).

The Convocation of York is of much smaller extent. Occasionally the two act together. See 'House of Convocation.'

In 1870 the Convocation of Canterbury appointed the Committee of Revisers of the Authorised Version of the Bible.

Convulsionists, 1632. I. The convulsion epidemic broke out in whole nunneries about Bordeaux, especially in the convent des Ursulines of Loudun, an educational establishment. In 1686, the French refugees, driven from house and home in the infamous dragonnade expeditions, were affected by the same epidemic. See 'Convulsionnaires' and 'Plagues,' &c.

II. 1882. An extreme democrat or radical, whose platform is convulsion, or plucking up the established order of all things by the roots.

Convulsionnaires, 1730. Certain Jansenists of France who met in St. Medard's churchyard, in the suburbs of Paris, where was the tomb of the Abbé François de Paris, who had died in 1727, where numberless miracles were alleged to have been done. These fanatics 'threw themselves into the most violent contortions of body; rolled about on the ground, imitated birds, beasts, and fishes; and when utterly exhausted went off in convulsions or a swoon.' Louis XV. ordered them to be imprisoned in 1733, but it was not possible to stamp out the fervour altogether. In the revival meetings in the last quarter of the 19th cent. similar exhibitions have been recorded in the daily papers.

When the king commanded the cemetery gates to be closed, a wit wrote over them :
De par le roi, défense à Dieu
De faire miracle en ce lieu.
Henceforth the king forbids God's grace
To show His wonders in this place.

Co-operative Stores. Retail stores for the sale of groceries, drapery-goods, shoes, and even butcher's meat and poultry, of the best quality at the lowest profitable price. The movement began at Rochdale in 1843. In London the Civil Service Co-operative Store does an enormous business, insomuch that an original 1*l.* share is worth 200*l.* (1890), and the capital of the stores is worth seven millions sterling. The next largest is the Army and Navy Stores. Every customer must be a member by the payment of 20*s.*, and all sales are strictly for ready money. A member may hold as many as 200 shares.

Copenhagen (Peace of), 10 June, 1660. Between Denmark and Sweden, effected by the Swedish Government on the death of their king Carle X. By this treaty the district of Trondhjem and the island of Bornholm were restored to the Danes. See 'Treaty of Roskilde.'

Trondhjem, pronounce Tron-yem.

Copley Medal (The), 1709. Instituted in the Royal Society of London by Sir Godfrey Copley for scientific discoveries.

Copts, or 'Copti.' Egyptian Christians of the Eutychian heresy. They continue the practice of circumcision. Their patriarch lives in Cairo, and is called the Patriarch of Alexandria and Jerusalem.

Copyright. See 'Lord Mahon's Act.'

Coqueluche (The Great Plague of), 1580. Was so called in France 'parce que les malades à l'agonie rendaient des sons enroués, comme le fait un coq.' A sort of catarrhe convulsif, or hooping-cough.

Cordeliers. I. The French name for the strictest branch of the Franciscan friars, who wore a girdle of knotted cord.

II. 1790. A republican club which held its sessions in the convent of the Cordeliers, Paris. It was opposed to the Jacobins (q.v.), and affected extreme poverty. It was this club which demanded the abolition of royalty and the institution of a free republic. Closed by the Convention at the death of Danton in 1794.

The chief members were the giant Danton; the scarcely less notorious Camille Desmoulins, Hébert, the editor of 'Père Duchêne,' and Marat, the bloodthirsty young surgeon. Camille Desmoulins was the editor of a popular journal called Le Vieux Cordelier.

Corinthians. I. Prize-fighters. Falstaff calls himself 'a Corinthian . . . . a lad of mettle' (1 Hen. IV. act ii. 4). So called from the Isthmian games held by the Greeks on the Isthmus of Corinth every alternate spring. In these games boxing formed a prominent part, and St. Paul, in his first epistle to the Corinthians (ix. 26), alludes to the racing and boxing so famous in Corinth, when he says, 'I, therefore, so run, not as uncertainly; so fight I, not as one that beateth the air.'

A Corinthian, a swell of the first water.

> Brave Tom, the champion, with an air
> Almost Corinthian took the chair.
> CRIB, Memorial.

II. In the days of the Regency, Corinthians meant London bloods, or, more strictly speaking, members of the Pugilistic Club, in Bond Street, London, of which both George the prince regent and his brother Frederick duke of York were distinguished members. The Prince Regent was the chief champion of the Bristoleans (Belcher, Cribb, and Molineux), the Duke of York was leader of the Hebrew school, of whom Mendoza was the principal. Thomas Cribb was actually attached to the household of the Prince of Wales, much to the annoyance of the general public.

Cork, in Ireland, is the Irish corcah, a marsh.

Cork-boys, 1762. A political Irish association, a Cork branch of the Whiteboys (q.v.). Their especial grievance was the payment of tithes. See 'Irish Associations.'

Corn Importation Bill (The), 1846. When wheat is 48*s.* the duty shall fall by 1*s.* with every shilling in price till it touches 53*s.*, when the fixed duty shall be 4*s.* This scale to last for three years, and to disappear on 1 Feb., 1849, leaving from that date only a normal rate of duty. All colonial wheat and flour to be admitted at once at a nominal rate.

Corn-law Rhymer (The). Ebenezer Elliott (1781–1849); born near Rotherham, in Yorkshire. His Corn-law Rhymes were published in 1831.

Corn Laws (The). Laws to regulate the exportation and importation of corn date as far back as 1360, which prohibited the exportation of corn except to Calais and Gascony. In 1393 the right to export was granted. In 1436 the right to export was granted only when wheat did not exceed 6*s.* 8*d.* a quarter. From that time sundry laws were made, till 1828, when the sliding scale was 'perfected.' By this law, if wheat was selling at 62*s.* a quarter, a duty of 24*s.* 8*d.* a quarter was imposed on imported corn; for every shilling less than 62*s.* a quarter an extra shilling was added to the import duty; but when corn exceeded that price, the import duty rapidly decreased, till the price of corn reached 73*s.* a quarter (famine price), when a minimum duty of a shilling was imposed on imported corn.

Cornage. A kind of tenure in grand sergeanty. The service in this tenure was the blowing of a horn to warn the subjects of the king when any invasion of the Scots was detected or apprehended (Latin, cornu, a horn).

Corn-cracker State (The). The State of Kentucky. The inhabitants are called Corn-crackers.

Corneille du Boulevard (Le) Guilbert de Pixérécourt (1773–1844).

Cornwallis (A). A sort of Guy Fawkes procession once held in the U.S., to commemorate the struggle for independence, typified by the surrender of Lord Cornwallis at York Town in 1781 to the united American and French army. Prior to this he had rendered himself formidable to the Americans in the battle of Brandywine, by the reduction of Charleston, and his victories at Camden and Guilford. Now obsolete.

Coro'na (The Roman). 1. 'Corōna Castrensis,' or 'Corona Vallaris,' a gold crown, ornamented with palisades (valla), bestowed on the soldier who first surmounted the stockade, and forced his way into an enemy's camp.

2. Corona Cívica (a civic crown), a chaplet of oak-leaves and acorns, bestowed on the Roman soldier who saved the life of a comrade in battle and slew the antagonist.

3. Corona Classica, or Corona Navalis, or Corona Rostrāta, a gold chaplet designed to imitate the beaks of ships (rostra), presented to the admiral who had destroyed an enemy's fleet (classis).

4. Corona Longa, a festoon of flowers hung round the neck on festive occasions, as on the feast of Bacchus, &c.

5. Corona Murālis (or mural crown) decorated with the towers and turrets of a battlement, and bestowed on the soldier who first scaled the walls of a besieged city.

7. Corona Natalitia, a wreath of laurel, ivy, or parsley, hung over a door to announce the birth of a child. In Holland a rosette of lace is the natal symbol.

8. Corona Obsidionālis, a garland of grasses and wild flowers presented to a commander who came to the relief of a besieged army. The least in value, and highest in honour, of all crowns.

9. Corona Oleagĭna, a wreath of olive-leaves, presented to all those by whose counsel or instrumentality a triumph was obtained, whether present or not in the action.

10. Corona Ovālis, a chaplet of myrtle won by a general in an ovation.

11. Corōna Pactĭlis, or Plectilis, a wreath of natural flowers with their leaves and stalks, worn on festive occasions.

12. Corona Radiāta, for gods and emperors. A band of gold set round with conical rays, tapering upwards.

13. Corona Sutĭlis, a wreath of roses without their stalks, worn by the Salii at their festivals.

14. Corona Triumphālis, worn by a general in a triumph. Some were laurel leaves without their berries, some were gold leaves in imitation, and some were of gold, not worn, but presented as a valuable gift.

Corona never meant a royal crown. No. 12 was worn by emperors not as imperator but divus. The royal head-dress was a white band tied behind the head in a bow with long ends. Asiatic monarchs wore a blue and white fillet.

Besides the corona mentioned above, there were others not honorary, but only emblematical, such as the Corona Sacerdotālis, worn during sacrifice, both by priests and people.

Corona Funĕbris, or Sepulchrālis, with which the dead were crowned.

Corona Convivālis, the Corona Nuptiālis, and the Corona Natalitia over the door of the vestibule where a child was born.

Coro'na Sacerdota'lis. A crown of flowers worn by the clergy on certain high festivals, when they walked in procession from the monastery to the parish church. Thus, in the fifteenth century, Roger de Walden went to St. Paul's to be enthroned bishop, crowned with a wreath of red roses. Polidore Vergil (sixteenth century) refers to the same custom at the feast of St. Paul. Stow speaks of 'the dean and chapter issuing from the west door with roses on their heads.'

The tonsure was called the 'corona clericālis,' meant to symbolise the crown of thorns.—BEDE, v. 22.

Coronation of English Queens (The). The queen of William I. crowned two years after the coronation of the king; the queen of Henry I. ditto; the queen of John not crowned with him, but alone; the queen of Henry III. not crowned with him, but afterwards alone; the queen of Edward III. crowned alone; the queen of Henry IV. not crowned with him, but alone; the queen of Henry V. ditto; the queen of Henry VI. ditto; the queen of Henry VII. crowned long after him; the queens of Henry VIII. some crowned and some not crowned; the queen of Charles I. never crowned; the queen of Charles II. ditto; the queen of George I. ditto; the queen of George IV. never crowned.

Coronation of the Ass (The). An important ceremony in the Festival of Vesta, to commemorate the following incident: Vesta was once brutally assaulted by some Roman ruffians, who would have offered her indecent violence, but were alarmed by the sudden braying of an ass. See 'Feast of the Ass.'

Coroners, 1079, were originally state officers with authority to determine felonies; but now they only take inquisitions of death. They are elected for life, and have authority to assemble juries. When a jury is assembled, it is charged and sworn by the coroner to inquire, upon view of the dead body, how the party came by its death. Recently, the coroner has been empowered to order the attendance of a legally-qualified medical attendant to make a post-mortem examination if required. The fee is one guinea for attendance without a post-mortem, and two guineas for attendance with post-mortem examination.

Corporal D'Epré, 1814. A sobriquet under which the imperialists toasted Napoleon while he was in Elba. D'Epré is a pun on the word dépré, parted [from us].

Corporal Violet, 1814. The sobriquet under which Napoleon was toasted during his stay in Elba. The violet is and was the floral emblem of the French empire. Napoleon left for Elba in May, but it was generally thought by the imperial party that he would return the spring following 'with the violets,' and so he did.

The Government of Louis XVIII. never paid the money promised to the 'Emperor of Elba,' and therefore broke the contract which bound the exile to his abdication of the throne of France.

Corporation Act (The), 1661. This act, passed in the reign of Charles II., compelled everyone, before being admitted to any office in any municipal corporation, to take the sacrament in the Established Church, to subscribe the declaration abjuring the Solemn League and Covenant, and also that against the lawfulness of taking up arms against the ruling sovereign on any pretence whatsoever. See 'Test Act' and 'Municipal Corporation Act.'

Corporation and Test Act Repeal Bill (The), 9 Geo. IV., May 1828. To repeal the 'Corporation' and 'Test' Acts (q.v.). See 'Municipal Corporation, &c.'

Corporation Oath (The), 1661. Passed by the Pension Parliament (q.v.) to this effect: 'I do declare and believe that it is not lawful upon any pretence whatever to take arms against the king; and I do abhor that traitorous position of taking arms by his authority against his person, or against those commissioned by him.'

Corps Législatif (Le), of the Consulate, 24 Dec., 1799. Consisting of 300 deputies. The Tribunate acted as a legislative grand jury, deciding what laws and bills were to be laid before the Corps Législatif. In 1807 the Conseil d'Etat took the place of the Tribunate. In 1814 this body was replaced by the 'Chamber of Deputies.' During the 'Hundred Days' the 'Chamber of Deputies' was called the Chamber of Representatives. In 1815 it was again called the 'Chamber of Deputies.' In 1852 it resumed the name of the Corps Législatif.

Pronounce Cor lay-jis-lah'-tef.

Corpus Christi College. I. Cambridge [C. C. C. C.], 1352. Founded by the guilds of Corpus Christi and of the Blessed Virgin Mary, assisted by Henry duke of Lancaster, and originally called 'Benet College.' The head is called 'master.'

II. Oxford, 1516. Founded by Fox, bishop of Winchester. The head is called 'president.'

Corpus Christi Festival (The). Called by the French Fête Dieu, 1264, in honour of the consecrated host or wafer. It is held on the Thursday following Trinity Sunday, and is the most splendid festival of the Catholic Church.

Corpus Juris Canon'ici. A summary of the legal responses and papal rescripts respecting the jurisdiction of the Church of Rome. It contains three parts: viz. (1) The Decretals, in 5 books; (2) The Text, in 5 books; and (3) The Extravagantes Communes.—The Decretals, compiled by Raimond de Pennafort, by order of Gregory IX., contain the rescript of the popes Alexander III., Innocent III., and Gregory IX., and was published in 1234. The Text was compiled by order of Boniface VIII., and continued the Decretals to the reign of the living pope. The Extravagantes Communes contained the 'Clementines,' or constitutions of Clement V. and the Extravagantes Johannis (XXII.).

Corpus Juris Civi'lis. The summary of Roman laws made in the reign of the Emperor Justinian. It consisted of four parts: (1) The Code, in 12 tables; (2) The Digest or Pandects, in 50 books; (3) The Institutes, a précis of the Digest to teach the rudiments of Roman law, in 4 books; and (4) the Novels, containing 16 edicts and 168 new laws by Justinian himself. The first three published A.D. 533, the last in 534.

Correggio. The best pictures of Correggio were actually used in the royal stables in the North to keep the wind from the backs or tails of the horses.

> Well then, the Charles of Mr. West
> And Oliver, I do protest,
> And eke the witnesses of resurrection (Peter and John)
> Will stop a hole, keep out the wind,
> And make a properer window-blind,
> Than great Correggio, used for horse-protection.
>
> PETER PINDAR, Lyric Odes, ii.

Correggio of Sculptors (The). Goujon (1515–1572), slain in the massacre of St. Bartholomew.

Corresponding Society (The), 1792. A society in London in strong sympathy with the French revolutionists, which corresponded with the National Convention of France. The object of the society was to establish a republic in Great Britain.

Corrupt Practices Act (The), 1854 (21, 22 Vict. c. 87). Relating to bribery, treating, and undue influence at the election of members of parliament

Numerous additions and amendments of the original act have been made. The New Act came into force in 1883.

Corruptibles (The), or 'Corruptibilists, 537. A party of the Monophysites of Alexandria, supported by Justinian, and led by Theodosius, a disciple of Sevērus. This party, favoured by the Empress Theodora, and the arms of the eunuch Narses, were called by their opponents Imperialists or Melchites. It was opposed to the 'Corruptibles' (q.v.), and so bitter was the animosity that the streets of Alexandria were deluged with blood. It is said that 200,000 Christians were slaughtered in one day at the installation of Apollinarius as patriarch of Alexandria. This, of course, is a gross exaggeration.

The Corruptibles were Nestorians, who insisted on the perfect manhood of Christ. The Incorruptibles were Eutychians, who insisted that the body of Christ was not, like ours, corruptible, but was a celestial body.

Corse Present. An oblation made at funerals. See 'Soul-shot.'

Corsica Paoli. Pasquale de Paoli, a native of Corsica, leader of the war in Corsica against Genoa. When the island was conquered by the French, Pasquale de Paoli took refuge in England.

Corsican Ogre (The). Napoleon I., who was a Corsican by birth and family (1769, 1804–1814; died 1821).

Corsican Sesostris (The). Napoleon Bonaparte (1769–1821, reigned 1804–1814).

Cortes (2 syl.). The representative assembly of the estates of Spain and of Portugal.

Corvée. Gratuitous work enforced by feudal tenure. It consisted either of personal labour or the gratuitous loan of horses and oxen. The usual work was to cut down and stack the lord's hay, to lop and cut his firewood, to dig and plough his land, to keep his ditches and hedges in order, and to sweep and repair his chimneys. Turgot, the French minister, abolished much of this enforced labour, 27 June, 1787, and the rest was abolished by the Constituent Assembly and the Convention.

Still used in Egypt, &c.

Corvi'nus. János Hun'yadi was so called (1400–1456). The tale is that his mother, Elizabeth Morsiani, was a paramour of the Emperor Sigismund, who gave her a ring, and promised to load her child with honour if she presented this ring. Elizabeth was on her road to the king's palace when a crow snatched the ring from her son's hand and flew up with it to a neighbouring tree. Her brother shot the bird and restored the ring. When her son, who was named János, was grown to man's estate, the king bestowed on him the domain of Hunyad, with 60 villages, and gave him as coat-of-arms a crow carrying a ring in its beak. Whence his name, John of Hunyad, Corvīnus.

Coryphæus of the Interpreters of Law (The). Bartōlus of Sasso-Ferrato, in Umbria (1313–1356). He practised law in Pisa and Perugia, and is known for his commentaries on the Corpus Juris Civilis. A French proverb runs thus: 'He knows his Bartolus as well as a cordelier knows his Dormi.' (Il sait son Bartole comme un cordelier son Dormi.)

The Dormi was a celebrated recueil of sermons of the fourteenth century. The words 'Dormi securé' are the first two words of the book.

 The coryphēus was the leader and chief speaker of the chorus in Greek dramas. Hence, a leader, chief, best of the kind.

Cosherers. Irish vagrants who lived by preying on their neighbours. There were always in Ireland a number of 'young gentlemen' who lived by 'coshering' on the country with their horses and hounds, preying on the farmers, drinking, gambling, and running into debt.

Coshery. An Irish custom which entitled the chief lord or dynast to exact from his tenants provisions and lodging for himself and his retinue.

These dynasts used to come with a great multitude of people to monasteries and gentlemen's houses, and there continue for two days and two nights, taking meat and drink at their pleasure, while their horses and servants were quartered upon the poor farmers of the neighbourhood, and nothing was paid for their entertainment.—T. Moore, Hist. of Ireland, ch. xiv.

Coterie, 1770. The first English female club. Amongst other members were the Duchess of Bedford, Lady Betty Delmé, the Countess of Pembroke, Mrs. Fazakerly, Lady Molyneux, Miss Pelham, &c. Play was both deep and constant.

Though called the Female Coterie, 'Ladies might ballot for gentlemen;' hence Sir T. Tancred was a member, so was George Augustus Selwyn.

Cottereaux (The). A band of brigands organised in 1792 by John Cottereaux, a cobbler of Laval. He rallied his men by screeching like an owl, and hence these desperadoes were nicknamed Screech-owls or Chouans. John Cottereaux was slain in 1794 in an encounter with the French Republican army. See 'French Brigands.'

Pronounce Cot'-ro', and Shwds.

Les coteraux, ou Routiers, ou Brabançons, étaient des misérables de la secte de Pierre de Bruys, espèce de Manichéens, qui avait surtout infecté de ses erreurs le Languedoc et la Gascogne. Ils faisaient profession de ne craindre ni Dieu ni les hommes. Ils se mettaient aux gages de tous ceux qui voulaient commettre quelque crime, et ils se signalaient par toutes sortes de brigandages. Henri II., roi d'Angleterre, les avait pris à son service en 1174 pour combattre son fils Richard.—Les Petits Bollandistes, vol. vi. p. 850.

(The word coteraux in this extract is an anachronism, as John Cottereaux died in 1794.)

Cottesmore Pack (The). Rutlandshire. One of the three packs of the old 'Melton-Mowbray Hunt,' established in 1759. They were the Earl of Lonsdale's hounds. The other two packs were the Duke of Rutland's and Mr. Osbaldiston's, called the Quorn pack, of Leicester. The 'Melton-Mowbray Hunt' is now a thing of the past, but the Duke of Rutland's hounds, the Quorn, and the Cottesmore hounds are still celebrated (1890).

Cottonian Library (The), 1753. In the British Museum, but purchased for the use of the public in 1700. It was collected by Sir Robert Cotton (1570–1634), and consisted originally of 958 volumes; but part was burnt by a fire which broke out in Ashburnham House, and the present collection consists of 746 entire volumes and 98 defective ones. It is rich in historical documents, from the Saxon times to the reign of James I. It also contains numerous registers of English monasteries, the charters of Edgar and of Henry I. to Hyde Abbey, near Winchester, written in gold letters, and the MS. called the 'Durham Book,' which is a copy of the Latin Gospels, with an interlinear Saxon gloss, written before the year 800, and reputed to have belonged to the Venerable Bede.

COUNCIL OR COUNCILS.

A complete list of the 2,730 Church councils, with a brief summary of the subjects of debate in each, would fill at least fifty pages of this Dictionary. Those here given require to be known by all students of Church history. See p. 218, col. 2, 'Councils (contradictory),' and 'General Councils.'

Council, PARLIAMENT. In the early times of parliaments we frequently meet with the word 'council,' especially in the reigns of Edward III. and Richard II. After the Leicester Parliament (q.v.), a parliament was an assembly of the commons with the clergy and barons. A great council was an assembly to which the commons were not summoned. Strictly speaking, a parliament had the power of granting taxes, and a council was called merely to consult with the king on matters where taxes were not concerned.

Council (A Civic). 'Concilium Civile,' in which a local bishop meets the clergy of his diocese.

Council (A Great). 'Concilium Magnum,' an œcumenical council or great synod. The Council of Nice is called 'Magnum et Universale Concilium.' The whole college of bishops dispersed throughout Christendom ought to be convened to an œcumenical or general council.

Council (The Palace). 'Concilium palatinum,' 859. These councils were held biennially in the royal palace of the Carlovingian kings, and were conventions of the bishops—'generales episcoporum conventus.'

Council (A Plenary). 'Concilium Plenārium' is one to which a metropolitan invites all the bishops under his jurisdiction.

Council (A Provincial). 'Concilium Provinciale.'

Sunt et provincialia Concilia quæ post illa universalia necessario recipere debemus, quia et in illis multa ecclesiasticis negotiis necessaria reperimus. — BERNALDUS CONSTANTIENSIS PRESBYTER, De Reconciliatione lapsorum, p. 287.

Council (Privy). See 'Privy Council.'

Council for the Propagation of Faith and the Extirpation of Heretics (The), 31 May, 1650. At Turin. Designed for the extirpation of the Vaudois. If the council could not convert the Vaudois to the 'Catholic' faith, they were to extirpate them as heretics.

Council of Aix-la-Chapelle (The), Nov. 809. An ecclesiastical council, held at Aix-la-Chapelle, on the 'Procession of the Holy Ghost.' The 'Filioque' controversy, which long disturbed the church, was this: Did the Holy Ghost proceed from the Father only, or from the Father and the Son (filioque)? The Greek Church maintained the former, the Roman Church the latter dogma. The Council of Aix-la-Chapelle condemned the Greek dogma.

Council of Albi (The), in Lent 1255. That is the Council held at Albi, in France, for the final extirpation of the Albigensian heresy.

Council of Ariminium (The). That is, Rimini, in Italy, A.D. 359; convened by the Emperors Constans and Constantius to decide upon the Arian controversy.

This council condemned as heretics Arius, Ursacius, Valens, and others.

Councils of Arles (The). I. A.D. 314, assembled by Constantine against the Donatists (q.v.).

II. A.D. 353. Against Athanasius and others.

III.–VII. On discipline: viz. A.D. 442, 452, 524, 554, 813.

VIII A.D. 1059. Against the Archbishop of Narbonne.

IX. A.D. 1205. Respecting church government.

X. A.D. 1211. To excommunicate the Count of Toulouse, the great defender of the Albigenses.

XI. A.D. 1234. Against heretics.

XII. A.D. 1260. Against the followers of Joachim, abbot of Flores, called 'The Prophet.' It was his 'Everlasting Gospel' which was condemned in the council.

XIII. A.D. 1274. Respecting church discipline.

Council of Basel (The), 1431–1443. The Ninth General Council of the Western Church (eighteenth), convened for the reunion of the Eastern and Western Churches, and for general reform. It declared the authority of a general council superior to that of the pope, and that appeals lay from the pope to a general council; it abolished annates or first-fruits, and wrested from the pope the right of electing to vacant bishoprics and benefices. Pope Eugenius was so disgusted that he set up an opposition council; whereupon the Council of Basel cited him to appear before them, but he refused, and declared the council dissolved. The council now deposed the pope, and elected Felix V. in his place, thus making a new schism. Eugenius died in 1447, Felix resigned, and Nicholas V. remained sole pope.

Eighteenth if numbered from the Council of Nice, A.D., 325, when the Eastern and Western Churches were not divided.

Council of Blood (The). So the council established in the Netherlands by the Duke of Alba was called by the Brabançons, in consequence of the numerous executions which it ordained. The Counts of Egmont and of Horn were two of its victims. See under 'Conseil.'

Councils of Carthage (The). I. A.D. 200. Respecting the rebaptism of heretics.

II. A.D. 251. To confirm the election of Cornelius as pope; to regulate the readmission of apostates; and to condemn the schism of Felicissimus.

III. A.D. 252. Respecting the treatment of apostates.

IV. A.D. 253. Respecting the baptism of infants.

V. A.D. 254. Respecting the deposition of Basilides and Martial, Spanish bishops.

VI. A.D. 255. Respecting rebaptism.

VII. A.D. 256. To confirm the previous council.

VIII. 312. To elect Cæcilianus as bishop of Carthage. He was deposed by the Donatists.

IX. A.D. 397. To abolish love feasts. It declared the Apocryphal writings of equal authority to other scriptures. See 'Laodicea.'

X. A.D. 401–411. Respecting the Donatists.

XI. A.D. 412. Against Celestius.

XII. A.D. 416–418. Against Pelagius and Celestius.

XIII. A.D. 419–425. On the appeal of Apiarius to the pope.

XIV. A.D. 484. A conference appointed by Hunneric between the Catholics and Arians. The Catholic bishops exiled.

XV. A.D. 525. On the liberties of monasteries.

XVI. A.D. 535. For the restitution of the rights and possessions of the church usurped by the Vandals.

Council of Chalce'don (The), 451. The Fourth General Council, convened by the Emperor Marcian to condemn the heresy of Eutyches. This council confirmed the condemnation of the Nestorians.

The Eutychian heresy merged the human nature of Christ in his divine nature. The Nestorians divided the Godhead and manhood of Christ into two distinct persons and natures.

The First General Council was held at Nice 325 and condemned the Arian heresy. The Second General Council was held at Constantinople in 380 and condemned the Macedonian heresy. The third General Council was held at Ephesus, and condemned the Nestorian heresy. The Fourth condemned the Eutychian heresy. Arius denied the divinity of Christ. Macedonius denied his humanity. Nestorius maintained that Mary was not the mother of God but of Jesus, for God could not be born. And Eutyches maintained that the human nature was merged in the Divine and there lost. See 'General Councils.'

Council of Cloveshoo (The). In Kent, A.D. 747. Convened by Cuthbert, archbishop of Canterbury. It enacted that every bishop should visit his diocese at least once a year; that the people should be taught the Creed and the Lord's Prayer in English, and should have the nature of the sacraments explained to them in English. Other canons were passed for the correction of morals and discipline.

Prayers for the dead were enjoined in this council.

Councils of Constance (The). I. A.D. 1043. To establish 'public and universal peace' in Germany.

II. A.D. 1094. To reprobate simony and incontinence, and to regulate the time of Easter and Whitsuntide.

III. A.D. 1153. For the divorce of Frederick Barbarossa and Adelaide.

IV. The Eighth General Council of the Western Church (seventeenth), A.D. 1414–1418. Against Wyclif, Huss, and Jerome of Prague. With impotent rage this council not only condemned the opinions of Wyclif, but ordered his bones to be exhumed and burnt. Thirteen years afterwards his bones were actually exhumed and burnt, and the ashes thrown into the river Swift. This council deposed the three contemporary popes (Gregory XII., Benedict XIII., and John XXIII.), and elected Martin V. pope. Gregory died first, and no other was elected in his place: then John, and then Benedict, leaving Martin V. the sole pope, and thus closing the Great Schism which had lasted from 1378 to 1429.

Seventeenth if reckoned from the Council of Nice, A.D. 325, when the Eastern and Western Churches were not divided.

Councils of Constantinople (The). Those of 336, 339, and 360 were in favour of Arius.

The Second General Council, May to July 381. Called by Theodosius. It condemned appeals to Rome, and determined the limits of the Metropolitan provinces. It also condemned Macedonius, who denied the divinity of the Holy Ghost.

The councils of 382, 383, 394 were convened to pacify the schismatics, if possible.

The council of 403 was in favour of Chrysostom, and that of 404 deposed him.

The council of 448 condemned Eutyches. See 'Eutychians.'

The council of 450 condemned the dogmas of Nestorius and Eutyches. See 'Nestorians.'

The council of 459 condemned the Simoniacs.

The council of 492 confirmed the Council of Chalcēdon.

The council of 495 or 496 deposed Euphemius.

The council of 516 condemned the Council of Chalcedon.

The council of 518 reversed the condemnations of Euphemius and Macedonius, and restored their exiled partisans.

The councils of 520, 531, 532 were in favour of Euphemius, who was ordained patriarch.

The council of 536 condemned 'heretical' bishops.

The councils of 543, 547, 551 condemned Origen.

The Fifth General Council, 553, also condemned Origen. So did the councils of Constantinople of 588, 626.

The council of 638 was in favour of the Monothelites (q.v.).

Sixth General Council, 680–681, condemned the Monothelites (q.v.).

The councils of 712, 715, 730 were in condemnation of the 'Sixth General Council.'

The councils of 786, 806, 809, 812, 814 condemned the Iconoclasts (q.v.).

The council of 815 deposed Nicephorus. In this council the Iconoclasts had it all their own way.

The councils of 821, 829 were called to reconcile the Catholics and Iconoclasts, but the Catholics refused to attend.

The councils of 842, 847 condemned the Iconoclasts.

The council of 858 deposed Photius (the fons et origo of the separation of the two churches).

OF THE UNIVERSITY OF CALIFORNIA

The council of 861 restored Photius and deposed St. Ignatius.

The council of 867 reversed the decision of the previous council 861, and deposed Photius again.

Eighth General Council, 869–870, deposed Photius and condemned the Iconoclasts.

The council of 1054 anathematised the pope's legates.

The councils of 1066, 1067 were against incestuous marriages.

The council of 1110 condemned the Bogomiles or Bogarmitæ (q.v.).

The councils of 1140, 1143, 1144, 1147, 1157 condemned the works of Constantine Chrysomale.

The council of 1170 was to effect the union of the Eastern and Western Churches.

The councils of 1277, 1280 excommunicated the opponents of the union.

The council of 1283 condemned Veccus.

The councils of 1284, 1285 reversed the judgments of 1277, 1280, and condemned those who sought the union of the two churches.

The council of 1341 condemned Barlaam, the opponent of Palamas.

The council of 1345 condemned the doctrine of Palamas, the opponent of Barlaam; he was imprisoned 1346, but in 1349 was created patriarch of Constantinople, and in 1351 a synod in the same city confirmed his doctrine.

The council of 1450 was also against the union.

The councils of Constantinople give a lamentable picture of the Eastern Church, which seems to have had no fixed principle.

Council of Eanham (The). In Oxfordshire, 1008, convened on the subject of church government. It decreed that tithes of produce should be paid at Allhallows, but tithes of young at Whitsuntide. That Rome-shot should be paid at St. Peter's mass, soul-shot immediately the grave was opened, light-shot thrice a year, plough-alms a fortnight after Easter. That on Sunday no trade should be carried on.

Council of Elders (The), or 'Conseil des Anciens,' 23 Sept., 1795. One of the two Legislative Councils of Year III. in French history. The other council was 'Le Conseil des Cinq-cents,' which had the sole right of initiating laws; the Elders had the power of veto or approval. The executive was placed in a board of five directors called the Directory.

Le Conseil des Anciens consisted of 250 members.

Councils of Ephesus (The). I. A.D. 245. Condemned Noetus.

II. A.D. 401. For the election of a bishop.

III. A.D. 431. The Third General Council, condemned Nestorius and Pelagius. It laid down this canon, that every diocese and province shall exercise the right of ordaining unmolested and inviolable, and no bishop shall occupy another's diocese. Each province is 'Autocephālus,' and each diocese independent

IV. A.D. 449. Called the Latrocinium, or 'Robber Synod' (q.v.).

V. A.D. 476. Respecting Basiliscus and the Council of Chalcēdon.

Council of Holy Martyrs (A). 'Concilium Martўrum Sanctorum,' a place where many martyrs or holy men lie buried.

Council of Laodicea (The), A.D. 360. Excluded the apocryphal writings from the canon of Scripture; but the Council of Carthage, in 397, declared them to be 'of equal authority with the other scriptures.'

Councils of the Lateran (The). I. A.D. 649. To condemn the Monothelites (q.v.).

II. Nov. 864. To depose and excommunicate the Bishop of Porto.

III. Aug. 900. To restore the Bishop of Langres.

IV. Jan. 993. To canonise Udalric, bishop of Augsburg.

V. Feb. 1111. Respecting investitures. Pope Pascal II. compelled by Kaiser Heinrich V. to concede the right.

VI. March 1112. To revoke the concession of Pope Pascal II.

VII. March 1116. To excommunicate Kaiser Heinrich V.

VIII. A.D. 1123. The First General Council of the Western Church, held by Callixtus II. (Ninth).

IX. A.D. 1139. The Second General Council of the Western Church, for the reunion of the Eastern and Western Churches (Tenth).

X. A.D. 1179. The Third General Council of the Western Church. It placed in the cardinals the sole right of electing the pope. Decided on the crusade against the Albigenses. Anathematised the Albigenses as heretics, and forbade their interment in consecrated ground (Eleventh).

XI. Nov. 1215. The Fourth General Council of the Western Church. Held by Innocent III. to deprive Raymond count of Toulouse of his dominions for protecting the Albigenses. To anathematise the English barons for forcing Magna Charta on King John, and declaring the charter null and void. To vote for the extermination of heretics. And to declare transubstantiation to be a tenet of the 'Catholic' Church.

XII. July 1511 (The Fifth General Lateran). The Tenth General Council of the Western Church. By Julius II. to declare void the Council of Pisa.

XIII. March 1517. To abolish the Pragmatic Sanction. To confirm the concordat with François I. To impose a tax of one-tenth for war with Turkey. And to issue a decree against the printing of 'dangerous books.' (This was in fact a part of the preceding council.)

If reckoned from the Council of Nice, when the Eastern and Western Churches were not divided, these general councils would be numbered thus: A.D. 1123 (the Tenth), A.D. 1139 (the Eleventh), A.D. 1179 (the Twelfth), A.D. 1215 (the Thirteenth), and A.D. 1511-1517 (the Nineteenth).

Council of Lyons (The), 1245. The Fifth General Council of the Western Church (Fourteenth), held by Innocent IV., to depose the Kaiser Friederich II.

A.D. 1274. The Sixth General Council of the Western Church (Fifteenth), held by Gregory X. Respecting the election of bishops, the reunion of the Eastern and Western Churches, the reduction of the Begging Friars, and the reformation of the clergy.

The Council of 1528 was against Lutheranism.

Fourteenth and Fifteenth, if reckoned from the Council of Nice, A.D. 325, when the Eastern and Western Churches were not separated.

Council of Mantua (The), 1536. Summoned by Paul III., who cited Henry VIII. to appear before it. Henry VIII. of course denied the authority of the council.

Council of Nice, or 'Nicæa' Called The First General Council, A.D. 325. Assembled by Constantine against the Arians. The sentence runs thus:—'The Catholic and Apostolic Church anathematises all who say that there was a time when the Son did not exist; that He had no existence previous to his birth in Bethlehem; that He was created out of nothing; or who say that He was formed from another substance or essence; or who say that He is capable of change.' It also condemned the Melesian schism (q.v.), and 'settled' the Paschal or Easter Controversy (q.v.).

The Nicene Creed, as it now stands, was not published by this Council, but by the Council of Constantinople in 381. It was drafted at Nice, approved of by the Council of Milan in 346, by the Council of Sardica in 347, and the Council of Rimini in 360; but it was completed by the Council of Constantinople.

The Seventh Ecumenical Council was also held at Nice A.D. 787.

Council of Officers (The), 1647. Officers elected from each of the parliamentary regiments to examine into and rectify the 'distempers' of the parliamentary army. To this upper council was added a lower one, consisting of two privates or officers not higher in rank than ensigns, and called the adjutants or adjutators or adjuvants, and afterwards Agitators, because, like the Roman tribunes, they were ceaseless disturbers of the peace. This lower council soon became the Aaron's rod of all the other national assemblies, and dominated even the parliament itself. Charles I. called Cornet Joyce 'Mr. Agitator Joyce,' not by way of reproach, but as a usual method of address.

Council of Peers (The), 24 Sept., 1640, or 'Great Council of Peers.' Convened at York by Charles I., who was unwilling to summon a parliament, because his parliaments always insisted on redress of grievances before they would vote supplies. The object for which the Council of Peers was convened was to grant supplies in order to raise an army against the Scotch, who had encamped on Dunse-law hill, and threatened to advance.

Council of Pisa (The), 1409. Convoked by the cardinals of the rival popes (Gregory XII. and Benedict XIII.). The two popes were summoned to appear, but refused, and were declared contumacious, schismatic, heretical, and perjured. They were both deposed, and Alexander V. elected pope. The condemned popes treated the decrees of the council with supreme contempt; and all the council effected was to make three popes instead of two, all of whom hurled curses, calumnies, and excommunications at each other. Declared void by the Fifth General Lateran Council.

Council of Sar'dica (The), or 'Sardia,' in Thrace, A.D. 347; to settle the controversy between the Arians and Athanasius. It condemned the Arians.

Councils of Toulouse (The).
I. 13 Sept., 1056. Against simony, the marriage of ecclesiastics, and other abuses.
II. 1068. Against simony.
III. 1118. Against the Manichæans.
IV. Nov. 1229. To establish the Inquisition.

Council of Trent (The), or 'Tridentum,' 1545–1563. Assembled by Paul III., and continued under Julius III. and Pius IV., to fix what should be admitted as orthodox doctrine. Its main object was to condemn the Reformation.

Council of Trouble (The), 1567. The organisation, under Margaret, governor of the Netherlands, under which 18,000 persons in three years were put to death. Also called 'The Tribunal of Blood.'

Council of Trullo (The), A.D. 692. The Fifth and Sixth General Council, which confirmed the decree of the Council of Ephesus, that every bishop shall ordain unmolested in his own diocese, and no bishop shall interfere in another's diocese or province.

In the language of the council, each province is Autocephâlous, and each diocese independent and free except to its own metropolitan.

Council of War (A). A conference of officers on some matter in which the chief commander, pending war, wishes to state his own opinion upon some military or naval matter, and hear what his officers think about it. In the navy the council of war usually consists of flag officers, assisted sometimes by other officers of lower rank. In the army the commander-in-chief can call whom he thinks proper to confer with him.

Council of the Earthquake (The), 1382. The council, held at Blackfriars, and headed by Courtenay, archbishop of Canterbury, to condemn Wyclif and his teachings. The archbishop submitted twenty-four allegations drawn from Wyclif's works; but an earthquake in the midst of the proceedings terrified every prelate present, except the primate, who declared that the earthquake was a good omen, signifying that God would expel from the church the ill humours of heresy.

Council of the Senate (The). University of Cambridge, established in 1857 (19, 20 Vict., c. 88), which must send a 'grace' to the senate before that legislative body can move in any matter. The council consists of the chancellor and vice-chancellor, with eight other members of the senate chosen from the electoral roll (q.v.). The eight members hold office in the council for four years.

The eight members of the council consist of 2 heads of colleges, 2 of the professors, and 4 other members.

Council of the Troubles (The). So the Spaniards called the 'Council of Blood' (q.v.).

Council of the 6 (The). For the exclusion of the Stuart dynasty and the restoration of Great Britain to a republic. Of this council four were beheaded, viz. Russell, Algernon Sidney, Monmouth, and Argyll; Essex died in the Tower by his own hand; and Howard of Escrick (a traitor and sad villain) perished in great poverty, deserted and hated by all men.

Hampden said 'that the coming into England of King William was nothing else but the continuing of the council of six.'—HOWITT, Hist. of England.

Council of the 10 (The), 'I Dieci,' 1310. A secret tribunal of the republic of Venice, armed with unlimited powers in watching over the safety of the state. It punished at discretion all secret enemies of the republic. At first it was prorogued annually, but in 1325 it was made perpetual, and continued as long as the Venetian republic endured.

Council of the 13 (The), 1653. A council of state, with Cromwell at the head, appointed after the dissolution of the Long Parliament. The council selected a parliament of 156 members; 139 for England, 6 for Wales, 6 for Ireland, and 5 for Scotland. It was to last fifteen months, when they were to choose successors and disperse. It was called the 'Little Parliament' (q.v.).

Some proposed that the council of state should consist of 10 members; some of 70, after the model of the Jewish sanhedrim; others of 18, in imitation of Christ and his apostles. The last suggestion was adopted.—Dr. LINGARD, Hist. of Eng., viii. 6.

Council of the 16 (The), 'Conseil des Seize,' 1585. A committee of sixteen members of the Catholic League of France to prevent the crown descending to Henri of Navarre, a Protestant, on the death of the reigning king, Henri III., who was childless. The plot was to proclaim the old Cardinal de Bourbon king. This, however, was a mere bait, for if they had succeeded, they would have given the crown to Charles de Lorraine, duc de Mayenne.

On the death of Henri III. in 1589 the old cardinal was actually proclaimed Charles X., but Henri of Navarre, by his victories of Arques and Ivry, secured the crown to himself, and in the interim the old cardinal died.

Council of the 38 (The), 1649. The government of England was vested in a council of thirty-eight members, with Cromwell at the head, after the execution of Charles I.

Council of the 40 (The.) See 'Forty.'

In 1653 Cromwell intended to dissolve the Long Parliament, and substitute a 'Council of Forty,' with himself at the head. But after dismissing the parliament he appointed instead a 'Council of Twelve,' with himself at the head (making 13), in imitation of Christ and his twelve apostles.

Council of the 100 (The). The great legislative and executive council of ancient Carthage, which concentrated in itself all the real power of the state. The two elective magistrates called 'Suffètes' were amenable to the council of the self-elected hundred, who held office for life, and so was the senate, which consisted of 300. Similarly in Venice the doge and senate were amenable to the Council of Ten.

Council of the 400 (The), B.C. 594. Instituted by Solon of Athens. See 'Government of the 400.'

Council of the 500 (The). I. In Greek history. Βουλὴ τῶν πεντακοσίων. The Athenian Senate. Solon divided the people into four tribes, each of which chose a representative. Klisthenês increased the number to ten, and then the senate was increased to 500.

II. In French history. 'Conseil des Cinq-cents,' from 27 Oct., 1795 to 14 Dec., 1799, was one of the two councils, the other being called the 'Conseil des Anciens,' consisting of 250 members. Both these were legislative bodies like our lords and commons. The executive was placed in a board of five directors called the 'Directory.' The 500 had the exclusive power of the initiative; the elders only vetoed or confirmed the measures.

Councils (Contradictory Church).

A.D. Council of :—

310. ARLES condemned Athanasius, so in 385 did the Council of Tyre, and in 354 the Council of Milan; but in 325 the Council of Nice confirmed the tenets of Athanasius, and so did the Council of Sardica in 347.

325. NICE condemned Arius as a heretic; but three Councils of Constantinople (q.v.), the Council of Arles in 353, and the Council of Milan in 354, declared Arianism to be the orthodox faith. Eusebius, bishop of Nicomedia, sided with Arius. When Julius, in 336, succeeded Mark, he called a council at Sardica, but it was so divided on the subject that each party excommunicated the other.

357. SIRMIUM condemned the dogma of Homoiousion (q.v.); but the Council of Ancyra and that of Constantinople confirmed it.

360. LAODICEA excluded the Apocrypha from the canon of scripture; but in 397 the Council of Carthage declared it to be equal in every respect to all other scripture.

382. CONSTANTINOPLE confirmed the Council of Calcium; but in 516 another Council of Constantinople reversed the previous decision.

403. CONSTANTINOPLE was in favour of Chrysostom; but that of 404 deposed him.

492. CONSTANTINOPLE confirmed the Council of Chalcêdon; but in 516 another Council of Constantinople condemned it.

495. CONSTANTINOPLE deposed Euphemius; but that of 518 reversed the decree, and restored him.

638. CONSTANTINOPLE confirmed the doctrine of the Monothêlites (4 syl.), as the true faith; but in 680 another Council of Constantinople condemned it as heresy. Three other councils condemned that of 680. The Lateran Council of 648 also condemned it.

712. CONSTANTINOPLE condemned the Sixth General Council.

730. CONSTANTINOPLE approved of Iconoclasm; but in 814 condemned it. In 815 approved of it; but in 842, 869, 870 condemned it. In 787 it was condemned by the council held at Nice.

754. CONSTANTINOPLE condemned the worship of images. In 766 the Council of Jerusalem favoured images, so did the Council of Nice in 787. In 829 the Council of Constantinople again condemned them, but in 842 another Council of Constantinople reversed the judgment of the previous one.

852. CONSTANTINOPLE deposed Photius; 861 it restored him and deposed Ignatius; in 867 it reversed the judgment of 861.

1112. LATERAN revoked the 5th Lateran of the previous year.

1284, 1285. CONSTANTINOPLE reversed the judgments of 1277, 1280.

1341. CONSTANTINOPLE condemned Palamas; but in 1345 another council reversed the judgment.

1511. IV. LATERAN declared the Acts of the Council of Pisa null and void.

N.B.—A complete list of all the Contradictory Councils would require several pages of this NOTE-BOOK.

Councillors (The). Since the Municipal Corporations Act of 1835, every burgess is qualified to be elected who was of full age on the last day of August preceding the election, provided (1) he has occupied premises within the borough continuously for three preceding years, and has for that time resided within seven miles of the borough; (2) provided also he has been rated to the poor-rate, and has paid both poor-rates and borough-rates. In the council is vested the entire deliberative and administrative functions of the corporation. They appoint the town-clerk (q.v.), the treasurer (q.v.), the mayor (q.v.), and aldermen, all from their own body. They control the police, the watch, and the lighting; make bye-laws, impose fines for nuisances, and are responsible for the government of the borough. They control the burgess fund, and appoint the salaries of police magistrates.

Counter-Remonstrance (The), 1611. The counterblast put forward by Frans Gomar of Bruges against the Remonstrance (q.v.) of the Arminians, presented to the States of Holland in 1610, and dogmatically laying down the dogmas of absolute predestination and reprobation.

Counter-Remonstrants. Ultra-Calvinists or Gomarists who put forward the Counter-Remonstrance (q.v.). The States tried to reconcile the Remonstrants and Counter-Remonstrants in 1614, but wholly without effect, and so violent did the contest grow that the Remonstrants had to be protected by a military guard. In 1619 the Synod of Dort was convened, and the Arminians were excluded from pleading their cause. Since then the Remonstrants have become more temperate and less Calvinistic.

Countess of Huntingdon's Connexion (The), 1770. A sect of Calvinistic Methodists founded by Selina countess of Huntingdon, widow of Theophilus earl of Huntingdon. They use the English Prayer-book.

Counties Corporate. Twelve cities and five towns in England with territories annexed, governed by their own sheriffs, who are quite independent of the county sheriffs

The twelve cities are Bristol, Canterbury, Chester, Coventry, Exeter, Gloucester, Lichfield, Lincoln, London, Norwich, Worcester, and York.

The five towns are Kingston-upon-Hull, Newcastle-upon-Tyne, Nottingham, Poole and Southampton.

In 1889 London was erected into a county of itself.

There are some in Ireland.

Country (The), 1620. The anti-Court party. The terms 'Court and Country' to express the royalists and anti-royalists first arose in the parliament assembled 30 Jan., 1620, by James I.

In 1678 the 'Country' was the opposition party, bent on overturning the government of Lord Danby, and on the exclusion of the Duke of York from the succession. After the death of Charles II., the Dukes of Buckingham and Shaftesbury (who were in the 'Cabal') were its leaders.

In 1692 they were often called the 'Grumbletonians,' and were opposed to what was called the 'Patriot party.' They were the 'outs' in Walpole's ministry. The 'ins' or 'let alones' were the Patriot party, called formerly the 'Court party'

In the latter part of the reign of George I., and in the reign of George II., the Court party meant the Whigs, and the Country party the Tories. In the early part of George I.'s reign the Whigs, or Court party, were called the Hanoverians.

Country Pastor (A). The pen-name of Archbishop Whately (1787–1863).

Country of the Three Mountains (The), and of four rivers, Hungary. The mountains are the Tátra, Fátra, and Mátra. The rivers are the Danube, the Theiss, the Drave, and the Save. The last three are tributaries of the Danube, which empties itself in the Black Sea.

County Councils, 1889.

1. They have charge of the public buildings, such as the shire-hall, the police-courts, the bridges, the lunatic asylums, &c. in the county.

2. They appoint the public analyst, the inspector of weights and measures, the county surveyor, the county treasurer, and the county coroner.

3. They have to keep up the highways (i.e. the disturnpiked roads).

4. They carry out the regulations connected with the Contagious Diseases (Animals) Act, the compensation to those who have to destroy their infected animals, and the restrictions to be placed on the importation of cattle.

5. They make regulations, &c. to preserve the purification of rivers.

6. They, in union with the justices of peace, have the charge and appointment of the county police.

7. They are bound to put in force the Allotment Act, and to enable labouring men, according to the council's discretion, to obtain allotments.

8. They are, at their discretion, to assist emigrants from this country to other places of settlement.

9. All local taxes are handed over to them, whether from probate duties or the consolidated funds.

The councils are elected for three years; and they appoint the aldermen who hold office for six years.

County Courts, 1846. Originally established for the recovery of small debts under 20*l.*, subsequently extended to 50*l.*, and in 1865 to 500*l.* They now take cognizance not only of debts to the amount stated, but of all personal actions, not criminal, where the amount does not exceed 50*l.*; and exercise all the functions of the High Court of Chancery in suits by creditors, legatees, devisees, heirs-at-law, &c., in which the estate and personals do not exceed 500*l.* They also take cognizance of the dissolution of partnerships; but the vice-chancellor has the power of removing a suit from a County Court to the Court of Chancery.

Coup de Bourguignon (Un). A blow given from behind; a cowardly blow; the blow of an assassin. The origin of this phrase is as follows: The Duc de Biron, who was beheaded in the reign of Henri IV., was told by an astrologer, 'de se garder d'un coup de Bourguignon par derrière.' When brought to the block he asked who was to be his headsman, and was told 'a man from Burgundy.' Then the words of the astrologer flashed into his memory: 'Beware of the blow of a Burgundian,' and the words became proverbial.

Coup d'état. I. 23 de Juin, 1789. After the Séance Royale, the master of the ceremonies commanded the Tiers état to retire as the other two classes had left and the assembly was over. Then Mirabeau, one of the deputies, told the Tiers not to leave: 'Nous sommes ici' (he exclaimed in a voice of thunder), 'nous sommes ici par la volonté du peuple, nous n'en sortirons que par la force des baïonnettes.' He then made the deputies swear not to part till they had given the nation a constitution. Finally he declared the person of a deputy inviolable. (This was carried by 493 against 34 voices.)

Pronounce Coo da-tah' de Ju'ah'n (n slight and nasal).

II. De 18 Fructidor, 4 Sept. 1797. By the Directory. The royalists had made great head in the elections. They had returned 42 new deputies, and had succeeded in getting Pichegru appointed president of the 'Five Hundred,' Barbé Marbois as chief of the Elders, and Barthélemy as the new director. At midnight 12,000 armed men, with 40 pieces of cannon, were stationed round the Tuileries; 52 of the deputies, including Pichegru, Barbé Marbois, and Barthélemy, were arrested and transported to Cayenne; the elections of 48 of the departments were cancelled; and 35 of the journals were suspended.

Coup de Jarnac. A treacherous blow, a stab in the dark. In 1547, in the presence of Henri II. of France, La Châtaigneraie, a favourite of the king's, and Guy Chabot, lord of Jarnac, fought a duel at St. Germain. After a few sword strokes Châtaigneraie fell in a very suspicious manner, being wounded, it was supposed, by some secret emissary of the king, and not by his adversary.

Coupe-tête. Mathieu Jouve Jourdan (1749–1794). So called because he boasted that he had cut off the head of De Launay, governor of the Bastille. He also cut off the heads of two of the body-guards at Versailles (6 Oct., 1789), and stuck them on pikes, reproaching the people because they had allowed him to cut off the heads of only two of the guards.

Pronounce Coop-tāt.

Cour de Poison (Le), 1680. A court of justice to try the poisoners Brinvilliérs, La Voisin, and La Vigoureux.

Court and Country (The), 1620. See 'Country.'

Court Fools. A long list is given in the 'Readers' Handbook,' pp. 344, 345, 346. The following have obtained an historical reputation:—

ARCHIE ARMSTRONG, jester to James I. and Charles I. He died 1646.
BRUSQUET, 'who never had his equal in repartee' (1512-1563).
CHICOT, jester to Henri III. and IV. of France.
COULON, 'prince of mimics.' He died 1858, and was jester to Louis XVIII.
DUFRESNOY, the 'Joe Miller' of France. Jester in the court of Louis XIV.
KLAUS NARR, jester in the court of the Elector Friedrich the Wise of Prussia. His jests have been frequently printed.
SCOGAN, court fool to Edward IV.
TRIBOULET, court jester to Louis XII. and François I. (1487-1536).

Court-leet. The same as 'Court of Frank-pledge' (q.v.).

Court-Martial. A military tribunal for trying military or naval men for offences of discipline: such as mutiny; abandonment of a post, guard, or fortress; desertion, &c. The president of the court should be a field officer, and in no case may be inferior in rank to a captain. It has even the power of life and death but the offender is shot, not hanged.

Court of Arches (The). The supreme court of appeal in the archbishopric of Canterbury, formerly held in St. Mary-le-Bow. In 1567 it was removed to the Common Hall of Doctors' Commons, but since 1867 the sittings have generally been held at Westminster.

The court used to be held in the church of St. Mary-le-Bow (Sancta Maria de Arcûbus), so called because the steeple was raised on pillars built archwise, like bent bows.

Court of Audience (The), or 'Audience Court.' Belonging to each of the archbishops, and having the same authority as the Court of Arches (q.v.), but inferior to it in dignity and antiquity. The Dean of the Arches was the official auditor of the Audience.

Court of Augmentations (The). 27 Hen. VIII., c. 27, A.D. 1536, established for managing the revenues of the lesser monasteries given to the crown.

The annual revenues of the 375 smaller monasteries was 30,000*l.* The wages of an ordinary workman in the reign of Henry VIII. was 3*d.* a day, and of a master workman 4*d.* The wages in 1890 of a labourer is 2*s.* 6*d.*, and of a gardener 3*s.* 6*d.* That is, ten times the price of wages in the reign of Henry VII. So 30,000*l.* would equal 300,000*l.* of money in 1890.

Court of Cassation (The). An ancient French court of appeal, having the power to quash (casser) the judgments of all inferior courts. It was divided into three chambers, called La Chambre des Requêtes, La Chambre de Cassation Civile, and La Chambre de Cassation Criminelle. In 1790 the court was replaced by the 'Tribunal de Cassation,' but in 1804 the old title was restored.

Court of Claims (The). I. A court established in the early part of the reign of Charles II. to decide on the rival claims or titles of estates in Ireland confiscated by Cromwell. It will be remembered that Cromwell confiscated many of the estates of the ancient Irish nobility who had joined the rebellion, and bestowed them on his own adherents. When Charles II. was restored the evicted noblemen applied for the recovery of their estates, and this court was established to settle the rival claims. The restorable Irish were divided into Innocents, Ensignmen (q.v.), and Articlemen (q.v.).

II. A court established in the reign of William III. to investigate the claims and dispose of the lands forfeited in Ireland by the adherents of James II. The chief sufferer by this court was the Earl of Clancarty.

Court of Commissioners of Review (The). To revise the sentence of the court of 'Delegates' (q.v.). Both this court and the High Court of Delegates are abolished.

Court of Conscience. For the recovery of small debts. These courts, of which there were several in London, Westminster, and other trading districts, were superseded by county courts in 1846.

Court of Ecclesiastical Commission (The), 1686. Instituted by the lord chancellor under the advice of Jeffries. It had supreme power to decide dogmatically on all ecclesiastical matters, without restraint of laws, canons, or customs. The commissioners consisted of three divines and three laymen. The archbishop (Sancroft) refused to sanction the commission, and was set aside by Cartwright, bishop of Chester.

The three clerics were the archbishop of Canterbury (Sancroft), the bishop of Durham, and the bishop of Rochester.

The three laymen were the lord chancellor (Jeffries), the lord treasurer, and the chief justice of the King's Bench.

Court of Exchequer (The), 1357. A court of appeal (31 Edw. III. st. 1, c. 12), consisting of a court of revenue and a court of common law. Its equity jurisdiction was, by 5 Vict., c. 5 transferred to the Court of Chancery; and by 19, 20 Vict. the Court of Exchequer was abolished, and its jurisdiction transferred to the Court of Session (q.v.).

A Court of Exchequer was established in Scotland by 6 Anne c. 26.

Court of Faculties (The). Established by 25 Hen. VIII. c. 21, s. 4, transferring to the two archbishops certain fees and prerogatives previously claimed by the pope of Rome. The chief officer is called 'Magister ad facultātēs.' Of late years the court is mainly occupied in granting licence to marry without publication of banns.

By 25 Hen. VIII. this court was given dispensing power in regard to pluralities—eating meat in Lent, pew rights, monumenta, modes of burial, erecting organs in churches, levelling churchyards, removing buried bodies, and so on.

Court of Frank-pledge (The), or 'Court-leet.' A court of record held annually within a hundred, lordship, or manor, which every resident freeholder was bound to attend in order to take an oath of allegiance. It took cognisance of all crimes committed within its jurisdiction. The business is now performed by the quarter sessions and justices of the peace.

Court of High Commission (The), 1559. Established by 1 Eliz. c. 1 for the settlement of ecclesiastical offences. It became most obnoxious in the reign of Charles I., as it assumed unwarrantable proportions, almost all offences of a political tendency being construed as ecclesiastical. Established in Scotland by James I. in 1610. Abolished in 1641 (16 Car. I. c. 11).

Court of Love (The), 12th to 14th cent. A tribunal of ladies established to decide metaphysical questions of gallantry. André le Chapelain has collected the rules of this court in his 'De arte amatoria et reprobatione amoris.'

Court of Peculiars (The). An annex of the Court of Arches (q.v.), having jurisdiction over those parishes which are exempt from the jurisdiction of the Ordinary. Superseded by the Court of Probate.

Court of Pie-powder. 'Curia pedis pulverizati,' so called from the dusty feet of the suitors; is a court of record, incident to every fair and market. The steward of the owner of the market is ex officio judge, and has power to administer justice for all commercial injuries in that fair or market. See Stephen, 'Commentaries,' iii. 321 n (1880).

Pipowders est un Court qui est incident a chescune faire, pour le determination de differences sur contract et touts disorders en ceo commis.—Termes de la Ley, p. 478.

Court of Session (The), 1532. In Scotland, established by James V. of that nation. A central and supreme tribunal of justice. In 1808 the Court of Session was divided into two separate courts called the First and Second Divisions.

Court of Tynwald (A). The Manx court of legislature, consisting of the Council and the House of Keys (q.v.).

The court at Tynwald Hill was formed by King Orry, who gave the Manx their legislative government about the time of the emigration of Rollo to Normandy, and of Ingolf to Iceland, during the reign of Harald Harfager, 872-933.

Court of the Four Boroughs (The). In Scotch history, a high court of appeal, to which Edinburgh, Stirling, Roxburgh, and Berwick sent commissioners. When Berwick fell into the hands of the English, either Lanark or Linlithgow was substituted.

Courts of Requests. Established by Cardinal Wolsey for the recovery of small debts. They were abolished in 1846, when the Small Debts Act was introduced.

There was a Court of Requests of the king in person; but the court was virtually abolished by 16 Car. I. c. 10.

Courte-heuse. Robert, eldest son of William the Conqueror, was so called on account of the shortness of his legs.

Courtenay (Peregrine). The pen-name of W. M. Praed (1802–1839).

Courtenay Riots (The), 1832. One John Nicholls Thom, of Truro, assumed the name of Count Rothschild, of Rose Hill, Herne Bay; and afterwards as Sir William Percy Honeywood Courtenay he laid claim to the old seats of Hales Place and Powderham Castle. He was now called 'King of Jerusalem' and 'Knight of Malta.' Being found to be insane, he was confined for a little time, but in 1838 made his escape, called himself the 'Saviour of the World,' and with a large following, carrying a blue and white flag, surmounted with a rampant lion, proceeded to various farmhouses. At Bossenden three constables attempted to arrest the madman, but one being shot, the other two fled. A hundred and fifty of the 45th regiment were then sent against the rebels, when ten were shot, amongst whom was Courtenay himself.

Cousin (Trusty and well-beloved cousin). So the monarchs of Great Britain address every peer of the degree of earl, in formal instruments such as writs, commissions, and so on. The style of address runs back to the time of Henry IV.; and Blackstone tells us that this king, either by his wife, his mother, or his sisters, was actually related or allied to every earl in the realm, and, being a usurper, never ceased reminding his peers of their connection with the crown in his own person. The custom remains, though the raison d'être has long since ceased ('Commentaries,' i. 398).

Cousinhood (The). The Grenville family, in the reign of George II., was so called from its 'many flourishing branches,' which have furnished in 150 years 3 first lords of the treasury, 3 secretaries of state, 2 keepers of the privy seal, and 4 lords of the admiralty, all sons or grandsons of the first Countess Temple.

In Pitt's administration, 1756, there were, four of the Grenville family. Pitt was first lord; his brother-in-law (Lord Temple) was first lord of the admiralty; his next brother, George Grenville, was treasurer of the navy; the third brother, James Grenville, was at the Treasury Board. Horace Walpole sarcastically remarked, 'Tis a pity that Pitt has not Grenville cousins enough to fill the whole administration.'

Covenant (The), 1643. An agreement between the English and Scotch parliamentarians, to do all in their power to bring the churches of the three kingdoms into a uniformity of faith, church government, and form of worship; to extirpate popery, prelacy, schism, and profaneness; to preserve intact the rights and privileges of the parliament, and the liberties of the kingdom; to punish malignants; to unite England and Scotland in lasting union; and to lead, both in private and public, lives consistent with a God-fearing and God-loving people. See 'National Covenant,' 'Solemn League and Covenant,' &c.

The first 'Covenant' was subscribed 3 Dec., 1557, pledging the subscribers to 'maintain and set forward the Word of God.' Another was subscribed in 1580, abjuring the tenets of the Church of Rome. The Covenant of 1638 was provoked by Archbishop Laud. See 'National Covenant.'

Covenanters, 1557. Scotch reformers, who subscribed to the Solemn League and Covenant (q.v.), or to the National Covenant (q.v.). It was first introduced in the reign of James V. In 1581 the General Assembly of Scotland drew up a Confession of Faith, and this covenant was signed by James VI. of Scotland and I. of England. In 1590 and 1596 it was again subscribed to. In 1638 it was renewed, and the Covenanters bound themselves by oath to preserve religion in the same state in which it existed in 1580. Strictly speaking, the Covenanters date from the time of this oath (1638), but the 'congregation' (q.v.) are sometimes called covenanters, because they bound themselves to the Solemn League and Covenant.

In the spring of 1562 Elizabeth became engaged to support the Huguenots against their government, as she had supported the Covenanters of Scotland.—Howitt, Hist. of Eng., vol. ii. p. 418.

Coventry Act (The), 22, 23 Car. II. c. 1, making cutting and maiming a capital offence. So called from the ill usage of Sir John Coventry by some of the life-guardsmen, in revenge of something he said in parliament respecting the king's theatrical amours.

The tale is that Sir John Coventry, Oct. 1670, rose in his place in parliament, and asked a question which was considered to be a reflection on the king's amours. Charles was furious, and Sir John was attacked one night in the streets, when his nose being cut to the bone, he ever after wore a patch. It became a common jest for courtiers to put a patch on their nose, and strut about in mimicry of Sir John, in order to divert the king.

I will have his nose slit as wide as Coventry's.—Sir W. SCOTT, Peveril of the Peak, chap. 37.

Coverdale's Bible, 1535. This translation of the Bible by Miles Coverdale, afterwards Bishop of Exeter, was dedicated to Henry VIII., and was the first English Bible sanctioned by royal authority. See 'Bibles.'

Coxians and Knoxians, 1556. The followers of Dr. Coxe, dean of Christ Church (Oxford), and John Knox, who left England during the reign of Mary, and retired to the Continent. Dr. Coxe insisted on the use of the English Liturgy and made a point of repeating the responses aloud; but Dr. Knox (backed by Calvin) objected to the Common Prayer-book, and insisted on the use of the Genevan service. The altercation became so noisy that the magistrates had to interfere. Coxe retired to Strasburg, and settled there; Knox retired to Geneva.

C. P. pricked against a sailor's name in the muster-roll of a man-of-war stood for 'civil power,' meaning that the man had been sentenced by the civil power to serve in the fleet. It was equivalent to rogue or vagabond. Such men were nicknamed 'Newgate birds,' i.e. they had flown out of prison aboard ship.

Cracovia. Avoir ses lettres de Cracovie, to be recognised and proclaimed a liar. The Hôtel de Cracovie is in 'Moncorbeau,' in the département de Lot-et-Garonne. The master, who is a café-tier, 'délivre, moyennant quelques sous, des brevets de hâbleurs, que les mauvais plaisants envoient, par la voie de la poste, aux menteurs de leur connaissance.'

PATENT OF MEMBERSHIP.—Nous ayant fait savoir que depuis longtemps vous vous êtes exercé dans le noble art de maltraiter toute sorte de vérités, à amplifier les récits, en augmentant et diminuant aux faits qui arrivent en ce monde terrestre, et que par des succès heureux, fruit d'une imagination féconde et brillante, vous êtes parvenu à inventer des vérités qui n'ont jamais existé, à créer des histoires qui, sans vous, auraient resté éternellement dans l'oubli. . . . Nous, toujours zélés à maintenir et accroître la haute réputation de notre ordre . . . avons jugé à propos de vous incorporer dans notre diète, et vous recevoir en frère bien-aimé. . . . Fait et passé dans notre diète générale.—Signed by the secretary.

Cracovia. L'arbre de Cracovie. A tree in the garden of the Palais Royal was so called 'à cause des menteries débitées sous son ombrage, ou parce que les nouvellistes se réunissaient là pendant les troubles de Pologne' (Quitard, Dictionnaire des Proverbes Français, p. 273).

Je donne sept-mille livres . . . . au baron de Kniran, à condition qu'il se rendra, tous les lundis et vendredis . . . . au Palais Royal, sous l'arbre de Cracovie, et que là il lira des nouvelles supposées à cette multitude de faux politiques et de vrais découvrés, qui gobent tout ce qu'on leur dit. —Le Livre des Quatre Couleurs, p. 109.

Craft-gilds. Clubs of tradesmen in contradistinction to merchant-gilds. These gilds were all-powerful with apprentices, who were required to carry their work to the craft-box to be inspected by the committee of masters, bad work being punished by fines. Any workman who proved refractory might be expelled, in which case he was not allowed to exercise any trade within the limits of the gild. Our 'Livery Companies' are relics of the craft-gilds.

Edward III. was a member of the Armourers' craft-gild.

Craftsman (The), 1724. A very celebrated journal planned and established in the reign of George I. by 'the Patriots,' in opposition to the ministry of Walpole. Bolingbroke and Pulteney were the chief organisers of this paper.

Crane's Charity. For the relief of sick scholars. To pay nurses, medicine, medical attendance, and give money grants to sick scholars in the University of Cambridge, or one of the following grammar-schools, that of Wisbeach, Cambridge, Lynn, and Ipswich. The proceeds of the gift received in order by the five aforestated institutions. Founded by John Crane in 1654.

Cranmer's Bible, 1539. This was Coverdale's Bible (q.v.), examined and corrected by Archbishop Cranmer, who also wrote the preface. It was printed by Grafton in 1540, and every parish was obliged by royal proclamation to have a copy in the parish church under a penalty of 40*s.* a month. See 'Bibles.'

Cranmer's Catechism was not composed by Cranmer, but only adopted by him. It was originally written in German for the youth of Nürnburg; was translated into Latin by Justus Jonas, the friend of Luther; was brought to England in 1548, and translated by Rowland Taylor, one of Cranmer's chaplains. It insists on Three Sacraments—baptism, absolution, and the eucharist—and states that those who have heathen parents and die without baptism are 'damned eternally.' Our Church Catechism is quite another thing, probably the work of Nowell or else of Poinet.

It was not originally written in question and answer. It contained a third sacrament, called the 'Sacrament of Reconciliation.'

Crannoges (2 syl.), or 'Crannogs.' Fortified islands in the Irish or Scotch lakes, in common use as dwelling-places among the ancient Celtic inhabitants. Herodotos (v. 16) speaks of the lake-dwellings of Lake Prasias. A crannoge was generally approached by a boat. In the Irish annals frequent mention is made of these lake-dwellings between the 9th and 17th cent. That at Lough Lynch, in Antrim, was the birthplace of Colkitto; and that of Roughan Lake was the last retreat of Sir Phelim O'Neil in 1641. In 1853–4 similar dwellings were found in Lake Zürich (Switzerland), in Lake Constance, and at Morges, on the Lake of Geneva; and since 1857 lake dwellings have been discovered in Savoy, Hanover, Denmark, Borneo, New Guinea, Burmah, and Siam.

Craven Fund. For researches in the languages, literature, history, archæology, and arts of ancient Greece and Rome, or for the comparative philology of the Indo-European languages. Value 40*l.* a year. Left to the University of Cambridge by John lord Craven, and founded in 1886.

Craven Scholarships. For classics. I. Two for undergraduates in the University of Cambridge. Present value 50*l.* a year, tenable for seven years. Founded by John lord Craven. See 'Regius Prof. of Greek.'

In 1861 new rules were made for these scholarships.

II. Six in the University of Oxford of the value of 80*l.*, and tenable for three years. Founded by Lord Craven in 1647.

Craven Studentship. Philology. Value 200*l.* for one year, but the holder eligible for re-election. The funds for this studentship were left by John lord Craven, but it was not founded till 1886. Cambridge University.

Subjects: Languages, literature, history, archæology, and arts of ancient Greece and Rome, or else the comparative philology of the Indo-European languages.

Crazy Jane. Joanna la Loca, daughter and heiress of Isabella of Spain. She was born to vast dominions, but was imbecile, and spent her time in watching the coffin of her husband Philip, who she believed would come to life again (1479–1555).

Crazy Poet (The). Nathaniel Lee, the dramatic poet, who was confined four years in Bedlam (1657–1690).

Cream-coloured Parasite (The), 1770. Bradshaw, one of Bute's agents with the king (George III.).

Credenza di Sant' Ambrogio, 1198. The House of Commons in the Milanese republic.

S. Ambrogio, i.e. St. Ambrose, patron saint of Milan.

Crédit Foncier, 1852. A French method of borrowing money on real property. Its peculiarity is that the repayment of the loan is by an annuity terminable at a certain date—the date and annuity being so calculated that when the last payment is made, the loan and interest are both extinguished.

In England, loans advanced from the Queen Anne's bounty are of a similar character. A clergyman borrows a sum of money on the security of his 'living,' and either he or his successor pays annually a sum of money equal to the interest and part of the principal, so that in twenty years both are extinguished.

Creed of Pope Pius IV. (The). In Latin, 'Professio Fidēi Tridentīna,' A.D. 1564: (1) the seven sacraments; (2) the Trent doctrine of justification and original sin; (3) the propitiatory sacrifice of the mass; (4) transubstantiation; (5) communion in one kind only; (6) purgatory; (7) invocation of saints; (8) veneration of relics; (9) image worship; (10) the Roman Church is the mother of all Christian churches; (11) obedience to the pope is obligatory; (12) the decrees of all synods, Trent included, must be accepted. This oath is to be taken by all priests and all members of a monastic order. 'Hanc veram catholicam Fidem, extra quam nemo salvus esse potest, voveo, spondeo, et juro.' See 'Confession' and 'Symbol.'

Crem'era (The). A river which flows into the Tiber below Veii. It was here that the Fabian clan marked out their place of abode when they quitted Rome.

Creole State (The). Louisiana. The original settlers were French and Spanish.

Crescent and the Cross (The). Mahometanism and Christianity. The Saracenic symbol is a crescent; the Christian symbol is the cross.

The battle of Tours was to decide whether or not the Cross was to sink under the Crescent.—Chroniques de St. Denys, book v. 26.

Crescent as a Turkish Symbol (The). The Sultan Othman (1259–1326), founder of the Othman or Ottoman dynasty, saw in a vision a crescent moon which went on increasing till it reached from furthest east to furthest west. This led him to adopt the symbol which had been in use by the Janissaries at least half a century previously, and he took for his motto 'Donec totum compleat orbem.'

Philip, father of Alexander, meeting with great difficulties in the siege of Byzantium, set workmen to undermine the walls; but a crescent moon discovered the design, which miscarried. Consequently, the Byzantes erected a statue to Diana, and the crescent became the symbol of the state. This legend reminds us of the Thistle of Scotland.

Crespi (Treaty of), 17 Sept., 1544. Between Karl V. and François I., binding the two sovereigns to unite for the defence of Christendom against the Turks, and to unite their families by the marriage of the second son of François with a daughter of Karl.

Henry VIII. was allied with Karl in an invasion of France, but while Henry was besieging Boulogne François broke up the alliance by a separate treaty.

Crests of the Kings of England (The).

Richard I., a lion, assumed in the crusade. The same was borne by Edward III., Henry VII., Edward VI., James I., and has since been recognised as the crest of the royal family of England.

Edward III. sometimes bore a white raven crowned.

Alexander the Great assumed a ram's head under pretence of being sprung from Jupiter Ammon.

Julius Cæsar adorned his helmet with a star to denote his descent from Venus.

Crime'an War (The), 1853–1856. In 1852 Napoleon III. demanded that the protectorate of the Holy Places in Turkey should be restored to the Latin Church, according to the treaty of 1740, called 'The Charter of the Latins.' The Greek Church, supported by Russia, had gradually ousted the Latin Church; and Turkey, wholly indifferent to the religious question, but fearing to offend either France or Russia, swayed backwards and forwards according to the pressure made to bear upon her. Threatened by Russia, the sultan at last declared war in Oct. 1853, and, being supported by England and France, hostilities were carried on till 1855, when Russia sued for peace, and a treaty of peace was signed by all the belligerents 30 March, 1856. The secret object of Napoleon III. was to divert the attention of the French from home politics.

Criminal Law Amendment Act (The), 1871. Provides 'that no person shall be liable to punishment for doing any act on the ground that it tends to cripple or restrain the free course of trade.'

Crimson and White. In the Valois-Angoulême dynasty, the Catholic soldiers wore crimson jackets and scarfs; but the soldiers of the Protestant faction wore white jackets and scarfs. The Swiss guard wore a grey livery.

Crofters. Descendants of the Highland clansmen dwelling in the Western Isles, and the counties of Ross, Argyll, Sutherland, Inverness, and the islands of Orkney and Shetland. They occupy small farms or crofts. In 1745 the chiefs claimed the ownership of the lands, and during the present century have made large clearances for sheep-walks.

Crofters' Act (The), 1886. Provides (1) security of tenure for the crofters; (2) fixed reasonable rents; (3) compensation for improvements; (4) enlargement of holdings; and (5) bequest of holdings.

By this Act a crofter is a yearly tenant of a holding not rented at more than 30*l.* a year.

Cromnyo-mantia. A kind of divination with onions laid on the altar on Christmas Eve. See Burton, 'Anatomy of Melancholy,' vol. ii. p. 341.

Cromwell Grandison. So Lafayette was called by Mirabeau. The Grandison referred to was Sir Charles Grandison, the hero of a novel by Samuel Richardson, so faultless a gentleman that Sir W. Scott wrote of him as 'the faultless monster that the world ne'er saw.' Lafayette was as dogmatic and dictatorial as Cromwell, and assumed all the French suavity and finesse of a Sir Charles.

Cromwell of France (The). François Maximilien Joseph Isidore Robespierre (1759–1794). Both were main instruments in bringing their respective kings to the block, and both after the death of their king rose to supreme power; but in other respects there was very little resemblance between them.

'Vallien was one of the first to denounce him [Robespierre] from the tribunal; and the whole assembly shouted, 'Down with the tyrant! Down with the Cromwell!'—PRINCE, Parallel History, vol. iii. p. 98.

Cromwell of the Jews (The). Judas Maccabæus, died B.C. 160.

Cromwell's Mad Chaplain. Hugh Peters (1599–1660). His favourite text was Psalm cxlix. 6–9, 'To bind their kings with chains, and their nobles with fetters of iron.'

Cromwell's Trench. A woody dell about half-a-mile from Lathom, in Lancashire. So called because the parliamentary army made their camp there when they besieged the Countess of Derby in her castle.

'Cromwell's Stones' are two circular holes in a large stone which evidently once contained nodules of iron. It is said that the parliamentary besiegers used these holes as moulds for casting balls during the siege.

Cromwellians. The partisans of Oliver Cromwell (1599, 1653–1658).

Cronbane Halfpenny, 1789. A token of the Associated Irish Mine Company, payable at Cronbane Lodge, Wicklow. It had on one side the head of a mitred bishop (perhaps meant for St. Patrick), with the legend CRONBANE HALFPENNY.

Croppies (The). So the Irish insurgents were called in derision, when, in 1796–97, soldiers and yeomanry marched over the country to put down the various societies which kept the island in continual terror. They were so called because of their short-cut hair. In 1798 Ireland was in revolt. Some 15,000 'rebels' mustered on Vinegar Hill, near Enniscorthy; the camp was stormed by English troops under General Lake, and the revolt stamped out. See 'Irish Associations.'

Croppers, 1812. The tag-rag of 'General Lud,' who went about destroying the new frames for the finish of woollen goods. These Croppers were the men hitherto employed to finish the woollen goods; and the new frames, which did the work better, faster, and cheaper, threw them out of employ. The chief ringleader was a man named Mellor. These riots broke out from time to time for four or five years.

Croquants (Les). Peasants of Guyenne, who revolted in the reign of Henri IV. and in that of his son Louis XIII. They were reduced to submission in 1595, and again in 1636, by the Duc d'Epernon.

It is said they were so called from the town Crocq (Creuse). The word is used as a verb: 'Les gens de guerre qui de toutes parts croquaient le peuple.'—BORDIER and CHARTON, Histoire de France, vol. ii. p. 107, col. 2.

(1) ✚ Greek cross. The basis of all others. Two straight lines bisecting each other at right angles. St. George's cross, red on white.

(2) ✠ Cross moline. A Greek cross with the ends turned round both ways.

(3) ✙ Cross fleury. A Greek cross with a fleur-de-lis on each end.

(4) Cross potent. A Greek cross with each end crutched. The Pectoral cross.

(5) Cross patonée. A Greek cross with three points at each extremity. The cross pendant or Altar cross.

(6) Cross crosslet. A Greek cross with a cross at each extremity.

(7) Maltese cross. A Greek cross narrowing towards the centre, with two points at each extremity. The Teutonic knights wore a black Maltese cross.

(8) Cross pattée. A Maltese cross without the points at the extremities. The Spire cross.

(9) Agnus Dei. A Spire cross on the top of a blunt spear. The cross of the Resurrection. The cross of Victory.

(10) X St. Andrew's. The capital letter X. White on blue. St. Patrick's cross, red on white. Crux decussāta. The Reliquary cross. In heraldry called a Saltire. Croix de Bourgogne.

(11) T Tau cross. A Greek letter T. St. Anthony's cross. An Egyptian cross. The Marking cross, or Crux Ansāta.

(12) Latin cross. A Greek cross with the stem lengthened. Crux immissa. Cross of the Passion. The Triumphal cross. When placed on the chancel screen and made large, it is called the Rood or the Holy Rood.

(13) Cardinal's cross, carried before a cardinal. A double Greek cross. A Lorraine cross. The Patriarch's cross in the Greek Church.

(14) Pope's cross, carried before the pope. A triple Greek cross.

(15) The Lambeaux. A Maltese cross on a Latin stem, set on a lambel with three pendants.

(16) Constantine's cross. A cross with a Greek P [R] = Chr, i.e. Chr[istos].

(17) A cross crosslet with the lower stem pointed, technically called fitchée.

(18) The Austral or Southern cross. A constellation consisting of four bright stars disposed in a cruciform fashion, the upper and lower stars pointing to the south pole.

Cross (The sign of the). This is made by carrying the right hand to the forehead, the stomach, the left shoulder, and the right shoulder, thus forming the four points of a Latin cross. It is said that this was a secret sign practised by Christians for mutual recognition, and that it may be traced back to the 2nd cent.

Cross of Christ (The). The Empress Helēna, mother of Constantine, is supposed to have found the cross hidden in a cave, near the Temple of Venus, at Jerusalem. We are told that she cut it up into three unequal pieces, one of which she enshrined in a silver casket, and gave it to Macarius, patriarch of Jerusalem; another part she sent to Constantinople, and the rest she sent to Rome, where it was deposited in the church of the Holy Cross. This part is now enclosed in one of the four pillars which support the dome of St. Peter's Church. The part sent to Constantinople was given by Baldwin II. (king of Jerusalem) to St. Louis [IX.] of France, and it is kept in Notre-Dame de Paris. The part sent to Jerusalem was, in 636, subdivided into nineteen pieces, four of which were kept at Jerusalem, and the rest were sent, three to Antioch, three to Constantinople, two to Cyprus, two to Georgia, and one to each of the five following places: Alexandria, Ascalon, Crete, Damascus, and Edessa. See 'Crucifixion,' Relics of the.

Macarius was the person who suggested to Helēna that the true cross of the three discovered should be tested by touching with the crosses a woman ready to die. The two crosses of the two thieves produced no effect, but the moment she felt the touch of the true cross she leaped up, restored to perfect health. As Helena was eighty years old at the time, one is rather surprised that she parted with so valuable a treasure.

Calvin says that 'fifty men could not carry the wood of what is called the true cross.' Luther thinks there was wood enough 'to build an immense house.' Cyril of Jerusalem tells us the wood was multiplied 'like the loaves and fishes when Jesus fed the multitude in the desert'.

and St. Paulinus tells us that, although chips were cut from it daily, 'yet the wood never suffered diminution.'

By a diligent search I find the following places are said to possess parts of the cross:—Aix-la-Chapelle, Amiens, Angers, Arles, Arras, Autun, Avignon, Baugé, Bernay, Besançon, Bologna, Bonifacio, Bordeaux, Bourbon-Larchambault, Bourges, Brussels, Chalinargues, Châlons, Chamirey, Châtillon, Cheffes in Anjou, Chelles, Compiègne, Conques, Cortona, Courtray, Denmark, Dijon, Donawert, England, Faphine, Fiume, Florence, Gand, Geneva, Grammont, Jaucourt, Jerusalem, Langres, Laon, Libourne, Lille, Limbourg, Longpont, Lorris, Lyons, Mâcon, Maestricht, Marseilles, Milan, Mount Athos, Montepulciano, Naples, Nevers, Norway, Nuremberg, Padua, Paris, Pisa, Poitiers, Pontigny, Ragusa, Rielles-Eaux, Rome, Royaumont, St. Dié, St. Florent, St. Quentin, St. Sepulchre, Sens, Siena, Tournay, Trèves, Troyes, Turin, Valcourt, Vamback, Venice, Venloo. These I have traced, but doubtless there are several others.

Mount Athos has 878,360 cubic millimètres of the cross; Rome has 687,587; Brussels 516,090; Venice 445,582; Ghent 436,450; and Paris 287,731.

Cross of Shame (The). The 'Fiery Cross' (q.v.) was so called, because disobedience to its summons was deemed infamy.

Crosses on Tombs.

Seven crosses designate the tomb of a bishop, who alone can administer all the seven sacraments.

Five crosses designate the tomb of a priest, who can administer five out of the seven sacraments.

One cross marks the tomb of an ordinary Christian, to indicate his faith in the cross as his one hope of salvation.

Crosse Scholarships. For Theology. Three in the University of Cambridge for Bachelors of Arts; value 20*l.* a year each, and tenable for three years. Founded by the Rev. John Crosse, vicar of Bradford, Yorkshire, 1832. See 'Regius Professor of Divinity.'

Crossing the Line. The first authentic account of the ordeal observed on board ship dates 1702. One sailor represents Neptune and another his wife Amphitrite; another his barber, and the rest his suite. All dress in the most grotesque raiments they can obtain. A tarred topsail is formed into a bath, and a throne is provided for Neptune and his wife. Those midshipmen who have never crossed the line are then brought forth, while the men pour over them buckets of water, or play the fire hose into their faces. Their faces being tarred are scraped by the barber, and the victims are then soused into the bath provided. Here they are left to struggle out and make their escape as they best can. This horse-play is now almost entirely, and in most cases wholly, abolished.

Crossman's Catechism. This is Robert Nelson's 'Whole Duty of a Christian,' edited and abridged by Crossman. Nelson lived 1656–1715, and was a non-juror, but the intimate friend of Tillotson.

Crouchback. Edmund Plantagenet, 2nd son of Henry III., and first earl of Lancaster. Next brother to Edward I. (1241–1296).

Crown (The). It was Walter Walker, grocer, at the sign of the Crown, who said he would make his son heir of the crown. When Edward IV. was told of this merry jest, he ordered Walker to be arrested and put to death for treason (1461).

Crown. A crown is the circlet of gold, &c., ornamented, placed over the cap represented in England by a border of ermine and a silk or velvet loose cap. The crown of the sovereign and Prince of Wales has a jewelled diadem of gold arched over the cap, surmounted with a ball and cross pattée. Cap velvet, turned up with ermine.

The sovereign's crown has two diadems crossed at right angles. The crown of the Prince of Wales has only one diadem. The coronet has a fleur-de-lis, and 4 crosses pattée, alternately. A cross pattée stands in full-front midway between the spring of the diadem.

The robe of state of the Prince of Wales is of purple velvet, lined with ermine, and trimmed with a deep ermine cape reaching to the elbows. Its speciality is five rows of ermine tails.

Baron's crown. A velvet cap with ermine border similar to that of other peers, but the coronet differs from that of a viscount by having only 8 round pearls on the upper rim instead of 14. In France 'une torsade en perles.'

His robe of state is similar to that of a viscount, but the cape has only 2 rows of black spots. A prince has 5 rows, a duke 4 rows, a marquis half 4 and half 3, an earl 3, a viscount half 3 and half 2, a baron 2.

A prince's coronet bears on the upper rim 4 fleurs-de-lis and 4 crosses pattée, a duke's 8 strawberry leaves, a marquis's 4 strawberry leaves alternating with 4 golden balls, an earl's 4 points surmounted with balls alternating with 4 strawberry leaves, a viscount's with 14 golden balls, a baron's with 8 golden balls.

Duke's crown consists of a velvet cap with a border of ermine, and the coronet over it is a circle of gold with jewels, the upper rim being set with 8 gold strawberry leaves. In France the leaves were 'fleurs de persil.'

His state robe is a crimson velvet mantle lined with white taffeta (not ermine), but the cape is ermine, reaching to the elbows, having 4 (instead of 5) rows of ermine tails.

His parliamentary robe is scarlet cloth, lined with white taffeta, and the ermine cape.

Earl's crown. A velvet cap with a border of ermine, with a circlet of gold enriched with jewels, from the upper rim of which rise 8 points, each surmounted with a round pearl, towering somewhat above the cap, and between these points 8 small gold strawberry leaves. In France the leaves were omitted.

His robe of state is crimson velvet, like that of a duke, but the cape has only 3 rows of black spots instead of 4.

Marquis's crown. A velvet cap with a border of ermine, and a coronet of gold jewelled like that of a duke, but with this difference, instead of eight strawberry leaves on the upper rim, the rim is surmounted with 4 strawberry leaves and 4 round pearls. In France they were parsley leaves.

His state robe is a crimson velvet mantle, and the cape has 4 rows of black spots on the right shoulder, and only 3 rows on the left.

Prince's crown (except the Prince of Wales). A velvet cap turned up with ermine and surmounted with a gold ball. The gold and jewelled circlet has 4 crosses pattée and 4 fleur-de-lis alternately, but there is no diadem, nor ball and cross.

The princesses' crown is like that of the princes'.

The nephews and nieces have strawberry leaves in the place of fleurs-de-lis and crosses pattée.

Viscount's crown. The cap is the same as that of a duke, marquis, or earl; but the gold and jewelled coronet has 14 round pearls on the upper rim, quite close together. In France the pearls were arranged in sets of three.

His state robe is the same as that of an earl, with this difference, instead of 3 complete rows of black spots, there are 3 rows on the right shoulder and only 2 on the left. See 'Marquis,' above.

Crown (A). In the Catholic Church is the subjective recognition of superior Christian merit: as the crown of virginity, the crown of humility, the crown of learning, the crown of martyrdom, &c. St. Peter of Ravenna received the 'triple crown of virginity, doctorate, and martyrdom.' St. Angelus, in 1225, received 'the triple crown of virginity, preaching, and martyrdom.' St. Cecilia received the double crown of virginity and martyrdom.

Crown (The English). It is said that Alfred, in 872, was the first English sovereign to wear a symbol of regal authority.

In 929 Athelstan wore a coronet not unlike that of our earls.

William the Conqueror added a coronet with points to his ducal cap.

In 1483 Richard III. introduced the crosses, and Henry VII. the arches in 1485.

The oldest crown now existing in England is that of Charles II., 1660.

The present crown was made in 1838, the jewels being taken from old crowns broken up. It contains a large ruby and a large sapphire.

The smaller stones are 1,363 brilliants, 1,273 rose diamonds, 273 pearls, 147 table diamonds, 16 sapphires, 11 emeralds, 4 rubies, and 4 drop pearls.

In 1386 Richard II. pawned his crown and regalia for a loan of 2,000*l*.

Crown (The Papal). In 593 Pope Hormisdas wore a cap of state.

In 1053 Pope Damasus II. followed the same example.

Hildebrand (1073–1083) wore a royal crown, with the legend, Corona regni de manu Dei.

In 1160 the papal cap was encircled with a crown.

Boniface VIII. (1294–1303) added a second crown, with this legend, Diadema imperii de manu Petri.

It is very doubtful who introduced the third crown. Some say it was John XXII. (1316–1334), some say it was Benedict XII. (1334–1342), and some ascribe it to Urban V. (1362–1370). It indicates supremacy in temporal power, in spiritual power, and in ecclesiastical power, in Europe, Asia, and Africa.

Crown and Anchor Association (The), 1795. For the 'protection of liberty and property from republicans and levellers.' The chairman was Mr. Reeves, M.P.

Crown and Government Securities Bill (The), 1848. To facilitate prosecutions for political offences. The bill was especially directed against the war party of Ireland urged on by Mr. Mitchel, M.P., editor of the 'United Irishman' (q.v.).

Crown Oration (The), B.C. 330. Soon after the battle of Chæronēa, Ctesiphon proposed that Demosthenēs should be presented with a golden crown in the theatre, during the great Dionysiac festival, for his services to Athens. Æschinēs indicted Ctesiphon for this proposal, and Demosthenēs spoke in his defence. The oration of Æschinēs is called the 'oration against Ctesiphon'; that of Demosthenēs is called his oration 'on the Crown,' or his 'Crown oration.' Æschinēs failed to secure a fifth part of the votes, and quitted Athens to live in Rhodes.

Crown of Thorns (The). Placed on the head of Jesus; was not found in the cave with the cross, and there is no record extant of its discovery. In the thirteenth century Baldwin II., king of Jerusalem, gave it to St. Louis [IX.] of France, who built in Paris a holy chapel for its depository. It is devoid of thorns now, for they have been given away to a vast number of churches, and parts have been set in rings. I myself have seen and handled one of these rings. This relic and fragments of the Cross are borne in procession by twelve canons at 8 o'clock every Good Friday night through Notre Dame de Paris. At least this was the case when I lived in Paris. See 'Crucifixion,' Relics of the.

In the Hôtel de Cluny, Paris, is a ring said to contain a small part of one of the thorns.

Crowns. The kaiser-kings of Germany received three crowns. I. The silver crown, as king of Germany. II. The iron crown of Lombardy, as king of Italy; and III. The imperial crown as kaiser of the Holy Roman Empire. The first he received at Aix-la-Chapelle, the second at Monza, and the third at Rome; but Karl V. (Charles-quint) was the last kaiser-king who received the imperial crown at the pope's hands.

The imperial crown was a small mitre, cleft in the front instead of at the sides.

Crown of St. Stephen (The). The crown of Hungary. Stephen I. (979, 997–1038), called 'the Apostle of Hungary,' received a crown from Pope Sylvester II., with which the emperor of Austria is still crowned as 'king of Hungary.' See 'Corona.'

If Hungarian independence should be secured through the help of Prince Napoleon, the prince himself should accept the crown of St. Stephen.—KOSSUTH, Memoirs of my Exile (1880).

Crusades, from 11th to 13th cent. Expeditions to recover Palestine from the Moslems. So called because the soldiers wore a cross on the shoulder or breast as a badge of their religious faith.

1st, in 1096–1099; decreed by Urban II. It ended in the capture of Jerusalem by the crusaders.

2nd, in 1147–1149; led by Louis VII. and Konrad III. Its object was the relief of Christians oppressed by the Moslems. It was a complete failure. The Christians had to surrender Jerusalem.

3rd, in 1189–1192. This crusade was the most heroic. Frederick Barbarossa of Germany, Philippe Augustus of France, and Richard Cœur de Lion of England were among the crusaders, while the renowned Saladin was on the other side. It was brought to an untimely close, on Saladin's agreeing to allow pilgrims free access to the Holy Sepulchre.

4th, in 1198–1204. Constantinople was taken.

5th in 1216–1221. The sultan recovered Damietta.

6th, in 1215–1229. Kaiser Friederich II. proclaimed King of Jerusalem; but in 1244 Jerusalem was retaken by the Turks.

7th, in 1248–1253. A truce of ten years concluded. (Led by St. Louis of France.)

8th, in 1270–1272. Nazareth taken, truce of ten years concluded. (Led by St. Louis, who died at Tunis, on his way, 25 August, 1270.)

Crusca (Accademia della), 1582. The famous Florentine Academy, instituted to enrich the literature and improve the language of Tuscany. So named because it discarded as bran all words not purely Tuscan. The great Italian dictionary was produced by this Academy, 1612. See 'Della Crusca.'

Crusoe's Island. Juan Fernandez is so called by sailors, from a persuasion that it was the island of Defoe's famous story.

Crusty Christopher. So Tennyson called Professor Wilson, who noticed the works of the young poet in 'Blackwood's Magazine' with praise not unmixed with censure, 1830.

Crystal Palace (The), 1851. A large building almost entirely of iron and glass constructed in Hyde Park, London, as an exhibition room for all nations in the world. It was 1,848 feet long, 408 feet wide, and 66 feet high, crossed by a transept 108 feet high and 408 feet long, enclosing several noble elms. It was nearly four times the length of St. Paul's and twice the width. It contained 34 miles of gutter to carry off the rain, 900,000 feet of glass, and covered over 18 acres of ground. The designer was Mr. Joseph Paxton, and the contractors were Messrs. Fox and Henderson; their contract being 79,800*l.* and the material, or 150,000*l.* without it. The actual cost was 176,030*l.* It was begun 26 Sept., 1850, and opened 1 May, 1851. It realised a profit of 150,000*l.* in 144 days.

Cuckoo Ale. Ale drunk the first day one hears the cuckoo. In Shropshire it was at one time customary for the labouring classes, as soon as the cuckoo was heard by them for the first time in the year, to leave off work, and spend the rest of the day in merry-making, a main part of which was drinking cuckoo ale. This was drunk out of doors to welcome the cuckoo.

Cuckoo Day, 14 April. The birthday of the Princess Beatrice. The tradition is that the old woman let the cuckoo out of her bag at Heathfield Fair.

Cuentas del Gran Capitan. A ridiculous pretence of an account of money spent. Gonsalvo, the great captain, was accused by Ferdinand of misappropriating the public money, and was commanded to produce his accounts. Gonsalvo read aloud: 'Item the first, 200,763 ducats and 9 reals to friars, nuns, and mendicants, to offer up prayers for the success of his majesty's arms. Item the second, 700,494 ducats and 10 reals to spies.' Here Ferdinand, who had never sent Gonsalvo money enough to pay the soldiers, seeing the jest, and fully ashamed of the accusation, interrupted the captain by a burst of laughter which was echoed by the whole court.

Cuirassiers. Heavy horsemen wearing, in the time of Queen Mary, body-armour over their buff coats. They carried sword and pistol. Napoleon had twelve regiments of cuirassiers. The Russian cuirassiers are armed with lances. In England, at the present day, the Life Guards and Horse Guards wear cuirasses.
Pronounce Kŵi-ras-seeah.

Culdees. Secular clergy attached to cathedrals and performing the office of dean and chapter to the episcopate. They were pretty numerous, and made their first appearance in the 9th cent. Nothing is heard of them after the 14th cent. The word seems to be Irish, and to mean 'Attendants of God' (ceile De).

Cum Occasione (The Bulls), 1653. By which Innocent X. condemned the five famous propositions of Jansen. In 1665, Alexander VII. prescribed a formula for the condemnation of Jansen and the Jansenists, which all ecclesiastics were required to sign.

Cumean Sibyl. Amalthæa offered 9 vols. of prophecies on the future of Rome to Tarquinius Superbus, who refused to purchase them. Having destroyed three of them, she returned the following year, asking the same price for the remaining six. Tarquin again refused to purchase them; whereupon Amalthæa destroyed three more, and demanded the original price for the three left. The books were bought, placed in a coffer, and stowed away in the crypt of the capitol under the charge of two patricians. The custodians were afterwards increased to ten, and then to fifteen. In the reign of Honorius they were burnt by Stilico, his master of the horse. (Varro, 'Antiquities,' vol. ii.)

It is rather remarkable that Tarquinius Superbus died at Cumæ, the home of the famous sibyl.

Cup or Chalice (The) used by our Lord at the Last Supper has been preserved, according to tradition; but there are two cups which profess to be the genuine one. Some affirm that it is the silver chalice at Valencia, in Spain; but others insist that it is the green glass cup at Genoa, which was taken to Paris in 1816, and broken in the transit. This cup has two handles and is of hexagonal form. Its diameter a-top is 326 millimètres, and it will hold three litres of liquor. See 'Crucifixion,' Relics of the.

The 'Sacro Catino' is sometimes identified with the 'Holy Graal' of the romances of the middle ages; but many consider the Holy Graal to be the paten and not the cup. In Arthurian romance it seems to be a golden vessel, not silver or glass, and suits the idea of a paten with the consecrated bread far better than that of a chalice. Thus we read (part iii. chap. 3, 4, 85, 102), 'immediately the bread had been distributed the graal vanished.'

Cupid's Gardens. A corruption of Cuper's Gardens. Public gardens laid out by Boydell Cuper, gardener to Thomas, earl of Arundel. Boydell Cuper, when Arundel House was taken down, obtained numerous mutilated marbles, which he erected in these gardens. They were opposite Somerset House, were opened to the public in 1678, and ceased to exist in 1753. These gardens were famous for fireworks, but no less notorious for licentiousness.

Curfew Bell (The). A corruption of couvre-feu, 'put out the fire.' William the Conqueror ordered the bell to be rung at eight o'clock every night in every city and town in England, when every fire and every lamp and candle was to be put out. This was not to annoy the English, but to prevent fires and conspiracies. William had enforced the same in Normandy as an act of police before the battle of Hastings.

Curia Regia (The), 1860. The supreme court of judicature in Hungary.

Curia Regis, or Council of the Realm, 1172. A sort of parliament held by Henry II. at Lismore for the purpose of conferring with the prelates and magnates on the government of Ireland. Henry determined to extend to his English subjects in Ireland the laws and usages they were accustomed to while they lived in England. These laws and usages extended over what was called the Pale (q.v.), but all the rest of Ireland continued to observe their own laws and usages.

Sir John Davies informs us that no legislative council was held in Ireland for 140 years after the council at Lismore, but that Irish representatives attended the English parliaments.

Curlew Mountains (The). The county of Leitrim was so called even in the reign of Queen Elizabeth.

Curop'alate. One who had charge of the palace in the Eastern Empire, called in the Frankish kingdom 'Maire du Palais,' by the Romans 'Major domus,' and in English 'Steward of the Household.' Michael I. was called 'Curopalātus,' because he was Mayor of the Palace to Stauracius, whom he deposed and succeeded 2 Oct., 811. Being himself deposed by Leo, he turned monk and died about 845.

Curry-powder Duke (The). The Duke of Norfolk, who, during the corn-law agitation, said in a speech he was surprised that the poor did not put a pinch or two of curry-powder in their stews, as it gave the meat such a piquant flavour.

I remember Sir Robert Harvey saying in a public speech that he was surprised the poor did not more frequently eat a red herring at breakfast, as it gave such a piquant flavour to bread and butter. In ridicule of this speech, a red herring was often carried on a pole in political elections. The remark of the Princess Lamballe was of a similar character. She was surprised the poor did not eat brioches, as bread was so dear. And our Princess Charlotte said she would rather eat beef than starve.

Curse of Cromwell (The), 1650. His campaign in Ireland, which certainly was stained with revolting cruelty. Witness the massacres of Drogheda and Clonmel. He was lord-lieutenant at the time.

This bloody campaign has always been remembered in that country as the 'Curse of Cromwell.' —Howitt, Hist. of Eng. (Commonwealth, p. 315).

Curse of Scotland (The). The Nine of Diamonds is so called from its resemblance to the nine lozenges in the heraldic bearing of John Dalryn ple, first earl of Stair, so scandalously concerned in the massacre of Glencoe (q.v.).

Curtmantle. The surname of Henry II. of England. He wore the Anjou mantle, which was shorter than the robe worn by his predecessors (1133, 1154–1189).

Curule Magistrate (A). A Roman state officer, such as dictator, consul, prætor, &c., who sate on an ivory chair at the head of public assemblies. All the children of such a magistrate became nobles [nobiles]. The Curule chair was like a camp-stool, which could easily be moved about, and was placed in the chariot of the magistrate when he rode in state.

Curūlis is connected with currus, a chariot; hence equus curulis (a carriage-horse), triumphus curulis (a carriage triumph), in contradistinction to an ovation which was made on foot.

Custos Rotulo'rum. The chief officer of the court of Quarter Sessions (q.v.), who has custody of the records or rolls; he must be a justice of the peace of the county, nominated by the crown, and appointed by the commission.

Cynic Philosophers (The) of ancient Greece. Founded by Antisthĕnēs the Athenian (B.C. 440–376). Cynic is an adjective from κυνὸς (gen. of κύων, a dog); so called because Antisthĕnēs taught in the gymnasium called Cynosargēs (the White Dog). He was a censor of public morals and manners. Diogĕnēs of Sinōpē (B.C. 412–323) affected to be surly like a dog, and like a dog snarled at every one. The Athenians raised to his memory a pillar of Parian marble surmounted with a dog. The substance of the inscription being—

Say, dog, I pray, what guard you in that tomb?
'A dog.' His name? 'Diogenēs.' From far?
'Sinopē.' He who made a tub his home?
'The same. Now, dead, among the stars a star.'

Cyclic Poets (The). The epic poets who sprang up after Homer, and confined themselves to the same cycle of events, viz. the Story of Troy. Stasīnos of Cyprus chose for his subject events immediately preceding the Trojan war. Arctīnos of Milētus related the story of the wooden horse. Agĭas of Trœzēnē took for his subject the return from Troy. And Eugămon of Cyrēnē made a continuation of the Odyssey.

Nec sic incipies, ut scriptor cyclicus olim.
HORACE, Ars Poetica, 137.

Cy-près Process (The). The process of approximation. Where a literal execution is inexpedient or impracticable, the court will execute a devise as nearly as it can, according to the spirit of the devisor's words, or, to speak technically, cy-près. For example: if there are no objects remaining to take the benefit of a charity, the court will dispose of the revenues by a new scheme on the principles of the original trust.

As in law, a cy-près or approximate administration of an obsolete devise is admissible, so in reference to the Bible, is it not incumbent upon you to apply what seems obsolete to cases analogous to those originally intended?—Dr. HESSEY, Moral Difficulties connected with the Bible (1871), p. 112.

Cyrena'ic Sect (The). Founded at Cyrēnē, in Africa, by Aristippos, who studied under Socratēs. He taught that pleasure is the ultimate object of human pursuit, but that virtuous motives and virtuous conduct are indispensable to true pleasure. Aristippos died B.C. 380.

Cyzicēnus. Antiochus IX., king of Syria, who was educated at Cyzicos (B.C. 112–96).

Czar (Cæsar or Kaiser), 1237. A title first conferred on Dimitri I., son of Yaroslaf, by the Greek emperor. Before then the sovereign was called Kniaz (grand-duke) or Welik Knez (great prince), a title which ran on concurrently with czar till 1545. After the battle of Pultowa, in 1709, the head of the Russian empire was also styled emperor and autocrat.

The monarch of Casan was called tzar. This monarchy was conquered, in 1545, by Ivan Vassilivich (the Terrible); and it is said that Ivan then dropped the titles of Kniaz and Welik Knez, and retained only that of 'tsar' or 'czar.'

D. By the Mutiny Act, 21 Vict. c. 9 (1858) it was enacted that, 'on the first, and on every subsequent conviction for desertion, the court-martial . . . may order the offender to be marked on the left side, two inches below the armpit, with the letter "D" (deserter), not less than an inch long, with some ink, or gunpowder, or other preparation not liable to be obliterated.'

For other brands, see 'F' ('Dict. of Phrase and Fable,' p. 281), 'V,' and 'S.'

Dacoits. Brigands, so called in Oude, Burmah, &c. But sometimes the Dacōtah Indians of North America are incorrectly called Dacoits.

Dacoity. Brigandage.

Dactyls, or 'Idēan Dactyls.' Priests of Cybēlē, Saturn, and Jupiter, dwelling in Crete, on Mount Ida.

Said to be called 'Dactyls' from the Greek word δακτυλος, a finger, because they were ten in number.

Dagger-ale. A very celebrated ale sold at 'The Dagger' ordinary, in Holborn. The dagger refers to the City arms.

Dagger-money. A tax to provide arms and police, when judges entered a town, to prevent their being molested or attacked by highwaymen.

Dagger-scene in the House of Commons (The). During the French Revolution, Edmund Burke on one occasion threw a dagger on the floor of the house, vociferating 'There is French fraternity for you! Such is the poignard which French Jacobins would plunge into the heart of our sovereign.' Canning spoilt this bunkum by saying: 'The gentleman has brought his knife with him, but where is the fork?'

Dague de la Miséricorde (La), or the 'Mercy of God.' A broad strong poniard, which was hung on the right side of the Scottish-French archers. See Sir W. Scott, 'Quentin Durward,' chap. v.

Daguerreotype (The), 1825. The production of permanent pictures on plated copper by Louis Jacques Mandé Daguerre (1789–1851).

Daibutsu. The great statue of Buddha, in Japan. It is about 600 years old, 50 feet in height, and 100 feet in girth; it is made of bronze and silver, but the eyes are of gold. The proportions are exquisite, and probably it is the finest idol in existence.

Daily Courant (The), 11 March, 1702. Called the first daily newspaper in England.

Daily News (The). Commenced 21 Jan., 1846, London.

Daily Paper (First English), 11 March, 1702. The 'Daily Courant.' See 'English Mercurie.'

Daily Paper (First French), 1777. Called the 'Journal de Paris.'

It contained an article on the 'Almanach des Muses,' a short letter by Voltaire, the advertisement of a library, two or three miscellaneous articles, and a pun; the pun was the chief attraction, and continued so for some time.

Daily Telegraph (The). A London newspaper, commenced 29 June, 1855.

Daisy League (The), 1887. A league formed at Belfast for the promotion of women's rights, and for Home Rule in Ireland under imperial control. Not independent Home Rule or separation from Great Britain. The badge of the league is a daisy, and the motto is 'Faith, Hope, and Charity.' Of course the idea was suggested by the Primrose League (q.v.)

Dalcassians, or Dalgais. The people of North Munster, including Clare, Limerick, and the country about Cashel as far as the mountains of Sliablama, in Ossory. The people of South Munster were called Eugenians (Eoganachts, or sons of Eogan).

Dalreudi'ni. Natives of Ulster, same as Dalriads (q.v.).

Dalriada. Antrim in Ireland is so called from Cairbre Riada, on one of whose descendants the country was settled by the arbitration of St. Colman, A.D. 572.

Cairbre, or Cairbre, was generally called Cairbre 'of the Long Arm.'

Dalriadic Rulers (The). The kings of Argyllshire. Dalriada is the ancient name of the northern half of Antrim, in Ireland. Cairbre (of the Long Arm) of the race of Riada, who lived in the 3rd cent., planted a colony on the shores of Argyllshire, in Albany, and in 506 some of his descendants founded there the kingdom of 'Dal-riada in Albany.' In 843 Kenneth MacAlpin united the Dalriads and Picts under one sceptre, and became the first king of Albany.

About two centuries afterwards Albania began to be known as Scotia, or Scotland.

'Hector Boece added by interpolation from forty to forty-five Scotch kings to the authentic Irish list of Dalriadic rulers.'—T. Moore, History of Ireland, chap. viii. p. 137.

Dalriads (The). The Irish-Scots, who possessed themselves of a part of Argyllshire, in the middle of the 3rd cent.

Damage-cleer (i.e. damna clericorum). A fee paid to the clerks of courts before judgment was executed. It was the tenth part in all Common Pleas, and a twentieth part in the King's Bench and Exchequer courts, of all damages exceeding five marks. Abolished in 1665.

Dame de Beauté (La). Agnes Sorel, the mistress of Charles VII. of France (1410–1450). So called from the 'Château de Beauté,' on the banks of the Marne, given her by the king.

Damianists. Those nuns of the Order of St. Claire who followed the most austere rule of St. Francis. Those who followed the modified rule introduced by Urban IV. in 1264 were denominated Urbanists.

Damien (Father). A Belgian Catholic missioner (1839–1889) who devoted his life to the care of the lepers at Molokai. He caught the disease, and speedily fell a victim, at the age of 49.

Damiens (Robert François), Jan. 1757. Attempted the life of Louis XV. as he was stepping into his coach to return to the Trianon, by stabbing him between the fourth and fifth rib. The devilry of the French in torturing this creature is wholly without precedent. First incisions were made in his arms and thighs, into which boiling oil was poured. He was next chained on an iron bed, and the torture again applied. On 28 March, amidst a vast crowd of people, he was taken to the Place de Grève, and being fastened by iron gyves to a scaffold, one of his hands was burnt in liquid flaming sulphur. His thighs, legs, and arms were then excoriated with red-hot pincers, and boiling oil, molten lead, hot resin, and sulphur were poured over the wounds. Next, tight ligatures being tied round his wrists and ankles, four young horses were fastened to the ropes to pull the limbs asunder. This lasted an hour, when the medical attendants ordered the tendons to be cut. Again the horses were lashed, and one arm and leg were severed. After a few more pulls the other members were pulled off, and the man expired. In 1764 Goldsmith published his 'Traveller,' and at the conclusion alludes to 'Damiens' bed of steel.' See Smollett's 'History of England,' vol. v., chap. 12, p. 8.

Dan. So Daniel O'Connell was lovingly designated by the Irish.

Danaanian Dynasty (The). A dynasty said to have reigned in Ireland, and to have been succeeded by the Milesians. They were descendants of Tuatha na Danaan (q.v.), who had migrated to Scotland, and had been led back by Nuad of the 'Silver Hand.' See 'Silver Hand.'

Danans (The). Invaders of Ireland in prehistoric times, who overthrew the Belgæ settlement in one great battle and the 'Irish' in another, and made themselves masters of the island. The Belgæ were allowed by them a free territory in Connaught.

By the 'Irish' must be understood the Fomorians and Partholanians (q.v.).

Dance of St. Guy (The), 1378. An epidemic in Germany; also called the 'Dance of St. Witt.' It was supposed that the victims of this disease were possessed, and therefore they were exorcised by the priests.

Pausanias tells us that the daughters of Prœtus and the women of Argos fancied they were cows, and ran about the meadows under this hallucination. Compare Dan. ii. 32, 33.

Dancing Mania (The), 1374. A strange disease, which pervaded different parts of Germany, and first broke out in the neighbourhood of Aix-la-Chapelle. Persons would join hands, forming large circles, and dance like mad people till they fell exhausted to the ground. The magistrates of the Rhenish cities were obliged to put down the mania by an armed force. In the French Revolution a similar mania prevailed, the 'Carmagnole' being the name of the dance and song which then moved men, women, and children to a temporary frenzy.

Called in Holland 'St. John's Dance;' in Germany 'St. Witt's Dance;' in Strasburg 'St. Guy's or 'St. Vitus's Dance.'

Dancing-masters (Father of all). Beauchamps, who died 1695. Louis XIV. took lessons of him for twenty years.

Dando (The), Sept. 1427. A kind of influenza which affected nearly everyone in France. It began with pains in the shoulders and loins, shivering fits followed, and then a tearing cough. It lasted fifteen or sixteen days. A chronicler says during the dando not a man or woman could be found who had not a large pimple either on the mouth or on the nose.

Dandy. For the different names of French dandies, see 'Incroyables.'

Dandy King (The). Joachim Murat, king of Naples, called by Napoleon 'Un roi de théâtre.' He used to parade the streets of Paris dressed like a stage king in silks and satins (1771–1815).

Egan says the word 'dandy' was first used in 1820; this requires confirmation, for velocipedes, invented in 1779, were called 'dandy-horses,' and were common in 1818. I myself rode one at the time.

Dane Territory. In England. At the Peace of Nottingham, 868, Alfred the Great divided England into two parts, the larger of which he assigned to the Danes; but he kept London in his own portion. The boundary ran along the Thames to the mouth of the Lea; then by Bedford and the river Ouse to the old Roman road called 'Watling Street.' See 'The Five Burghs.'

Danebrog (The Order of), 1219. Instituted in Denmark by Waldemar the Victorious. Revived in 1671 by Christian V. To recompense services rendered to the state, whether military or civil. The decoration consists of a cross of gold pattée, enamelled with white, and suspended with a white ribbon edged with red.

Brog = flag. The order is in honour of the national flag of Denmark.

Danegelt. A tax first levied in 991 by Ethelred the Unready to bribe the Danes, who had invaded the kingdom, to quit it. Several times during the reign of Ethelred the Danes returned, and received fresh bribes. It is said that he paid them altogether 150,000*l.* (fully four and a half millions according to the present value of money). The tax was from time to time levied by subsequent kings, under pretence of fortifying the kingdom or maintaining a fleet or army against the Danes. Edward the Confessor abolished it; but it was again collected, under the name of 'Herëgeld' (army tax), in the reigns of William I., William II., Henry I., and Stephen.

In 991 the tax was 1s. for every hide of land, but the tax was soon doubled.

Danelagh. Means the 'Danes' law,' but the word is applied to the 'Five Burghs' given by Alfred to the Danes at the Peace of Nottingham in 868. The 'Five Burghs of the Danes' were Derby, Leicester, Lincoln, Nottingham, and Stamford.

According to the 'Bromton Chronicle,' the Danelagh contained fifteen counties (not five), viz. Essex, Middlesex, Suffolk, Norfolk, Hertfordshire, Cambridgeshire, Hampshire, Lincoln, Nottinghamshire, Derbyshire, Northamptonshire, Leicestershire, Buckinghamshire, Bedfordshire, and all that vast territory called Northumbria.

Danish Butler (The). Baron Ludvig Holberg (1684–1754), author of the heroi-comic Hudibrastic poem entitled 'Peder Paars.'

Danites (The). Sometimes called 'Destroying Angels.' The more violent members of the Mormon community who carried out the decrees of the Elders on recalcitrant brethren. A number of them, disguised as Indians, massacred a party of Mormons withdrawing from the Utah settlement. Brigham Young was accused of complicity.

'P'r'aps you've heard tell of Danites?' I had heard . . . of that spiritual police of Mormondom, of those fierce zealots who obey their prophet blindly . . . Seth's right; we don't want to set up any chaps to paint-Injun on our account, as Angel Brown, and young Harris, and the Danites did.'—CHARLES DICKENS, Christmas Number, 1861, All the Year Round, p. 41 (Tom Tiddler's Ground).

Dante of Philosophy (The). John Baptist Pico, professor of rhetoric in Naples (1688–1740).

Danton of the Gironde (The). Isnard, son of a perfumer at Grasse; a literary man, formed on the old Grecian and Roman model. He was a thorough republican of very impetuous character.

Dantonists. The followers of Danton, one of the three leaders in the Reign of Terror, the other two being Hébert and Robespierre. When Danton thought that blood enough had been shed, he halted and advised moderation, but was trampled in the dust by those less scrupulous than himself. Robespierre accused him of monarchical proclivities, and he was condemned to death by the Revolutionary Tribunal.

Danubian Principalities (The). Moldavia and Wallachia, constituted into independent states by the Convention of Paris, 19 Aug., 1858. They were united provisionally by a firman of the Sultan, 12 Nov., 1861. United under the title of Roumania 23 Dec., 1861.

Darbyites (Dar'-by-ites), Darbyism, 1832. A split from the Plymouth Brethren on the doctrine of the humanity of Christ. So called from John H. Darby.

Darg. The regulation enforced by the trades union among colliers, that no workman shall raise in a day more of the mineral than could be easily raised by the most inexperienced and unskilful of the colliers.

Darg = day: contract work by the day.

Darien Scheme (The). The Darien Company was projected by William Paterson (founder of the Bank of England) in 1694. Incorporated by Act of Parliament in Scotland, 1695. Settlement abandoned in 1699, and finally in 1700. The scheme was to colonise the Atlantic side of the Isthmus of Panama, in order to form a commercial entrepôt between the eastern and western hemispheres; and a monopoly of all the trade of Asia, Africa, and America was granted to the company. The ground, however, belonged to Spain, and the climate was fatal to the colonists. Many having died and more sickened, a Spanish force was sent against the new-comers, which broke up the company entirely.

Then there were malcontents [in Scotland] created by the government opposition to the Darien scheme. . . . The Darien malcontents were for the most part revolutionists.—HOWITT, History of England (Anne, p. 182).

Dark Ages (The). From the fall of the Roman empire, A.D. 475, to the revival of literature on the discovery of the Pandects at Amalfi in 1137. Not to draw the limits too finely, say 700 years (450 to 1150). The Middle Ages (q.v.) may be extended to about 1550, covering from ten to eleven centuries.

Darling of Mankind (The). Vespasian the Roman emperor (9, 70–79). Titus was called the 'Delight of Mankind' (40, 79–81).

Darvel Gatheren. A great wooden idol in Wales, held in great veneration. There was a legend that one day Darvel would burn a forest. When Friar Forrest, in 1538, the confessor of Queen Katharine, was burnt for denying the king's supremacy, this image was cast on the pile.

David Darvel Gatheren,
As saith the Welshmen,
Fetched outlaws out of hell;
Now is he come, with spear and shield,
In harness to burn in Smith field,
For in Wales he may not dwell.
And Forrest, the friar,
That obstinate liar,
That wilfully shall be dead,
In his contumacy
The gospel doth deny
The king to be supreme head.

Darwinism. So called from Charles Darwin. Is the theory that species owe their origin to natural selection, or the survival of those best adapted to the surroundings, &c.

Evolution is the development of new species of animals and plants by a natural process, of which the chief factors are heredity, variation, and adaptation. Hence Darwinism and evolution are quite distinct ideas.

Daughter of Jerusalem. Mount Zion, the fortified part of Jerusalem. Here David had his palace, and hence it was also called 'The City of David.'

Dauphin of France (The), 1349. Heir apparent of the crown, like our 'Prince of Wales.' Humbert II. count of Dauphiny, by the Treaty of Vincennes (30 May, 1349), ceded Dauphiny to the crown of France, and from that time to the first Revolution the eldest son of the reigning king was entitled 'The Dauphin.' The wife of a dauphin was entitled Dauphine (2 syl.).

The Grand Dauphin means the eldest son of Louis XIV., named 'Louis de France' (1661–1711). The son of the Grand Dauphin also died before his grandfather (1682–1712).

David Dale's People. Scotch Independents. So called from David Dale of New Lanark, the philanthropist (1738–1806).

Davidians, or the 'Family of Love.' So called from David George, who made himself sometimes Christ and sometimes the Holy Ghost. See Strype, 'Cranmer,' p. 291. Their tenets are touched upon in the preface to the 'Ecclesiastical Polity,' and a short account of them is given in Sir W. Scott's 'Woodstock,' ii. p. 218.

David George published an account of his visions in 1542, under the title of the 'Book of Wonders.' He died in 1556.

Davies Scholarship. For Classics. Value about 30*l.* a year, tenable for seven years. Founded in the University of Cambridge by the Rev. Jonathan Davies, D.D., provost of Eton, 1804. See 'Regius Professor of Greek.'

Davis Chinese Scholarship. Tenable for two years. Founded in the University of Oxford by Sir John F. Davis, F.R.S.

Davis Strait. So called from John Davis, an English navigator of the 16th cent.

Day of Adoration (The). 'Dies Adoratus,' 14 Sept. Called also 'L'exaltation de la Sainte Croix,' 'en mémoire de ce qu' Héraclius rapporta sur le Calvaire en 642 la vraie croix que Chosroès, roi des Perses, avait enlevée 14 ans auparavant.'

Day of Federation (The), 14 July, 1790. The anniversary of the storming of the Bastille, when the people swore 'to defend the liberty of France.'

Day of Ferdinand (The), 27 May, 1800. By a most disgraceful trick, Napoleon Bonaparte persuaded the old king of Spain to abdicate, and then he set his own brother Joseph on the vacant throne. The Spaniards, disgusted at this treachery, rose as one man, massacred the French garrison at Madrid, and cut to pieces the squadron at Cadiz. This, of course, led to reprisals, and the result was the long Peninsular War (q.v.), so glorious to the Duke of Wellington, ending with the battle of Waterloo, 18 June, 1815, and the banishment of Napoleon to St. Helena.

Day of July (The). 'Journée de Juillet,' 14 July. Noted for the insurrection of the people of Paris in 1789, and the taking of the Bastille. Between 1790–1792 the anniversary was called the 'Fête de la Fédération. See 'Days of July.'

Day of New Cloaks (The). Old Christmas Day was at one time so called in France, from the custom of giving on that day a new robe to each courtier.

On Christmas Eve, 1245, the king [Louis IX.] bade all his court be present at early morning mass. At the chapel door each man received his new cloak, put it on, and went in. . . . As the day rose, each man saw on his neighbour's shoulder the cross which betokened the crusading vow.—KITCHIN, History of France, vol. i. p. 328.

Day of Poniards (The), 28 Feb., 1791. The day of the attack on the prison of Vincennes (2 syl.), called 'the Second Bastille.' On this day a large number of courtiers rushed to the Tuileries to defend the king and royal family. Lafayette with the National Guards disarmed them, and they were very roughly handled by the mob. This day was called 'the Day of Poniards' because Marat, in his journal, L'Ami du Peuple, declared that 5,000 poniards had been manufactured in Paris for the use of the aristocrats against the patriots. A diligent search was made by order of the National Assembly, but only thirty-five poniards could be found, and those were for persons engaged in the slave trade.

A number of the king's friends . . . had flocked to the palace, as on the Day of Poniards.—HOWITT, History of England (George III., p. 418).

Day of Reason (The), 8 June, 1794. When the bishops and clergy of Paris, decorated with caps of liberty, renounced their sacerdotal office and publicly declared: 'We now abjure the trade of superstition, and are resolved henceforth to be men instead of Christians; to own no temple but the sanctuary of the law; no divinity but liberty; no object of worship but our country; and no gospel but the constitution.'

The Bishop of Moulines trampled on his cross and mitre, and, taking up a pike and cap of liberty, preached to the people that 'death is an eternal sleep.'

Day of Rest (The).

Christians set apart	1st	day of the week	(Sunday).
Greeks	〃	2nd	〃	〃 (Monday).
Persians	〃	3rd	〃	〃 (Tuesday).
Assyrians	〃	4th	〃	〃 (Wednesday).
Egyptians and Jesids	〃	5th	〃	〃 (Thursday).
Turks	〃	6th	〃	〃 (Friday).
Jews	〃	7th	〃	〃 (Saturday).

See 'Sunday.'

Day of St. Ferdinand (The). A repetition of the 'Sicilian Vespers.' See 'Day of Ferdinand.'

Day of the Barricades. See 'Barricades.'

Day of the Bastille (The), 14 July, 1789. The day on which the Bastille was demolished by the French rabble.

Day of the Burræ (The). The first Sunday of Lent is so called by the Lotharingians, from the custom of carrying bandons or torches on that day, first observed in 1249. The day is known as the 'Burræ;' hence we read such phrases as these:—'Die crastina burarum,' or 'Feria quinta post buras.' See 'Sunday.'

Day of the Camel (The), 8 Nov., A.D. 657. The famous battle of Bassōrah, in which Ali defeated Ayesha, Telha, and Zobeir. It was the first civil war of the Moslems, and received its name from the following circumstance: Ayesha, the prophet's widow, who hated Ali (son of Fatima), went to the battle on a camel, with seventy men to hold her bridle. All the seventy men were slain, and the cage or litter in which Ayesha rode was struck with so many darts and javelins that, as Gibbon says, it was like a porcupine with its quills.

Day of the Dupes (The), 11 Nov., 1630. Marie de Medicis, the queen mother, hating Richelieu, induced her son, Louis XIII., to dismiss him; and the king, unable to resist his mother, commanded the cardinal to resign his portfolio. The lady was triumphant, her friends were loud in their congratulations, and all thought the influence of the queen mother was paramount. Next day Richelieu waited on the king to place in his hands the seals of office; Louis relented, refused to accept the resignation, and Richelieu became more powerful than ever. This day is called in French history 'La Journée des Dupes.' The dupes were the queen mother, her younger son the Duke of Orleans, Michel and Louis de Marillac, and all their clique.

Day of the Millers (The). 'Journée des Farines,' 3 Jan., 1591. When some of the partisans of Henri IV., disguised as millers, attempted to get possession of the barrier de St. Honoré, in Paris, with the view of making themselves masters of the city. In this they failed.

Days. See also

Baronial days.	Red-letter days.
Black days.	Scarlet days.
Egyptian days.	Sundays.

Days in Banc. Days appointed by the courts, or fixed by statute, when process must be returned, or when parties served with writs are to make their appearance in full court.

Days of Grace. The three days beyond the time at which a 'bill' is actually due. Sunday, Good Friday, and Christmas Day do not count.

Days of Ill-name. 'Dies maledicti,' also called 'Dies Ægyptiaci' and 'Dies Ægri.' Two days in every month held unlucky by the Egyptians, because they fancied 'quod in aliqua hora dierum illorum non erat bonum sanguinare (id est sanguinem minuere), nec aliquod opus incipere.' On these days they would commence no new work, nor start on a journey. St. Augustine refers to this in his 'Commentary on Epistle to the Galatians,' chap. iv.

Days of July (The). 'Journées de Juillet,' the 27, 28, 29. When the people of Paris rose and drove Charles X. from the throne for suppressing the liberty of the press, 1830. See 'Day of July.'

Days of June (The), 5, 6. I. An émeute provoked in Paris by the Republicans at the funeral of Lamarque, deputy of the Opposition, 1832. Barricades were thrown up in the quarters of St. Antoine, St. Martin, St. Denis [Sahn Dnee], &c. The troops were called in, and on the 6th put down the disturbance by taking the church of St. Merry by storm.

II. 23, 24, 25, 26. A bloody insurrection by the party styled the 'Démocratique et Sociale' against the republic established in France 24 Feb., 1848. It was aroused by the dissolution of the ateliers nationaux. St. Jaques, St. Marceau, and St. Antoine were besieged, and it was only put down by calling out the soldiers under the direction of Cavaignac. Seven generals were killed, and Mgr. Affre (archbishop of Paris) was shot on the 25th, attempting to stop the slaughter. The loss of life was enormous, but the number of slain was not allowed to be published.

De Donis Conditionalibus (Statute). The statute of Westminster which established in England the power of creating an entail (13 Edw. I. c. 1).

De Eminenti, 1642. The bull of Urban VIII. against Jansen and his book 'Augustinus.'

De Hæretico Comburendo (The), 2 Hen. IV. c. 15, A.D. 1401. An Act forbidding all unlicensed preaching; authorising bishops to arrest anyone suspected of propagating unsound doctrines; and all persons arrested were to be kept in prison till they abjured their errors, or in default thereof were to be handed over to the secular power, which 'shall forthwith do them to be burnt.' Repealed by 29 Car. II. c. 9, A.D. 1677.

William Sawtrey, a London clergyman, was the first to suffer. He was arrested by Archbishop Arundel, and burnt alive for refusing to adore the cross.

De Officiis. By Cicero, 1466. Printed by Fust and his son-in-law Peter Schæffer. The first secular book ever printed in moveable metal types. The three books previously printed were Biblia Sacra Latina, Biblia Latina, and Psalmorum Codex.

De Profundis. The first two words of the Psalm CXXX. in Latin, sung by Catholics in the funeral service.

Deacon. A deacon must be 22 years of age. His duties in the Greek and Latin Churches are: (1) to administer the alms to the poor, and to administer the Eucharist, but not to consecrate.

Deacons were prohibited from celebrating the Holy Communion by the Act of Uniformity (q.v.), 1662, 14 Car. II. c. 4.

Dead-cart (The). A cart which traversed London from nightfall to daybreak during the plague. It was accompanied by two men, one with a bell, and the other with a long pitchfork. The bell was rung from time to time to give notice that the cart was at hand, and when the dead were pushed into the street, they were tossed by the pitchfork into the cart, and carried to a great pit, where they were shot down wholesale (1665).

The pit in Aldgate was 40 feet by 16 feet, and 9 feet deep. Above 400 bodies were shot into it between the 6th and 20th of Sept.

Dead Hand (The). Mortmain, i.e. the possession of lands and tenements in 'dead hands,' or hands which cannot alienate.

These may have been his reasons for seeking the protection of the 'dead hand.'—H. Hayman, D.D.

A corporation is a 'dead hand' because it cannot alienate. So is the Church.

Dead's Part (The). That portion of the moveable estate of a deceased person which remains over, after satisfying the legal claims of wife and children. In Scotland the surplus is the only part which the deceased could dispose of by will or testament. Abolished by 19, 20 Vict. c. 94.

Dead Reckoning. A term in navigation, signifying the calculation of a ship's place at sea, made independently of celestial observations.

Dead Weight Annuity (The). 4 Geo. IV. c. 22. Military and naval pensions, and pensions given to civil supernumeraries. They expired in 1867.

Dead Woman Crowned (A), 1357. Ines de Castro, wife of Pedro (I.) of Portugal. Pedro had clandestinely married Ines de Castro, and his father Affonso, king of Portugal, had her privately assassinated. In 1357 Affonso died, and Pedro succeeded to the crown. He then had the corpse disinterred, sumptuously arrayed, and crowned. Pedro stood beside the corpse, and the nobles did homage to it by kissing the hand. The ceremony being over, the dead body was restored to its sepulchre again.

Dean. In Oxford University; the title of the master of Christ Church, which is a cathedral.

Dean Ireland Exegetical Professorship (The). In Oxford University. Stipend 800*l.* a year. Founded by Dr. John Ireland, of Oriel College, dean of Westminster, 1847.

Dean Ireland's Scholarships. Four for Latin and Greek, tenable for four years. Founded in the University of Oxford by Dr. John Ireland, of Oriel College, dean of Westminster, in 1825.

Dean of Faculty (The). President of the incorporation of advocates or barristers in Scotland; elected annually.

Dean of Guild. In Scotch burghs was head of the mercantile body called the 'Guild brethren.' At one time he was a judge in mercantile and maritime causes within the burgh, but is now a kind of city edile.

Dean of University College, London. The principal or head of a faculty chosen for a limited period.

Deans (Honorary). Without jurisdiction, such as the dean of the Chapel Royal, of St. James's Palace, &c.

Deans (Rural). Are deputies of the bishop, planted all round his diocese, to inspect the conduct of the parochial clergy, inquire into and report dilapidations, and armed with judicial authority in matters not of serious importance.

Deans of Chapters. Are either of cathedral or collegiate churches. Such as the dean of Canterbury and the dean of St. Paul's, who are governors over the canons. It is a crown appointment, and the dean must reside eight months in the year, and may hold a living with his deanery. The office in Durham is worth 3,000*l.* a year; of St. Paul's, of Westminster, of York, and of Manchester is worth 2,000*l.* a year; of most other cathedrals about 1,000*l.* a year; but from agricultural depression in the last ten years (1890) the value of all church benefices dependent on tithes has much depreciated.

Deans of Peculiars, or 'Deans in Peculiar.' Have sometimes jurisdiction and cure of souls, and sometimes jurisdiction only. Of this nature is the dean of Battle in Sussex, founded by William I., the dean of Westminster, the dean of the chapel of St. George of Windsor, and the dean of King's Chapel. The following have jurisdiction but no cure of souls, viz. the dean of Arches in London, the dean of Bocking in Essex, the dean of Croydon in Surrey, and the dean of Christ Church, Oxford.

Deans of Provinces, or 'Deans of Bishops.' Like the bishop of London, who is 'dean of the province of Canterbury.' The archbishop sends to him his mandate for summoning the bishops of his province when a convocation is to be assembled.

Deans of the Chapel Royal (The). In Scotland there are three such deans appointed by the crown; the duties are quite nominal, being limited to an occasional sermon before the sovereign when in the neighbourhood.

Deasy's Act, 1860. An Irish land act, which reduced the question to a mere matter of contract. So that the tenant's house, the out-offices, the fences and drains, made or paid for by the tenant, were the property of the landlord. This continued till 1870, when an act was passed to provide compensation for improvements and prevent capricious evictions.

Death Rate. The number of inhabitants at present on the earth is 1,800 millions.

The annual death rate is 33 millions; 92 thousand daily: nearly 4 thousand every hour,* 60 every minute, and 1 every second.

Only 1 in 1,000 reach the age of 100, 1 in 500 reach the age of 80, 6 in 1,000 reach the age of 65.

* In round numbers: More exact, 33,033,033 die annually, 91,824 daily, 3,730 hourly.

Death with Music. Leopold I., the kaiser (1658–1705), on his death-bed requested that the court musicians might be introduced, that he might die to the sounds of sweet music. Mirabeau's last words were 'Let me die to the sounds of delicious music.'

Deaths (Registration of). See 'Registration,' &c.

Debarring. In the Scotch church, means excluding from communion all those deemed by the minister and his lieutenants unworthy to 'partake of that feast.'

Debased Style (The), 1600. Applied to architecture means that which followed the Reformation period. Called debased, because the designs were inferior to the previous styles, and the execution by no means good. There was no unity, but different schools and different periods were mixed together.

The first was the Early English or Lancet style, the second the Decorated, the third the Florid or Perpendicular, and the fourth the Debased.

Debateable Land (The). 'The space between the Esk and the Sark, bounded on the third side by the march dike. It seems properly to belong to Scotland, but having been disputed by both crowns, was styled "The Debateable Land." In the reign of James VI. (I. of England) Sir Richard Graham, obtaining from the Earl of Cumberland a lease of this tract, bought it of James, and got it united to the county of Cumberland.' (Pennant, 'Tour in Scotland,' vol. ii. p. 82.)

Decadence. In ancient art applied to works subsequent to the reign of Augustus. In modern art the term is applied to the post-renaissant period, or the rococo style introduced in the reign of Louis XV.

In Greece the term is applied to art subsequent to the time of Pericles, the turning point of Greek art. In England art reached its lowest point in the reign of George IV.

Dec'adists. Those who observed the new French Calendar introduced by Fabre d'Eglantine in 1793. So-called because the year was divided into decades (10 days instead of weeks), the 10th decade being called décadi.

There were 360 decades in a year, and these made up 300 days, the odd 5 (to make up 365 days) were called Sans-culottides, or holidays for the sans-culottes or operatives.

Decalcea'ti, 1570. The barefooted friars. They were Augustine and Franciscan friars of the stricter rule, which forbade the wearing of boots or shoes.

Decan (i. e. the south). The country between the river Nerbuddah and the river Krishna.

Decelæan War (The), B.C. 413. Decelēa was a demus of Attica on the borders of Bœōtia. In the nineteenth year of the Peloponnesian war (B.C. 413) the Peloponnesians, under Agis, seized and fortified the demus, and thereby greatly annoyed the Athenians. It was held till the close of the Peloponnesian war (B.C. 404).

December 25. The time of the winter solstice has been held in high festival by well nigh all the nations of the earth, and probably our festival of the Nativity was fixed to this day in order to divert a long and general pagan practice to the birth of Christ in Bethlehem. The 25 Dec. was chosen for the festival in the reign of Antoninus Pius (138–161), and is attributed to Telesphorus.

CHINA.—The birth of Buddha, son of Mâya, is celebrated 25 Dec.—BUNSEN, The Angel Messiah; LILLIE, Buddha and Buddhism, p. 73.

DRUIDS.—The festival called 'Nolagh' was celebrated at the winter solstice.—HIGGINS, Anacalypsis, vol. ii. p. 99.

EGYPT.—Horus, son of Isis, is said to have been born at the close of Dec.—M. LE CLERC DE SEPTCHENES, Religion of the Ancient Greeks, p. 214; BONWICK, Egyptian Belief, p. 157.

GREECE.—The birth of Demêter (Cerês), Dionysos (Bacchus), and Hêraklês (Hercules), were all celebrated during the winter solstice. Just as that of Osiris was in Egypt. The Greeks called 25 Dec. 'The Triple Night.'—Religion of the Ancient Greeks, p. 215; Anacalypsis, vol. ii. p. 99.

INDIA.—Monier Williams (Hindûstan, p. 181) tells us that numerous Indian tribes keep Yule as a religious festival, decorate their houses with garlands, and make presents to their friends at this festal season.

MEXICO.—The festival called 'Capacrame' was held in the winter solstice.—Hist Indies, vol. ii. p. 354.

ROME.—The festival called 'Natâlis Solis Invicti' was celebrated on 25 Dec. with public games.—Rev. J. B. GROSS, The Heathen Religion, p. 287.

PERSIA.—The great festival in honour of the birth of Mithras was at the same period.—Celtic Druids, p. 163; GROSS, &c., p. 287.

SCANDINAVIA.—The festival called Jul, in honour of Freyr, son of Odin, was our Yule.

GERMANY.—The Yule feast: the French Noël, the Scandinavian Jul, the Druidical Nolagh.

* * On this day [25 Dec.] the birth of Christ was lately fixed at Rome, in order that, while the heathen were busy with their profane ceremonies, Christians might perform their holy rites undisturbed.—CHRYSOSTOM.

December Laws (The), 1867, which gave to Hungary its present form of government.

Decembrists (in Russian history), 1825. Revolutionists who, at the death of Czar Alexander I., on 1 Dec., tried to introduce a constitutional government in Russia. This revolution was headed by some of the chief military and naval officers in the empire. It came to naught, and multitudes were imprisoned for long periods. Thus Colonel Battenkoff was imprisoned in the fortress of Petropavlovsk, in St. Petersburg, from Dec. 1825 to Feb. 1846, when he was exiled to West Siberia.

Decemviral Tribunal (The). Of Venice. Called in English the 'Council of the Ten,' or 'The Ten' (q.v.).

Decemvirs (The), or Council of Ten, B.C. 451. Appointed both to administer justice, conduct the government, and command the armies of Rome, as well as to draw up a new body of laws. Their code was called 'The Twelve Tables,' or Leges Duodecim Tabularum, the Magna Charta of old Rome. Abolished B.C. 449.

There were ten curators of the Sibylline Books called the Decemviri. Originally the curators were only two, called the Duumviri, appointed by King Tarquin. The number was increased to ten by the Licinian Laws, B.C. 366. Sulla added five more B.C. 82, and Julius Cæsar in about B.C. 46 augmented the number to sixteen.

Decided (The). A secret society sprung from the Carbonâri after the unsuccessful outbreak of 24 June, 1817. They were the Guelphs of the papal states, the republican 'Brother Protectors' of France, the 'Adelphi' of Piedmont, and the 'Society of the Black Pin.'

Decimation Tax (The), 1654. 'That all who had ever borne arms for the king, or had declared themselves to be of the royal party, should be decimated; that is, should pay a tenth part of all the estate which they had left to support the charge which the commonwealth was put to by the unquietness of their temper, and the just cause of jealousy which they had administered.'

The decimation tax was denounced as unjust, because it was a violation of the Act of Oblivion (q.v.).—Dr LINGARD, Hist. of Eng. viii. 7.

Declaration for refuting Four Scandals (A), 6 Dec., 1662. The four scandals which Charles II. abjured were these:—

I. That the Act of Indemnity was intended to be merely temporary.

II. That he intended to keep a large standing army.

III. That he was a persecutor.

IV. That he favoured popery.

Declaration at the Savoy, London (The), 29 Sept., 1658. A declaration of faith drawn up by the Independents in the Savoy, London; not unlike the Confession of Faith of the divines at Westminster. The chief difference is in the church government, which is wholly democratic.

The Church of England is governed by parliament and bishops, assisted by the deans and other ecclesiastics. The Presbyterian Church is governed by the presbyter and elders. The Independents leave all government to the discretion of each individual congregation.

Declaration of Breda, in Holland (The), 1660. In which Charles II., then in exile, promised a general amnesty to all concerned in the parliamentary wars, religious toleration, and satisfaction to the army. Sometimes called the 'Declaration from Breda.' There was this proviso—'unless parliament in its wisdom sees fit to determine otherwise.'

Declaration of Charles II. (The). I. 25 Oct., 1660. A declaration having for its professed objects 'the promotion of godliness, the encouragement of public and private religious services, the observance of the Lord's day, and the holiness of ministers.' It promised that all holy offices should be filled with holy men, that confirmation should be carefully performed, that bishops should have no civil power, that the liturgy should be revised, that the cross in baptism and bowing at the name of Jesus should be left free, and that only the oaths of allegiance and supremacy should be required, without subscription and canonical obedience.

II. For the Settlement of Ireland, 28 Nov., 1660. Whereby soldiers and adventurers who had been planted on the estates of the Irish by the Commonwealth were to retain them, except they had belonged to persons who had remained entirely neuter in the civil war. In such cases the soldiers and adventurers were to give back the estates to the Irish, and were to receive compensation from the 'fund of reprisals.'

Declaration of Cromwell (The), 1654. Forbidding any clergyman or fellow of a college to preach, be an instructor of youth, or administer the sacraments, under pain of imprisonment or exile. This prohibition continued in force till the Restoration.

Declaration of Dunfermline (The), 1650. In this instrument Charles II. was called upon by the Scotch presbytery to lament his father's opposition to the work of God and to the 'Solemn League and Covenant' (q.v.), which opposition had caused the blood of the Lord's people to be shed. He was called upon also to deplore the idolatry of his mother, the toleration of which in the king's house could not fail to provoke the anger of a jealous God, who visits the sins of the fathers on the children. He declared that he subscribed the covenant in sincerity of heart, and would in future have no friends but those who were friends to the covenant, and that such friends should in no wise be held his enemies. He acknowledged the sinfulness of the treaty with the bloody rebels of Ireland, which he now declared to be null and void. He declared his detestation of both popery and prelacy, as well as of idolatry and heresy, schism and profaneness. He promised to reform the Church of England and conform it to the Church of Scotland, according to a plan to be drawn out by the Assembly of the Divines of Westminster.

Declaration of George I., in 1728. George I. was a Lutheran, and in order to conform church and state to his own views, prohibited the clergy touching on politics in their sermons, but allowed Convocation to transact ecclesiastical business and make church canons.

Declaration of Independence (The). Signed 4 July, 1776, by the American Congress, declaring the 'United States of North America' independent and separated entirely from the British crown. The Independence was acknowledged by France 16 Jan., 1778, and by Holland 19 April, 1782; provisional articles of peace were signed by England 8 Sept., 1782. The Declaration was drawn up by Thomas Jefferson, of Virginia; John Adams, of Massachusetts; Roger Sherman, of Connecticut; Robert R. Livingstone, of New York; and Benjamin Franklin, of Pennsylvania. It was signed by eleven states, and the name American Colonies was changed into 'The United States' (of North America).

Provisional articles of peace were signed by England at Paris 3 Sept., 1782; the definitive treaty was signed at Paris 3 Sept., 1783; and John Adams was received by George III. as ambassador of the United States 2 June, 1785.

Declaration of Indulgence (The). I. 26 Dec., 1672. Published by Charles II. of England, 'by virtue of his ecclesiastical powers, suspending all penal laws against Nonconformists. The real object was to legalise the Catholic religion. In virtue of this edict John Bunyan left his prison at Bedford. The declaration was a mere political ruse whereby the 'traitor king' hoped to play into the hands of Louis XIV., and it was immediately followed by a dissolution of the triple alliance against France, and a declaration of war with Holland. The Commons, suspecting the villainy of the king, passed the Test Act; and the Duke of York, the Lord High Treasurer, and many high officers in the army, were obliged to retire from public life.

For the Declaration in the reign of James II. see p. 245.

II. 8 April, 1687, by James II. He removed the oaths and penalties from Dissenters, that Roman Catholics might be eligible to places of emolument and influence on his privy council, the two houses of parliament, the corporations, universities, the church, and even in the army and navy. It ran thus:—'We have thought fit, by virtue of our royal prerogative, to issue forth this our Declaration of Indulgence, making no doubt of the concurrence of our two houses of parliament when we shall think it convenient for them to meet.' See 'Declaration of Indulgence 1688.'

III. 1688, by James II. Commanding the bishops to instruct their clergy to read in their respective churches, in London on 20 May, and elsewhere on 27 May, the Declaration of 1687, with this additional clause, stating the king's unalterable resolution to secure to his subjects 'freedom of conscience for ever,' and of rendering merit henceforth the sole qualification for office. See 'Seven Bishops.'

Declaration of Jamestown (The), 1650. By ten Irish bishops and ten other clergymen, charging Ormond, the lord-lieutenant, with negligence, incapacity, and perfidy. They protested, however, that although they were compelled to withdraw from the government of the king's viceroy, they had no intention of disputing the royal supremacy; but under present circumstances the Irish were no longer bound by the articles of pacification. Next day they appended a form of excommunication against all those who abetted either Ormond or Ireton, in opposition to the interests of the Catholic confederacy.

Declaration of Liberty of Conscience (The), 27 April, 1688. Ordered to be read in all churches, 4 May. Seven bishops (q.v.) petitioned against the order May 18, and were committed to the Tower June 8. This Declaration, sometimes called a 'Declaration of Indulgence,' annulled the penal laws against Roman Catholics as well as against Nonconformists, and abrogated the Test Act. The object of James II. was to introduce popery, and to appoint papists to all offices of state, magistracies, and military posts.

Declaration of Rights (The). I. Tendered by the Convention to William and Mary, and accepted 13 Feb., 1689. This Declaration set forth how King James II. tried to subvert the laws and liberties of the kingdom by levying money without consent of parliament, by persecuting those who petitioned him, by keeping a standing army in time of peace, by violating freedom of election, by returning corrupt jurors, by excessive bail, fines, and punishments. And 'they do claim and insist on all and singular the premises, as their undoubted rights and liberties.' The Declaration, being accepted, was formed into a 'Bill of Rights.'

II. Sept. 1774. Passed by the first American Congress, which met in Carpenters' Hall, Philadelphia. It was attended by deputies secretly sent from twelve different states. The Declaration set forth that the colonists had lost neither the rights of nature nor the privileges of Englishmen by emigration, and consequently, that the late acts of the British Parliament were gross violations of their rights, especially as affecting Massachusetts. They resolved, therefore, to suspend all imports, or all use of imported goods, till harmony was restored between Great Britain and her American colonies.

III. May, 1776 (United States):—

I. All men are born equally free, possessing natural rights which no compact can deprive them of.
II. All power is vested in the people, from whom it is derived.
III. The people have an inalienable and indefeasible right to reform, alter, or abolish any form of government at their pleasure.
IV. The idea of an hereditary first magistrate is unnatural and absurd. [True, but popular elections are great evils.]

Declaration of Sports (The), 1617. Issued by James I. of England, to signify his pleasure that on Sundays, after divine service, 'no lawful recreation shall be barred to his good people. Nonconformists and others not attending divine service at church shall be prohibited from taking any part in the sports, nor shall anyone be allowed to go out of his own parish.' The sports specified in the Declaration as fit for Sunday are 'dancing, archery, leaping, vaulting, May-games, morrice-dances, and the setting-up of May-poles;' but bear and bull baiting, bowling, and interludes were forbidden. Charles I. (1633) also caused the Declaration to be read from the pulpit of parish churches.

Declaration of Toleration (The), 15 March, 1672. Suspending all penal laws on account of religion; promising licences and places of worship to Protestants, provided they met together with open doors; and granting liberty of private worship to all papists.

Declaration of Vienna (The), 13 March, 1815. An act published by the allies declaring Napoleon I. an outlaw.

Declaration of the Clergy. 'Déclaration du Clergé' 'or 'Libertés Gallicanes.' Insisting on a distinction between spiritual and temporal power; and placing infallibility not in the pope, but in the whole episcopal body united under the pope. This Declaration furthermore recognised the supreme authority of the general councils and of the sacred canons. As drawn up by Bossuet in 1682 it may be thus summarised:—

Que l'église doit être régie par les canons; que saint Pierre et ses successeurs n'ont reçu de puissance que sur les choses spirituelles; que les règles et les constitutions admises dans le royaume doivent être maintenues, et les bornes posées par nos pères demeurer inébranlables; que les decrets et jugements du pape ne sont irréformables qu'autant que le consentement de l'église est intervenu, &c.

Declaration of the Rights of Man (The). In French history. 1 Oct., 1789. Adopted by the Assemblée Constituante of Paris, setting forth all the new liberties, equality of imposts, and the eligibility of anyone and everyone to public offices. Called in French, 'La Déclaration des droits de l'homme et du citoyen.' It was drawn up by Comte Emanuel Sieyès, better known as l'Abbé Sieyès.

The Abbé Sieyès was a monarchist, and declared a monarchy to be more favourable to liberty than a republic. He opposed the licentiousness of the press, declined sitting in the Convention, opposed the Jacobins throughout, and declared that the Convention could not constitutionally try Louis XVI. for his life, because such a proceeding would make the Convention both accuser and judge. Sieyès was one of the few prominent men who survived the Revolution, and died in his bed at the age of 88.

Declaratory Act (The), 1766. An act declaratory of the supreme power of parliament over the colonies. This act the Americans objected to, although the Stamp Act was repealed.

Decorated English, 1275–1375. In architecture; succeeded the Early English or Lancet style. It is more ornamental, and the principal lines run pyramidically rather than horizontally or vertically.

Decoration or Memorial Day, 30 May. An annual holiday in the United States of America to honour those deceased soldiers of the north who took part in the war between the Federals and Confederates. The cemeteries are visited and decorated with wreaths of flowers.

In the extreme south, where spring comes in earlier, an earlier day is taken.

Decree of Berlin (The), 21 Nov., 1806. Also called the Continental System, which declared the British Isles in a state of siege, and prohibited all commerce and correspondence with the hated nation. Every Englishman found in a country occupied by France was declared a prisoner of war. All merchandise belonging to an Englishman was lawful prize. All trading in British goods was forbidden. And, by a subsequent addition to this decree, all English goods, wherever found, were to be burnt.

Decree of Fontainebleau (The), 18 Oct., 1810. Ordering that all English goods wherever found should be burnt in all countries directly or indirectly belonging to France.

Decree of 3 Ventôse, Year III. (The), 21 Feb., 1795. The state undertakes to pay salaries to the Catholic clergy; but any persons may freely exercise any other form of religious worship, provided they violate no law, and pay their own expenses. See the 'Law of Germinal.'

Decretals. The second volume of the canon law, containing the responses of sundry popes and church councils to questions put to them. The first collection was made by Dionysius Exiguus somewhere about 550; but what is generally understood by the word is the compilation made by Gratian, a Benedictine monk, in 1151. This was supplemented by Pope Gregory IX. about a century later, and the supplement was called Extra. Boniface VIII. supplied a sixth volume, called Sexte, and the letters of Clement V., called Clementines, make two more volumes. The last volume, called Extravagantes contains the decisions of the popes between Urban IV. and Sixtus IV. both included. See 'False Decretals.'

Decretum of Gratian (The), 1151. A compilation by Gratian, an Italian monk, of canons, papal epistles, and patristic sentences, arranged into titles and chapters, like the Pandects.

This decretum gives authority to the False Decretals of Isidore. It was supplemented in 1234 by the decretals of Raimond de Pennafort, which consist almost entirely of the rescripts issued by the later popes, especially Alexander III., Innocent III., Honorius III., and Gregory IX. The decretum is nearly obsolete.

Dec'uman Gate (The). The rearward gate of a camp. The opposite or front gate was the prætōrian gate. In a Roman camp there were always four gates. The prætorian gate faced the enemy; the decuman gate was the furthest from the enemy, and was called dec'uman, because the tenth legion were posted near it. The gate on the right side of the camp was the porta principalis dextra, and the one opposite to it on the left side was porta principālis sinistra.

Decūmus is another spelling of decimus (tenth), as maxūmus is of maximus.

Dee's Speculum (Dr.). In which persons were told they could see their friends in distant lands, and how they were occupied. It is generally said that this speculum was a 'polished piece of cannel coal,' but this is a mistake, as it was a piece of solid pink-tinted glass about the size of an orange. It is now in the British Museum.

Deed-bote. Amends for misdeeds, sometimes substantial and sometimes only chastisement or punishment; satisfaction. (Dæd-bót, an act of atonement.)

Confession, restitution, deed-bote, and penance were strictly enforced [by St. Dunstan].—Early English Church.

Deemsters. In the Isle of Man. There are two judges so called, whose courts are held weekly, alternately at Douglas and Castletown, by the deemster of the southern division, and at Ramsey and Peel (or Kirk Michael) by the deemster of the northern division. An appeal from the deemster's judgment may be made to the staff of government.

In the Isle of Man and in Jersey, deemsters decide disputes without process or charge. They are chosen by the contending parties (Ang.-Sax., dema, an umpire). At one time there was a deemster, or demster, attached to the High Court of Justiciary in Scotland, who pronounced the 'doom' or sentence of condemned persons; the office was attached to the executioner, but has been long abolished.

Referred to in Scott's 'Old Mortality' and 'Heart of Mid-Lothian.'

Deev-bend (devil-binder). Tah-Omars was so called from his victories over his enemies (deevs). A mythic shah of Persia placed B.C. 870–840. His successor was his nephew, the famous Jam-schēd.

Defender of the Faith. I. John de Torquemada (1388–1468). He was a Dominican, born at Valladōlid, and received in 1437 the honour of 'Defender of the Faith' from the Council of Basle. He denounced the heresies of Wyclif and of Huss. He was finally made a cardinal.

II. 'Fidĕi Defensor,' 1521. A title conferred by Leo X. on Henry VIII. of England in grateful acknowledgment of a book written in Latin against Martin Luther, entitled 'A Defence of the Seven Sacraments' (Assertio Septem Sacramentorum adversus Martinum Lutherium). The pope subsequently withdrew the title, but in the thirty-fifth year of the king's reign the parliament legally confirmed it, and it still remains.

The title had been assumed by Richard II. in his proclamation against Wyclif. Henry IV. in 1411 had been styled 'The Chief Defender of the Orthodox Faith,' and Henry III. was called 'Defender of the Church.' The bull of Leo X. was preserved by Sir Robert Cotton, and is signed by the pope, 4 bishop-cardinals, 15 priest-cardinals, and 8 deacon-cardinals. Henry's book is now in the Vatican, and contains this inscription in the king's handwriting: 'Anglorum rex Henricus Leoni X. mittit hoc opus et fidei testem et amicitiæ.'

 The title 'Defender of the Faith' seems to have been given to advocates of ecclesiastical suits who defended the Church against those who opposed its doctrines, rules, and discipline.

Defenders. I. A.D. 407. Ecclesiastical history. Church officers. In 420 one or more were appointed to each patriarchal church.

II. 1690. An Irish secret association formed after the battle of the Boyne in defence of the Catholics. Opposed by the Orangists. They were very active in the uprisings between 1798–1803.

III. 1795. An Irish Roman Catholic association organised in self-defence against the Peep-o'-Day Boys, a Presbyterian association which arose in Ireland in 1790. In 1688 all the Catholic property of Ireland was confiscated. In the latter part of the 18th cent. some attempts were made to ameliorate this injustice, and the Protestants of the north clamouring for 'Protestant ascendency' associated themselves into a society called 'The Peep-o'-Day Boys,' whose object was to maintain the Protestant ascendency, and resist all Catholic encroachment. The Roman Catholics then organised themselves into a society called 'The Defenders,' and collisions became common, but the principal aggressions of the Defenders were nocturnal plunder, house-breaking, and murder. In 1795 a pitched battle was fought in the county of Armagh, attended with much bloodshed. Ultimately the Defenders amalgamated with the United Irishmen (q.v.), and the great opponents were the Orangemen, a Protestant association. See 'Irish Associations.'

The battle of the Diamond, in which the Catholics of Ireland sustained great loss, was fought 21 Sept., 1795, and the first Orange lodge was formed later in the same day.

Defenestration of Prague (The), 23 May, 1618. That is, the ejection out of windows by the Bohemians. The Bohemians had two Protestant churches, one in the diocese of Prague, and the other in the territory of the abbot of Braunau. The archbishop of Prague and the abbot pulled down these reformed churches, and when the Protestants remonstrated they were told it was the king's pleasure. So Count Thurn of Bohemia headed a deputation which went to the royal castle of Prague to lay their grievance before the king. Being admitted into the council hall, they were so insolently received that they threw two of the councillors and the king's private secretary out of the windows into the moat. This was the beginning of the Thirty Years' War.

Precisely the same thing occurred at Prague in 1419, when someone from the royal castle threw a stone at a procession of Bohemian reformers. Instantly a rush was made into the council hall, and thirteen of the magistrates were thrown out of the windows into the streets.

Degree of Meridian. First measured by Eratosthĕnês between Syēnê and Alexandria, about B.C. 196; next by Posidonius between Alexandria and Rhodes, A.D. 112–150; then by the brothers Ben Shaku by order of the calif Al Mamûn, on the plain south of Damascus, A.D. 813–833. It was measured from London to York by Norwood in 1633–1635. It was measured in France by the Abbé Picard, between Amiens and Malvoisine, in 1669–1671. It was measured in Lapland by Maupertius, Clairaut, and others in 1735; in Peru by Bouguer and others in 1735; at the Cape of Good Hope by Lacaille in 1752.

Dei Gratia. Introduced into English charters in 1106. It continued in the British coinage up to 1849, when it was discontinued in the florins, thence called the 'graceless florins.' These coins were recalled the same year, and the letters D.G. were restored.

It is in reality a relic of the exploded doctrine of the 'divine right of kings.' Thus M.N. is king by divine right, or Dei gratia, and not by human appointment, or hominum gratia.

Deilemites. See 'Di'-le-mites.'

De'ipassia'ni or 'Patripassionists.' Certain Unitarians who maintained that God is one and indivisible, and denied the three personalities of the Trinity. Hence, said they, the being crucified on Calvary was not God the Son (for there is no such being), but God the Father, or the one and only God. St. Augustine refers to these 'heretics.'

Dek'abrist. A Decembrist, from Dekaber, the Russian for December. It denotes those persons who suffered death or captivity for the part they took in the military conspiracy which broke out in St. Petersburg in December 1825, on the accession of Czar Nicholas to the throne.

Delaval Papers (The). A large collection of letters, state papers, and old records belonging to the Delaval family of Seaton Delaval, discovered by John Robinson in 1888 in certain store-rooms of the disused Royal Northumberland Glass Works, Hartley, near Seaton Delaval Hall, and presented to the museum of the Society of Antiquaries. See 'Notes and Queries,' 1889, May 25, pp. 415, 416.

Delaware (Pennsylvania). The English name of an Indian tribe (the Lenâpe) with which William Penn chiefly negotiated.

Delaware (U.S. North America). A river and a state so called from Lord Delaware, governor of Virginia under James I. He rendered the colony great services (died 1618). The nickname of the inhabitants of this state is Musk-rats.

Visited by Lord Delaware in 1610; was settled by Swedes in 1627; passed to the Dutch in 1655; was ceded to England in 1664; made into a separate colony in 1704 (but was attached to Pennsylvania); and became one of the United States in 1776.

Delegates (The High Court of), 1583. Established by Act of Parliament (25 Hen. VIII. c. 19) as a tribunal of appeal from the Ecclesiastical and Admiralty Court. The jurisdiction was transferred to the Privy Council in 1832 (2, 3 Will. IV. c. 92).

Delegation (The), 1867. A body of delegates in the Austro-Hungarian kingdom, in which both states are equally represented; the house acts in matters which affect both the kingdoms, such as relations with foreign countries, army and navy, peace and war, &c. Besides this house each kingdom has its own legislative chambers, consisting of an upper and lower house.

Delenda est Carthago. Carthage must be destroyed, or wiped out of the nations of the earth. The words with which old Cato used to finish his speeches. Alexander said to the same effect, 'No world two suns can bear'—that is, Persia and Macedonia cannot both exist together. Napoleon said that London must be stamped out.

Delicate Investigation (The), 1806. This was a closed-door investigation by the four lords, Erskine, Grenville, Spencer, and Ellenborough, into the conduct of the Princess Caroline, cousin and wife of George, prince regent of Wales, with the view of a separation for alleged adultery. The real cause of offence was the intimacy of the prince with Lady Jersey, whose dismissal, demanded by Caroline, was refused. The four lords gave a very unsatisfactory verdict of 'Undue levity,' and the princess was banished from the receptions at Windsor. A trial was afterwards arranged, called 'a Bill of Pains and Penalties,' 1820. Denman and Brougham undertook the defence, and the Bill was abandoned—i.e. the queen was acquitted—in November. She was refused admission into Westminster Hall at the coronation of her husband (July 1821) and died the following August.

Delight of Mankind (The). Titus the Roman emperor (40, 79–81).

Delinquents, 1641. Those proceeded against for having exercised illegal powers in levying arbitrary taxes, and in the sentences of the Star Chamber, High Commission, and so on.

There was an order of Parliament directing the confiscation of their estates. In this order certain bishops and other of the clergy are named. We constantly find them coupled with Papists.

Della Crusca (L'Accademia), or 'Della Cruscan School,' 1582. Instituted at Florence; but in 1785 a number of English residents at Florence assumed the name of 'Della Cruscans,' and amused themselves by writing verses which they published in the 'Florence Miscellany.' These verses were conspicuous for affectation and insipidity, but got introduced into two daily English newspapers, 'The World' and 'The Oracle.' Gifford says the epidemic spread 'from fool to fool'; but in 1794 Gifford's 'Baviad,' and in 1796 his 'Mæviad,' so mauled these simpletons that the name of 'Della Cruscan' became a by-word for literary puerility.

Gifford's Della Cruscan bookworm, who 'lives upon a whilome for a week,' has become proverbial.

Delphine Classics (The), 1670–1680. 'In usum Delphini.' The chief Latin authors, edited by Pierre Huet for the French dauphin. They contain, in the margin of the text, the 'interpretatio' in italic type, and at the bottom of each page a commentary which explains every allusion and difficulty. At the close is a verbal concordance of great value, added chiefly by the Daciers (husband and wife).

They were republished by Valpy in 166 volumes, 1819–1830.

Delta of 'Blackwood's Magazine' was David Macbeth Moir, 1798–1851. He was author of 'Casa Wappy.'

Deluge. See 'Flood.'

Demagogische Umtriebe, 1817. An attempt of demagogues in Germany to stir up the people against the governments. In 1819 a committee was appointed to examine into it, and in 1834 a tribunal of arbitration was constituted.

Democratic Labour Association, 1890. Organised by Michael Davitt in Ireland, in opposition to Mr. Parnell's notion of peasant proprietorship. Davitt insists that there should be neither landlords nor proprietors of land, under any kind of denomination, whether farmers or independent gentlefolk, but that the people of the soil have each a natural right to 'a man's full share' of the land, which he has as much right to take from the farmer proprietor as from the landed proprietor. Mr. Parnell's platform is that farmers should be proprietors, not tenants. See 'Irish Associations.'

Démocratique et Sociale. See 'Days of June, II.,' p. 240.

Democritus Junior. Rev. Robert Burton, author of the 'Anatomy of Melancholy' (1576–1640).

Demon of the South (The). Philip II. of Spain (1527, 1555–1598).

Demosthenês (The High-born). William the Silent, prince of Orange.

The High-born Demosthenês electrified large assemblies by his indignant invectives against the Spanish Philip, 1568.—MOTLEY, The Dutch Republic, pt. iii. 2.

Demosthenes of America (The). Daniel Webster, the statesman. Like Demosthenês, he was neither florid nor impassioned, but he reasoned with irresistible force, and his language was terse, well chosen, and telling. He had the power of sarcasm, but seldom used it. His face, figure, and voice made him master of his audience.

Demosthenes of France (The). Comte de Mirabeau (1749–1791); also called 'The Hurricane,' from the overpowering force of his eloquence and irresistible audacity. He was so corpulent that he was jocosely called the Tub.

Demosthenes of the Pulpit. Dr. Thomas Rennell, dean of Westminster, was so called by William Pitt (1753–1840).

Demy (plu. Demies). A 'scholar' of Magdalen College, Oxford.

Denmark, i.e. dain-mark. Dain means flat, hence the German danieder, on the ground, &c. The Danskir occupied the flat or low lands between Gothland hills and the sea.

Denyer and Johnson Scholarships. Two for theology. Value 50*l.* a year each, tenable for one year. Founded in Oxford University from the revenue of the scholarship founded by John Johnson, D.D., fellow of Magdalen College, and the prizes offered by Mrs. Denyer for two theological essays. Incorporated in 1878.

Denys (St.). Martyred 251. The tradition is that after being beheaded he walked from Paris four miles to found an abbey, where now stands the town of St. Denys, carrying with him his head under his arm, and resting seven times on the way at equal distances to bless and console his followers. Crosses were erected at these seven places, and it was long customary to lay the dead which passed by on one of these crosses for a few minutes.

St. Denys, pronounce Sahn dnee.

Deodand. A chattel or chattels forfeited as a peace-offering to God for causing the death of a human being, as when a brick or tile falls on him, or the wheel of a cart runs over him. When the forfeit was transferred from the church to the crown, instead of the chattel being forfeited, a money-fine was imposed. Abolished 18 Aug., 1846 (6, 10 Vict. c. 62).

Deontology, 1830. Jeremy Bentham's system of the science of morality or Maxima felicitas doctrine. Deon, a Greek word, means 'right' or 'fit,' and the great aim of deontology is to secure the 'greatest happiness to the greatest number.' There can be no doubt that Bentham was in advance of his age, and many points once considered utopian are now established by law.

Departments, 1790. Territorial divisions of France made by the Constituent Assembly.

The 'Départements Maritimes' (3 syl.) are the five great ports, viz. Lorient, Brest, Toulon, Cherbourg, and Rochefort.

Deposed Kings of England.

I. Before the Conquest.
- Sigebert of Wessex, A.D. 755.
- Alcred of Northumbria, 774.
- Ethelred I., 779.
- Eardwulf and Ethelwulf, 857.
- Edwy, 957.
- Ethelred II., 1013.
- Hardicanute, son of Canute, 1037.

II. Since the Conquest.
- Edward II., 1327.
- Richard II., 1399.
- Henry VI., 1460.
- James II., 1688. Euphemistically called his 'abdication.'

Charles I. was not only deposed but tried for treason against his parliament and beheaded; Charles II. was not exactly deposed, but he was kept from the crown during the Commonwealth.

The most absolute and tyrannical of our sovereigns have been the Welsh and Scotch dynasties, but Wales and Scotland are eminently democratic.

The Stuarts claimed the 'right divine' of kings, but James I. and Charles II. did no honour to the claim.

Deposed Kings of France.
Louis XVI., like Charles I., was not only deposed but executed, 1793.
Napoleon I. (emperor) was twice deposed, 1814, 1815.
Charles X. (1830), like James II., is said to have 'abdicated.'
Louis-Philippe (1848), also said to have 'abdicated.'
Napoleon III., 1872.

Déprêtrisation, 7 Nov., 1793. When Mgr. Gobel, archbishop of Paris, and hundreds of the clergy appeared at the bar of the Convention, and declared they would henceforth acknowledge no master, in heaven or earth, except the sovereign people. They renounced their ministry, and abandoned the Christian religion.

Derby Day. The Wednesday of the great spring meeting which takes place at Epsom, in Surrey, in the month of May. The Derby week is the week succeeding Trinity Sunday, and Derby Day, which is the second day of the races, is the most important horse-race day in the kingdom and the greatest English holiday.

Derby is generally pronounced Dar'-be.

Derby Scholarship. In Oxford University. The recipient must have highly distinguished himself either in the final examination or as the winner of university scholarships and prizes. Founded in honour of Edw. Geoffrey S. Stanley, earl of Derby, chancellor of the university, by subscribers in Lancashire. Value, the interest of 4,300*l.* Founded 1870.

Derbyites or 'Darbyites.' A split from the Plymouth Brethren, under a Mr. Darby, on the subject of the human nature of Christ.

Derbyshire Hudibras (The). George Eyre.

Derbyshire Insurrection (The), 1817. Stirred up by Jeremiah Brandreth, a framework-knitter of Nottingham who induced 300 Derbyshire and Nottingham men, chiefly miners, to march with him to London and overturn the government. At Eastwood, some three miles from Nottingham, they were overtaken by a troop of horse-soldiers, and fled in all directions. Several were taken prisoners and three executed at Derby, one of whom was Brandreth the leader.

Derbyshire Neck (The). Goître or swelling in the throat produced, some think, by excess of lime in the water used for drinking.

Dervises, i.e. paupers, A.D. 759. A species of Moslem monk, of which there are thirty-two sects. They live in convents, the principal establishment being at Konieh, in Caramania. They fast every Thursday. They are great opium eaters and are given to strong drinks. The dancing dervises twist themselves round with extended arms for hours together, all the while repeating the name of Allah. Persia is noted for its dervises.

Descartes. See 'Cogito, ergo sum.'

Despairing Shepherd (The). Addison is meant, and the lady was the dowager Countess of Warwick. The ballad is by Nicholas Rowe (1716).

Despard's Conspiracy, 1803. A very foolish plot devised by Colonel Edward Despard of Ireland to assassinate the king (George III.), and establish in Great Britain and Ireland a republican form of government. Despard and six others were executed on Kennington Common. If Despard was not partly insane, this silly plot was out of revenge for being superseded in office on the Mosquito Shore in consequence of having got into some squabble with the colony.

Destroying Prince (The). Tamerlane or Timur the Tartar (1336, 1370–1405). So called in India because in 1396 he made in Delhi a general massacre of the inhabitants. It is said that 100,000 were put to death in a single hour (!)

Destructionists. Those Christians who believe that after the wicked have suffered in hell in proportion to their sins they will be destroyed. The Rev. Mr. Bourne of Norwich is the founder of this sect.

They deny that they teach the doctrine of annihilation; assert that destruction is the scripture term, and say they are not bound to be wise above what is written.

Determinists. Those who believe that the actions of men are not predetermined by God, but are determined by the nature which they inherit and surrounding circumstances.

Detroits (Treaty of), 13 July, 1841. Between England, Austria, France, Prussia, Russia, and Turkey; by which the sultan engaged to close the Bosphorus and the Dardanelles to all nations without distinction or favour; revoking the privilege accorded to Russia by the treaty of Unkiarskelessi.

Deus Vult. The war-cry of the first crusade (1096–1099). At the Council of Clermont in France, after Pope Urban had finished his address in favour of a crusade against the Saracens, the assembly shouted Deus vult (God wills it), the crowd outside took up the cry, and Urban, crossing his arms over his breast, and bending to the rails of the altar, said with deep emotion, 'God wills it, God's will be done.'

Deux-Ponts (The Dynasty of the). 'Deux-Ponts' is the French form of Zweibrücken in Bavaria. After the abdication of Christina, last of the dynasty of Gustavus Vasa, in Sweden, Charles X., of the principality of Deux-Ponts, was elected king of Sweden. The dynasty lasted from 1654 to 1751. Charles X. was cousin of Christina, but is generally called Charles the Aggressor. The successor of Charles X. was Charles XI. (1660–1697), 'The Golden Era of Art.' Then followed Charles XII., surnamed the Warlike, or 'Brilliant Madman.'

Deux-Ponts pronounce deh põ'n, 'n' very slight and nasal.

Devadassi (The). Indian girls attached to the temples. They prepare the garlands, dance and sing before the idols, and take part in all public processions. See 'Bayaderes.'

Devil (The). I. 'Le Diable.' Olivier Ledain, the tool of Louis XI., and once the king's barber. So-called from his malice and mischief-making. He was executed in 1484.

II. John Hunyades, surnamed Corvin (1400-1456), called 'The Devil' by the Turks, from the terror of his name. Called Corvinus from his crest, which was a crow with a gold ring in its beak.

Hunyades pronounce Hu'-ne-a-des.

III. Giovanni de' Medici was called Le Grand Diable (1498–1526). So-called by the French on account of his horrible cruelties at Caravaggio and Biagrasso in 1524.

IV. A noted public-house (No. 2, Fleet Street), purchased in 1788 by Child's Bank firm. Here the original Apollo Club was held, and here lawyers of the neighbourhood used to dine, sticking up a notice on their doors 'Gone to the Devil,' that those who wanted them might know where to find them. See the 'Heaven.'

Devil (Robert the). I. Robert of Normandy, surnamed the Magnificent, father of William the Conqueror (1028–1035).

II. Robert François Damiens, who attempted to assassinate Louis XV. (1714–1757). See 'Damiens.'

Devil (Son of the). Ezzelino, chief of the Ghibellins, governor of Vicenza. So called on account of his diabolical cruelties (1215–1259).

Devil (The French). Jean Bart, an intrepid French sailor born at Dunkirk (1650–1702).

Devil (The White). George Castriot, called 'The White Devil of Wallachia' (1404–1467).

Devil Dick. Richard Porson, the Greek critic (1759–1808).

Devil of Arras (The). Cardinal d'Alibi, sent in 1418 to negotiate a peace between the Armagnacs and Burgundians. The cardinal offered fair terms, but while the Count of Armagnac was signing the treaty the soldiers of Louis XI. massacred both him and his followers.

Devil of Vendée (The). J. Antoine Rossignol, the commissioner in the Vendéan War (1759–1802).

Devil's Bible (The). An exquisite MS. Bible, inscribed on 300 asses' skins, and taken to Stockholm after the 30 years' war. The tradition is that a poor monk was condemned to death, but was told that the sentence would be commuted if he would copy out on asses' skins the whole Bible in a single night. At night he made a compact with the devil to exchange his soul for the required transcript. The writing is exquisite, and every letter is a model. See 'Bibles.'

Each of the many editions of Tyndale's New Testament possesses some distinct characteristic by which it may be recognised. The edition of 1552 has a woodcut of the Devil with a wooden leg, sowing tares.—DORE, Early English Bibles.

Devil's Bridge (The). I. Over a precipice of Mount St. Gothard. It has only one arch.

II. In Cardigan, Wales. Over a precipice at the base of which flows Monk's brook.

Devil's Parliament (The). The parliament assembled by Henry VI. at Coventry, in 1459. So called because it passed attainders on the Duke of York and his chief supporters. See 'Parliament.'

Devil's Staircase (The). General Wade's road up the Corry Arrack, constructed after the rebellion of 1715. It wound up the mountain by seventeen zigzags, or traverses, and down the other side.

If this road you had seen before it was made,
You'd hold up your hands and bless General Wade.

Devil's Wall (The), in Germany, which extends from the Danube to the Rhine; built by the Romans to preserve the possessions south of Germany from the incursions of the Teutons and Germans. It was begun by Hadrian.

Devoirs of Calais. Customs due to the king for merchandise brought to Calais or exported therefrom while our staple was there.

A staple is a mart or place where goods are stored or exposed for sale. There were courts of staple, statutes of staple, and a mayor of the staple.

Devolution (The War of). See 'War of Devolution.'

Dewanny Adawlut (Court of). An Indian court for trying revenue and other cases. 'Adawlut' means a court of justice, and 'Dewanny' the jurisdiction of a dewan, a minister of the revenue department.

Dey. The chief of Algiers before the French conquest. The Algerian militia was under a pacha sent from Constantinople, but in 1600 permission was obtained from the sultan to elect a dey, to counteract the tyranny of the pacha-governors. The power of the deys grew rapidly, and in 1710 the dey Baba-Aly actually deposed the pacha and obtained from the sultan the investiture of regency. As the deys were always elected from Constantinople, they were always under the power of the sultan. In 1732 six deys were installed and assassinated in one day. The last dey of Algiers was Hussein, who reigned twelve years, up to the occupation of the French in 1830.

Dgelallian Era (The). The Persian era followed to this day, and begun in 1075. Dgel-al-Eddin, son of Alp-Arslan (the valiant lion), called Malek-Shah (1071–1092), appointed eight astronomers to reform the calendar.

Dharina Subha (The), 1830. A Hindu society formed at Calcutta for the purpose of keeping up the ancient usages of the Hindu faith, and especially of the Suttee, which the 'Company' had made illegal.

Diadem. A diadem was anciently a fillet worn round the head, and tied behind with a bow having long ends.

In Egypt, the diadem bore the symbol of the sacred serpent.

In France, Clovis wore a diadem; and François I. was the first to adopt a crown.

In Greece, Alexander the Great adopted the Persian diadem.

In Persia, the diadem was a blue fillet worked with white, and bound round the tiara or turban.

In Rome, Julius Cæsar bound his head with a diadem of laurel leaves. Diocletian introduced the Persian diadem. Constantine the Great habitually wore it ornamented with precious stones. Subsequent emperors adorned it with single or double rows of pearls and precious stones.

 What we now call a diadem is the gold and jewelled band springing from the coronet and arched over the cap. The Prince of Wales has one diadem to his crown, the sovereign has two crossing each other at right angles.

Dialogue with Trypho. By Justin Martyr, A.D. 156, in Latin. Trypho is a Jew supposed to be travelling in Greece, having been driven out of Palestine during the insurrection of Barchocab; and Justin Martyr is supposed to convert him. He shows from the Old Testament that Jesus Christ is the Messiah, and confutes the usual charges of the Jews against this theory. The disputations of the first and second day are lost.

Diamonds of note. (N.B. 151½ carats = 1 oz.)

The Great Mogul is the Koh-i-noor.

The Braganza diamond was discovered in Brazil, and is now among the Portuguese State jewels. It is the size of a hen's egg and is valued at 58 million pounds sterling. It has never been cut, and many fancy it must be a White Topaz; if so, the diamond of the Rajah of Mattan is the largest known. E. W. Streeter, in his 'Precious Stones and Gems' (p. 111), says it is valued at 58,850,000*l.*

 For the history of these diamonds see under the respective names.

Diamond Necklace (The), 1785. A necklace presented through Madame de Lamotte by Cardinal de Rohan, as he supposed, to Marie Antoinette. It was a swindling transaction of the Countess de Lamotte. The fact is this. The Cardinal de Rohan, a profligate churchman, entertained a love passion for the queen; and the Countess de Lamotte induced him to purchase for 85,000*l.* a diamond necklace, made for Madame Dubarry, and present it to the queen. The cardinal handed the necklace to the countess, and when the time of payment arrived Boehmer, the jeweller, sent his bill in to the queen. Marie Antoinette denied all knowledge of the matter, and in the trial which ensued it was proved that the countess had sold the necklace to an English jeweller and kept the money. The trial lasted nine months, and created immense scandal.

Diane de France. The Duchess of Angoulême (1538–1619). She married François de Montmorency, and in 1572 contrived his escape from the massacre of St. Bartholomew. She exercised great influence over Henri III. and Henri IV. of France.

Diane de Poitiers (1499–1566). Married Louis de Brézé. Her influence in the court of Henri II. of France was paramount. The king created her Duchesse de Valentinois. Even Catherine de Medicis, the queen, was under the thumb of the court favourite. At the death of Henri II. she retired to Anet, and disappeared wholly from public life.

Diapason. See 'Musical Scale,' &c.

Diapente (4 syl.). See 'Musical Scale,' &c.

Diatessaron. See 'Musical Scale,' &c.

Diatessaron (Tatian's). An heretical précis of Four 'Gospels,' ascribed to Tatian, and supposed to confirm the existence of four gospels, and only four, received by the church at the time. There were three or more Tatians in the first four centuries of some celebrity:

I. The Platonic philosopher (born in Syria, A.D. 130), a disciple of Justin the Martyr, author of 'Discourses to the Greeks' (published by C. Gessner in 1546, and by Otto, Iéna, 1851). He became a Gnostic and chief of the Encratistès, or total abstainers.

II. Tatian of Mesopotamia, who lived in the 5th cent., author of the 'Diatessaron' in bad Greek; a Latin translation by Victor of Capua is inserted in the 'Library of the Fathers.'

III. A martyr who suffered death in the reign of Julian. His day is 12 Sept., &c.

Many erroneously ascribe the 'Diatessaron' to the Platonic Tatian, but the Greek of the 'Discourses' is far better than that of the 'Diatessaron,' and the style of thought is widely different.

Dickon of the Broom. Richard Cœur de Lion. So called from the genista or broom plant worn by his ancestors, as pilgrims, symbolical of humility; whence the name Plantagenet. Strange as it may seem, never was there so proud and overbearing a line of princes as these self-styled 'humble ones.'

Dictator. The first dictator of Rome was Titus Lartius, created dictator B.C. 498, about nine years after the expulsion of the 'kings.' The cause was the fear of a domestic sedition. Cincinnatus was dictator B.C. 458; Mamercus Æmilius in 437, 433, and 426; Quintus Servilius, B.C. 439; Camillus was five times dictator, B.C. 396, 390, 389, 368, 367; Papirius about 320; and Fabius Maximus 315. After B.C. 202 the office fell into abeyance; but in B.C. 82 it was revived by Sulla; in B.C. 48 Julius Cæsar was dictator. The office was offered to Augustus B.C. 23, but declined.

The office was formally abolished by Antony B.C. 44.

Dictator of Letters (The). Voltaire (1694–1778).

Dictum of Kenilworth (The), 15 Oct., 1266. After the battle of Evesham and death of Simon de Montfort, Montfort's younger son shut himself up in Kenilworth Castle, and there sustained for six months a siege by the royal forces of Henry III., but at the end of six months he surrendered. A decree was then enacted that hereafter all who took up arms against the ruling sovereign shall pay to the crown five years' value of all their lands and possessions. This is called 'The Dictum of Kenilworth.'

Dido, niece of Jezebel.

ITHOBAL I., king of Tyre (1 Kings xvi. 18) had for children, BEL[US], Margenus, and Jezebel.
Belus was the father of PYGMALION and Dido (of Carthage).
Hence Jezebel was Dido's aunt.

Dies Fasti. Business days. On these days, marked F, the prætor administered justice, and assemblies of the people might be held. Subsequently a law was passed forbidding the holding of a comitia upon certain of the dies fasti.

Fasti dies, quibus certa verba legitima, sine piaculo, prætoribus licebat fari. Erant hæc tria, do [actionem], dico [jus], addico [aliquid meæ sententiæ].'—VARRO.

Dies Intercisi. Half-holidays. On these days it was lawful to administer justice one part of the day, but not for the other half.

Dies Iræ. A famous medieval hymn on the Last Judgment, beginning with the line 'Dies iræ, dies illa,' supposed to be the work of Thomas of Cela'no, a native of Abruzzi, in Naples, who died about 1255. It forms a portion of the service of the mass. The first and third stanzas are:

I.
Dies iræ, dies illa,
Solvet sæclum in favilla,
Teste David cum Sibylla.

III.
Tuba mirum spargens sonum
Per sepulcra regionum,
Coget omnes ante thronum.

I.
That day of wrath, that fearful day,
Shall melt both heaven and earth away,
As David and the Sibyl say.

III.
The trumpet by the angel blown
Shall wake the dead, bring bone to bone,
And summon all before the throne.

Dies Nefasti. Holidays. On these days it was unlawful to administer justice, and assemblies of the people could not be held. Marked N.

Numa nefastos dies fastosque fecit.—LIVY, bk. i. 19.

Diet (The). I. Of the old German Empire. It was summoned by the emperor twice a year, and oftener if needful, and met usually at Ratisbon. The emperor and his diet levied taxes, enacted laws, declared war, and made peace. The diet consisted of three chambers, that of the electors, that of the princes, and that of the Imperial cities. Each chamber deliberated separately, and then the electors and princes ratified or refused the proposition. If they ratified it, the emperor was asked to sign it, and it became law.

Switzerland and Poland had their diets. Greek διαιτηται, the diet of the Διαιτηται, or justices-in-eyre.

II. Of the German Bund. A permanent assembly containing the plenipotentiaries of the thirty-five sovereign states. The place of meeting was the free city of Frankfort-on-the-Main. The diet might be either a plenum of seventy representatives, or a federative council of seventeen. Every state of the Bund has at least one vote in the plenum; Austria, Prussia, Bavaria, Saxony, Hanover, and Würtemberg had four votes each, five other states had three votes each, and three other states had each a double vote. In the minor or federative council the eleven principal states had one vote each, and all the rest of the states six votes amongst them. Austria always presided. Superseded in 1848 by the National Assembly. See 'Reichstag.'

This was all changed in 1871. As to Hanover, it is now only a geographical name. It was attached to Prussia in 1866.

Diet of Augsburg (The). I. 1530. Convened by Karl V. to put an end to the Lutheran controversy. At this diet the Protestant party presented and read out their 'Confession,' or summary of their faith. This summary spread over twenty-eight chapters, and had been drawn up by Melanchthon. A confutation on behalf of the Romanists was put in, and met the emperor's approval. It was therefore decreed that all Protestants shall forthwith return to their allegiance to the see of Rome on pain of the emperor's severe displeasure. This decision led the Reformers into an alliance, called 'The League of Smalkald' (q.v). See 'Augsburg Confession.'

There were three other diets, so-called, in 1500, 1518, 1548 (see 'Interim'); and 1555, which conceded to the Lutherans liberty of conscience. See next article.

II. 26 Sept., 1555. Also called 'The Religious Peace of Augsburg.' According to the treaty of Passau (1552) an imperial council was called for the autumn of 1555. Karl V. would take no part in it; he was disgusted at the turn of affairs, and deputed his brother Ferdinand, 'king of the Romans,' to represent him. The diet was held at Augsburg, and full liberty of conscience was confirmed. Lutherans and Catholics were declared alike eligible to all offices of the state, and to seats in the imperial diet. Every ruler in Germany might sanction in his own province whatever form of religion he chose, but all were to tolerate those who held different views.

Diets of Compearance. Scotland. The days on which a party to a civil or criminal process is cited to appear in court. Till 1823 there were two such diets, because there were two summonses, but since then only one summons and one diet to a process.

Diet of Hungary (The). Is composed of the king (i.e. Emperor of Austria) and two chambers. The upper chamber consisting of the higher clergy, the magnates, the two courts of appeal, and two representatives from each chapter, county, city, and privileged district.

Diet of La Magione (The), 1502. The confederacy of Cardinal Orsini, his brother Paolo, Vitellozzo Vitelli, and other magnates, to assassinate Cesare Borgia. Cesare by craft managed to assemble all the lords of this conspiracy, apart from their troops, in the castle of Sinigaglia, where he had them all strangled.

Diet of Roncaglia (The), 12 Nov., 1158. It declared Italy to pertain to the empire of Germany.

Diet of Spire or Speyer (The). In Bavaria. I. A.D. 1526. Called by the German princes to terminate the religious differences stirred up by Martin Luther. It was resolved to request the Emperor Karl V. to call a general council, and in the interim each individual state in Germany was to regulate its own church matters.

II. A.D. 1529. In which the decrees of the previous diet were revoked and declared to be illegal. The Edict of Worms was directed to be put in full force; and the Gospels were not to be preached except in the sense approved of by the Church. The Lutheran princes protested against this decision of the diet, and appealed to the emperor (Karl V.) and to the next general council. Hence arose the name of Protestants. See 'Diet of Worms.'

Diet of Switzerland (The). Is composed of the representatives of the several cantons, and is held every two years, alternately at Zürich, Berne, and Lucerne. Each canton has a vote.

Diet of Worms (The). I. 1495. Maximilian asked for troops against Charles VIII. of France; but instead of troops the diet proclaimed a perpetual peace, by which decree private feuds were stamped out; for instead of appeals to arms the angry barons were commanded to refer their grievances to courts of law.

II. The Diet of 1521, to which Charles-quint (Karl V.) cited Luther, and commanded him to recant. Luther made answer: 'Whatsoever can be shown in my writings contrary to the Word of God I will freely retract; but he who shall take away from that book or add thereto, God will take away his part from the Book of Life.' Luther was then dismissed. This is what is generally meant by the 'Diet of Worms.'

The other diets of Worms were those of 1547 and 1578.

Dietrich. A German way of spelling Theodoric, the great Gothic hero.

Dieu et mon Droit. Assumed as a motto by Richard Cœur de Lion (1189–1199). It was revived by Edward III. in 1340.

Diffusion of Useful Knowledge (Society for the), 1825. Consisting chiefly of eminent public characters and men of distinguished literary and scientific merit. The object was the diffusion of useful knowledge to all classes of society, by periodical literature. Mr. Henry (afterwards Lord) Brougham was the leader, and published the first book, on 'The Objects, Advantages, and Pleasures of Science,' in 1827.

Digest. The Pandects of Justinian, in fifty books, containing the opinions of eminent lawyers on points of Roman law, digested or arranged in systematical order by Tribonian and sixteen assistants. It was finished in three years, A.D. 533. Digesta is the Latin term; the proper Greek title is Pandectæ. The symbol is ff, a corruption of the Greek π (p). A manuscript copy of Justinian's Digest was discovered at Amalfi in 1137, and was carried from Pisa to Florence in 1411.

Dilemee (The). The middle part of Ghilan, raised into a separate government by Abu Shujah ul Buiyah, a fisherman, while Persia was under the califs (10th cent.). The government of the Dilemee included Irak, Fars, Kerman, Khuzistan, and Laristan.

Dilemites (3 syl.) or 'Bouides,' (2 syl.). A Mussulman dynasty (932–1055) in Fars, Kerman, Khuzistan, Laristan, and part of Irak, contemporary with the Samanides (q.v.), while Persia was a province of the califs. Founded by Abu Shujah ul Buiyah, a fisherman of Dilem in Mazanderan. He had three sons, and an astrologer told him all his sons should be kings, and so it was: Ali, his eldest son, was king of Fars and Irak Adjemî. Dying childless, he was succeeded by his brother Ruken u Dowlut Hussein Buiyah. The third of the fisherman's sons was virtually king of Bagdad. Persia was at the time a province of the Califs.

The Samanides (q.v.) were contemporary from 903 to 999.

Dilettanti Society (The). A society of some sixty gentlemen for the study of antique art, formed into a club in 1734, and holding its meetings in the Thatched-house Tavern, St. James Street. In 1764 three members were sent to the East to make drawings: they were Mr. Chandler for the literary part, Mr. Revett for the architectural part, and Mr. Pars to take drawings of bas-reliefs and views. They returned in 1766, and published two magnificent volumes. In 1811 another expedition was sent out, viz. Mr. Gill (Sir William), Mr. Francis Bedford, and Mr. John Gandy, who visited Asia Minor, and published two volumes of drawings, one in 1817 and the other in 1835. These are all first-class works. The following gentlemen were members of the society: Sir Joshua Reynolds, Charles James Fox, the Duke of Norfolk, George Selwyn, David Garrick, George Colman, Lord Holland, Sir Joseph Banks, and Sir George Beaumont.

Dinner Bell (The). Edmund Burke (1729–1797), though a great orator, was, especially in the latter part of his life, most prolix. General Fitzpatrick said of him:—

Ask any person in the house who is the best-informed man, and the answer will certainly be Mr. Burke. Ask who is the greatest wit, and the answer will be Mr. Burke. Who is the most eloquent? Mr. Burke. Who is the most tedious? Mr. Burke.

Dionysian Cycle (The). The cycle harmonising the Alexandrine and Roman usage. It was Dionysius Exiguus who constructed this table, which was in use till the reform of the calendar by Gregory XIII., in the latter half of the 16th cent.

Dionysian Period (The), or 'Great Paschal Period,' 532 years. The Ethiopians, who use the 'Era of Diocletian,' do not date as we do, consecutively from one period, but after the lapse of 532 years begin again. This is called the 'Dionysian Period.'

Dionysius the Areopagite (Acts xii. 34). The books called the 'Celestial Hierarchy,' 'Mystical Theology,' and the 'Name of God,' ascribed to him, are spurious, and certainly are not earlier than the 5th cent. See 'Literary Forgeries.'

Diploma (A). A 'libellus duorum foliorum,' written on one side, granted by a magistrate either for a passport or to confer some privilege or favour on the person named therein. Greek διπλόος double, διπλόω to double, δίπλωμα.

Diploma Leopoldinum. The constitution of Transylvania, granted by Leopold I.—the Magna Charta of Transylvanian freedom. It guaranteed religious toleration, the existence of Hungarian laws, and the reservation of offices and appointments of state to natives only, and a large number of minor immunities.

Directions (The), 1695. For the unity of opinion in the doctrine of the Trinity, issued by command of William and Mary under the advice of Archbishop Tenison. It followed the Injunctions for the maintenance of church discipline.

Directory (The). 'Le Directoire,' the executive of the Constitution of Year III. (27 Oct., 1795—9 Nov., 1799). The legislature consisted of two houses, the Council of Elders and the Council of 500. The number of the directors was five, named by the two councils, and they were elected for five years, without power of re-election. They appointed the ministers and les généraux-en-chef. Abolished by Napoleon in Nov. 1799.

The military glory of France was never greater than in the Directory. It had for its commanders Bonaparte, Kléber, Desaix, Masséna, and Moreau.

Directory for Public Worship (The), or 'The Directory,' 1645. A book put forth by the Westminster Assembly of Divines (q.v.) to supersede the Book of Common Prayer. The Creed, the Lord's Prayer, the Ten Commandments were omitted; the sign of the cross in baptism, private and lay baptism, and the use of the ring in matrimony were disallowed; the Confession, the absolution in the 'Visitation of the Sick,' the Burial Service, saints' days, and Christmas Day were dispensed with; the Apocrypha, vestments, crosses, crucifixes, roodscreens were forbidden. For the use of the people the Assembly put forth their 'Larger and Shorter Catechisms.' The Directory contained directions, but no prayers. It is almost obsolete.

Disastrous Peace (The). 'La Paix Malheureuse,' 1558. Made after the battle of Gravelines. It was signed at Cateau-Cambrésis. By this treaty Henri II. of France renounced all claim to Genoa, Naples, Milan, and Corsica. Thus ended the Italian war, which had lasted for sixty-five years (1483–1559).

Discalceati of the Augustine Order were reformed by Friar Thomas of Jesus, a Portuguese, in 1570.

Disciples of Christ (The), or the 'Disciples.' Members of the 'Church of Christ,' or 'Campbellite Baptists.' Organised by Alexander Campbell, who emigrated to America early in the 19th cent. They are Baptists, and think all Christians have departed from the simplicity of the gospel. They ignore all creeds, and take the Bible as their only rule of faith and practice.

Discipline (The First Book of), 1560. Was drawn up by John Knox and four other ministers, laying down rules for the Scotch, for the election of their church ministers by the congregation, for their examination by the elders, for the election of elders, the way of dealing with ecclesiastical offenders, and other matters of discipline.

'The Second Book of Discipline, 1578. An expoaition of Presbyterianism by the Committee of the General Assembly, in which Andrew Melville took a leading part. It sets forth the line of demarcation between the civil and ecclesiastical powers, the platform being Presbyterianism.

Discoverers, 1623. Agents employed by the English government, in the reign of James I., to scrutinise Irish titles to estates, and to discover flaws if possible. Their reward was a part of the lands discovered to have faulty titles.

The disturbed state of Ireland, and the law fluctuating between English and Irish tenure, caused great laxity in the enrolment of patents and rights of all sorts in Ireland, and full 500,000 acres were added to the crown by the Discoverers.

Dispersion (Day of the), 5 July. Instituted 1098, in commemoration of the dispersion of the apostles, each of whom then went to a specific field of labour.

Dissenters' Acts (The). In the reign of Charles II.

The Corporation Act (q.v.), excluding dissenters from municipal offices, 1661 (13 Car. II. st. 2, c. 1).

The Act of Uniformity (q.v.), 1662 (14 Car. II. c. 4).

The Conventicle Acts (q.v.) of 1664 (16 Car. II. c. 1) and 1670 (22 Car. II. c. 1), forbidding conventicle assemblies.

The Five Mile Act (q.v.), 1665 (17 Car. II. c. 2).

The Test Act (q.v.), 1673 (25 Car. II. c. 2), excluding dissenters from government offices.

See also the Toleration Act, exempting dissenters from certain penalties, 1689 (1 Will. & Mary, c. 18); the Savoy Conference (q.v.), 1661; and the 'Seven Bishops.'

Dissidents (The), of Poland, 1548. The Greek Church party, with the Calvinists, Arians, and other Protestants. In 1573 Henry of Valois, by the 'Pacta Conventa,' gave freedom of worship and equality of rights to all Poles, regardless of their religious creeds; but still the Catholics persecuted and oppressed the dissidents. In 1736 the 'Pacta Conventa' was repealed. Russia interfered on behalf of the dissidents (for Russia belonged to the Greek Church), and was supported by England, Prussia, Sweden, and Denmark, but without success. In 1767 the dissidents united into what was called the Confederation of Radom, and applied to Russia to support their cause. Next year the Catholics of Poland, calling themselves 'patriots,' combined into the Confederation of Bar. Poland was divided. Russia interfered, and this led, in 1772, to the partition of Poland.

Dissidents. In Polish history. Originally the Polish Christians generally spoke of themselves as 'nos dissidentes in religione' from the Catholic Church; but in 1572 the Catholics called the Lutherans 'dissidents' and the Greek Church 'schismatics.'

Dissolution of Monasteries (The). The lesser monasteries, entirely dissolved in 1539 (31 Hen. VIII. c. 13), were restored by Queen Mary, but again suppressed, and the property vested in the crown 1559 (1 Eliz. c. 24).

Distinguished Service Order (The), Nov. 1886. A naval and military order founded by Queen Victoria for distinguished merit in the United Kingdom.

Ditch (The), 625, or 'Expedition of the Nations.' The great defeat of the Koreish tribe by Mohammed; after which the tribe concluded a truce and then surrendered Mecca to him.

Dithmarschen War (The). Count Gerhard VII. of Holstein attempted to subjugate Dithmarsch, but the inhabitants resisted, and defeated the count with considerable loss (1386). In 1500 John I. of Denmark resolved to subjugate the rebels, and marched into Dithmarsch with an army of 30,000 men; but he was utterly defeated, and the sacred banner called 'the Dannebrog' became the trophy of the conquerors.

Diversions of Purley (The). A philological treatise by John Horne Tooke (Pt. I., 1786; Pt. II., 1805), to prove that all words were originally formed from objects of external perception. Called 'Purley' from the residence of William Tooke, his benefactor. The title of the work is headed by the Homeric phrase ἔπεα πτερόεντα.

The persons of the dialogue are: B (for Dr. Beadon, afterwards bishop of Gloucester); H (for Horne Tooke), and T (for William Tooke).

Divine Aspasia. 'Whom to know is a liberal education.' (Steele, 'Tatler,' No. 49; Lady Elizabeth Hastings, 1682–1739).

Divine Doctor (The), or the 'Ecstatic Doctor.' Johan van Ruysbroeck, the mystic, born at Ruysbroeck, near Brussels (1294–1381).

Divine Legation (The), or, in full, 'The Divine Legation of Moses demonstrated.' By William Warburton, bishop of Gloucester (1738), to prove that the Pentateuch must be a divine revelation, because it is silent on the subject of a future state. This extraordinary production has laid under tribute such a parade of learning as was never equalled, except, perhaps, in Burton's 'Anatomy of Melancholy.' Everyone is aghast at the learning, but no one is convinced.

Divine Right of Kings (The). A 17th cent. dogma, implying the belief that kings hold their office by divine appointment, and are the earthly representatives of deity. So they are in a theocracy like Judæa and the popedom. The dogma was sanctioned in the book of the Canons of Convocation, 1604; but in the Bill of Rights, 1689, the right of the people to depose the monarch, to change the order of succession, and to confer the throne on whom they think proper is distinctly set forth. In Great Britain the monarch has only parliamentary right, and the parliament that makes a sovereign can unmake also.

In Russia the Czar still claims the 'divine right to govern wrong,' and, accordingly, in 1883, Alexander insisted on placing the crown on his own head.

Divorce a mensa et thoro (Latin). A partial divorce, severing wife and husband 'from board and bed,' but not annulling the marriage. In this sort of divorce neither husband nor wife could marry again so long as both remained alive. Divorces a mensa et thoro were granted by the ecclesiastical court when man and wife could not, from incompatibility of temper or ill-usage, live under the same roof.

Now called 'judicial separation'; the court has power to order alimony for the wife. The new law of divorce dates from 1857. In 1878, by the 'Matrimonial Causes Amendment Act,' a wife can plead cruelty as a sufficient cause for judicial separation.

Divorce a vinculo matrimonii. A total divorce 'from the bond of matrimony,' in consequence of some canonical impediment existing before marriage, such as bigamy, kinship within the prohibited degrees, &c. The children of such parents are illegitimate.

By the law of 1857 adultery is made a valid plea for an entire dissolution of marriage; but the Council of Trent, which closed in 1563, pronounced marriage to be absolutely indissoluble.

Divorce Court, 1857 (23, 24 Vict. 144). A court which takes the jurisdiction of divorce out of the ecclesiastical courts. It is composed of a judge ordinary, the three chiefs in the courts of common law, and three present judges. After divorce the offending party is free to marry again.

Dix-huit Brumaire. Year VIII. The coup d'état of Bonaparte, when the Directory was overthrown, and the supremacy of Bonaparte established (9 Nov. 1799).

Dixie Professorship. Of ecclesiastical history. Stipend 500*l.* a year and a fellowship at Emmanuel College. Founded in the University of Cambridge by Sir William Dixie, of Emmanuel College, 1884.

Djezzar, i.e. Butcher. Achmed Pacha (1735–1804). He was originally a slave, and rose to the pashalic of Acre. He is noted for his dogged defence of Acre against Napoleon I. in 1799. His cruelty was a monomania, for at times he was both tender-hearted and charitable. See 'Butcher.'

Djoubanians (The). A dynasty which reigned in Irak and Khorassan from A.D. 1335 till 1378, founded by Djouban, tutor of Behader-Khan. He married the khan's sister and revolted. Tamerlane conquered this part of Persia, and made his son governor thereof.

Doce'tæ (The), or 'Docētes' (3 syl.). A sect ascribed to Simon Magus. They believed that the body of Christ was a sort of phantom body, like that which had appeared to Adam and Eve, Cain and Abel, Noah and Abraham, and therefore that the sufferings and death of Christ were not real. Supposed to be referred to in 2 John vii. (Greek δοκέω, to seem, to appear.)

The Docetæ were a Gnostic sect, and, like the Gnostics generally, considered matter the opposite of spirit, and evil the opposite of good. As God is spirit and only good, evil must be resident in matter, and it would be no more possible for a divine nature to take a material body than for good to mix with evil.

Doce'tism. The doctrine of the Docētæ (q.v.), which was this, that the humanity, the actions, and the sufferings of Christ were only phenomenal and not real.

Doctor Doctorum. Alexander of Hales, Gloucestershire, the 'Irrefragable Doctor,' a friar minor, who applied the rules of Aristotle to school philosophy. His chief work is 'Summa Theologiæ.' He died in 1245.

Doctor My-book. John Abernethy (1764–1831). So called because he said to so many of his patients, 'I must refer you to my book; there are only about a dozen pages you need read. Begin at p. 78, and you will soon find all that I can tell you or you need know.' He was not a physician, but a surgeon. His fundamental principle was that most ailments, whether of the legs or eyes, feet or head, are due to deranged digestion, and that a 'blue pill,' with 4 ozs. of food three times a day, will prove a panacea.

Doctor of Asia. POLYCARP, bishop of Smyrna, in Asia; or 'Doctor of the Holy Church of Smyrna' (26 Jan.), 72–167.

Doctor of Dancing (The). Beauchamps, of whom Louis XIV. took lessons for twenty years. Beauchamps died 1695.

Doctors (Scholastic) who bear complementary titles. Those marked with a * are 'Doctors of the Church.' The rest are, for the most part, Mediæval Schoolmen.

Doctors (Ubiquist). 'Docteurs Ubiquistes' are doctors not members of the Sorbonne, the college of Navarre, or the Cholets.

Doctors of Reason (The). Members of the Chinese sect of Tao or Taou, a kind of rationalistic religious sect.

Tao, one of the Chinese names of the Supreme Being, is identified by some missionaries with the 'Logos' of St. John's Gospel. See 'Tao.'

Doctors of the Church. Certain canonised authors of the early and mediæval Christian Church whose works have been accepted as authority on doctrine, dogma, and discipline. There have been hundreds and thousands of Theological Doctors, but the following list contains all those distinctively recognised by Catholics as 'Doctors of the Church,' and must not be confounded with the 'Scholastic Doctors.'

To make this list as correct and perfect as possible, I have been carefully over all the many thousand names of the Bollandists, with those contained in the 'Dictionnaire Hagiographique' of the Abbé Migne.

 The four preceding doctors of the Latin Church were—

1. AMBROSE of Milan		340-397
2. AUGUSTINE of Hippo		354-430
3. JEROME, 'Father of the Latin Church'		345-420
4. GREGORY the Great...		544-604

When Pius V. in 1567 declared Aquinas to be the 'Fifth Doctor of the Church,' he did not ignore those between Gregory and Aquinas, but spoke of S. Thomas as we speak of the Tenth Muse, or Eighth Wonder of the World, meaning some one or some wonder of striking excellence. There may have been others more learned than Aquinas, as there are poets superior to Marie Lejars de Gournay, surnamed 'the Tenth Muse,' and buildings more marvellous than the palace of the Escurial of Toledo, called the 'Eighth Wonder.' Such phrases are merely complementary hyperbole.

Doctors of the Sorbonne. 'Docteurs en Sorbonne.' The Sorbonne is a secular ecclesiastical college founded in Paris by Robert de Sorbon in 1252. The members live in common, and are provided with everything necessary for life and well-being. The head of the college is called the Proviseur, and his assistant is called a Prior. The buildings were restored by Richelieu in the 17th cent. Since 1821 these buildings have been the seat of the University of Paris, consecrated to humanity studies, the arts, sciences, and theology

The following doctors of the Sorbonne are placed in the 'Petits Bollandistes' among the saints. They were 'Martyrs of the Revolution' (M. R.).

BURTE (Jean François),	whose day is 2 Sept.
MEUR (Vincent de),	" " 26 June
THORAME (Jules de Pazery de)	" " 2 Sept.

Doctors' Commons. A college of doctors in the civil law, London, wherein the Court of Admiralty and the principal ecclesiastical courts were held. Founded by Dr. Henry Harvey, dean of the Arches. The original house was destroyed by the great fire of London in 1666. Building taken down in 1867.

Doctrinaires. I. or 'Prêtres de la Doctrine,' 1592. Founded by Cæsar de Bus of Avignon, and confirmed by the pope in 1597. The object of the society was to instruct the poor, especially in rural districts, in religious matters. Many schools were under them. Cæsar de Bus also established a female society for women called 'Filles de la Doctrine.'

II. 1815. A political party in France favourable to a constitutional government, and hoping to combine perfect liberty with regality. Royer-Collard was the chief, or père de la doctrine. See above.

The following were eminent doctrinaires, viz. Camille Jordan, De Broglie, De Serre, Duchâtel, Duvergier, De Hauranne, Guizot, Jaubert, and Rémusat.

Doctrine of Signatures (The). The doctrine that visible signs indicate the virtues and uses of natural objects. Thus white was cold, and red hot. Hence in fever red medicines, such as mulberries and pomegranates, were prescribed. For liver complaints yellow substances were recommended. Malignant plants, says Coles, have a sad or evil appearance, either in their leaves, flowers, or fruit. Euphrasia, or 'eye-bright,' has a spot like the pupil of the eye; walnuts, which represent the human brain, are good for idiocy; nettle-tea for the nettle-rash; bilberry and turmeric, being yellow, are good for jaundice; liver-wort, which is spotted like tubercles on the liver, is good for liver complaints. So throughout Nature puts her label on everything, if men were but wise enough to read her writing.

Doctrines of Port Royal. The community of Port Royal, in Paris, were the most strenuous defenders of the famous book called 'Augustinus' by Cornelius Jansen, which was designed to show that St. Augustine was unsound on the doctrines of grace, free-will, predestination, and universal redemption. Jansen's book was condemned by Pope Urban VIII., and the school of Port Royal was suppressed in 1660.

[She] had adopted the tenets of the Jansenists, with perhaps a still further tendency towards the reformed doctrines than those of Port Royal.—Sir W. SCOTT, Redgauntlet, chap. xvii.

Dodd, D.D. (William), 1758-1777. Hanged at Tyburn for forging the name of Lord Chesterfield to a bond for 4,200*l.*

Dodo (The). This bird, now extinct, was seen by the Portuguese in the Mauritius in 1499; it was seen by the Dutch in 1598; it was figured by De Bry in 1601, by Clusin in 1605, and by Bontius in 1658; the bones of a dodo were discovered in the Mauritius by Clark in 1805.

There is a dodo's foot in the British Museum; a head and foot in the Ashmolëan Museum, Oxford.

Dog, or 'Dog Steenie.' George Villiers duke of Buckingham. When first made the king's favourite [James I.], the queen said, 'Now you must be my watch-dog, and whenever the king is inclined to make a fool of himself, you must pull the old sow by the ear.'

Buckingham wrote from Madrid to James to send over jewels: 'first your best hatband, the Portugal diamond, the rest of the pendent diamonds to make up a necklace to give the Infanta, and the best rope of pearls, with a rich chain or two for myself to wear, or else your dog will lack a collar' (1623).

Dog-days, or 'Canicular Days.' The forty days beginning with 8 July and ending 11 Aug. So-called from Caniculus, the Dog-star, or Sirius, in the constellation called Canis Major, the brightest of the fixed stars. The Egyptians had the beginning of their year dependent on the heliacal rising of the Canicula, coinciding with the flood of the Nile.

Dogs, or Barbets. So the Vaudois were usually called by the Catholics. The Vaudois employed by gentlemen as footmen to stand behind a carriage were called barbets.

The Marquises Fleury and Angrogna, fearing the bite of the dogs (barbets), were not the last to run away.—LÉGER (quoted by Ant. Monastier, Hist. of the Vaudois Church, p. 804).

Dogado. The territory of the doge of Venice, comprising the city of Venice, the isles of Malamocco, Chioggia, and Brondolo, with a narrow slip of coast between the mouths of the Adige and the Musone. By a law in 1367 neither the doge nor any of his family could hold any estate beyond the dogado, and if before raised to the office any doge happened to have any estate or fief beyond this territory, he was obliged to sell it.

Doge, i.e. duke. The chief magistrate of several Italian republics. In Venice (697) and Amalfi (897) the office was held for life; in Genoa from 1528 the office was limited to two years; in Ragusa from 787 it was monthly, so that there were twelve doges a year. The doge was both general and judge, ruling in concert with a representative council of the chief citizens. The first doge of Venice, 697, was Paulucci Anaferto; the last was Ludovico Marini, for in 1795 Napoleon I. abolished the office. Marini was elected in 1789, and died 1803. The doge was 'rex in foro, senator in curia, captivus in aula.'

The constitution of Venice was a pyramid, resting on the basis of the grand council, and rising through the senate and the college to the doge, the ornamental apex. In 1173 the election of doge was transferred from the people to the grand council.

Dogget's 'Coat and Badge,' 1715. The prize of a rowing match on the Thames, instituted by Thomas Dogget, an actor. The race day is 1 Aug., the day of the accession of George I. The race is from London Bridge to the 'Old Swan' at Chelsea, when the tide is strongest against the rowers.

Dogmael's Stone (St.). A stone in Pembrokeshire with an inscription in Ogham. See 'Golspie Stone.'

There is another near Margam in Glamorganshire, and one near Crickhowel, in Brecknockshire. The town is called St. Dogmell in Bartholomew's Gazetteer.'

Dogmatists and Empirics. Two schools of medicine in Alexandria which prevailed during the three centuries preceding the birth of Christ. The Dogmatists or Methodists were those who followed certain prescribed rules; the Empirics were those who trusted to experiment and experience. The chief of the Dogmatists were Erasträtos, Themison, and Cœlius Aurelianus.

The chief of the Empirics were Philinos of Cos, Sextus Empiricus, and Heraclidés of Tarentum.

Dom-Boc. A book of dooms or 'Liber Judiciālis.' A code of laws compiled by Alfred the Great from the West Saxon collection of Ina, the Kentish collection of Ethelbert, and the Mercian laws of Offa.

It begins, 'The Lord spake all these words, saying. . . .' Then follow the Ten Commandments, part of the Mosaic Law, and the Golden Rule; then the ecclesiastical and civil laws.

Dome of Chosroes (The). A magnificent edifice in Modain, one of the wonders of the East, built in the 6th cent. by Chosroes the Great of Persia.

Domesday Book. See 'Doomsday Book.'

Domicellæ Cameræ Reginæ. Ladies of the bedchamber; generally, if not always, married ladies.

Domicellæ Reginæ. Maids of honour, and of course unmarried.

Domiciliary Canons. Canons not in holy orders, and therefore having no right to any particular chapter.

Domina Anglorum. Maud, daughter of Henry I., and mother of Henry II., by Geoffrey Plantagenet, count of Anjou.

Domingo (Revolt of Santo) from the French yoke.

(a) The revolt of the slaves broke out 22 Aug., 1791, and Toussaint Louverture, a negro chieftain, was proclaimed governor for life in 1801, but he died in 1803.

(b) Another revolt, to expel the French from the island, broke out in 1803. The revolters put themselves under British protection; D'Essalines (originally a slave) was appointed governor, and the ancient name of Hayti was restored. In 1804 the governor declared himself emperor of the whole island, but in 1806 he was assassinated, and the French part of the island was divided into two parts —a negro republic and a mulatto commonwealth. In 1822 Peter Boyer, a man of colour, reduced the whole island under one government—a representative republic—but he abdicated in 1843, and retired to Paris, where he died in 1850.

(c) In 1844 the Spanish portion of the island was seized by the blacks, and formed into a republic under Santana, and in 1849 Faustin Soulouque, a negro, proclaimed himself Faustin I. emperor of Hayti, but he abdicated in 1861. Salnave was declared president 11 Jan., 1870, but was shot by the French on the 15th of the same month.

At present (1890) the island is divided into two republics: one (Hayti) French-speaking, and the other (Santo Domingo) Spanish-speaking.

Dominica Bran'donum. Properly was the Sunday preceding Quadrigesima Sunday (1st in Lent). See 'Sundays.'

Brandones appellabant Galli primam quadragesimalis jejunii hebdomadam, quod hujus prima die sub vesperum pueri brandonibus, seu facibus accensis februare solerent. Dominica brandonum Quadragesimam præcedit.—DUCANGE, Glossary BRANDO).

Dominica de Rosa, or 'Lætare Sunday' (q.v.). The fourth Sunday in Lent, when the pope blesses the golden rose. See 'Sundays.'

Domin'ical Letters (The). From Dominica (dies), i.e. Sunday; the Sunday Letters. They are A B C D E F G, used in almanacs to mark the Sundays throughout the year. The 1st, 8th, 15th, and 22nd days are marked A; the 2nd, 9th, 16th, 23rd, &c., are marked B, and so on. Hence, on whatever day the first Sunday of the year falls, the letter which marks it will mark every other Sunday in the year. If it is A (the 1st of the month) every Sunday will be A, and so on, because there are seven days and seven letters.

Dominicans, or Preaching Friars, 1215. A religious order of the rule of Augustine, founded by St. Dominic at Toulouse for preaching and the conversion of heretics. In 1233 the function of Inquisitors was added. They had several houses in Italy, Spain, Portugal, France, Germany, and England. In 1218 the Dominicans of Paris were called Jacobins, because their convent was in the Rue St. Jacques. Among the most famous of the order were Albert the Great, St. Thomas Aquinas, Raymond of Penafort, Vincent of Beauvais, Caïetan, Dom Soto, &c. They sustained a long rivalry with the Franciscans, but were suppressed in France in 1790 by the National Assembly. Their outer dress is a black garment with a scapulary and capuchin of the same cloth. They also carry a rosary suspended from their girdle.

By the Second Council of Lyons the Begging Friars were limited to the Dominicans or Black Friars, the Franciscans or Grey Friars, the Augustines (also Black Friars), and the Carmelites or White Friars.

There are Dominican nuns and Dominican tertiaries, &c.

Dominicans, 1793, &c. Those Frenchmen who observed Sunday after the introduction of the new French Calendar, which abolished the week of seven days and introduced a decade of ten days instead. The Dominicans had, of course, fifty-two weeks in the year, the Decadists had thirty-six decades.

Dominion Day. Canada, 2 July.

Dominus. Ds. on tombstones, in the middle ages, indicates either a clergyman or a knight. Clergymen were then addressed as knights.

Dominus ac Redemptor Noster, 1773. The famous brief of Clement XIV. suppressing 'for ever the society of the Jesuits, out of regard to the peace of the church.'

Domitian Road (The), B.C. 122. Constructed in Gaul by Cnæus Domitius (Ahenobarbus).

Don, Dom, Dona. Don is Do[mi]nus, Dom is Dom-inus, Dona is Do[mi]na. Don and Dona are Spanish forms, Dom is Portuguese. At one time these were given only to princes, bishops, and seniors, then to hidalgos; but now-a-days they are very often mere polite forms of address, like our esquire.

Donald Ballach, i. e. the Freckled. Cousin-german of Alexander lord of the Isles.

Donati (The), 1293. A faction in Florence opposed to the Cerchi. So named from two powerful houses. Dante, the poet, was connected with the house of the Donati. See 'Donătists.'

In Pistoia, an ally of Florence, there were two similar factions, the Neri and the Bianchi. The Neri sided with the Donati, and the Bianchi with the Cerchi. The Neri were zealous Guelfs, and the Bianchi were of the Ghibelline party. When Dante was in Pistoia he joined the Bianchi, and his house was pulled down about his ears by the Neri zealots. (Cerchi pronounce Cher-kē.)

Donation of Constantine (The). The tale is that Constantine the Great (306–337) was healed of leprosy by the water of baptism under St. Silvester, the Roman bishop. In reward of this service the emperor withdrew from Rome, and founded a new capital in the East. The Roman capital he resigned to St. Silvester and his successors for ever ('palatium nostrum, et urbem Romam, et totius Italiæ civitates'). If this tale is accepted, the 'Donations of Pepin and Charlemagne' were no donations at all, but simply restitutions of a part of Constantine's Donation. The deed has been proved to be a gross and impudent forgery. See 'Literary Forgeries.'

In Ariosto we read that the Deed of Constantine's Gift was found in the Moon with other rubbish—

> Di varii fiori ad un gran monte passa,
> Ch' ebbe già buono odore, or putia forte.
> Questo era il dono (se però dir lece)
> Che Costantino al buon Silvestro fece.
> Orlando Furioso, xxxiv. 80.

Donation of Pepin (The). By the liberality of Pepin and Charlemagne the ancient patrimony of farms and houses of the popes was transformed into the temporal dominion of cities and provinces. This first-fruits of the conquests of Pepin, called his donation, was the germ of the temporal dominions of the pope of Rome ('Liber Pontificalis,' p. 171).

The 'donation' included the territories of Ravenna, Bologna, and Ferrara, taken from Astolphus. The donation was greatly enlarged by Charlemagne.—Codex Carolinus.

The 'Donation of Constantine' was a forgery probably of the notorious Riculfe, who is supposed to have forged the 'Decretals' (8th cent.).

Donatism, A.D. 311. The religious tenets of Donātus, the Numidian bishop, who insisted that personal holiness made a Christian; and that the apostolic succession of bishops did not of itself form the necessary medium of communication with Christ; that, in fact, Christianity is a personal matter more than a matter of pedigree. At one time Donatism ran Catholicism very hard indeed, and at the present day there are not many who would not subscribe to this fundamental doctrine of Donatus, 'that he who by faith and works shows himself an approved Christian, is to be accounted a Christian, whether that grace has been communicated by apostolic succession or not.'

Don'atists. I. A.D. 311. A religious sect founded by Donat, bishop of Casa Nigra, in Africa. Donātus declared that Cæcilianus, bishop of Carthage, was not duly elected, and that all those in his obedience were heretics. His heretical doctrines were these: that baptism administered by heretics is null and void; and that the church is not infallible, seeing it had erred in the case of Cæcilianus. The Council of Arles, held A.D. 314, acquitted Cæcilianus and condemned Donatus. Donatus and his followers now seceded from the church and formed a new sect which, in 330, had as many as 172 bishops. The fundamental doctrines of the new sect were these: (1) that the Son is inferior to the Father, and the Holy Ghost is inferior to the Son; (2) that personal holiness is far more important than apostolic succession, and (3) when any member is excommunicated for offences, he must be re-baptized before he can be again admitted into church membership.

II. A.D. 316. The followers of Donātus, bishop of Carthage, who, being condemned by pope and emperor as a schismatic, revolted, and carried with him a large following of reformers, who lighted a civil war and desolated Africa in the reigns of Constantine and his successors till the Vandal invasion. St. Augustine combated these 'sectaries.'

Donnellan Lectureship (The), 1794. Instituted in Dublin University under the will of Anne Donnellan.

Dooms of Ethelbert (The), A.D. 597. Giving a legal status in England to the Christian church.

Doomsday Book, or 'Domesday Book,' 1085–1086. A statistical survey of that part of England which was under the sway of William the Conqueror. So called, probably, because it was of authority in all dooms, i.e. judgments in disputed questions which afterwards arose on matters contained therein. It was anciently known as the 'Liber de Wintonia' (Book of Winchester), because at one time it was preserved in the royal treasury of that city, under three locks and keys. It was printed and published in 1783 in two folio volumes. In 1816 two supplementary volumes were published. See below 'Supplementary Volume.' N.B. The counties of Durham, Northumberland, Westmoreland, and Cumberland are omitted.

There are two volumes: one called the Great Domesday Book and the other the Little Domesday Book. The great book contains 382 double pages of vellum, each page having a double column. Some of the capital letters are in red ink, and some passages are touched with red ink. It contains a survey of thirty-one counties. The Little Domesday Book contains 450 double pages of vellum in single column. It contains the counties of Essex, Norfolk, Suffolk, part of Rutland, part of Lancashire, York, and Chester.

Contents: The name of the place; the present tenant; the tenant in the time of Edward, 1041; how many hydes of land in the manor; how many ploughgates in demesne (i.e. reserved in the lord's own hand); how many homagers or vassals; how many villeins; how many cottars; how many serfs; what freemen; how many tenants in socage (i.e. by hereditary right); how much wood; how much meadow and pasture; what mills and fishponds; how much has been added or taken away since 1041; what the present value. The return was three-fold: (1) As these details were in 1041; (2) As they had been given by William; and (3) As they were when the survey was made.

Doomsday Book (Supplementary Volumes). Vol. i. contains an introduction by Sir Henry Ellis, and indices of the names contained in Doomsday Book. Vol. ii. contains (1) the Exon Domesday (q.v.); (2) the Inquisitio Eliensis, or survey of the lands of the monastery of Ely, i.e. of the counties of Cambridge, Hertford, Essex, Norfolk, Suffolk, and Huntingdonshire; (3) the Winton Domesday, containing two surveys of the city of Winchester: one made between 1107 and 1128, and the other made in 1148; and (4) the Bolden Book (q.v.), or survey of the see of Durham made in 1183.

Dorian Mode (The). In music is our scale of D played entirely on white notes of the piano, with the minor seventh so characteristic of Greek music. Practically singers began their scale with A instead of D.

Dorians. One of the four distinctive people of old Greece, who conquered Peloponnesus and settled there. This is called 'The Return of the Heraclidæ.' There were also Dorian settlements in Asia Minor and the neighbouring islands. They were a sturdy unpolished race. In architecture it was the strongest, simplest, and plainest of the three orders; in philosophy it was of the Pythagorean school; in politics highly aristocratic; in dialect harsh and rough. Scotch is often called the British Doric.

The three orders were the Ionic, the most chaste and elegant; the Corinthian, the most ornate; and the Doric, the most plain and the strongest.

Doric School of Greek Poets (The). Founded by Alcman and Stesichŏros. Alcman of Lydia (B.C. 660–600) was a Spartan slave, emancipated. He wrote in the Doric dialect; most of his poems are erotic, but very few fragments remain. In one of his odes he exclaims, 'Oh that I were a seamew, which wings its flight among the halcyons, and runs on the surface of the sea-waves. Bird of spring with radiant plumage, and heart that knows no sigh!' This is not unworthy to be compared with that beautiful verse of the psalmist, 'Oh that I had wings like a dove, for then would I flee away and be at rest!'

Stesichŏros (B.C. 632–552) was a native of Sicily, and was the father of the choral epode. His poems are in irregular verse, and the subjects are 'The Labours of Herculès,' the 'Return of the Heraclidæ,' the 'Siege of Troy,' 'Return from Troy,' and the 'Calydonian Hunt.'

Alcman wrote in Old Doric; but Theocritos, Bion, and Moschos wrote in New Doric.

Dorislaus (Dr.), in 1649. Was sent by the British parliament as envoy to the States of Holland, while Charles II., in exile, was holding his court at the Hague. The very evening of his arrival, while he sat at supper in the inn, six gentlemen with drawn swords dragged him from his chair, and murdered him on the floor. These assassins were Scotchmen, followers of Montrose, and Dorislaus had been recently employed 'to draw the charge against the king.'

As long as he (William II. prince of Orange) lived, no atonement could be obtained for the murder of Dorislaus.—Dr. Lingard, Hist. of Engl., viii. 5.

It must be remembered that William II. had married a daughter of Charles I., and all the partisans of the stadtholder were rabid royalists.

Dorsetshire Labourers (The), 1834. At the Dorchester assizes six agricultural labourers were tried and convicted of being members of an illegal society, and for administering illegal oaths. They belonged to a trades-union in which those initiated were admitted blindfold into a room where was the picture of a skeleton and a skull. These labourers were sentenced to transportation for seven years.

It was now proposed that, as the Orange leaders had violated the law as much as the Dorsetshire labourers, they should be dealt with in the same manner, and that if evidence could be obtained, the Duke of Cumberland (grandmaster), Lord Kenyon, the Bishop of Salisbury (chaplain), Colonel Fairman, and the rest should be prosecuted in the central criminal court.—Howitt, Hist. of Engl. (year 1836, p. 273).

Dort (Synod of). Held between 13 Nov., 1618, and 25 May, 1619. It was an assembly of Protestant divines to consider the nature and tendency of the doctrines of Arminius, professor of divinity in Leyden. The synod decided in favour of Calvinism, and excommunicated Arminius and his adherents.

Dotation of Pepin (The). See 'Donation,' &c.

Dotted Bible (The). An edition of the Bible printed in 1578, page for page with that of 1574. See 'Bible.'

Douay Bible (The), 1581. A translation made by the professors connected with the College of Douay, founded in 1568 by Dr. William Allen for the education of English boys designed for the Romish priesthood. These students were to be sent into England as itinerant preachers, with the view of creating a reactionary feeling and upsetting the Reformed Church. Dr. Allen himself worked on the translation. See 'Bible.'

Double Procession (The). That is the Filioque dogma. Did the Holy Ghost proceed from the Father AND the Son, or from the Father BY the Son? The former is the dogma of the Western Church; the latter is the belief of the Eastern Church.

Doublement du Tiers (Le), 27 Dec., 1788. When the commons or deputies of 'Le Tiers' were made equal in number to the deputies of the noblesse and clergy both together. There were 572 of the Tiers, 572 of the other two estates, and a chairman.

Doubling Ordinance (The), 1662. A law that whoever advanced one-fourth more than his original share for land in Ireland should be entitled to double the quantity of land; but if any 'adventurer' refused to make such advance, any other person might reap the benefit, provided he repaid the 'adventurer' the sum originally subscribed.

Those who subscribed 200*l.* were to have 1,000 acres in Ulster; those who subscribed 300*l.* were to have 1,000 acres in Connaught; those who subscribed 450*l.* were to have 1,000 acres in Munster; and those who subscribed 600*l.* were to have 1,000 acres of the forfeited land in Leinster. The subscribers were called 'The Adventurers.'

Douglas's Larder, 1307. 'James Douglas penetrated into his own country in disguise, and, collecting some of his ancient followers, surprised the English garrison placed by Lord Clifford in Douglas Castle, and putting the garrison to the sword, he mingled the mangled bodies with a large stock of provisions which the English had amassed, and set fire to the castle. The country people to this day call this "Douglas's Larder."' (Sir W. Scott, 'History of Scotland,' ix.)

Having set fire to his castle, he fled to the mountains, saying that he liked better to hear the lark sing than the mouse cheep.

Douglas Wars (The), 1572, 1573. Skirmishes in the regency of James earl of Morton, in which prisoners were relentlessly executed on both sides.

Douloir (The). An instrument of death resembling the more modern guillotine. It was used in the reign of Henri IV. for the execution of his godson, the Duc de Montmorenci.

Dover (Treaty of), 22 May, 1670. A secret compact between Charles II. of England and Louis XIV. of France, negotiated through Henrietta duchess of Orléans, and providing that Charles should publicly announce his conversion to Romanism; and if any disturbance ensued, that Louis should send to his aid a French army and a subsidy of three million francs.

Doves' Dung (2 Kings vi. 25). Sold in the siege of Samaria at the rate of half a pound for twelve shillings, does not mean the droppings of pigeons, but the plant called by botanists 'ornithogallum,' from two Greek words, ὄρνιθος γάλα, bird's milk, and known as 'the Star of Bethlehem'—i.e. the star-shaped flower of Bethlehem. The roots of these plants are white, edible, and in some English counties are sold for "'French asparagus.' They are much eaten in the Levant, where the plant abounds, roasted like chestnuts or boiled. The plant sold in Samaria would be better understood by the equivalent, 'A bunch of asparagus or half a pint of chestnuts for twelve shillings.'

Dow Purse. The money anciently given by the bridegroom to his bride on their wedding day. It was a Roman custom, but obtained among the Greeks, the Jews, and almost all the northern parts of Europe.

The Greeks called it ὀρθρινον δωρον. In Germany it is called Morgengabe, i.e. morning present.

Downing College. In Cambridge University, founded by Sir George Downing, of Gamlingay Park, Cambridge, in 1800, opened in 1821.

Downing Professorship of the laws of England. Stipend 200*l.* a year. Founded 1800, in the University of Cambridge, by Sir George Downing, Bart., founder of Downing College, Cambridge, and of the Downing Professorship of Medicine. See 'Regius Professorship of Civil Law.'

Downing Professorship of Medicine (The), in the University of Cambridge, 1800. Founded by Sir George Downing, Bart., the founder of Downing College, Cambridge, and of the Downing Professorship of the Laws of England. Stipend 200*l.* more than a Fellow of Downing receives. See 'Regius Professorship of Physic.'

Doxology (The). In the reign of Constantine the Great there were four forms of the doxology in use:—

1. Glory be to the Father, and to the Son, and to the Holy Ghost.
2. Glory be to the Father, and to the Son, in the Holy Ghost.
3. Glory be to the Father, in the Son, and in the Holy Ghost.
4. Glory be to the Father, by the Son, and in the Holy Ghost. (Philostorgius, Book III., chap. xiii.)

Doyen des Rois (Le). So Louis XIV. used to style himself in the latter years of his long reign. He reigned 72 years, and it will not be easy to find in history a reign of equal length.

Dozen Peers (The). The 12 peers assembled at the instance of the barons, in the reign of Henry III., to be privy councillors, or rather conservators of the kingdom.

Dozsa Rebellion (The), 1513–1514, Hungary. Also called the Kurucz Rebellion, that is the rebellion of the Cruciferi, because the original insurgents were intended to be 'soldiers of the cross.' It was a peasants' uprising against the oppressions of the upper class. Of course the rebels were defeated immediately they came into conflict with the better trained, and George Dozsa was put to death with the most savage cruelty. He was seated on a red-hot iron chair, a red-hot iron crown was placed on his head, and a red-hot sceptre in his hand, and to add to his tortures his flesh was then torn from his bones. See 'Damiens.'

Draco Regis. The standard borne in war anciently by our kings. It had the figure of a dragon wrought on it.

Dragonnades (3 syl.), 1685. An armed expedition to stamp out Protestantism in France. Each expedition was led by a bishop, who demanded that every Protestant should abjure Protestantism, and those who refused to do so were left to the tender mercies of the dragoons who accompanied him. Hundreds were thrown into dungeons; hundreds who fled were hunted down like wild beasts; many were gibbeted or sent to the galleys; and not a few were cut down by the sword.

The persecutions were renewed in 1723 and 1724.

Drama (Father of the French). Jodell (1532–1573).

Drama (Father of the modern German). Andreas Greif (1616–1664).

Drama (Father of the Greek). Thespis, 6th cent. B.C.

Drama (Father of the Spanish). Lopé de Vega (1562–1635).

Drapier's Letters, 1724. A series of letters by Dean Swift on the halfpence and farthings coined for Ireland by William Wood, iron and copper founder of Wolverhampton. Drapier is represented as a poor but independent-spirited shopkeeper, utterly unskilled in law, but who did not mean to be ruined if he could help it. In these letters the Irish were told that Wood's patent was iniquitous, and that the contract had been infamously carried out. Wood was called a 'wood-louse,' and his copper was declared to be vile brass, 20 of which coins were not worth 10 honest ones. The Irish refused to take Wood's halfpence, and the government was compelled to withdraw the coinage. Swift became immensely popular in Ireland, but Sir Isaac Newton, master of the mint, examined the coin, and declared it to be rather above the terms of the contract.

Dreadful Woman (The). Caroline, the wife of George prince regent. Married 1795, separated the year her daughter was born, 1796, died 1821.

The Whigs threatened to espouse in a body the cause of the Dreadful Woman, and bring her to the front again.—WINGFIELD, Abigail Rowe, vol. I. p. 169.

Dresden (Treaty of Peace at). 25 Dec., 1745, was signed at Dresden the treaty which concluded the second Silesian war between Maria Theresa of Austria and Frederick II. the Great of Prussia. By this treaty Silesia was again restored to Prussia. See 'Berlin,' treaty of.

Drinking in Belgium. The Belgian labourer spends one quarter of his wages in dram-drinking. On ordinary days he requires six drams a day, and on festal ones more. The first, called a Worm-killer, is taken at 5.30 a.m.; the second, called an Eye-opener, at 8 a.m.; the third, called a Whip, at 11 a.m.; the fourth, called a Digester, at 2 p.m.; the fifth, called a Soldier, at 5 p.m.; and the sixth, called a Finisher, at 7.30 p.m.

Drinks of Great Men.

BRAHAM, the singer—Bottled porter.
BYRON—Port wine.
CHARLES V.—Alicante.
CROMWELL—Malvoisie.
FRANÇOIS I.—Sherry.
FREDERICK THE GREAT—Tokay.
FREDERICK WILLIAM IV. of Prussia—Cliquot.
GLADSTONE—Egg beaten up in sherry.
GOETHE—Johannisberg hock.
HENRI IV.—Surènes.
HUMBOLDT—Sauterne.
KEAN (Edmund), the actor—Beef tea for breakfast, cold brandy.
NAPOLEON I.—Chambertin.
PETER THE GREAT—Madeira.
RABELAIS—Old Chablis.
RICHELIEU (Cardinal)—Romanée.
RICHELIEU (Marshal)—Médoc.
RUBENS—Marsala.
SAXE (Marshal de)—Champagne.
TALLEYRAND—Château-Margaux.

Driving for Rent (Ireland). Driving the cattle of a defaulting tenant into a pound, there to be kept till the rent is paid, or sold by auction till the money due to the landlord is realised.

Droits of Admiralty. Derelict ships and other property picked up at sea and unclaimed. These possessions at one time were the perquisites of the lord high admiral; but by the Merchant Shipping Act of 1854 they were placed under the control of the Board of Trade.

Droughty Year of '26 (The), i.e. 1826. The prevailing wind was north. Corn ceased to grow, and grass was dried up. The hottest day of the year was 28 June, when the thermometer in England stood at 90° in the shade.

Drum (The Sacred). An object of religious veneration and instrument of magical incantations among the Laplanders in former times. It was hollowed out of a piece of pine or birch, and covered with skin like a kettledrum. The drumstick was a reindeer's horn. Every family had its sacred drum, and the movement of certain rings attached to it was the domestic Urim and Thummim.

Drunken Parliament (The). The parliament assembled at Edinburgh 1 Jan., 1661, the members of which, says Burnet, 'were almost perpetually drunk.' It annulled, in a single act, all the proceedings of its predecessors during the last twenty-eight years. By this measure the whole church system of Scotland fell to the ground. See 'Parliament.'

Druses (The) of the Lebanon. The seven heads of their religious creed are:

1. Speak the truth to a Druse; 2. Every Druse must stand fast to every other Druse; 3. The religious creed of a Druse must be exclusive; 4. A Druse must believe in the unity of Hakem as God; 5. A Druse must be contented with his lot; 6. he must submit his own will wholly; 7. he must eschew the devil and all false doctrine.

Hakem (the sixth Fatimite calif of Egypt) taught that he himself was the tenth and last revelation of God to man. He was therefore a sort of Christ or God manifest in the flesh. The chief is always called the Hakem.

Dry Mass. 'Missa Sicca,' mass without the elements. The Introitus, Collect, Epistle, Gospel, and Canticles constitute the entire service. This sort of mass was performed when 'sacerdos non potest conficere, quia forte jam celebravit, vel ob aliam causam, potest, accepta stola, Epistolam et Evangelium legere, et dicere Orationem dominicam, et dare benedictionem.' This mass was not allowed in the Netherlands, and was vehemently objected to by the Jansenists. It is now quite obsolete.

Dryden of Germany (The). Martin Opitz of Silesia (1597–1639). No more like the Duke of Buckingham's poet 'Squab' than Beau Brummel is like Dr. Samuel Johnson.

Duad. According to Pythagoras is the second mathematical quantity, viz. length. The point is the monad, length the duad, breadth the triad, and depth the tetrad. Physically, intellectual capacity is the monad, scientific knowledge is the duad, opinion the triad, and perception by the senses the tetrad.

Dualism. Same as Manicheism. So-called because it teaches the twofold nature of everything, one evil and the other good. Thus there is a principle of good and a principle of evil in soul and matter, male and female, and even in deity. The correlative of dualism is monism.

Dublin Castle. I. A collection of public government offices, such as the Privy Council Chamber, the Chief Secretary's Office, the Prisons Office, the bureau of the Constabulary and Metropolitan Police, the Record Tower, &c., conjoined in one block of buildings, with the lord lieutenant's official residence, where he dispenses hospitality.

II. 1880. A convenient but not very precise phrase to express the policy introduced in the Gladstone administration of arresting men known to the agents of government 'for inciting to any act of violence or intimidation, and tending to interfere with or to disturb the maintenance of law and order' (in Ireland).

Dublin University. In 1591 (at the especial direction of Queen Elizabeth) the first stone of Trinity College, Dublin, was laid. This university has a chancellor, vice-chancellor, provost, vice-provost, and nineteen professors. The students may, if they choose, take an ad eundem at either Cambridge or Oxford. That is a graduate of Trinity College, Dublin, may take the same degree at Cambridge or Oxford without being called on to pass an examination.

Duc de Roussillon (Le). A name and title assumed by Henri Cosprons of Perpignan, but not recognised in France. The man so-called was 'd'une famille tout-à-fait bourgeoise.' He disappeared suddenly into obscurity, and whether alive or dead in 1890 is not known.

Ducal Towns. In feudal times were those built on the domains of dukes and other princes. They were inhabited by the duke's retainers, who were subject to just such laws and service as each particular duke thought proper to impose. Generally the townsmen were obliged to ask their lord's permission even to marry or give in marriage, and the lord expected a fee for his permission. When license for a marriage was obtained, a herald announced it in the streets, and at one time the ceremony could not be performed till that day twelvemonth. See 'Imperial Free Cities,' and 'Church Cities.'

Duchess of Devonshire's Kiss (The). In 1784, the Duchess of Devonshire, with Lady Duncannon, Mrs. Crewe, Mrs. Damer, and some others, dressed in blue and buff, the colours of the American Independents, canvassed personally for Mr. Fox. In the purlieus of Westminster a butcher, in his sleeves and apron, stoutly refused his vote except on the condition that he might give her grace a kiss. The request was granted, and the vote secured.

Duchoborzes (The), or 'Duchobortzi.' A sect of the Russo-Greek church (18th cent.). They believe that human souls existed before the creation of the world, and, like the Swedenborgians, ascribe hidden mysterious meanings to Bible language, which only inward light can unfathom. They reject the use of pictures, and observe neither the rite of baptism nor of the eucharist. During the reign of Alexander I. an impostor, named Kapustan, who called himself a prophet, taught them the transmigration of souls. Disputes arose, many were burnt alive, many others were put to death in other ways, and in 1841 almost all the residue were transferred to the provinces beyond the Caucasus.

Dudley Diamond (The). A Cape diamond weighing 46 carats, triangular in shape, and of great brilliancy. It was bought by the Earl of Dudley, and has been set in a beautiful head ornament (1872).

Duke, 1337. The first English duke was Edward the Black Prince, created by his father (2 Edward III.), 1327.

Duke of Exeter's Daughter (The). The famous rack in the Tower of London is so called, because it was invented by the Duke of Exeter when he was high constable, 1447.

Duke of Thunder (The). Horatio Nelson, in allusion to his Sicilian title 'Duke of Brontë' (in Sicily).

Brontë is the Greek for thunder

Duke of York's School (The). The 'Royal Military Asylum' at Chelsea is so called because, in 1800, Frederick duke of York was the chief instrument in founding the soldiers' orphan asylum at Chelsea. In 1803 schools were opened for 700 boys and 300 girls, children of deceased soldiers. The girls' school is abolished.

Duke with the Silver Hand. Nuad, who led the tribe of the Danaans from Scotland back to Ireland. Having lost his hand in the great battle of Moytura, Cred a goldsmith made him a silver one, which the surgeon Miach, son of Dian Kect, fixed on his wrist. See 'Golden Hand,' 'Iron Hand' (Keating, 'Ogygia,' part iii. chap. 10).

In this phrase duke = king, as in dukes of Edom (1 Chron. i. 51-54). Shakespeare calls the king of Athens 'Duke Theseus'; Horace calls Laomedon king of Troy, 'the fraudulent duke' (Odes III. iii. 24), because he borrowed money from the temples and never restored it. Then we have the dukes of Parma, of Holstein, of Savoy, &c.; and several grand-dukes.

Dulceans or Dulcinists (The), 1300. Heretics, so called from Dulcin (*— 1308), an Italian, who gave out that his was to be the third reign: first, the Father, from the beginning to the coming of Christ; then the son to the year 1300; and then the reign of Dulcin, the Holy Ghost, when the authority of the pope was to cease. He and his wife were burnt to death, in 1308, by Pope Clement IV.

Dulcifluous Doctor (The). 'Doctor Dulcifluus' or 'Dulcissimus,' Antonius Andreas or Andrea, a scholastic philosopher, who died 1320.

Dulwich College, 1619. Founded by Edward Alleyne, a tragic actor.

Pronounce Dul'-litch.

Dulwich Gallery (The). A collection of pictures in a gallery constructed by Sir John Soane, and connected with Dulwich College. It was opened to the public in 1812. The collection originated with M. Noel Desenfans, a picture dealer, agent to Stanislaus king of Poland; and bequeathed to Sir Francis Bourgeois, who left it to the trustees of Dulwich College.

Dumas (Alexandre). A French novelist (1803–1870). According to the Times newspaper (13 Dec., 1870, p. 6) Alexandre Dumas wrote 1,200 vols. His memoirs take up thirty volumes. In his heyday he made 30,000*l.* a year.

Dumb Ox of Sicily (The). Thomas Aquinas (1224–1274), so called by his fellow-students at Cologne; but Albertus Magnus, his tutor, said, The dumb ox will one day fill the world with his lowing.' Longfellow, in 'The Golden Legend,' calls him 'the dumb ox of Cologne,' from the monastery of Cologne. He was born in Naples.

Dunces' Day. In the University of Cambridge, Ash Wednesday, 18th cent., &c. Eight by-term men received their degrees as baccalaurei ad baptistam in the following Michaelmas term; and eight more as baccalaurei ad diem cinerum on Ash Wednesday, or 'Dunces' Day' (W. W. Rouse Ball, 'Hist. of the Study of Mathematics,' &c., 1889).

Dunkers, or 'Tunkers.' A sect of German-descended Baptists founded in Pennsylvania in 1724. They are divided into several minor sections, chiefly differing in points of discipline. To this sect may be assigned the German Seventh-day Baptists. They believe that salvation is to be obtained only by penance and mortification of the body and live in meditation. They deny the eternity of future punishment, and believe that the dead have the gospel preached to them. They are sometimes called 'Pennsylvanian Baptists,' and dress like Dominican friars, in black gowns. The word Dunker or Tunker is from tunken, to dip.

Hannah Adams, in her 'Religious World Displayed,' calls the Dunkers 'a medley of the Baptists, Universalists, Calvinists, Lutherans, Jews, Methodists, and Roman Catholics.' They are, however, distinguished for their piety and benevolence.

Dunmow Flitch (The). A custom of the manor of Little Dunmow, of uncertain origin, of giving a flitch of bacon to any married couple who would take oath that for a year and a day since they were wed they never once wished themselves unmarried. During six centuries only seven persons have claimed the prize; the last claimants were John and Susan Gilder, of Tarling, Essex, in 1772. Harrison Ainsworth tried to revive the custom, but without success.

Dunse (Pacification of), 18 June, 1639. Between Charles I. and the Scots.

Dunse Law. Is no legal enactment or legal custom at all, but a beautiful little hill close by the town of Dunse on which the Covenanters encamped when Charles I. invaded Scotland with a view of forcing episcopacy and the Church of England Prayer-book on the people of Scotland. See 'Pacification of Dunse.'

Durani Dynasty (The). Founded in Afghanistan by Nadir Shah in 1747.

Durham (University of). Patent granted by Cromwell, 15 May, 1657. Incorporated by royal charter, 1837.

Durham Book (The). A copy of the Latin gospels with an interlinear Saxon gloss, written before the year 800, illuminated in the most elaborate style of the Anglo-Saxons, and reputed to have once belonged to the Venerable Bede. It is in the Cottonian collection of the British Museum Library. See 'Lindisfarne MS.'

Durham Letter (The), Oct. 1850. A letter written by Lord John Russell to the Bishop of Durham on the subject of 'Papal Aggression' (q.v.), which contained these words: 'The Roman Catholic religion confines the intellect and enslaves the soul.' This letter caused great excitement for a few weeks. A bill passed through both houses with large majorities against the establishment of a Catholic hierarchy in England and Ireland, but it proved a dead letter. The hierarchy continued, and soon the angry feeling of the nation subsided.

Duri Durani (Pearl of Pearls). The title assumed by Shah Ahmed, founder of the Kaubul empire. He died 1778, after a reign of twenty-six years.

Dutch School (The) of painting. The golden age was the 17th cent. Faultless in drawing, arrangement, colour, and also for texture of garments, hair of the head and beard, skin, &c.

CUYP, head of all animal painters ...	1605–1691

Dutch Toys. Not toys made by the Dutch, but by the Germans (Deutsche). They are chiefly made at Sonneberg in Saxe-Meiningen.

Dutch War (The). I. 1652–1654. Carried on chiefly by Admiral Blake and the Dutch admiral Van Tromp in Cromwell's time. Several engagements took place with varying success, and at last the Dutch sued for peace.

II. 1666–1668. Carried on by Louis XIV., and terminated by the Peace of Aix-la-Chapelle, between Louis XIV. and Carlos II.

III. 1672–1674. Carried on by Louis

XIV., and terminated by the Peace of Ryswick, signed by France, Austria, Spain, and Holland.

Duumviri. The two chief magistrates in Roman colonies who represented consuls. The two officers originally appointed in charge of the Sibylline books were also called duumviri.

There were duumviri whose duty it was to distribute corn to the people, duumvirs charged with the temple edifices and their services, as well as the colonial duumvirs, and many others.

Dyeing. In the dark ages the Jews were the only dyers. Hume says that the English, in the reign of Henry II., wore their robes white because they knew not the art of dyeing; but Hallam proves that woad was imported in the reign of John for dye. We also find allusions to a vegetable substance called 'folium,' used by the English for dyeing wood red or purple, in the 13th century. In 1628 two dyers of Exeter were flogged for teaching the art of dyeing in the North of England.

Dynamite Saturday, 24 Jan., 1885. When great damage was done to the Houses of Parliament and the Tower of London by explosions of dynamite. The Law Courts and some other public buildings were to have been attacked, but were happily too well guarded. See below.

Dynamiters, 1882. Irish rebels who used dynamite to destroy the public buildings of the English and destroy the private property of those obnoxious to them. In 1883 these Fenians were especially active, being urged to mischief by the money and encouragement received from the Irish in North America.

Dynast. A provincial ruler of Ireland, king in his own province, but subject to the Ard-righ, or supreme lord of the island. From the 5th to the 12th cent. Ireland was a pentarchy. Roderic O'Conor, who died in 1198, was the last Ard-righ, or Milesian over-lord. In 1175, by a treaty signed at Windsor, he became the liegeman of Henry II. See Rymer, 'Fœdera,' vol. i. p. 31.

Not one seventh part of the kings of Ireland, before its conquest by Henry II., died a natural death. This applies not only to the monarchs, but also to the dynasts and even to the heads of septs. Ireland was never so ill governed as when under the rule of Irishmen.

Dynasty danced out (A), 1760. Mr. Hawkins Brown (aged 30), in his travels, danced one evening at the court of Naples. His dress was a 'volcano silk with lava buttons,' and his dancing was with 'such agility and vigour' that the queen laughed till she was in convulsions, which terminated in a miscarriage, and changed the dynasty of the Neapolitan throne.

Dyvour (Scotch). A bankrupt.

Dzat and Bedagat. The sacred books of the Buddhists.

Eagle (An). As an ensign.

An eagle stripped of its feathers, emblematic of the Nile, was the ensign of the ancient Egyptians.

An eagle was adopted as an ensign by ancient Rome, B.C. 104. Marius confined the golden eagle to the legions. It had wings displayed and a thunderbolt in one of its talons.

The head of a white eagle, stripped of feathers, was the ensign of the Lagidês.

A gold or silver eagle at the end of a pike (with wings displayed), emblematic of the sun, was the Persian ensign in the time of Cyrus.

The Teutonic knights in 1148 adopted an eagle as their cognizance.

In MODERN times: the eagle was adopted, as a Russian symbol, by Ivan Vassilivich (who died 1584).

It was adopted by the United States of North America in 1788.

It was adopted in France by Napoleon I. in 1804 (superseded by the Fleur-de-lys in 1815), and restored by Napoleon III. in 1852.

Eagle (The Double-headed). Appears on the arms of the Holy Roman Empire under Kaiser Siegmund or Sigismund, 1433. See 'Eagle of Austria.'

Eagle and Child in the eagle's nest (The). Crest of the Earl of Derby. The tradition is that Sir Thomas Lathom, in the reign of Edward III., had only a daughter by his wife, and, wishing for a son, had a natural son whom he wished to make his heir. His difficulty, of course, was his wife, and this difficulty he surmounted thus: he conveyed the infant boy to an eagle's nest, and leading his lady to the spot, she heard the cries of a child in the tree. Her pity was moved, and the child was adopted. This child was afterwards Sir Oskytel. The daughter Isabella married Sir John Stanley, who adopted the crest of Eagle and Child, with the motto Sans changer (J. Roby, 'Traditions of Lancashire').

Eagle of Austria (The). Kaiser Ludwig V. (1314–1347) chose two black eagles for the national device; but Karl IV. (1347–1378) changed the device into a black eagle with two heads.

Eagle of Christ (The). St. John the Evangelist is called by Dante l' aquila di Cristo ('Paradiso,' xxvi. 53). It was St. Augustine who changed the ancient symbolism of the Four Evangelists derived from Ezekiel's cherubim.

Irenæus says John was the lion, and Mark the eagle; others make the lion symbolise Matthew, and the man symbolise Mark; but now the man represents Matthew, the lion Mark, the ox Luke, and the eagle John. See 'Evangelical Symbols.'

Unde mihi videntur qui ex Apocalypsi (iv. 7) illa quatuor animalia ad intelligendos quatuor Evangelistas interpretati sunt, probabilius aliquid attendisse, illi qui leonem in Matthæo, hominem in Marco, vitulum in Luca, aquilam in Joanne intellexerunt, quam illi qui hominem Matthæo, aquilam Marco, bovem Lucæ, leonem Joanni tribuerunt.—De Consens. Evang. l. 6.

Eagle of Divines (The). Thomas d'Aquinas, the 5th doctor (1224–1274).

Eagle of Doctors, 'Aquila Doctorum.' Pierre d'Ailly, called the 'Eagle of France,' and the 'Hammer of Heretics' (1350–1420).

Eagle of Meaux (The). Bossuet (1627–1704), bishop of Meaux, a great pulpit orator, especially famous for his 'Funeral Orations.'

Meaux, pronounce Mo.

Ear of Dionysius (The). The second of the 'latomiæ,' or quarries of Syracuse, used as prisons. The Athenians were confined therein, and subjected to all the torments of hunger, filth, and foul air. Capt. William Henry Smyth (1824) describes this cavern, and says amidst its many grottoes is one resembling the tympanum of the human ear, which is remarkable for its echoes. It is 64 feet high, varies from 17 to 35 feet in breadth, and is 187 feet long. It is said that Dionysius the tyrant had it constructed that its guardsman might overhear the conversation of the prisoners confined therein.

At one time the grotto was 72 feet high and 219 feet long, but Capt. Smyth says a part of it has been filled up, and that if two persons speak together the report is 'a confused clamour.' Without doubt the shape resembles the hollow of the human ear, and without doubt it was used at one time as a prison.

Earl Marshal's Court (The). Abolished in 1641 by the Long Parliament (q.v.). The earl marshal used to preside (jointly with the constable) over the Court of Chivalry. The last proceedings of the court were in 1631.

There is still an earl marshal, head of the College of Arms.

Earl of Aberdeen's Act (The), 1843. Determining questions respecting 'calls,' and the election of pastors in the church of Scotland.'

No legislation can possibly settle such questions finally.

Earl of Flint (The). The inexorable chief justice, George Jeffreys, was so called by the people after James II. made him a peer (Baron Jeffreys of Wem), 1640–1689.

Early English. Applied to architecture 1190. Distinguished by the Pointed arch, which was either lancet-shaped, equilateral, or obtuse-angled. Merged in the Decorated or Geometrical in 1275.

Early English Text Society (The). Established in London 1864.

Earth Houses. Underground buildings called 'Picts' Houses,' 'Weems,' and 'Caves.' Little stone houses built underground to hide people in time of war. Sometimes forty or fifty are found in Scotland clustered together.

East Country Company (The). Called by Elizabeth 'The Royal East Company,' the company which traded with the Baltic. The woollen cloths were principally made in Suffolk and Yorkshire. Ipswich, having the noblest harbour on the east, was most prosperous. Laud ruined the company by his religious dogmatism, and drove the workers in woollen goods to Holland, 'whereby the Dutch became instructed in a manufacture which before they knew nothing of.'

East Hendred, Northstead, and Hempholme Manors. The stewardship of which serves the purpose of the Chiltern Hundreds when the Buckinghamshire office is not vacant.

East Hendred is in Berkshire; post town Wantage. Hempholme is in Yorkshire, near Beverley. The Escheatorship of Munster serves for a similar purpose. See 'Chiltern Hundreds.'

East India Company (The), 1599. A company of merchants who sent out four ships to trade with the East Indies. In 1600 it was chartered by Queen Elizabeth, and in 1624 was vested with powers of government. Other companies were chartered in 1657, 1688, 1698, &c. In 1702 the companies were united. In 1773 a governor-general was appointed at Bengal. The charter ceased in 1833, but was renewed the same year. In 1858 the government of India was transferred to the crown.

In 1858 the number of directors was reduced from 24 to 18.

East India Company (The Danish), 1616. Dissolved in 1634. New one formed in 1670, a third in 1686, and a fourth in 1731. In 1777 the rights of the company were purchased by the king.

East India Company (The Dutch), 1595. Several companies united by the States in 1602.

East India Company (The French), 1664. Dissolved 1770. A new company formed 1785, but dissolved in 1790.

East India Company (The Ostend). Formed by Leopold in 1718, dissolved by Charles VI. in 1731.

East India Company (The Swedish), 1741. Reorganised in 1806.

Easter Eggs (Serving one with). Pelting one in the pillory with rotten eggs. In 1565 a Catholic priest in Scotland was seized in the service of the mass at Easter. Being seized he was dragged to the market-cross of Edinburgh, and there pelted with mud, filth, and rotten eggs. This was called 'serving him with his Easter eggs.'

Easter Limit (The). 'Termĭnus Paschālis.' From 8 March to 5 April. It begins with the vernal full moon, or that which immediately follows it. The earliest possible Easter Sunday is 22 March, and the latest possible is 25 April. Easter Sunday in 1943 will fall on 25 April, as it did in the year 1886.

The Easter new moon must fall somewhere between 8 March and 5 April. If on 8 March Easter day would be 21 March, if on 5 April it would be on 18 April. Now if 21 March happens to be Saturday, Easter Sunday will be the next day (March 22), the earliest possible. If, on the other hand, 18 April should happen to be Sunday, then Easter Sunday would be postponed a week, viz. to 25 April, the latest day possible.

 If the full moon fell on a Sunday, Easter day was postponed for a week, to prevent the coincidence of the Jewish passover and the Christian Easter being on the same day.

Easter Week. 'Hebdomăda Paschālis.' The week beginning with Easter Monday, and ending with the following Saturday, and therefore containing only 6 days. The next week following it was 'Hebdomada in Albis' (q.v.), which contained 8 days; and the week before it was the Great Week or Passion Week (q.v.), which contained 13 days.

Easterlings (The). 15th cent. Mariners of the Hanse-towns, as terrible at sea as the pirates of Algiers were afterwards. Spelman derives our word sterling [money] from these traders.

In the time of Richard I. monie coined in the east parte of Germany began to be of especiall request in England for the puritie thereof, and was called Easterling monie. Shortly after, some of that countrie skillful in mint matters and in all dies, were sent for into this realm to bring the coine into perfection, which since that time was called of them sterling, for Easterling.—CAMDEN.

Eastern Church (The). Separated from the Western or Latin Church about 324–334, and a rivalry began in 341. In 451 the Council of Chalcēdon conferred on the bishop of Constantinople equal rank and power with the bishop of Rome. John in 588 assumed the title of 'Œcumenical Patriarch.' The bishop of Constantinople is now generally called 'the Patriarch,' or 'the Patriarch of Constantinople.' See 'Patriarch.'

Eastern Empire (The). The eastern portion of the old Roman empire after its division by the brothers Valentinian and Valens, A.D. 364. Valens took the eastern part, with Constantinople for its capital; and Valentinian the western part, with Rome for his capital. The Eastern empire ended in 1453, when Mahomet II. warred against Constantine, who was slain, and the Eastern empire fell to the Ottomans or Turks.

The Western empire fell much sooner, viz. in A.D. 476.

Eating Fruit (Death from). Anacreon died from eating grapes. La Belle Gabrielle died from eating an orange. Kaiser Albert II., Friedrich III., and Maximilian I. all died from eating melons. Gen. Knox (U.S.) from eating raisins.

Eau de Brinvilliers, 1718. A poison made by Godin de Sainte Croix, who lived in scandalous intimacy with the Marchioness Brinvilliers, and furnished her with the means of poisoning her father, her two brothers, and several others. The marchioness chiefly employed a powder, called 'le poudre de succession.'

Eb'ionites (4 syl.). Judaising Christians of the 1st cent. They insisted on circumcision, despised the prophets, accepted only the gospel of St. Matthew, and that they interpolated; looked on Jesus only as a human being, but believed that Christ descended on him at his baptism. Paul's Epistles they rejected as antinomian. The Ebionites continued to exist as a sect after 300.

M. Guizot says the first Christians of Jerusalem were called Ebionites, on account of their poverty; called in Rom. xv. 26 'the poor saints.' These 'poor saints' were afterwards accused of the heresy of denying the divinity of Christ. (ἠβαιοί, poor, insignificant.)

Eblana, i.e. Dublin in Ireland.

Ecclesia Apostolica. The Church at Rome, called 'Cathedra Petri,' as having been founded by St. Peter.

Ecclesiastical Commission (The). I. 1583. A permanent commission, consisting of 44 members, established by Queen Elizabeth to decide on all questions respecting supremacy and uniformity. It had power to deprive any clergyman of his benefice without appeal. Heresy, schism, nonconformity, and even incest and adultery, fell within the pale of this court. Practically the whole power of the court rested with the bishops, and as there was no code to refer to, each question as it arose had to be left to the private judgment of the court or bishop appealed to. Parker deprived a vicar of his benefice for denying the verbal inspiration of scripture. Whitgift tried to force on the church the Calvinistic supralapsarian dogma. Bancroft was hot for the divine right of bishops. Abbot had no mercy on Erastians; Laud none for anti-Erastians.

'Supralapsarianism,' the doctrine that the fall of Adam and Eve, as well as the salvation or rejection of every living being, was predestined from all eternity.
'Erastianism,' the dogma that the church is, and ought to be, wholly dependent on the State.

II. 1686. Appointed by the advice of Jeffreys, the lord chancellor, with full authority, and without appeal, to decide on all ecclesiastical matters, without restraint of canon, civil, or municipal law. The commissioners were three divines and three laymen, all tools of the king (James II.), and their first act was to suspend Compton, bishop of London, because he would not favour the Romish party.

Ecclesiastical Commissioners (The), 1840. Amended from 1836. Ex officio the two archbishops and all the bishops of England and Wales, the deans of Canterbury, St. Paul's, and Westminster, the lord chancellor, the two chief justices, the master of the rolls, the chief baron, and the judges of the prerogative and admiralty courts, the president of the council, first lord of the treasury, chancellor of the exchequer, and one of the secretaries of state. Also nine laymen, not ex officio, seven appointed by the crown, and two by the archbishop of Canterbury. Five commissioners make a quorum, the highest in rank or else the senior commissioner to take the chair.

Ecclesiastical Courts. To decide on matters exclusively pertaining to the clergy and the established religion. Bacon enumerates ten such courts in his time:—

1. Convocation (q.v.).
2. The Court of Arches (q.v.).
3. Prerogative Court (q.v.).
4. Court of Audience (q.v.).
5. Court of Faculties (q.v.).
6. Court of Peculiars (q.v.).
7. Consistory Court (q.v.).
8. Archdeacon's Court (q.v.).
9. Court of Delegates. See 'Delegates.'
10. Court of Commissioners of Review (q.v.).

* * In 1857 the Prerogative Court was merged in the Court of Probate.
In 1832 the Commission of Delegates was superseded by the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council.

II. In Scotland there have been three ecclesiastical courts—(1) the General Assembly; (2) the Commissary Court; and (3) the Court of Teinds.

Ecclesiastical Era of Antioch (The). This era began 1 Sept., B.C. 5492.

Ecclesiastical Era of Constantinople (The). This era began 1 April, B.C. 5508.

Ecclesiastical Titles Assumption Act (The), 1851. To prohibit the pope of Rome from conferring on ecclesiastics titles connected with the names of places in the United Kingdom, such as Westminster, Nottingham, and so on. This act was provoked by what is called the 'papal aggression' of the court of Rome, which, 30 Sept., 1850, had divided Great Britain into territorial bishoprics under the Catholic archbishop of Westminster. Lord John Russell introduced the Ecclesiastical Titles Bill. Repealed 1867.

Ecclesiasticum Reservatum. A provision made in 1555 whereby it was stipulated that if any of the German clergy abandoned the Roman Catholic Church hereafter, his benefice should be forthwith filled up by a Catholic successor. With this exception, the alienation of all ecclesiastical property, secularised before the Treaty of Passau, in 1552, was confirmed by the Diet of Augsburg in 1555.

Passau, pronounce Pas-sow, as in now.

Eclectic School (The). I. Of Italian painting, succeeded the cinque cento (q.v.). The Carracci headed the movement. Domenichino (1581–1641) and Guido Reni (1575–1642) were exponents also of the same school.

II. Of French painting, founded by Paul Delaroche (1797–1856). He selected from the Classic and Romantic schools.

Eclectics (The). Alexandrine philosophers. Potămon and Ammonios Saccas (2nd cent.) were the first who attempted to fuse Platonism and Aristotelianism into one consistent system. The Neo-Platonic school was founded by Plotĭnus (205–270).

Modern eclecticism was founded by Victor Cousin, the French philosopher.

École Polytechnique (The), 1795. France. For the education of young men for the army, navy, civil engineering, and telegraphy.

Écoles Centrales, 9 Feb., 1795. Established by the National Convention for teaching sciences, arts, and letters. There must be 300,000 inhabitants in order to have such an institution. In 1802 many of these schools were converted into 'grammar schools' (Lycées), and in 1808 many ceased to exist.

Pronounce A-coal sen-tral.

Écoles Chrétiennes (Frères des), 1681. Instituted at Reims by J. B. de la Salle for the gratuitous instruction of children in the elements of religion and in elementary instruction. 'Les Frères portent une grande robe de bure noire et un chapeau à cornes.' This order was not suppressed at the Revolution, and still flourishes in France and other Christian countries.

Pronounce A-coal kra-te-en.

Écoles Pieuses (Les). The 'homes' of the waifs and strays brought under the care of the Piaristes (q.v.).

Pronounce A-coal pe-uze.

Écoles Primaires, 1802. To give children elementary instruction, as read ing, writing, arithmetic, and the elements of French grammar. In some elementary schools geography and history are taught. They subdivide into écoles publiques (or communales), and écoles privées; the former are directed by laymen and the latter by ecclesiastics. They are under the inspection of the bishops, pastors, rectors, prefects, sub-prefects, and mayors.

Pronounce A-coal pre-mair.

Écoles Secondaires, 1802. For teaching ancient and modern languages, geography, history, and the elements of science. They include grammar schools (lycées), colleges, boarding schools (pensions), and so on.

Pronounce A-coal skone-dair.

Economists. Christians who take for their rule of life 1 Cor. ix. 20: 'All things to all men.' In other words, 'Do as Rome does,' that is, adapt yourselves in every respect, as far as possible, to the society in which you are thrown.

Economists (French économistes). A name given to certain French writers of the 18th cent., who maintained that agriculture is the only fountain of wealth, and therefore clamoured for a land-tax. They were usually called 'Physiocrates' (q.v.).

Écorcheurs (Les), 1437. A gang of adventurers who committed great ravages, chiefly in Hainault, during the revolt of the Low Countries against the Duke of Burgundy. The best known of their leaders were Villandras and Chabannes the bastard. They were called the Skinners (écorcheurs), says Bouillet, 'parce qu'ils se composaient pour la plupart de bouchers ou d'écorcheurs de bêtes,' or else because they stripped those who fell into their hands of all their clothes, even their body-linen. See 'French Brigands.'

Pronounce Lays a-kor-shurs.

Écrasez l'infâme. A party watch-word among the Encyclopædists, meaning Down with superstition, or Down with senseless mummery. In full it would be Écrasez l'infâme superstition ('Walpoliana,' ii. 88).

Pronounce A-krah-zay lahn-fahm.

Ecstasy of Plotinus. A rapture in which he lost his personal consciousness and became part of the 'universal mind.' Plotinus says this ecstasy may be attained by music, by love, or by meditation. Paul speaks of such rapture in 2 Cor. xii. 2.

Ecstatic Doctor (The). See 'Divine Doctor.'

Ec'thesis of Heraclius. Published 638. Heraclius was emperor of the East, and the Ecthesis was the famous edict in favour of the Monoth'elites (4 syl.), q.v.

Ecumenical Bishop, A.D. 592. John, bishop of Constantinople, assumed this title, but Gregory I. of Rome induced Mauritius, emperor of the East, to insist on his dropping the title.

Ecumenical Councils (The Eight).

I. At NICÆA in Bithynia, held 325, to condemn the doctrine of Arius, who denied the divinity of Christ. Present 318 bishops.

II. At CONSTANTINOPLE, held 381, to condemn the heresy of Macedonius, who denied the divinity of the Holy Ghost. Present 150 bishops.

III. At EPHESUS, held 441, to condemn Nestorius, who denied the divinity of the Virgin Mary. Present 200 bishops.

IV. At CHALCEDON, held 451, to condemn the Monophysite heresy. Present 630 bishops.

(N.B.—The Anglican Church admits these four.)

V. At CONSTANTINOPLE (the second), held 553, to condemn the Nestorians. Present 165 bishops.

VI. At CONSTANTINOPLE (the third), held 680, to condemn the Monothelites. Present 170 bishops.

See 'Synods.'

VII. At NICÆA (the second), held 787, to condemn the Iconoclasts and re-establish images.

VIII. At CONSTANTINOPLE (the fourth), 869, to depose Photius and reinstate Ignatius. In this council the Monoth'elites and the Iconoclasts were both anathematised.

Monophysites (Greek μονος, φύσις, one nature), the human raised to the divine.

Nestorians allow the co-existence of the two natures of Christ, but not their union.

Monothelites, that is Μονοθέλῆται (Greek μονος, θέλημα, one will), the human will of Christ being absorbed, as they supposed, in the Divine will.

Edda. A collection of mythic and heroic songs of Scandinavia. The Poetic or elder Edda was compiled by Sæmund Sigfusson, and the songs compiled by him are supposed to belong to the 8th cent.; the oldest copy of Sæmund's Edda is of the 14th cent. It is from the original MS., and is preserved in the Royal Library of Copenhagen. Published by Resen in 1665, and edited by Rask in 1818.

The Prose or younger Edda was compiled by Snorro Sturleson, the Scandinavian Livy (1178–1241). It is supposed to have been compiled from posthumous papers left by Sæmund, Icelandic sources and traditions, and treats of Scandinavian mythology. This is sometimes called the Resenian Edda, because it was translated by Resen, in 1640.

Sæmund hinn Froda, Sigfusson, lived 1054-1133. Snorro Sturleson, 1178-1241. The elder Edda consists of two parts, the first mythological and the second heroic. The Sæmund Edda contains the famous poems of the Nibelungen cycle.

Edgar's Law. This was no law in the ordinary acceptation of the word, but the English constitution as it shaped itself in the hands of his minister Dunstan.

When the people clamoured for Edgar's law they meant they wished to be governed in the same way as Edgar governed the nation (959–975).—FREEMAN.

Edict (The Perpetual). I. Of Hadrian, A.D. 132. A compilation of all the edicts of preceding ediles and prætors, made by Salvius Julianus.

II. 1611. The forty-seven articles published by Albrecht, archduke of Austria, for the administration of justice in his dominions.

Edict of Berlin (The), or 'Decree of Berlin,' 21 Nov., 1806. Issued by Napoleon I., declaring the blockade of the British Isles, and 'boycotting' the English.

Edict of Chateaubriant (The), 1551. By Henri II., against the Calvinists.

Edict of Crémieu (The), 1536. By François of Crémieu, to regulate the jurisdiction of bailies, seneschals, and presidents (présidiaux).

Edict of Grace (The), July 1629. A treaty granted 'by grace' to the Huguenots soon after the capture of La Rochelle. By this treaty the reformers were reinstated in the possession of their places of worship, their cemeteries, and the exercise of their religion in the places they had before used, 'pending their return to the Catholic Church.'

By what has been said we may judge of the condition of the Reformed after the Edict of Grace.—FÉLICE, Hist. of the Protestants of France, book iii. 7.

Edict of January (The), 1562. Provided that those reformers who had taken possession of churches and ecclesiastical property in France should restore them without delay. It forbade reformers to destroy images or crosses, to meet within the walls of any town, or to go armed to any meeting (unless, indeed, they were of the privileged classes).

Edict of July (The), 1561. Granting toleration in France to domestic gatherings of reformers, but forbidding public meetings. See 'Edict of January.'

Edict of June 20 (The), 1730. A confirmation of the edict of 1620, granting to the church members of the three Vaudois valleys the right of working in their houses (with closed doors) on Catholic feast-days, of being employed on public works, and of acquiring real property. See 'Edict of Pacification.'

Edict of May 13 (The), 1694. In favour of the Vaudois, recognising their lawful establishment in the land of their ancestors, from which they had been expelled, their right to their hereditary possessions, and the revocation of the edicts of January and April 1686.

Edict of Melun (The), 1580. Redressing the complaints of the clergy.

Edict of Milan (The), March, 313. Published by Constantine in favour of Christians.

Edict of Nantes (The), 1598. An edict published by Henri IV. granting toleration to all Huguenots or Protestants, and placing them on entire equality with his Catholic subjects. Revoked by Louis XIV. (1685).

Pronounce Nantes to rhyme with aunt, can't.

Edict of Pacification (The), 1694. Granting full toleration not only to the Vaudois who belonged to the reformed religion from birth, but also to converts from Catholicism. This edict, as far as proselytes were concerned, was revoked by Victor Amadeus, and at the beginning of 1730 the exiles went to Geneva.

These edicts are very numerous in the 16th cent., with a view of putting an end to the religious wars. The most celebrated are—

The Edict of 19 May, 1563, by Charles IX., permitting Huguenots to assemble and worship in their own way.

Edict of Petites-Dates (The). 'L'Edit des Petites-Dates,' 1550. By Henri II., for the repression of abuses introduced 'dans la collation des bénéfices ecclésiastiques.'

Edict of Restitution (The), 1630. A foolish edict by Kaiser Ferdinand II. in the Thirty Years' War, after the retirement of the Danes. It enjoined restoration to the Catholics of the two archbishoprics, the twelve bishoprics, and all the parish churches, lands, and other property, which had been confiscated by the Protestants since the Treaty of Passau (7 Aug., 1552, i.e. 78 years ago). Compliance with this edict was well-nigh impossible, and at the Peace of Westphalia (24 Oct., 1648) the edict was cancelled.

Passau, pronounce Pas-sow, as in now.

Edict of Revocation (The), 1685. That is the Revocation of the Edict of Nantes (q.v.) by Louis XIV.

It was he [Louis XIV.] who in 1685 signed the fatal Edict of Revocation.—FÉLICE, Hist. of the Protestants of France, bk. iii. 7.

Edict of Romorantin (The), May 1560. Proposed by the French chancellor, Michel de l'Hôpital, restoring to the bishops the adjudication of the crime of heresy. This edict was prodigal of the most scandalous penalties, but it saved France from the establishment of the Inquisition which Cardinal de Lorraine laboured hard to introduce.

Edict of Theodoric (The), A.D. 500. Promulgated in Italy, but superseded by Justinian's laws in 554.

Edict of Toleration (The), 1787 (102 years after the Revocation). The Huguenots or Protestants are spoken of in this edict as 'non-Catholics.' It granted to non-Catholics the right of living in France and of exercising any vocation; permission to marry before justices; and the right of interment without calling in a Catholic priest. As no penalty was mentioned for nonconformity, of course perfect toleration was tacitly granted to all religionists.

Edict of Union (The). I. A.D. 405. Published by Honōrius against the Donātists and Manichæans, with a view of 'uniting' them with the Catholic Church.

II. 21 July, 1588. The edict by which Henri III., who had been driven out of Paris, was supported by the League, and declared s'unir à elle.

Edict of 1698 (The), 13 April. French history. This edict solemnly confirmed the Revocation of the Edict of Nantes, and enjoined that new means should be employed for the better instruction of the people in the true religion.

Nantes (1 syl.), to rhyme with aunt, jaunt.

Edict of 1724 (The), or 'The Royal Declaration of 1724,' 14 May. By Louis XV. on the advice of Cardinal Dubois. This was the last law against the French Protestants, and the most severe of all. It declared the punishment of perpetual imprisonment at the galleys for men, and life seclusion for women, with confiscation of property, if they attended any religious service except those of the Catholics. The galleys or imprisonment for all who sheltered or omitted to denounce a 'heretic.' All children to be baptized by a Catholic priest within twenty-four hours of their birth, and to be sent to a Catholic school till fourteen years of age. Notice to be given to the parish priest of illness. No marriage to be legalised unless solemnised by a Catholic priest. No child to be sent out of France to be educated. No office whatever to be held except by Catholics. All mulcts to be for the relief of necessitous new converts.

Ediles (2 syl.). Annual magistrates in Rome whose duty it was to see to the edifices (ædes), especially the public baths, aqueducts, and market-places. There were curule ediles and plebeian ediles, the latter instituted B.C. 493. They ceased to be created in the reign of Constantine.

Edinburgh is Edwins-burgh, so called from Edwin, who founded the castle in the 6th cent. In Notts is a village called Edwin-stowe, where Edwin was buried. Here Robin Hood was married.

Edinburgh (Treaty of), 6 July, 1560. Between Queen Elizabeth and the Scots for the evacuation of Scotland by the French. By this treaty François II. and Mary fully recognised the right of Elizabeth to the English crown, and agreed that Mary, in time to come, should neither assume the title nor bear the arms of England.

At their coronation in Paris François and Mary were proclaimed king and queen of France England, and Scotland. The princes of Lorraine had money struck in France bearing the arms of England; and proclamations were made in the names of François and Mary, king and queen of the three realms.

Edinburgh (University of), 1582. Founded by James VI. (James I. of England). Reconstituted in 1858.

Edinburgh Review (The). Commenced in Oct. 1802. The political views were those of the Whig party.

Edmund Crouchback, 1241–1296. First earl of Lancaster, 2nd son of Henry III., the eldest son being Edward I.

Edmund Hall (St.), Oxford. Said to have been founded by Edmund archbishop of Canterbury, in the reign of Henry III. The head of the Hall is called 'the Principal.'

Edrisites (3 syl.), 785–919. A Mussulman dynasty which had Fez as the seat of government. The founder was Edris (785–793), of the race of Ali, poisoned by order of the calif Harun al Rashid.

Edris was succeeded by Edris II. (793–828); Mohammed I., Ali, Yahia I., Yahia II., Ali II., Yahia III., Yahia IV. (905–919).

Education. The first parliamentary grant for education was made in 1834. The Committee of Privy Council was appointed in 1839. Public elementary education in England and Wales was provided for in 1870 (33, 34 Vict. c. 75).

Edward I. 'Longshanks,' king of England (1239, 1274–1307). Son of Henry III. He married twice: (1) Eleanor daughter of Ferdinand III. of Castile, by whom he had four sons and eight daughters. The first two sons died young, and the last three daughters.

3rd son, EDWARD II. (the first prince of Wales) who succeeded his father.

The daughters who married are Eleanor, Joan, Margaret, Beatrix, and Elizabeth. Mary was a nun at Amesbury, and died 1286.

By his second wife he had two sons: Thomas earl of Norfolk, and Edmund of Woodstock, earl of Kent.

His style and title: 'Edwardus rex Angliæ dominus Hiberniæ et dux Aquitaniæ' (Guienne).

His title to France: On the death of Charles IV., two claimants for the crown appeared, Philippe de Valois his cousin, and Edward I. his nephew. If the Salique law was set aside, then Blanche (sister of Charles IV.), wife of Philippe de Valois, was the heiress; if the Salique law remained in force, Edward, who claimed through his mother Isabelle, must be set aside, and again Philippe de Valois, grandson of Philippe III. le Bel, was heir. In neither case had Edward any just claim.

PHILIPPE III. was father of PHILIPPE IV. and of Charles de Valois.
PHILIPPE IV. was father of LOUIS X., PHILIPPE V., CHARLES IV., and Isabelle (who married Edward II.). See 'Fatal Three.'
CHARLES IV. left a daughter, Blanche, who married PHILIPPE [VI.], son of Charles de Valois. This was after his accession to the throne; he was then son-in-law as well as cousin to the last king, CHARLES IV., and grandson of PHILIPPE III.

Edward II. 'Caernarvon,' king of England (1284, 1307–1327). This son of Edward I. was born at Caernarvon, and was the first English prince of Wales. He married Isabella, daughter of Philippe IV. of France, his cousin, by whom he had two sons and two daughters.

1. EDWARD III., who succeeded his father.
2. John of Eltham, earl of Cornwall.
3. Joan, who married David Bruce, king of Scotland.
4. Eleanor, who married Reynald count of Gueldres.

His favourites were Gaveston, who was twice banished—in 1297 and in 1307—and at last executed summarily by the indignant barons in 1312. Edward's next favourite was Hugh Despenser, who was executed in 1326.

He was murdered in Berkley Castle by Maltravers and Gournay.

His style and title, up to 1326, was: 'Edwardus, D.G. rex Angliæ, dominus Hiberniæ, et dux Aquitaniæ' (Guienne). From 1326 he discontinued the title of 'dux Aquitaniæ.'

Edward III. 'Windsor,' so called from the place of his birth (1312, 1327–1377). Married Philippa of Hainault, by whom he had seven sons and five daughters.

		Born
1st son.	Edward the Black Prince, born at Woodstock, father of RICHARD II., who succeeded his grandfather. (Isabella)	1330
2nd son.	William, born at Hatfield, who died 1336 (Joanna, born 1335, died 1348.)	1334
3rd son.	Lionel duke of Clarence, born at Antwerp	1338
4th son.	John of Gaunt, born at Ghent, duke of Lancaster	1339 or 1340
5th son.	Edmund duke of York, born at King's Langley (Blanche, died young; Mary and Margaret)	1341 ...
6th son.	William, born at Windsor, lived only from June to Sept.	1348
7th son.	Thomas, born at Woodstock, created duke of Gloucester 1385 by Richard II., and murdered in 1397. Born, according to Stow and Dugdale	1355

After the death of Philippa, Edward III. attached himself, without marriage, to Alice Perrars or Perrers, one of the ladies of the bedchamber.

His style and title, from 1327 to 1337: 'Edwardus, D.G. rex Angliæ, dominus Hiberniæ, et dux Aquitaniæ' (Guienne). From 1337 to 1377: 'Edwardus, D.G. rex Angliæ et Franciæ [sometimes 'Franciæ et Angliæ'], dominus Hiberniæ, et dux Aquitaniæ.'

N.B.—All the monarchs of England from 1377 styled themselves 'king of France' up to 1800, when George III. relinquished the senseless title.

His claim to the throne of France. On the death of Charles IV. without male issue, the claimants were Philippe de Valois and Edward III. of England. The former was crowned as Philippe VI. de Valois.

PHILIPPE III. of France had two sons, viz. PHILIPPE IV. (who succeeded him) and Charles de Valois.
PHILIPPE IV. had for issue LOUIS X. (who succeeded and died without issue), PHILIPPE V. (who also died without issue), and Isabelle.
Philippe the claimant was the son of Charles de Valois, grandson of PHILIPPE III., and cousin of the last king, CHARLES IV.
Edward III. was the son of Isabelle, and great-grandson of PHILIPPE III., and nephew of the last king, CHARLES IV.
'The main argument was this: As women could not succeed to the crown, therefore Isabelle had no claim whatever, and her children could have none.

Edward III. and the two captive kings.—At the battle of Poitiers, 1355 Jean II. of France was made captive and brought to England. At the same time David II. of Scotland, defeated at Neville's Cross in 1346, was made captive. Thus were there two kings at one and the same time captives in London.

Edward IV. First of the line of York. The claim of York was undoubtedly superior to that of Lancaster, being from the third son (Lionel) of Edward III.; whereas the house of Lancaster was from John of Gaunt, the fourth son, and therefore a younger brother. The descent was from Lionel, third son of Edward III.

Lionel's daughter Philippa married Edward Mortimer. Their son was Roger Mortimer; and Roger Mortimer's daughter Anne married Richard (son of Edmund duke of York).

Richard duke of York, the White Rose, was slain in the battle of Wakefield; and his sons were EDWARD IV. and RICHARD III.

Edward married Elizabeth Woodville, a widow, and was the first of our sovereigns since the Conquest to marry a subject. He had ten children, but of the seven who reached maturity five were girls and two boys. Edward V. succeeded, but he and his brother Richard were both murdered in the Tower.

Elizabeth, the eldest daughter of Edward IV., and called 'The Rose of York,' or 'The White Rose of York,' married Henry VII., and thus united the rival branches of York and Lancaster.

His style and title: 'Edwardus, D.G. rex Angliæ et Franciæ, et dominus Hiberniæ.'

Edward V. Nominal king of England for about a month (1483). He was thirteen years of age, and his brother Richard was nine; both were murdered in the Tower by order of their uncle Richard [III.] duke of Gloucester. The actual assassins were Slater, John Dighton, and Miles Forest. In the reign of Charles II. the bodies of the princes were found under a staircase, and removed to Henry VII.'s Chapel in Westminster Abbey 1674.

Edward V. and Dr. Shaw.—Dr. Shaw, at St. Paul's Cross (Sunday, 22 June, 1483), preached from these words in the Book of Wisdom, 'Bastard slips shall not strike deep root,' his object being to show that Edward V. was a bastard. He said that Edward IV. was married to Lady Eleanor Butler, the widow of Lord Butler of Sudely and daughter of the Earl of Shrewsbury; consequently, Elizabeth Woodville (mother of Edward V.) was merely a concubine, and that Stillington, bishop of Bath, was a witness. As Edward V. was the son of a concubine, he could not come to the throne.

To set aside Edward and his brother Richard would not render Richard duke of Gloucester heir, because his elder brother Clarence left two sons behind; but Clarence having been put to death for treason barred his sons by his attainder.

Richard III. (1483) ordered Edward V. to be called officially 'Edward the bastard, lately called Edward V.'

Edward VI. Son of Henry VIII (1537, 1547–1553). He died after an attack of small-pox, leaving the crown to Lady Jane Grey. His style was 'Edward, D.G. of England, France, and Ireland king; Defender of the faith, and supreme head of the Anglican and Hibernian Church.'

The Pretender, Edward VI.—Lambert Simnel, son of Thomas Simnel, a joiner of Oxford, instructed by one Simons, a priest, to personate Edward Plantagenet, son of the Earl of Warwick, and become a 'pretender' to the crown, in the early part of the reign of Henry VII. (1486). He was crowned at Dublin as Edward VI. 2 May, 1487. Being defeated at Stoke by Henry VII. (16 June, 1487), he was made a scullion in the king's kitchen, but was afterwards raised to falconer.

Henry released Edward Plantagenet from prison and showed him publicly to the people, to show the imposition of Lambert Simnel. Edward VI. [Simnel] was crowned by the Bishop of Meath, with a diadem taken from a statue of the Virgin Mary, and carried to the castle on the shoulders of a chieftain named Darcy.

Edward VI.'s First Prayer Book or The First Liturgy of Edward VI. 1549 (2, 3 Edw. VI.). Substituted for the Latin Mass Book. By the Act for Uniformity all clergymen who refused to adopt the new liturgy were subject to imprisonment for six months for the first offence, loss of benefice for the second offence, and perpetual imprisonment for the third.

The DAILY SERVICE did not contain the Introductory Sentences, Exhortation, Confession, and Absolution, but began with the Lord's Prayer. There were no State prayers in this liturgy.

The LITANY contained a petition against the papacy.

The COMMUNION SERVICE did not contain the Ten Commandments, but enjoined that water be mixed with the wine.

In the BAPTISMAL SERVICE exorcism was employed to drive out the evil spirit; the child was clothed in a chrisom, and was anointed on the head.

The CATECHISM formed part of the service, but it comprised only an exposition of the Creed, the Lord's Prayer, and the Ten Commandments.

In the MARRIAGE SERVICE the sign of the cross was to be made on the forehead of the newly-married persons, and a present of money was given to the bride when the ring was put on her finger.

In the BURIAL SERVICE prayers for the dead were offered.

VESTMENTS. The priests of parish churches were to wear a surplice only; in cathedrals the hood was to be worn in preaching.

Edward VI.'s Second Prayer Book, or The Second Liturgy of Edward VI., 1552. The first liturgy reformed by Cranmer under the advice of Bucer and Peter Martyr.

In the DAILY SERVICE the Introductory Sentences, the Exhortation, the Confession, and the Absolution were added.

In the COMMUNION SERVICE the Ten Commandments were added; but the Introit, prayers for the dead, the name of the Virgin Mary, the sign of the cross, and mixing water with the wine were all omitted.

In the BAPTISMAL SERVICE exorcism, anointing the child, chrisom, and dipping the child thrice were omitted.

In the MARRIAGE SERVICE the sign of the cross and present of money were omitted.

In the BURIAL SERVICE prayers for the dead were omitted.

VESTMENTS. The nether albe, 'vestments,' and cope were forbidden. Prelates might wear a rochet, but other clergymen 'a surplice only.'

Edward Longshanks. See 'Edward I.'

Edward of Caernarvon. See 'Edward II.'

Edward of Hampton, Edward VI. (1537, 1547–1553). Called Hampton from Hampton Court, the place of his birth.

Edward of Hampton was no otherwise prince of Wales than under the general title of England, his father being king of England and Wales.—COKE, Reports (8 Jacobi, sect. viii.).

Edward the Black Prince (1330–1376). Son of Edward III., king of England, and father of Richard II. As he died a year before his father, he never succeeded to the crown. He was called Black because he was a name of terror to the French.

Similarly Lord Clifford was called Black for his cruelties. George Petrowitsch was called by the Turks Black George from the terror of his name; Agnes countess of March was called Black Agnes for her resistance to Edward III. at Dunbar. The Black Sea means the sea of terror, and the Black Wind the wind of terror. See 'Black.'

Edward the Confessor (1004, 1041–1066). A king of England before the Conquest. Canonised 1166 by Alexander III. The use of the Great Seal was first introduced by this king.

Confessores dicti qui martyrio vitam pro Christo, quem palam confessi et contestati sunt, finierunt. DU CANGE, vol. iii. p. 644, col. 1.

Edward the Elder (870, 901–925), king of England.

Edward the Martyr (961, 975–979). A king of England before the Conquest, assassinated at Corfe by order of his stepmother Elfrida, to make room for her own son, Ethelred the Unready.

Edward was no martyr in the ordinary sense of the word, but he was basely and treacherously murdered.

Edward the Outlaw. Son of Edmund Ironside, outlawed to Sweden by Canute.

Eelkhanee Tables (The). The astronomical tables of Nazir-u-Dien, produced in the reign of Hoolaku, shah of Persia (1258–1265). They are still highly esteemed, and are referred to for the latitude and longitude of places not yet fixed by European observations. See 'Star Tables.'

The word Eelkhanee means 'Chief of the Tribes.'

Effendi. A Turkish title of courtesy equal to our squire, and always placed after the proper name. Sometimes, however, in speaking to a Turkish gentleman the word effendi is used as the French use monsieur before a proper name. The Grand Chancellor of Turkey is called 'Reis Effendi.'

Égalité (Monsieur). Louis Philippe Joseph, duc d'Orléans (1747–1793). When Barère, president of the National Assembly, put the question what punishment should be accorded to the king, Louis XVI., the Duc d'Orléans rose and said, 'La mort sans phrase.' It is somewhat strange, but the only person who voted against the sentence of death was Thomas Paine, an Englishman, who had the manhood to say to the assembly, 'The king's death, instead of an act of justice, will appear in history as an act of vengeance.' Louis Égalité was guillotined 1793.

Egypt and Bible History.

There were thirty dynasties in ancient Egypt. From B.C. 3892 to 340.

The I. dynasty began in Upper Egypt with Menês, B.C. 3892. Menès founded the city of Memphis.

No trace of the 'Flood' has yet been discovered by Egyptologists.

II. dynasty began with Boethos, B.C. 3639. The second king of this line was Kakan, who introduced the worship of Apis, the sacred bull.

III. dynasty began with Necherophês,

B.C. 3338. The Sphinx was carved in this dynasty.

IV. dynasty began with Khufu [Suphis or Choops], B.C. 3124. Khufu built the great pyramid. His successor, Khafra or Khafren [Cephren or Kephren], built the second great pyramid; and the third king of the same line, Menkara [Mykerînos], built the third great pyramid.

V. dynasty began B.C. 2840. The VI. began B.C. 2744, the last monarch being Queen Nitocris, noted for her great beauty. VII. dynasty began B.C. 2592; the VIII. B.C. 2522; the IX. B.C. 2674; the X. B.C. 2565; the XI. B.C. 2423.

XII. dynasty began B.C. 2380 with Amen'emhat. In this dynasty were built the Temple of Amun-Ra, at Thebes, and the obelisk of Heliopŏlis. Amenemhat's son was Usurtesen I.

XIII. dynasty began B.C. 2136; the XIV. B.C. 2167.

HYKSOS or 'Shepherd Kings' were probably Arabs. The XV., XVI., XVII. dynasties (B.C. 1842, 1684, 1591).

It is supposed that ABRAHAM went to Egypt in B.C. 1806, while the XVI. dynasty was regnant.

It is supposed that JOSEPH was viceroy of Sutapepe-Nubti of the same dynasty. About B.C. 1718.

Hyk = king, Sos = shepherds.

XVIII. dynasty was founded by Aahmes [Amăsis], B.C. 1591, who expelled from Egypt the Shepherd Kings.

XIX. dynasty, B.C. 1443, was the Golden Age of the Pharaohs. The XIX. began with Ramses I., who was succeeded by Seti [Sethos], who built Karnak. Ramses II. was by far the greatest of all the kings of Egypt. It is said that he had 170 children, of which 111 were sons, that he reigned 67 years, and died above 96 years of age. After his death came a period of confusion.

It is supposed that MOSES was born in the reign of the great Ramses, and that the EXODUS occurred after his death, during the reign of Arisu, a usurper and a Syrian, about B.C. 1314.

No hint can be traced by Egyptologists either of the Exodus or the Passage of the Red Sea.

XX. dynasty was founded B.C. 1269 by Set-Nekht, and Egypt was on its full decline.

XXI. dynasty began B.C. 1091.

SOLOMON married Abra, the daughter of Pisenes II. [Pisham], last king of this line. She was 19 years of age (1 Kings iii. 1). It is supposed that 'Solomon's Song' was an epithalamium of this alliance.

XXII. dynasty was founded by Sheshouk [Shishak], B.C. 961, who received under his protection Jeroboam, and afterwards marched against Rehoboam with 12,000 chariots and 60,000 horsemen.

See 1 Kings xiv. 25, and 2 Chron. xii.

It is supposed that 2 Chron. xiv. 9-15, and xvi. 8, &c., refer to Zerah, the fourth of this dynasty, generally called Osorthon II.

XXIII. dynasty began B.C. 787. The second king of this line (Osorthon IV.) was the Egyptian Hercules.

XXIV. dynasty had only one sovereign, Bochoris, B.C. 729–716. He was deposed and put to death by Shabak.

XXV. dynasty founded by Shabak, B.C. 716.

HOSEA gave tribute to this king (2 Kings xvii. 3).

The successor of Shabak was Shabakok, called So in 2 Kings xvii. 4.

HEZEKIAH formed a confederacy with So, king of Egypt, against Sennacherib, king of Assyria, and Sennacherib marched against the allies (2 Kings xviii., xix.); but So had been succeeded by Tirhâkah or Tarach.

XXVI. dynasty was founded by Psammetik [Psammetichus] the Great, B.C. 685. His son, Neku II., called Pharaoh-Nechoh (2 Kings xxiii. 29, &c.), overthrew Josiah and slew him.

Pharaoh Hophra, the seventh of this line, contemporary of Jeremiah (xliv. 30), was dethroned by Nebuchadnezzar, king of Babylon. In 525 B.C. Egypt was an appanage of Persia (dynasty XXVII.); then followed a Saite dynasty, a Mendesian, and a Sebennyte, after which the Persian power was restored. Next came the Græco-Macedonian period; and B.C. 30 Egypt became a Roman province.

Egyptian Days. Unlucky days. There are three in the year, viz. the last Monday in April, the 2nd Monday of August, and the 3rd Monday of December. Called Egyptian because ill-luck was attributed to them by the Egyptian astrologers. In the Exeter Kalendar, a MS. of the time of Henry II., there are 24 Egyptian days.

Three days there are in the year which we call 'Egyptian days.'—Saxon MS. (British Museum).

 In regard to Friday, the Brahmins and Buddhists consider it a dies mala, as well as many Christians.

Egyptian Hall (The). In the Mansion House, City of London. It was built after the description of the Egyptian Hall by Vitruvius.

Egyptian Version of the Sacred Scriptures, embraces the Coptic and Memphitic, in the dialect of Lower Egypt. It is ascribed to the 3rd cent.

There is a version in the dialect of Upper Egypt, called 'Sa'hidic' or 'Theba'idic,' even more ancient. Probably close upon the 2nd cent.

Eight (The), i.e. 'Al Motamen.' So the Kalif Al Motassem was called by a play on his name, after his death. His subjects used to say he was the 8th of his dynasty, was born in the 8th month, reigned exactly 8 years, 8 months, and 8 days, had fought 8 battles, and left at death 8 sons, 8 daughters, 8,000 slaves, and 8 millions of gold.

It is possible that this may be true, just as it is possible that a dealer may hold thirteen trumps in his hand.

Eight Articles (The), 1555. While Cranmer, Ridley, and Latimer were in prison they drew up their confession of faith in eight articles: (1) the Scriptures are the true word of God; (2) the three Catholic creeds are to be believed; (3) justification is by faith only; (4) marriage is lawful to all men; (5) we reject the dogma of transubstantiation; (6) we reject the dogma of purgatory; (7) the cup in the Lord's Supper is to be given to the laity; and (8) public worship is not to be carried on in any foreign tongue. See 'Articles.'

Eight Canonical Hours (The). In the Catholic Church. There are four great (printed in capitals), and four little (printed in italics).

MATINS, or Nocturnes, between midnight and daybreak. On festivals and Sundays, three psalms, three anthems, and three lessons.

LAUDES, at daybreak. Five psalms, two or more capitules (scripture extracts), prayers, and canticles.

Prime, six o'clock in the morning. The first hour of the day.

Tierce, nine o'clock in the morning. The third hour of the day.

Sexte, twelve o'clock, or mid-day. The sixth hour of the day.

Nones, three o'clock in the afternoon. The ninth hour of the day.

VESPERS, at sunset. Five psalms, a capitule, a hymn, the Magnificat, one or more anthems, and prayers.

COMPLINE, at bedtime. Confession, one lesson, three psalms, an anthem, a hymn, a capitule, a short response, Nunc Dimittis, and prayers.

Eight Paradises (The), or 'Hesht Behesht.' Eight gardens in Ispahan, on either side of the gate called Char Baugh. Each garden has a pleasure-house.

Eighteenth Brumaire (The Battle of the), Year VIII. (9 Nov., 1799). Between Napoleon Bonaparte and the Directory. The Directory was overthrown, and Bonaparte constituted 'First Consul.'

Eighth Wonder of the World (The). The Escurial of Spain (q.v.).

Eighty (The), or the Ottanta. The upper house of legislature in the republic of Florence, in the time of Savonarola; the lower house consisted of 3,200 beneficiati, divided into three sections, holding office for six months. All laws were proposed by the Signoria, discussed by the Ottanta, and voted in silence into law by the Commons.

The beneficiati were those who had already held office in the state, or had been proposed for office. The former were called the Seduto, and the latter the Veduto.

Eighty-six. 'The immortal 86.' The followers of C. S. Parnell in the House of Commons in 1886, &c. These 86 really ruled the House, for they voted as one man, and could overthrow or carry any measure. Home Rule was the great question. The Tory government was thrown out by the 'immortal 86,' and Mr. Gladstone, who supported Home Rule, was supported by them.

Eikon Basilike (I-kon Bă-zil-I-ky). Published 1649, at one time attributed to Charles I.: but John Gauden, writing to the Bishop of Exeter, says the book 'is wholly and only my invention.' It contains a full account of the trial and condemnation of the king.

Eikonoclastes (5 syl.), 1649. Milton's reply to 'Eikon Basilikê.'

Eisteddfod (The), 1078. First appointed by Gryffith ap Conan to reform the Welsh bard system. In these annual meetings bards of merit rehearsed their poems, and minstrels played their harps. These bards were oral historians and genealogists. An Eisteddfod was held at Caerwys, 26 May, 1568, by proclamation of Queen Elizabeth. It was again revived by the Gwyneddigion Society in 1798; and again by the Cymrodorion Society in 1828. It lasts several days, and begins with the opening of the Gorsedd (or council of bards), and concludes with the Eisteddfod, or competition for prizes in poetry, recitation, and music.

Eisteddfod is from the Welsh verb eisteddi, to sit, and means a session, meeting together, or muster.

El Dora'do. Manoa, the hypothetical capital of Guiana, supposed by Sir Walter Raleigh and others to be so affluent that it was called 'The Golden City,' and Guiana was called 'The Golden Empire.'

He (Sir Walter) seems to have heard many wonderful rumours of gold mines, and of cities built of gold and silver, and even embossed with precious stones: but he discovered no magnificent Manoa, with pinnacles blazing with diamonds and rubies, nor any gold mines, only signs of gold in the mountains beyond the Spanish town of St. Thomas.—HOWITT, History of England (James I. vol. iii. p. 74).

Elders (The), or 'Council of the Elders' (Conseil des Anciens). One of the two legislative councils of the 'Constitution of Year III.' in French history (Sept. 22, 1795). It had no power of initiating any law, but only of veto or approval. The initiative was restricted to the 'Council of 500' (q.v.), and the executive to the five directors.

Eldest Son of the Church (The). Clovis, grandson of Merwig or Merovens (465, 481–511). The first king not an Arian.

Eldon Law Scholarship. Value 200*l.*, and tenable for three years. Founded in the University of Oxford in honour of Lord Chancellor Eldon in 1880.

El'eanor Crosses. Twelve memorial crosses erected in places where the bier of Eleanor of Castile, wife of Edward I., rested on its way from Hornby, in Lincolnshire, where she died, to Westminster, where she was buried. Three still remain: viz. at Walsham, Northampton, and Geddington. Charing Cross was destroyed in 1647, but a model of it stands in the front of the South-Eastern railway station, Strand, London.

The twelve are these: Charing, Dunstable, Geddington, Grantham, Lincoln, Northampton, St. Albans, Stamford, Stoney Stratford, Walsham, West Cheap, and Woburn.

Charing cross was the work of Richard and Roger Crandale.

Dunstable cross was the work of John Battle.

Lincoln cross was the work of Richard de Howe.

Northampton cross was the work of John Battle.

Stoney Stratford cross was the work of John Battle.

Walsham cross was the joint work of Dymenge de Leger and Dymenge de Reyns.

West Cheap was rebuilt by John Hetherley, lord mayor of London.

Woburn cross was the work of John Battle.

* * Some of these crosses were certainly not memorial crosses, but were built by Queen Eleanor herself as works of piety.

Eleanor, Maid of Brittany. Sister of Prince Arthur, and next to Arthur lawful successor to the crown of England. John usurped the crown, and both Eleanor and Arthur were captured by him at Mirabel 31 July, 1202. Arthur met with his death mysteriously, and Eleanor was imprisoned for life. She died in Bristol Castle 1241.

Eleatic School of Philosophers (The). So called from Elĕa, in Italy, the chief seat of these philosophers. They were divided into the Old and New Schools. The Old School was speculative, like the Ionic sect, and taught that there is but one element. The New School confined themselves to the study of natural philosophy.

The chief of the Old School were Xenophănês, the founder (B.C. 556–456); Parmenĭdês (B.C. 513–430), and Zenon (B.C. 480–405).

The chief of the New School were Leucippos (B.C. 510–430), Democritos (B.C. 509–400), and Protagŏras (B.C. 481–411).

Xenophănês revived the Eastern theory that God and the Universe are identical.

The Eleatic Metaphysicians were Pantheists, and the Eleatic Physicians were Atomistics.

Electoral Roll (The). University of Cambridge. Consists of members of the senate who have resided for fourteen weeks, at least, within 1½ mile of Great St. Mary's Church. The following are ex officio members: All officers of the University (members of the senate), all heads of houses, all professors and public examiners.

The Electoral Roll is published by the first Monday in October, from which day residence is calculated.

Electors (The). Originally the seven most powerful feudatories of Germany, who assumed the exclusive privilege of choosing the kaiser. They were (1) the king of Bohemia, (2) the duke of Saxony, (3) the margrave of Brandenburg, (4) the count palatine of the Rhine, (5) the archbishop of Mentz or Mayence, (6) the archbishop of Trèves, and (7) the archbishop of Cologne; the archbishop of Mentz was the official president, and 'Convener of the Electors.'

In 1618 the Duke of Bavaria was substituted for the King of Bohemia (the palsgrave), but in 1648 the palsgrave was readmitted, and in 1692 Ernest duke of Hanover was created the ninth elector; but in 1777 the number was again reduced to eight. In 1356 the Golden Bull of Karl IV. recognised the right of the electors to choose the king, but in 1806 the whole system was abolished by Napoleon Bonaparte.

The title of Elector continued to be held in Hesse-Cassel till 1866. The electoral crown was a scarlet cap turned up with ermine.

Electric Telegraph (The). Patented by Cooke and Wheatstone 12 June, 1837; brought into use on the Great Western Railway 1839; purchased by the postmaster-general 31 July, 1868; management of the telegraph assumed by the post-office 5 Feb., 1870.

Morse's original instrument dates from 1835. The submarine electric telegraph from Dover to Calais was laid in Aug. 1850, and purchased by the postmaster-general in 1868.

Elemental Spirits. Beings supposed in the middle ages to preside over the four elements. The elemental spirits of fire were called SALAMANDERS; the elemental spirits of air were called SYLPHS; the elemental spirits of earth were called GNOMES (1 syl.); and the elemental spirits of water were called UNDINES (2 syl.).

Elephant (Order of the), 1180. A Danish military order created by Knut VI. after his crusade in the East, when an elephant was killed. Revived in 1458 by Christian I. The cordon is blue moiré.

Elephants. The eight which sustain the world, according to Indian mythology, are called Achtequedjams.

Eleusin'ian Mysteries (The). The sacred rites with which the annual festival of Cerês was celebrated at Eleusis in Attica.

Eleuther'ia. Games in honour of Zeus Eleuthĕrĭos, so named from Eleuthĕris, a city of Bœotia, near which the famous battle of Platæa was won B.C. 479. See 'Platæa.'

Eleven (The). Athenian magistrates who had the charge of executing criminals.

When he [Socrates] came in from bathing, he sat down, and did not speak much. For then the officer of the Eleven came in.—PLATO, The Phædon.

Eleven Articles (The), 1560. Provisionary articles drawn up by the bishops in the early part of the reign of Queen Elizabeth for the instruction and guidance of the clergy and people till the meeting of convocation: (1) The Trinity is to be believed; (2) the holy scriptures and the three creeds are all sufficient; (3) the Church has authority to decree rites and ceremonies; (4) all persons not lawfully appointed shall be excluded from the ministry; (5) asserts the royal supremacy; (6) renounces all papal jurisdiction; (7) declares that the Common Prayer Book is according to scripture; (8) forbids exorcism, and the use of oil, salt and spittle in baptism; (9) rejects private masses, and denies the propitiatory sacrifice of the mass; (10) enjoins communion in both kinds; and (11) rejects images, relics, praying on beads, pilgrimages, miracles, and so on. See 'Articles.'

Eleven Members (The), 1647. When the army presented their 'Humble Representation' to parliament, it demanded the expulsion of eleven members, with Holles at their head. The army charged these members with stirring up strife between them and the parliament, and with a secret design of renewing the civil war. The eleven members were not expelled, but were induced to withdraw. A London mob forced the House to recall the eleven, and fourteen peers with 100 commoners fled to the army. Cromwell in two days took London, restored the 114 fugitives, and expelled the obnoxious eleven.

Elgin Marbles (The), 1816. So called from Lord Elgin, who collected them during his mission to the Porte in 1802. They were chiefly derived from the Parthenon, a temple of Minerva, on the Acropolis of Athens, of which they formed part of the frieze and pediment built by Phidias about B.C. 500. They were purchased by the British government for 35,000*l.*, and placed in the British Museum.

Elgin, pronounce gin as in the word 'begin,' not like the monosyllable.

Elijahs of Mosul (The). One of the three branches of the Nestorians. The other two are the 'Josephs of Amí'da' and the 'Simeons of Ormía.'

Eliot (George), the pseudonym of Miss Marian Evans (afterwards Mrs. Cross), a novelist (1819–1880).

Elisabeth (Mad.), sister of Louis XVI., who shared the captivity of the Royal family, and was scandalously guillotined in 1794.

Elizabeth, daughter of Henry VIII. (1533, 1558–1603). Katharine was divorced 23 May and Elizabeth born 7 Sept. the same year. Elizabeth is called 'The Virgin Queen of England,' because she was never married.

Her style was: 'Elizabeth, D.G. of England, France, and Ireland queen; Defender of the Faith; Supreme Governor of the Church of England and Hibernia.'

Elizabeth (1 Eliz. c. 1) insisted that the title 'Supreme Governor of the Church' should be substituted for 'Supreme Head of the Church.'

 Elizabeth and Mary queen of Scots. Elizabeth was not the cousin of Mary queen of Scots, but the cousin of Mary's father.

HENRY VII. had issue HENRY VIII. (who succeeded him) and Margaret (who married James IV. of Scotland).

ELIZABETH was a daughter of HENRY VIII.

Margaret's son was James V. of Scotland, and Mary queen of Scots was the daughter of James V. (she married Henry Stuart, lord Darnley).

Her favourites were, first, Robert Dudley (earl of Leicester), who died 1588; then Robert Devereux (earl of Essex), executed for treason in 1601.

Elizabethan Architecture. A style of domestic architecture which prevailed in the reign of Elizabeth, especially used in mansions and palatial buildings. Its gables are most characteristic.

Ellerton Theological Essay. Oxford University. Value 21*l.* annually. Founded by Dr. Ellerton, fellow of Magdalen College, 1825.

Ellison Gallery (The) of water-colour paintings. Presented to the nation by Elizabeth Ellison, and placed in the South Kensington Museum, May 1860.

Elms (The). The place of execution in Smithfield previous to the reign of Henry IV., when the gibbet was erected at Tyburn, which continued to be the chief place of execution in London till 1783.

Eloquence (Father of French). Alain Chartier, secretary to Charles VI. and VII. He was both poet and prose writer (1386–1458).

Eloquent Doctor (The). Peter Aureōlus, archbishop of Aix. There was a Peter of Ravenna surnamed Chrysologos, or Golden-speech, who died 450, and was canonised. And two Chrysostoms or Golden-mouthed, viz. Dion and John. Dion was born in Bithynia A.D. 30 and died 116, and John was born at Antioch 347 and died 407. It is this latter who is generally known as St. Chrysostom (the saint with the golden mouth).

Elrington and Bosworth Professorship. See 'Anglo-Saxon, &c.'

Elzevirs. Books printed by a celebrated family of printers in Holland between 1583 and 1680. The 12mo and 16mo classics are beautifully and correctly printed. The Virgil, Terence, and other Roman classical authors, the New Testament and the Psalter, have an unrivalled reputation.

For Greek printing the ALDINES are wholly unrivalled.

Emancipation Act (The), 13 April, 1829. The act which emancipated Catholics from religious and civil disabilities in the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland. It was framed by Sir Robert Peel, in the ministry of the Duke of Wellington, and signed by George IV.

Emancipation of Slaves (The), 28 August, 1833 (3, 4 Will. IV.). By this act slavery was abolished throughout the British colonies, and slave-owners were compensated by a grant from parliament of 30 millions sterling.

In 1861 Alexander II. of Russia emancipated 50 million serfs, but 'it has proved a gigantic failure, as the wretchedness of the peasantry is greater, the cultivation of the soil inferior, and much of the land is little better than waste. They cannot pay the interest of the money, which is 95 millions sterling, and hundreds are knouted every year. The result is the irrepressible Nihilists, by whom Alexander was blown to pieces.'—Nineteenth Century, June 1882.

Emania (The Kings of). King Kimboath of Ireland built the palace of Emania in Ulster, an epoch from which Tigernach dates the dawn of authentic Irish history. From this splendid palace the princes of Ulster were called the 'kings of Emania.' The princely palace of Emania was utterly destroyed when Muredach [Emain Macha] Tirech invaded Ulster, and dispossessed his cousin, the usurper Colla, of his kingdom (A.D. 327).

It was Colla himself and his brothers who burnt Emania after their return from banishment.

Embargo Act (The), 22 Dec., 1807, of President Jefferson, forbidding American vessels to leave their ports. This was, in fact, a measure preparatory to war, allowing merchants to call home their ships, and the country to put itself into a posture of defence. Repealed 8 Feb., 1809, 'as ruinous to the States, unsatisfactory to France, and ineffectual as a retaliation upon England.'

Embassy of the Three Philosophers (The), B.C. 151. An embassy sent by the Athenians to the Roman senate to obtain a mitigation of the fine (500 talents) imposed on them for attacking Orōpus. The fine was reduced to 100 talents. The three philosophers sent were Diogenês the Stoic, Critolaüs the Peripatetic, and Carucadês (founder of the third academy).

Embassy to China (The), 1793. (George) lord Macartney was sent by George III. on a friendly embassy to Kien Lung, emperor of China, who was at the time in his summer residence, Zhe-hol, in Tartary. His journey from Pekin to Zhe-hol was most gratifying, and more information of this ancient people was gained in this embassy than in all preceding ages put together. He tells us that white is worn in mourning, but never by brides; that the left is the side of honour; that rules of honour never desert; and that all ranks, except that of emperor, depend on comparative station. Yellow is the imperial colour.

Ember Days, 1095. Four times a year; the spring being the Wednesday, Friday, and Saturday of Easter week, or the week after the first Sunday in Lent; the summer being the same days after Whit Sunday; the autumn the same days after the feast of Holy Cross (14 Sept.); and the winter the same days after the feast of St. Lucia (13 Dec.). These seasons in the Western Church are appointed for the ordination of the clergy.

German quatember, i.e. 'quatuor tempora,' or four seasons. Consult Skeat's Dictionary.

Emerald Club (The), 1882. A branch of the Fenian Brotherhood whose object was to work by force alone for the freedom of Ireland. Dynamite and other compounds of nitro-glycerine were freely employed. The Emerald Society was organised in the United States of North America, and was contemporary with the Dublin 'Invincibles.' The principal of the Emerald Society was O'Donovan Rossa. See 'Irish Associations.'

Emerald of the Green Vault (The). An immense uncut Peruvian emerald given by Randolph II. to the Elector of Saxony, and kept in the Green Vault (grünes Gewölbe) at Dresden.

This 'vault' is in the Zwinger, a group of buildings erected by Augustus II. as a vestibule to his new palace. It is called 'Green' from the colour of the paper or hangings with which it was originally covered. The regalia used at the coronation of Augustus (a present of Karl V.) are still kept in the seventh apartment. The Emerald is in the eighth or last apartment.

Émeute. A riot of a political character, the result of what the French call 'attroupement' or party meetings in the public streets and squares. These public musters were first declared illegal in France in 1791; the law was confirmed 24 May, 1834, and again 7 June, 1848, when the pillagers of shops, breakers of windows, plunderers of arms, stump orators, and leaders of riots were most severely handled.

The Great Three Days Émeute of 1830 occurred on Tuesday, Wednesday, and Thursday, 27, 28, 29 July, when Charles X. was obliged to flee and abdicate.

Emil'ian Provinces (The). The northern part of the States of the Church (i.e. the Romagna), with the duchies of Parma and Modĕna, which in 1860 were attached to Sardinia, but now form part of the kingdom of Italy.

In 1796 Napoleon Bonaparte called Emilia the 'Emilian Republic.' NEW EMILIA comprehends Bologna, Ferrara, Forlì, Massa and Carrara, Modĕna, Palma, Placentia, Ravenna, and Reggio.

Emilie (The Divine), to whom Voltaire wrote verses, was Madame Châtelet, with whom he lived at Cirey for ten years. Her palfrey was called 'Rossignol.'

Emir al Omra. Commandant of commandants; a military rank and title created by the Calif Rhadi (936) as a sop to the Turkish guards, a constant terror of the Abbasides (3 syl.), as the Pretorian guards were of the Roman emperors. This great officer had the sole management of all military matters; officiated for the calif in the mosque of Bagdad; and had his name mentioned in the public prayers. The French 'Mayor of the Palace' resembled in rank and power the Emir al Omra of the Abbaside califs.

Imperator imperatorum would be the Latin equivalent.

Emma. So Harold called his coat-of-mail.

And he put on his coat-of-mail which he called Emma, and which was so strong that no man could pierce it.—FREEMAN, Old English History, &c. p. 314.

Emmanuel College. In Cambridge University. Founded by Sir Walter Mildmay in 1584.

Emmett's Insurrection. In Dublin 23 July, 1803, in which Lord Kilwarden and several other persons were assassinated by the insurgents. It received its distinctive name from Robert Emmett, a young enthusiast, who headed this outbreak, and only arrived in Dublin the previous year (1802). Emmett had manufactured a large number of arms, and heaped together a vast amount of ammunition. He expected 2,000 rebels to meet him at Contigan's mills before nine o'clock on Wednesday morning, 23 July, 1803, but everything went wrong. The man who was to turn the fuzees and rammers for the beams had forgotten them, the jointed pikes were all lost by an explosion in Patrick Street, the slow matches got mixed with others, the fuzees of the grenades were nowhere to be found, the scaling-ladders were not finished, and of the 2,000 men only eighteen put in an appearance. However, Emmett, with five or six others, in their green uniforms, marched towards the Castle, and were informed that Lord Kilwarden's carriage had been stopped, and that both his lordship and his nephew had been murdered. A company of soldiers soon dispersed the insurgents, and Emmet, being arrested, was tried, condemned, and executed 19 Sept. the same year.

Thomas Moore refers to Robert Emmett in his 'Irish Melodies,' 'O breathe not his name'; and again, 'She is far from the land where her young hero sleeps.' Emmett was engaged to a daughter of Curran.

Emoraïm (The). Jewish doctors who assisted in composing the Gema'ra, which took about 311 years. It contains annotations, discussions, and amplifications of the Mishnah. There are two Gemaras —that of Babylon, completed A.D. 500, and that of Jerusalem, finished in the middle of the 4th cent. The Mishnah and Gemara together make what is called the Talmud.

Empecinado (The). Juan Martin Diaz of Spain, the Spanish guerilla chief (1775–1825), so called from pecina, a pool or marsh; the villagers of Spanish marshes were nicknamed Empecinados. Diaz was a man of enormous muscular strength. George III. gave him a sword which no man could wield but himself. When captured in 1825 he burst the cords which bound him, threw from him five men, and was only captured by casting a cloak over him. Thus entangled he was hanged on a tree.

Another derivation of the name is this: 'El Empecinado, c. a. d. l'empoissé, qui lui fut donné, parce qu'il était d'un village de cordonniers, état où l'on fait, comme on sait, grand usage de la poix.'—Bouillet.

Emperor Elect of the Romans. Maximilian, who failed to get himself crowned kaiser, in 1508 assumed the title of 'Emperor Elect of the Romans.' Till then the 'emperors elect' were only called 'Kings of the Romans' (q.v.).

Emperor of Elba (The), 1814. Napoleon I., after his abdication. Elba is an island 20 leagues in extent, with 12,000 inhabitants. Napoleon was allowed an annual income of 240,000*l.*, and Josephine, with other members of his family, were allowed 80,000*l.* more. He entered Elba 10 May, and left it 26 Feb., 1815 (298 days).

Emperor of the German Kingdoms (The), 'Kaiser der deutschen Reiche,' 18 Jan., 1871. William I., king of Prussia, during the siege of Paris was created 'German Emperor.' In the preceding Nov. he was made head of the German Confederation (q.v.). The Austrian monarchs were only kings of Germany and emperors of the West, i.e. the Holy Roman Empire, and hence were kaiser-kings. They were sometimes called emperors, a title which did not belong to them as sovereigns of Germany, but as sovereigns of the West.

'Emperor of Germany' is not a correct designation, but either 'Deutscher Kaiser' (German Emperor) or 'Kaiser der deutschen Reiche.'

Emperor of the Romans. 'Emperors of Rome,' 'Emperors of the Holy Roman Empire,' or 'Emperors of the West,' all titles equivalent to kaiser, borne by Charlemagne and his successors. Otto the Great, king of Germany, revived the title. From 1508 the king of Germany was ex officio emperor of the Romans, and the king elect was emperor elect of the Romans, and continued so till his coronation; previously the king elect of Germany had been entitled 'king of the Romans.'

Emperor of the Romans, i.e. king of Germany after his coronation.
Emperor Elect of the Romans, the king elect of Germany from the time of Maximilian.
King of the Romans, the king elect of Germany between Otto I. and Maximilian I.

Empire State (The) of North America. New York, which has thirty-six votes in the Electoral College of 401.

Empirics and Dogmatists. Two schools of medicine in Alexandria in the three centuries preceding the birth of Christ. The Empirics took experience as the only base of curing maladies. The Dogmatists, or Methodists, were the regulars who treated diseases according to rule. The chiefs of the Empirics were Philinos of Cos, Sextus Empiricus, and Heraclidês of Tarentum.

The chief of the Dogmatists were Erasistrătos, Themison, and Cœlius Aurelĭānus.

Empirics and Rationalists. Two rival schools of philosophy. The Empirics insist that our sole knowledge of the material world depends upon our senses. The Rationalists or Idealists contend for an innate sense or perception. Chief of the Empiric philosophers are the Peripatetics, the disciples of Democrĭtos, Epicūros, and Aristotle, among the ancients; and the disciples of Hobbes, Locke, Condillac, and Diderot, among the moderns.

The chief of the Rationalists or Idealists are Plato, Malebranche, Kant, Schelling, and Hegel. There was also another school of Idealists, the exponents of which were Berkeley, Hume, Fichte, &c.

Empress of India, 1877. Queen Victoria assumed the title in addition to her other titles.

Enabling Statute (The), 1540 (32 Henry VIII. c. 28). I. Enabling a tenant-in-tail to make a lease for three lives, or twenty-one years, to bind his issue.

II. Enabling a husband seised in right of his wife in fee-simple, or fee-tail, to make a similar lease to bind his wife and her heirs, provided she joined therein.

III. Enabling ecclesiastics seised of an estate of fee-simple in right of their churches, to make leases to bind their successors. Repealed by 19, 20 Vict. c. 120, s. 35.

There are other enabling acts by which ecclesiastical lands may be leased.

Enactments (Russian). The old form used in Russia was Boiare prigovorili, i czar prikazal (The seniors are of opinion, and the czar has enacted). The seniors were called boyars = Latin majores, or primores, till Peter the Great abolished the title.

Encke's Comet. Recurs in about 1,200 days. It was not discovered by Encke (2 syl.), but its periodicity was.

Seen by Méchain 17 Jan., 1786.

Seen by Caroline Herschel 7–27 Nov., 1795.

Seen by Bouvard, Huth, and Pons 20 Oct. to 19 Nov., 1805.

Seen by Pons 25 Nov., 1818, to 12 Jan., 1819.

Johann Franz Encke (3 syl.) was born at Hamburg in 1791, and died in 1865.

Encratistes (3 syl.). See 'Encratites.'

Encratites (The), or Abstainers, A.D. 173. A religious sect founded by Tatian, one of the Greek Fathers. They abstained from marriage, meat, wine, and indeed all bodily indulgences. They distinguished between God and the Creator, and they denied the reality of Christ's body.

Encumbered Estates Act (The), 14 Aug., 1848. Ireland. To enable persons whose estates were encumbered by mortgages, chancery suits, or otherwise, to sell them at once, without delay or expense, either wholly or in part, with 'a parliamentary title,' which is given at the time of sale.

The Court was established 29 July, 1849, and closed 31 Aug., 1858. A similar Court was established in the West Indies 11 Aug., 1854.

Encumbered Estates of Ireland. Estates under the Court scattered all over Ireland, with deserted mansions and empty houses. Receivers take the place of the non-resident landlords, and, of course, are able to do nothing to help the tenants or pay for improvements.

Encyclical Letter (An). A letter from the pope or church council addressed to a whole nation or the whole of Christendom. In 1884 the French nation was addressed by an encyclical letter.

Encyclopædists, 18th cent. Leaders of thought who, in a publication entitled the 'Encyclopædia,' popularised enquiry into the Christian religion, politics, science, and government. No doubt these writers prepared the way for the Great Revolution.

The chief were D'Alembert (1717-1783), joint editor with Diderot of the famous 'Encyclopædia,' in 28 vols., to which Voltaire and other living savants contributed. Diderot (1712-1783), a materialist, who made the 'Encyclopædia' a vehicle for the diffusion of materialistic and atheistic opinions. J. J. Rousseau, Grimm, Dumarsais, Voltaire, Baron d'Holbach, and Jancourt. (N.B. Biography and history were excluded.)

End of the World. Nostradamus said, in 1566:

> Quand Georges Dieu crucifera,
> Que Marc le ressuscitera,
> Et que St. Jean le portera,
> La fin du monde arrivera.

That when Good Friday falls on 23 April (St. George's Day), and Easter Sunday on 25 April (St. Mark's Day), and Corpus Christi falls on 24 June (John the Baptist's Day), the world will come to an end. This coincidence of dates occurred in 1886, but the world still wags. The same coincidences occurred in 1734, 1666 (Great Fire), and, what is strange, in 1546, in 1451, 1421, 1204, 1109, 1014, 919, 672, 577, 482, 387, 140, and in 45. So will it be in 1943.

 Sir Isaac Newton calculated (so says the critic Corneille de Pauw) 'qu'une comète heurtera si violemment notre soleil en l'an 2255, qu'il n'y a plus aucune espérance qu'il soit encore en état d'éclairer les habitants de notre monde après cet accident.'

Endless Peace (The), A.D. 533. Purchased by Justinian of Kosroës or Chosroës I. the Great, king of Persia, for 11,000 pounds of gold (about 440,000*l.* sterling). It lasted barely seven years (Gibbon, 'Decline and Fall,' xli.).

Enfans sans Souci (Les). A volunteer theatrical company of young tradesmen in Paris, in the 15th cent., for the representation of satirical farces, in which living characters and current events were introduced. There was another company formed of lawyers and called the 'Basocians' (q.v.).

Pronounce Ahn-fahn sahgn soo-see.

Enfant de Miracle (L'). Napoleon I.

> 'They flit like phantoms about the mimic court of the "Enfant de Miracle."'—The Oracle, 1885.

Enforcing Act (The). Passed Congress 9 January, 1809. Its object was to preserve strict neutrality between England and France. All vessels from these two countries were, by this act, excluded from the United States.

Engagement (The). I., or Scottish Covenant, 1643. The agreement of the Assembly of Divines met in Henry VII.'s Chapel at Westminster, to maintain Presbyterianism. The whole clergy were required to submit; and 3,000 were ejected from their livings for refusing to do so.

II. In 1647. A secret treaty between Charles I. and the 'Solemn League and Covenant' (q.v.). Charles engaged to establish Presbyterianism in Scotland and extirpate the sectaries; and the league engaged to restore the king by force of arms. See 'Engagers.'

III. In 1649. The new oath substituted by the Long Parliament, after the execution of Charles I., for the oaths of Supremacy and Allegiance: 'I swear to be true and faithful to the government established without king or house of peers, and never to consent to their re-admission.'

> Some doubt may be raised of the policy of the 'Engagement.' . . . As long as it was confined to those who held office under the government, it remained a mere question of choice; but when it was exacted from all Englishmen above 17 years of age . . . it became to many an act of necessity, and served to irritate rather than to produce security.—Dr. Lingard, History of England, viii. 5.

Engagers (The), 1649. Or the party of Hamilton, pledged to support 'the Engagement.' The Duke of Hamilton collected some 15,000 men, tumultuary and ill-disciplined, on the king's (Charles I.'s) behalf; but they were utterly routed by Cromwell near Warrington, and Hamilton surrendered. The Engagers were the moderate Presbyterian party; the rigid Presbyterians, called 'Whigamores,' had the Duke of Argyll for their leader, and were the dominant party in the middle of the 17th cent.

> If the Covenanters got the upper hand . . . he [Montrose] must abandon his most devoted followers, the old Royalists and Engagers, and take the covenant himself.—Howitt, History of England (Commonwealth, p. 315).

England. Its Sovereigns and Dynasties since the Conquest:—

Norman line—Four kings (1066–1154): William I. the Conqueror; William II. Rufus (son); Henry I. Beauclerc (brother); Stephen of Blois (nephew).

Plantagenet line—Eight kings (1154–1399): Henry II. (grandson of Henry I.); Richard I. Cœur de Lion (son); John Lackland (brother); Henry III. (son); Edward I. Longshanks (son); Edward II. (son); Edward III. (son); Richard II. (grandson).

House of Lancaster—Three kings (1399–1461): Henry IV. (son of John of Gaunt duke of Lancaster); Henry V (son); Henry VI. (son).

House of York—Three kings (1461–1485): Edward IV. (son of Richard duke of York); Edward V. (son); Richard III. (brother of Edward IV.).

Tudor line—Five sovereigns (1485–1603): Henry VII. (son of Edmund Tudor and Margaret Beaufort); Henry VIII. (son); Edward VI. (son); Mary (daughter of Henry VIII. and Katharine of Arägon); Elizabeth (daughter of Henry VIII. and Anne Boleyn). Lady Jane Grey not reckoned in the list.

Stuart Dynasty (sovereigns of Great Britain)—Four sovereigns (1603–1689): James I. (son of Mary queen of Scots); Charles I. (son); [Commonwealth: Cromwell, Lord Protector]; Charles II. (son of Charles I.); James II. (brother); Anne (daughter of James II.).

House of Orange (Revolution), 1689–1714: William III. (prince of Orange) [grandson of Charles I.] and his wife Mary (daughter of James II.), conjointly.

House of Hanover—At present (1890) 2ve sovereigns (1714–°): George I. (elector of Hanover); George II. (son); George III. (grandson, son of Frederick prince of Wales); George IV. (son); William IV. (brother); Victoria (niece of William IV., daughter of Edward duke of Kent). See 'English Sovereigns.'

The Saxon race, which dominated 827-1013, gave fourteen sovereigns. The Saxons and Danes gave eight sovereigns (1013-1066).

N.B.—The English monarchs descend through the female line from King Egbert, the first king of England; and trace back in the male side up to William the Conqueror, whose son, Henry I., married Matilda, daughter of Margaret and Malcolm III. of Scotland. Margaret was the daughter of Prince Edward, and granddaughter of King Edmund, lineally descended from Egbert. See 'Victoria.'

England's Darling. Herëward the Wake, lord of Burn in Lincolnshire, famous for his resistance to William the Conqueror. He established his 'camp of refuge' in the Isle of Ely, where, in 1071, he was joined by Earl Morcar. Morcar surrendered and was imprisoned in Normandy, but Hereward escaped.

'England's Standard Advanced,' 1 May, 1649. A manifesto issued by Captain Thompson demanding the completion of public freedom, vowing justice on the murderers of Arnold and Lockyer, and threatening, if a hair of Lilburne's head was touched, to avenge the wrong seventy-and-sevenfold. This party was put down on 17 May by Fairfax and Cromwell, who shot Cornet Thompson (brother of Capt. Thompson) and two corporals in Burford churchyard; the rest promised to return to Ireland.

Lockyer, a trooper, a brave young fellow of 26, was shot by Fairfax and Cromwell, 26 April, 1649, for mutiny. He was buried with military honours, followed by thousands with sea-green and black ribbons on their hats.

English Aristophanês (The). Samuel Foote (1722–1777).

English Chrysostom (The). Jeremy Taylor is so called by Coleridge in 'Table Talk' (4 June 1830).

English Church Union (The), abbreviated into E.C.U. Formed in 1859 'for the purpose of uniting churchmen in defence of the doctrine and discipline of the Church of England, and of the rights and liberties of her faithful children.' It is what is called a high-church or 'ritualistic' association.

The 'Church Association' represents the 'moderate' or 'Evangelical' party.

English Claude (The). Thomas Gainsborough (died 1788 at the age of 61).

English Crown (The). Contains the following jewels:

1 large ruby, irregularly polished.	4 rubies.
1 large broad-spread sapphire.	1,363 brilliants.
16 sapphires.	1,272 rose diamonds.
11 emeralds.	147 table diamonds.
	4 drop-shaped pearls.
	273 pearls.

The gross weight of the crown made in 1838 by Messrs. Rundell & Bridge is 39 oz. 5 dwts. Troy.

The famous ruby was given to Edward the Black Prince by Don Pedro of Castile in 1367. Henry V. wore it in his helmet at the battle of Agincourt in 1415.

English Ennius (The). See 'Ennius.'

English Garrison (The). So the Irish landlords were denominated by the partisans of the Irish Land League (q.v.). The third allegation of the Times, in their charge called 'Parnellism and Crime,' 17 Sept., 1888.

We [the three Royal Commissioners] find that the respondents did enter into a conspiracy to a system of coercion and intimidation to promote an agrarian agitation . . . for the purpose of impoverishing and expelling from the country the Irish landlords, who were styled the 'English Garrison.'—Verdict (1890).

English Justinian (The). Edward I. (1239, 1272–1307). So called because, like Justinian, he codified the laws, and reduced to practical shape the institutions of his predecessors. Edward I., in fact, begins a new epoch; all before him was ancient England, all from his accession is modern England. He defined the limits of civil and ecclesiastical jurisdiction, instituted the appointment of 'Conservators of the Peace,' now called 'Justices of the Peace,' organised into their present shape the superior courts (the Queen's Bench, the Exchequer, and the Common Pleas), and instituted the 'Court of Appeal,' the basis of our 'Court of Chancery.'

In this reign were passed the 'Statute of Mortmain,' 1279, and the 'Statute of Rhuddlan,' 1284. And both Magna Charta and the Charter of the Forest were confirmed.

English Language (The). Ordered to be used in all courts of law, 1362 (36 Edw. III. st. i. c. 15).

It is a pity that the sovereign still uses Norman French, instead of English, in expressing the royal assent or dissent to Acts of Parliament.

English Language, how derived.

ARYAN family has six branches
1. Indian (Sanskrit).
2. Persian (Zend).
3. Slavonic (Russian).
4. Celtic (Gaelic and Cymric).
5. Græco-Latin (Greek).
6. Gothic (German).

TEUTONIC Gothic has three groups
1. Mæso-Gothic.
2. Low German (English, Dutch, Flemish).
3. High German (German).

See 'Erse.'

English Martyr (The first), 10 March, 1401. William Sawtre, rector of Lynn, Norfolk, who was burnt at the stake in the reign of Henry IV.

'English Mercurie' (The), 1588. Was for many years considered to be the oldest English newspaper, but in 1839 Mr. Thomas Watts of the British Museum proved it to be an impudent forgery, as the paper on which it is printed bears the arms of the House of Hanover, and the initials 'G. R.' See 'Literary Forgeries.'

English National Anthem. 'God save the King' (or Queen).

English Pale (The). In Ireland. The five districts of Cork, Drogheda, Dublin, Waterford, and Wexford. Generally called 'the Pale' (Henry II.).

There was an 'English Pale' about Calais.

English Pope (The). Adrian IV (1100, 1154–1159). His name was Nicholas Breakspear.

English Sovereigns do not succeed to the crown by hereditary right, but by parliamentary authority. A crooked sort of descent is preserved, but not like that of our hereditary nobility.

WILLIAM I. had no hereditary right at all. The heir (though not of royal descent) was Harold.

WILLIAM II. had no hereditary right. The heir was his elder brother Robert duke of Normandy.

HENRY I. had no hereditary right. The heir was Robert.

STEPHEN, the nephew of Henry I., had no hereditary right. The heir was Maud.

JOHN had no hereditary right. The heir was Arthur, son of Geoffrey, 4th son of Henry II. John was the 5th son.

HENRY II. had no hereditary right. The heir was Eleanor, damsel of Brittany, heiress of William I.

HENRY IV. had no hereditary right after Richard II.; the heir was Edward Mortimer, earl of March, by descent from Lionel (3rd son of Edward III.). Henry IV. was the son of John of Gaunt (4th son of Edward III.).

HENRY V. and VI. were out of the direct line, which was continued in the line of Mortimer earl of March.

RICHARD III. had no right to the crown while Edward V. was alive, and after the death of his nephew Edward the direct heirs were the sons of George duke of Clarence, his elder brother.

HENRY VII. had no right in descent; he was the son of Edmund Tudor, whose only pretence to 'royal descent' was that his grandmother was the widow of Henry V. (daughter of Charles VI. king of France). The heir was Elizabeth of York, whom he married after he became king.

There was another equally shadowy 'claim.' His paternal grandmother, Margaret, was the granddaughter of an illegitimate son of John of Gaunt (i.e. John Beaufort earl of Richmond had a natural son by Katharine Swynford).

WILLIAM III. and MARY had no hereditary right. The heir was the Old Pretender.

ANNE had no hereditary right. The heir was the Queen of Sardinia, by Henrietta Anne, daughter of Charles I.

GEORGE I. had no hereditary right.

This line was chosen by parliament because the Brunswickers were the nearest Protestant relatives to their predecessors. See 'England,' its sovereigns and dynasties.

English Sweat (The), Sept. 1482. So called because those attacked were covered from head to foot with a profuse perspiration. It lasted twenty-four hours, and sometimes longer, but left an extreme languor with palpitations for three years, and in some cases till death. Some 600 persons were attacked daily, and ninety out of a hundred died. It reappeared in the years 1485 and 1486. See 'Plague,' &c.

From 1506 to 1551 a modification of this disease appeared in Great Britain and in France. It was attributed to bad drainage, and was especially fatal to the fat and non-industrial class. Twelve hours decided whether it would prove fatal or not. In 1533 it broke out in Germany and the Netherlands, and again appeared in England in 1542 and 1551, since which time it has not recurred.

English Twenty Club (The). A club restricted to twenty of the best shots amongst the English volunteers. In 1884 Albert Victor, son of the prince of Wales, joined the club.

English in the Pale. The English settled in Ireland, holding the estates of native chiefs expelled by Strafford. These colonists kept themselves apart not only from the Irish proper but also from the Anglo-Irish. Many of the Pale were Catholics. See 'English Pale.'

Enne'ades (3 syl.). The great work of Plotinus, the neoplatonic philosopher, edited by Porphyry his disciple. It consists of six sections each divided into nine parts; hence the name Ennēades or Nines.

Ennius (The English). Layămon, who wrote a translation in Saxon of 'The Brut' of Wace (13th cent.).

Ennius (The Spanish). Juan de Mena of Cordŏva (1412–1456).

Ennius of France (The). Jehan de Meung (1260–1320), surnamed Clopinel, because he was lame and hobbled in his gait. He added 1,280 verses to the 'Romance of the Rose,' begun by Lorris.

Enoch (The Book of). Referred to by Jude, supposed to have been written about A.D. 40. Three Ethiopic versions were brought to Europe by Bruce in 1773; and a translation of it into English by Dr. Laurence was published in 1821; and much more recently Dr. Kenealy published a translation 'illustrated.'

It is divided into five parts: (1) the fall of the angels and the journey of Enoch through the earth under the guidance of an angel; (2) the revelation made to Enoch, as that of the revelation of St. John; (3) astronomy and the phenomena of the seasons; (4) the prophetic vision of the Messiah's kingdom till the Last Judgment; (5) exhortations and moral reflections.
Bruce presented one of his MS. copies to the Bodleian Library, Oxford.

Ensign of the British Navy (The). The Union Jack. It consists of three crosses, the blue field of St. Andrew is the field; then the white saltire of St. Andrew and the red saltire of St. Patrick, joined together, with a white edging to the latter, to express the field; over all is charged the red cross of St. George fimbriated with white.

The white ensign of the British or Royal Navy is the banner of St. George, with the 'Jack' cantoned in the first quarter.

The red ensign is that of the merchant service.

The blue ensign is that of the naval reserve.

Ensignmen, 1662. Those evicted Irishmen who joined the ensigns of Charles II. in Flanders, and after his return were entitled to have their estates restored to them by the Act of Settlement. To prevent injustice the then holders were 'reprised' by the grant of land elsewhere of the same value.

The claimants fared but badly. One of them was Lord Castleconnell, who had served Charles II. for five or six years as a common soldier in the Netherlands, in the Duke of York's regiment. Another was Colonel Charles MacCarthy Reagh, once the owner of a principality. It was found impossible to carry out the Restoration Settlement.

Enthusiasts (The). A sect of the Independents which sprang up during the civil war between Charles I. and the parliament. The word was applied to all those who insisted that the Scriptures must be interpreted by the light of private inspiration.

Under the head of Independents . . . . were the Arminians, Millenarics, Baptists, Anabaptists, Familists, Enthusiasts, Seekers, Perfectists, Socinians, Arians, and others.—HOWITT, Hist. of Eng. (Charles I., chap. vi. p. 279).

Eolic Dialect. The Eolians formed one of the four great divisions of Greece, and dwelt originally north of Thessaly, but pushed their way southwards. Their dialect was distinguished by an aspiration of initial vowels, called the digamma. Alcæos, Sappho, Corinna, and Pindar wrote in the Eolic dialect. One of the modes of music was called Eolic; it was less grave than the Doric, and less effeminate than the Lydian and Ionian.

Eon de l'Étoile, 12th cent. A religious impostor who gave himself out to be the Son of God, and drew around him a host of followers. In 1148 he was taken before the Council of Reims, and pronounced to be an idiot, but was thrown into prison and died there. He used to pervert 'Eum qui venturus est' into 'Eon qui venturus est.'

Eons. Intermediaries between the Supreme Being and the Jewish Jehovah; or, according to the Gnostic theory, between God and man. Wisdom is an Eon, so is Faith, so is Prudence. Basilĭdês says there are 365 such beings, but Valentin admits only thirty.

In modern phraseology the word 'Eon' (from the Greek aion, for ever) means an interminable period. Thus Eternity is said to be 'eon upon eon.'

Ephesian Letters. Magical letters from an inscription of the statue of Diana in the temple of Ephesus. These letters were looked on as an amulet or charm. They were ascribed to the Dactyli or priests of Cybelê. The letters were Askion, Kataskion, Tetras, Damnameneus, Aisia.

When Milesius contended with Ephesius at the Olympic games, Ephesius proved the successful competitor, because he had the Ephesian letters attached to his heels. When these were removed Milesius was the winner.

Ephors. Five contemporary Spartan magistrates of almost unlimited civil power. The two contemporary kings were, for the most part, only generals of the army.

Ephtalites (3 syl), or White Huns (q.v.).

Epicureans (The). Ancient Greek philosophers, so named from Epicūros of Samos, the founder. He taught in his own private grounds in Athens, and his disciples, like the Academics, were called the 'Garden sect.' His system was that the chief aim of life should be enjoyment; that the highest degree of enjoyment is perfect repose; and that is to be obtained only by keeping a sound and healthy mind in a sound and healthy body. Epicuros lived B.C. 342–270. His disciples were Metrodōros, Polyænos, and Hermăchos. His successors were Polystrătos, Basilĭdês, Protarchos, and others of less note.

Heraclitos of Ephesus (B.C. 543-483) taught that happiness is the end and aim of life.

Epicure'ans (The Sect of the). One of the Grecian sects in the early ages of Christianity. They denied that God troubles Himself about mundane matters, and taught that the world was made by the chance conflux of atoms. They disbelieved in a resurrection; held that man consists only of a material body, and as this life is his end-all and be-all, his duty is to make the best of it, without taking any thought of a state after death.

Epicu'rus of China (The). Tao or Taou, generally called by the title Laou-keun. He is mentioned by Kongfoo-tse (Confucius), with whom he was contemporary (about 5th cent. B.C.). See 'Tao' and 'Taoism.'

Epidemics. Such diseases as attack a large number of persons at the same time. The following have been noted:—

Year	Popular Name	Scientific Name	Affected	Authority
1374	Dancing mania	Chorea-mania	Hundreds	Hecker
1523	Wolf madness	Lycanthropia	„	Calmiel
1642, &c.	Demoniacal possession ...	Demono-mania	„	„
1731	Convulsionaries of St. Médard	Theo-mania	„	„
1800	Incendiarism	Pyro-mania	Many	Marc
Various	Witchcraft	Demono-pathia	Thousands	Various
—	Suicide	Melancholia	„	Esquirol
—	Visions	Delusions	Many	Boismont
1845	Panic	Pan-phobia	„	'Edin. Review,' 1849.

Asiatic cholera appeared in England in 1831 and several times since. Russian influenza was very fatal in London in 1720, and has frequently appeared in England since 1782.

Epiph'anes (4 syl.). Ptolemy V. This surname seems to have been given in irony. Similarly Ptolemy II., called 'brother-lover,' murdered all his brothers, and Ptolemy IV., called 'father-lover,' murdered both father and mother. So Ptolemy V., who began to reign at the age of 4, was poisoned at the age of 28, having distinguished himself in nothing. He was simply a commonplace villain.

Epiphany (The). A season kept in remembrance of the visit of the Magi to the infant Jesus in Bethlehem. First celebrated in 360. Twelfth day (or 6 Jan.).

It was not held as a separate festival till 813.

Episcopacy in Scotland. The three old women who hurled their stools at the head of the dean of Edinburgh, 22 July, 1637, for attempting to read the Anglican service in St. Giles's Church, were Euphemia Henderson, Bertha Craig, and Elspa Craig. The congregation shouted, 'A pope! a pope! Antichrist! Stone him! stone him!'

Episcopal Cap (The). A cap adorned with cordels and silk threads of a green colour. 'Pileus pontificalis cordulis ac floccis sericis coloris viridis ornatus.' See Du Cange, vol. v. p. 800. See 'Caps.'

'Cordula' means little cords or threads, a word not to be found in Latin dictionaries.

Episcopalians. Properly means those who accept the institution of bishops as rulers of the Church, but in modern parlance the term is restricted to the Church of England, and those churches which are associated with it, as Catholics is to the Church of Rome and Presbyterians to the Church of Scotland. The words are convenient and only perversely distorted to their etymological meanings.

It is puerile to contend against the ordinary acceptance of these words. They speak with sufficient preciseness for ordinary language, and if more is required we must indeed 'speak by the card or equivocation will undo us.'

Episcopi Vagan'tes (3 syl.). Free bishops. They had no diocese, but received the title for their learning. They were almost entirely Irish, and assumed the power of ordaining, till a Council called in 816 decreed that no Scot (Irishman) so ordained should be admitted into the ministry.

Epoch of the Building of Solomon's Temple (The), May B.C. 1015.

Era—Epoch. An era is a series of years beginning from an epoch. An epoch is an important event which constitutes the starting point of the series. Thus the birth of Christ was the epoch from which the Christian era begins to count, either backwards or forwards, or both.

Before the Nativity there was no general starting point of historic dates, but each nation chose its own epoch; generally the foundation of a city, the commencement of a dynasty, or some famous victory. These eras can easily be reduced to B.C. or A.D. if required, according to the notes appended to several of the following eras. The Catholic Church divides the whole history of man into six epochs or ages of unequal length, viz.:—

1. From Adam to Noah;
2. From Noah to Abraham;
3. From Abraham to David;
4. From David to the Babylonish captivity;
5. From the captivity of Judah to the birth of Christ;
6. From the birth of Christ to the end of the world.

But independent of these epochs there are numerous other events which have been made points de départ by different people:—

The Era of the Greek Olympiads	B.C. 776
The Era of the Foundation of Rome ...	753
The Era of Nabonassar	747
The Era of Alexander the Great	324
The Era of the Seleucidæ	312
The Julian Era	45

and so on. 'See 'Æra.'

Era (The Mundane). Many chronologists date from the foundation of the world, at any rate up to the Nativity; but great diversity of opinion exists on the subject. The chief authorities are: 'The Benedictines,' Calmet, The Greek Church, Professor Hales, and Archbishop Usher.

The BENEDICTINES' system is better known as 'L'Art de Vérifier les Dates.'

Dom Augustin CALMET (1672-1757) was a learned theologian of Lorraine, author of a 'Dictionary of the Bible,' in French.

The GREEK CHURCH based its calculation on the Septuagint.

HALES (Prof. William) of Dublin University, author of a 'New Analysis of Chronology' (1809-1814).

Dr. James USHER, archbishop of Armagh, was born in Dublin (1580-1656); and is the author of 'Annales Veteris et Novi Testamenti,' and a book of universal Chronology.

See 'Era of Antioch,' 'Era of Constantinople,' 'Era of Alexandria,' &c.

Prof. William Hales, the Chronologist, who died in 1831, must not be confounded with Alexander de Hales, who died in 1242, and was called the 'Irrefragable Doctor.'

Era of Abraham (The). Those who make the patriarch Abraham the epoch of their chronology begin their era 1 Oct., B.C. 2016.

To reduce the era of Abraham to the Christian era, subtract 2,015 years and three months. The remainder will be the year and the month.

Era of Actium (The), or 'the Actiatic Era.' Began 1 Jan. B.C. 30. It commemorates the victory of Octavianus (Augustus Cæsar) over Antony.

We ourselves often speak of events as occurring before or since the Conquest.

Era of Alexander (The), or Era of the Lagïdæ, that is of Ptolemy son of Lagus, a general of Alexander the Great, who reigned in Egypt after the death of the Macedonian. The era here referred to was that which began with the death of Alexander, and was used in Egypt after the accession of Ptolemy. It began 2 Nov., B.C. 324.

Called in Latin Æra Philippi or Æra Bicornis.

Era of Alexandria (The). A computation of Julius Africanus adopted by the Christians of Alexandria, who reckoned the interval between Adam and Christ to be 5,500 years, or rather 5,502. In the reign of Diocletian ten years were deducted, and 5,787 was called 5,777 of the world, or 277 of the incarnation.

Era of American Independence (The), 4 July, 1776.

Era of Antioch (The). According to Panodorus of Antioch, the chronologist, who lived in the 5th cent., the world was created 1 Sept., B.C. 5492.

This differs from the Mundane Era of Alexandria, which was fixed at 5502; but in A.D. 285, ten years being subtracted from the Alexandrian calculation, both the eras were alike. See 'Era, The Mundane.'

Era of Augustus (The), or of 'the Empire,' adopted by the Romans. It began B.C. 27.

Era of Bengal, or 'The Bengalee Era.' Measured by solar time, and not by lunar, like the Mohammedan year. It is supposed, however, to be derived from the Hegïra, and in the middle of the 16th cent. the two correspond.

Era of Bithynia (The). An era adopted by the Bithynians, who took for their starting point the year when they threw off the Macedonian yoke, and became independent; that is, B.C. 288.

This means that the year B.C. 288 of the Christian Era was the year 1 of the Bithynian Era.

Era of Constantinople (The). Adopted in the Eastern Empire in the 7th cent. Like the Era of Antioch (q.v.), it began from the creation of the world. According to this calculation, the interval between the Creation and the Nativity was 5,508 years, and the birth of Christ occurred in the 5,509th year. The Russians followed this era till the reign of Peter the Great.

The civil year of Constantinople began 1 Sept.; the ecclesiastical year either 21 March or 1 April. So in the Church of England the civil year begins on New Year's Day, but the ecclesiastical year in the preceding Advent, four weeks before Christmas Day.

Era of Creation (The). See 'Era, The Mundane.'

Era of Diocletian (The). Began 29 Aug. A.D. 284, when Diocletian was proclaimed emperor of Rome. This era was used by Christians till the introduction of the Christian era. See next article.

Era of Jesus Christ (The), or the 'Christian era,' the 'Year of Grace,' or 'the Incarnation.' Begins 1 Jan. in 4714 of the Julian period. This era was first used in 527 by Dionisius Exiguus, a monk of Scythia, and a Roman abbot, but was not generally adopted till long after that. In France in the 8th cent., in England in July 816, in Spain in the 11th cent., in Portugal in 1415, in the Eastern empire in 1453. It was in use in England as far back as A.D. 680.

Herod the Great died A.U.C. 750, and the era of Jesus Christ is A.U.C. 753. There must be an error of three years or more, for Herod not only died A.U.C. 750, but he spent the last forty days of his life at Jericho.

Regnante in perpetuum ac gubernante Domino nostro Salvatore secula universa, anno recapitulationis Dionisi, id est ab Incarnatione Christi, sexcentessimo octuagessimo [680]. . . . Ego Oshere Rex. . . .

Sometimes called 'Annus Trabeationis'; and sometimes 'The Circumcision.'

Era of Julius Cæsar (The), or 'the Julian Era.' It was B.C. 46 when Julius Cæsar reformed the calendar, and Julian's system prevailed in England till 1752, when it was superseded by the Gregorian year. What we call the 'Old Style' is that according to the Julian system: and what we call the 'New Style' is the Old Style corrected. In 1752 the difference was twelve days.

Russia still adheres to the 'Old Style.'

Era of Kings (The). See 'Era of the Seleucidæ.'

Era of Nabonassar (The). This era began on Wednesday, 26 Feb., B.C. 747. Nabonassar was the founder of the kingdom of Babylon. The Jews at this era made their year consist of 365 days instead of 360.

Famous in astronomy, being the era followed by Hipparchus and Ptolemy. It was used by the Chaldæan astronomers, and was transmitted by Callisthenes to Greece.

Era of Pisa (The). Much used in France in the 12th cent.; it preceded our common era by one year.

Era of Rome (The). See 'Era of the Foundation of Rome.'

Era of Salivâhana Saka (The), or 'The Saka' (i.e. the year), began A.D. 78. Named after Salivahan, a king who reigned many years in the Deccan, and was a great encourager of the arts and sciences. This era is much used in the southern provinces of Hindûstan. The years are called 'Saka.'

Era of Spain (The). Began 1 Jan., B.C. 38, and was in commemoration of the conquest of Spain by Augustus the year preceding. This era was long followed in Spain and Portugal.

Era of Tyre (The). Began 19 Oct., B.C. 125; the year when the Tyrians obtained their autonomy from the Syrian kings. This era was used in Syria.

To reduce the Tyrian Era to the Christian Era, subtract 124, and if the given year is less than 125, deduct it from 125, and the remainder will be the year B.C.

Era of Vicramâditya is reckoned from B.C. 56, and prevails chiefly in the northern provinces of India, and in Guzerat. It is called after a sovereign of Malwa, who defeated Soka king of Delhi, and acquired possession of the most important throne of India. The years are called 'Samvat.'

According to Indian mythology the world is to last for 4 yugs [ages], three of which are past already. The fourth, called the Kali-yug, is the last and worst.

Era of Yezdegird (The). A Persian era which began on the accession of Yezdegird III. to the throne of Persia, 16 June, A.D. 632. Also called 'the Gelalæan era.'

To reduce the Persian to the Christian era, add to the Persian era 630.

Era of the Arabians (The). See 'Era of the Hegîra.'

Era of the Armenians (The). This era began Tuesday, 9 July, A.D. 552, when the Council of the Armenians confirmed the condemnation of the Council of Chalcedonia, pronounced in 536, and thus completed their 'schism.'

Era of the Ascension (The). The era was used only by the author of the 'Chronicle of Alexandria,' who dates the martyrdom of Menas, 'Anno CCLVII Domini in cœlos assumptionis.'

To reduce this era to our A.D. add 28. Thus the martyrdom of St. Menas of Cotys is given in the 'Chronicle': 'Anno CCLVII Domini in cœlos assumptionis.' Which would be A.D. 285.

Era of the Chinese (The). Begins B.C. 2697. The Chinese begin their era with the accession of the Emperor Yao, a semi-historical monarch of the Tenth Ki (or race). Yao was the traditional author of the Chinese calendar, who first divided the year into 365 days, with an extra day every fourth year.

It is said that on one occasion, during the reign of Yao, the sun did not set for ten days. Some persons quote this, but not wisely, in confirmation of Joshua x. 12.

Era of the Foundation of Rome (The). A.U.C.

According to Varro	21 April, B.C.	753

Cato, Dionysius of Halicarnassus, Sollinus, and Eusebius follow the date given by the Capitoline Marbles.

The Roman emperors, with Plutarch, Tacitus, Dion, Aulus Gellius, Censorinus, Onuphrius, Baronius, Prof. Hales, Bishop Beveridge, Strauchius, Dr. Playfair, &c. follow the computation of Varro.

Era of the French Republic (The). Began 22 Sept., 1792, the day of the foundation of the French Republic, and terminated 31 Dec., 1805.

The following table will show the correspondence between the foolish French system and the ordinary Christian era

Era of the Heg'ira (The). Adopted by all Mohammedans. It began with the 'flight' of Mohammed from Mecca, 16 July, 622.

The i of 'Hegira' is generally pronounced long, but it would be more correctly written and pronounced 'Hedj'rah.' The word does not mean flight but emigration. Some place the Hedjrah on Thursday, 15 July.

Era of the Jews (The). The Jews now date from creation, which they place B.C. 3760, and they begin their year with the new moon next after the autumnal equinox.

Era of the Maccabees (The). Began B.C. 166, when Judas Maccabæus took the command of the insurgent Jews who sought to throw off the yoke of Antiochus Epiphanês. His arms were successful, he destroyed every vestige of the heathen religion, restored the Mosaic law, and established a Jewish dynasty called the Asmonæan which lasted to B.C. 37, when Herod the Great was made king of Judæa by the Romans. This era of the Maccabees is called by the Jews 'the Era of Kings.'

In 2 Maccabees vii. we read of a mother and her seven sons who were martyred by Antiochos Epiphanês, because they refused to eat swine's flesh at the king's command. This massacre is said to have occurred B.C. 166, and is celebrated in the Catholic Church on 1 August. These seven brothers were not related to the great Asmonæan family, but it is rather remarkable that both the events referred to occurred in the same year.

Era of the Martyrs (The). Began 23 Feb., 303. It was the tenth and last persecution of Diocletian, the Roman emperor, to which he was instigated by his colleague Galērius. Diocletian died A.D. 313.

The 'Era of Diocletian' (q.v.) and the 'Era of the Martyrs' are often used as synonymous terms, but the former began 29 August, 284, and the latter 23 Feb., 303. Without doubt Christians used the era of Diocletian in consequence of the persecutions which rendered the reign so memorable.

Much error prevails on the subject of these persecutions. We are apt to forget that Christians in power instituted the crusades, the wars of the Waldenses and of the Albigenses, the Dragonnades, the Thirty Years' war, the Bartholomew slaughter, the fires of Smithfield, and all the horrors of the Inquisition. All religious persecutions arose from a conviction that there is only one right religion; and those in power think that religion which is sanctioned by the state is the right one.

Era of the Olympiads (The). Began 1 July, B.C. 776. The era of the Olympiads is a system of dates adopted by the ancient Greeks. An Olympiad was the interval of four years between two consecutive celebrations of the Olympic games. These games were trials of strength and agility tested by running, boxing, leaping, wrestling, and so on, held at Olympia, a plain of Elis, every fourth year. They were first employed for chronological purposes, when Chorœbos won the foot-race, the principal match before chariot-races were introduced.

By this system of dates, events were said to have occurred on the 1st, 2nd, &c. year of the so-and-so Olympiad, mentioning the number of celebrations since the establishment of the era in B.C. 776.

Era of the Persians. See 'Era of Yezdegird.'

Era of the Seleu'cidæ (The). Began 1 Oct., B.C. 312, when Seleucus Nicātor, king of Syria, took possession of Babylon. The dynasty lasted 247 years, to B.C. 64.

Seleucus Nicātor, one of the best generals of Alexander the Great, was a native of Macedon, and therefore the era which he founded is sometimes called the 'Macedonian Era.'

It was called by the Jews the Era of Contracts, certainly a very apt appellation.

Erasmus's Paraphrase. This was a paraphrase of the Scriptures, in 1547, placed with the Bible in parish churches.

Erastianism. The religious tenets of Thomas Erastus, a physician of Baden (1524–1583), who asserted that the church is a civil institution, subordinate to and dependent on the civil power. Thus it is said that the Church of England is Erastian or a parliamentary church, and that its articles and discipline depend on acts of parliament. Erastus taught that the Christian ministry is not a divine institution, that Christ and his apostles prescribed no particular form of church government, and that the punishment of all offences belongs to the magistrate. Of course he denied the dogmas of apostolical succession, the power of the keys, and ordination. He taught that anyone might preach who liked, and that the success of preaching depended solely on moral suasion.

The Scotch Covenanters called submission to the civil powers 'Erastianism.' The book of Erastus is entitled 'De Excommunicatione ecclesiastica.'

Eremites of St. Paul (The), or 'Frères de la Mort,' 18th cent. A religious order under the patronage of St. Paul the Anchorite. Their special duty was to attend to the sick and preside at funerals. They wore on their scapulary a death's head and cross-bones.

Erenachs. Laymen who held in Ireland church lands. If dignitaries they were called Comorbans. They appropriated the revenues, like lay abbots, leaving to the clergy only the tithes and fees. (From the 9th to the 17th cent.)

Erfurt (Treaty of), 27 Sept., 1808. Between Napoleon I. and Alexander of Russia. Napoleon agreed to recognise as parts of the Russian empire Finland (taken from Sweden), and Moldavia and Walachia (taken from Turkey); and Alexander promised to support Joseph Bonaparte as king of Spain.

Eric. Blood-fine which the kindred of a layman convicted of homicide were compelled to pay to the family of the slain (Ireland).

Eric's Law. The ancient laws of Sweden collected into a single volume by orders of Eric IX., who reigned 1150-1162.

Eri'gena means 'the Irishman.' Joannes Scotus, the Schoolman, is so called. Scot and Irish were at one time synonymous terms; so that John Erigĕna and John Scotus mean the same thing. (Died 875.)

He must not be confounded with Duns Scotus, the Schoolman (1265-1308).

Erlau (He has won the fame of). An Hungarian proverb. In 1552 Erlau was besieged by the Turkish army of Solyman the Magnificent. Women joined the men in its defence, and so obstinately resisted that the Turks raised the siege, and Erlau was saved. This was one of the noblest defences in history. (Erlau, -lau to rhyme with now.)

Ernest of Hanover. Called the Confessor on account of his having introduced into his dominions the 'Augsburg Confession' (q.v.).

Erse. The native Irish language. Celtic is divided into Cymric and Gaelic.

Cymric is Welsh, old Cornish, and Armorican or Breton.

Gaelic is Highland Scotch, Erse, and Manx. See 'English Language,' &c.

Escalier des Malheureux (L'). A back or private staircase in the palace by which the boon companions of Pharamond entered into his sanctum sanctorum. When Pharamond wanted a little relaxation he made a well-known sign, and entering this apartment, 'on admettait ceux à qui les ministres avaient refusé leur audience, ou que la garde avait rebutés; et cet escalier, par lequel le monarque et eux passaient également, s'appelait "l'escalier des Malheureux"' (Dictionnaire Historique, &c., par C. S. des R . . . .).

Escu'rial (The). A famous monastery in New Castile called 'the eighth wonder of the world.' It is a pile of granite of great magnificence.

The tale is that Felipe II. of Spain in the battle of St. Quentin vowed to St. Lorenzo (on whose day, 15 Aug., 1557, the battle was fought) that if he would grant him the victory he would build a monastery to his honour. As St. Lorenzo was burnt to death on a gridiron the monastery was built in the form of a gridiron, long courts representing the bars of the gridiron. It was begun in 1563, and finished in 1584, and was intended for palace, mausoleum, and monastery. It has 14,000 doors, and 11,000 windows.

Es'karites (3 syl.). Mohammedan Platonists, who place the summum bonum in the 'Contemplation of the Great Omnipotent.' They are moral and of most placid temper.

Eskimo. Is derived from Ashkimai, and means 'eaters of raw flesh.' A term applied to them in contempt by the Indians of Algonkin stock.

Espousal of the Adriatic (The). An annual ceremony on the feast of Ascension in Venice from 1177 to the end of the republic, when the doge went in his state barge, the 'Bucentaur,' to the shore of Lido, near the mouth of the harbour, and dropped a gold ring into the sea, saying, 'We wed thee with this ring in token of our true and perpetual sovereignty.' The origin of this custom is as follows: When Pope Alexander III. was driven out of Rome by Frederick Barbarossa, he took refuge in Venice, and was honourably entertained in the doge's palace. Ziani, the doge, sent an embassy to the kaiser demanding the restitution of the pope, but Barbarossa replied, 'Unless the Venetians will deliver the fugitive into my hands a captive in chains I will utterly extirpate the republic.' War was the inevitable consequence. The Venetians proved the victors, and the kaiser's son Otto fell into their hands. Pope Alexander went forth to meet the victorious fleet, and, giving the doge a gold ring, said to him, 'With this ring take, on my authority, the lordship of the sea,' and the anniversary was kept ever after.

Essays and Reviews, 1860. By several Oxford scholars on ecclesiastical subjects. Condemned by the Conference of Clergy at Sion House, 25 Jan., 1861. The judgment of the Court of Arches against Williams and Wilson was reversed by the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council, 18 Feb., 1864. Synodical judgment on the book passed 24 June, 1864.

Essenes (2 syl.). A very ancient Jewish sect who maintained that the essence of religion is silence and contemplation. Many passed their life in celibacy; they looked on the Mosaic law as an allegorical system of mysterious truths, and renounced the outward letter. 'The letter killeth, it is the spirit [or spiritual meaning] which giveth life.'

Essex Junto (The), 1812. A certain party of the federalists of the United States imbued with Anglomania, and favourable to monarchy and separation. All the federalists were opposed to war with England, and favourable to a war with the French republic. The American government stigmatised the platform of the junto as treason, and as tending to a dissolution of the union.

> At the head of this minority (said Jefferson) is what is called the Essex Junto of Massachusetts, but the majority of these leaders do not aim at separation. In this they adhere to the known principle of General Hamilton—never, under any views, break the union. Anglomania, monarchy, and separation, then, are the principles of the Essex federalists; Anglomania and monarchy those of the Hamiltonians; Anglomania alone that of the people who call themselves federalists (vol. iv. p. 188).

Est-il Possible? Nickname of Prince George of Denmark, given him by his father-in-law, James II. He was the consort of Queen Anne, and his everlasting exclamation was 'Est-il possible?'

Estates of the Realm. Not king, lords, and commons, but lords spiritual, lords temporal, and the commons. Hence we read of the 'king and the three estates of the realm.'

Esther. The Persian word is Artishona. Her real Hebrew name was Hadassah.

Estrith'sonides (4 syl.). The second dynasty of Denmark (1047–1375). So-called from the founder, Svend, son of Estritha, sister of Canute the Great of England.

Estrapa'do (The). A punishment in which the victim was raised by his hands tied behind him, and then let fall once, twice, or more, with a concussion. The French called the suspension of a victim on a movable gibbet which (rising and falling alternately) plunged him into a fire and pulled him out, the 'punishment of the estrapade.' This was also sometimes repeated twice, thrice, or more times.

Établissements de St. Louis (Les), about 1255. A recueil of laws and ordinances under the direction of Louis IX., especially aimed at the venality of justice, the harsh treatment of creditors, and the extravagant rate of interest. The code is still extant, and shows both wisdom and a love of justice. Published in Paris 1786.

États Généraux (Les). A French deliberative assembly, consisting of all the three states, viz. the noblesse, the clergy, and the commons. The first was convoked by Philippe IV., in 1302, and the last by Louis XVI. in 1789, when the total number of deputies was 1,145. That is, 572 commons, 572 noblesse and clergy, and a chairman.

> Louis le Gros (1108-1137) admitted the commons into the Legislative Assembly, and called the name L'Assemblée des Trois Etats. The commons were not again called till 1302.
> Pronounce A-tah' jen-a-ro'.

Et-cetera Oath (The), 1641. An oath imposed by Charles I. upon the clergy, who were required to swear that they 'would not consent to alter the government of the church by archbishops, bishops, deans, archdeacons, &c.,' and to give a fixed declaration of opinion respecting church dogmas, government, rites and ceremonies.

Eternal City (The). Ancient Rome.

Ethelred the Unready. That is, the Unwise (*, 978–1016). His great unwisdom was shown in the massacre of the Danes on St. Bryce's Day, 13 Nov., 1002, in warding off the Danes by bribes rather than by war, and in his most unfortunate choice of ministers to execute his commands.

He bribed the Danes time after time. In 991 he paid them 10,000*l.* to retire, in 997 he paid them 16,000*l.* to leave the country. In 998 he increased his bribe to 20,000*l.*, in 999 to 24,000*l.*, then 36,000*l.* In 1002 he tried secret massacre, and in 1003 he bribed Sweyn, who had come over to avenge the blood of his countrymen, with 14,000*l.* in money and sixteen counties.

Ethelwolf's Charter. An erroneous term for 'Ethelwolf's Grant.' This king of Wessex gave a tenth part of his private estate to ecclesiastical purposes; and, in return, the churches gifted were to perform weekly certain 'religious' services. He ordained that one poor man on every ten hides of his own land should be maintained in food and clothing. He released from all payment (except the trinoda necessitas, q.v.) a tenth part of the folkland.

Selden, Hume, and others quote this as the legal origin of tithes; but tithes were established in the 8th cent., if not before. Ethelwolf reigned in Wessex 836–858, and hoped to avert invaders and bring peace on his kingdom by giving largely to the church.

Ethiopic Version (The) of the Bible, supposed to be of the 4th cent. This version is printed in Walton's Polyglot, but with many inaccuracies. See 'Scriptures.'

Eton School, or College, 12 Sept., 1440. Founded by Henry VI. as the 'College of the Blessed Marie of Eton, by Wyndesore.' The 'Montem' was abolished in 1847.

The Montem was a kind of 'black mail' exacted by the boys triennially on Whit Tuesday from all who passed the mound (or montem) called Salt Hill, and the 'gratuities,' called salt, sometimes amounted to 1,000*l.*
The last 'Montem' exaction was made in 1844.

Ettrick Shepherd (The). James Hogg, born at Ettrick, a shepherd and poet. Died 1835.

Eubages (The). The 2nd order of Druids—they may be called the working clergy. The Druids were the high priestly party, a princely order. The inferior order were called Bards. Hence the three classes were Druids, Eubăges (3 syl.), and Bards.

Eudoxian Heresy (The). Promulgated by Eudoxius, patriarch of Antioch, in the 4th cent.—That the Son had an independent mind, and, therefore, might differ from the Father; so that Father and Son might be at variance.

Eu-er'getes (4 syl.). The well-doer, or benefactor. Ptolemy III., king of Egypt, was so called after ravaging Syria and Persia, when he brought back 2,500 statues of Egyptian gods carried away by Cambyses (B.C. 246–221).

Eugene Aram. A market gardener's son, of Newby, in Yorkshire, who set up a school at Knaresborough. In 1745 one Daniel Clarke, a shoemaker, was missing, and thirteen years afterwards Richard Houseman dropped a remark about a skeleton in St. Robert's Cave, which caused him to be apprehended. Houseman on his trial accused Aram, who was apprehended and executed in 1759.

Euge'nians. The people of South Munster, i.e. Waterford, Cork, and Kerry, so called from Prince Eogan. Those of North Munster were called Dalcassians.

Eu'gubine Tables (The). Seven bronze tables with inscriptions, discovered at Gubbio (Eugubium), where they are still preserved. The literal characters on four of the tables are Umbrian, on two of them Latin, and on the remaining one partly Umbrian and partly Latin. The inscriptions are supposed to date between three and four hundred years before Christ. [Eugŭbine 3 syl.]

The subjects are directions respecting sacrifice and forms of prayer.

Euhe'merism, 4th cent. The teaching of Euhemerus or Evemerus, who taught that the heathen gods—Mars, Bacchus, Apollo, and so on—were either kings or noted worthies in the fabulous island of Panchæa, which he placed in the Southern Ocean. Some explain miracles by euhemerism.

Eulo'gia. Is bread blessed by the priest at the time of mass, for the benefit of those unable to attend, or for communicants who were allowed to take it home with them. The custom gave rise to the panis beatus (pain bénit), or Holy Bread (q.v.).

Food blessed by the priest is sometimes called Eulogia.

Eunom'ians, 4th cent. Disciples of Eunomius, bishop of Cyzicum, who maintained that God the Father could not be of the same nature as Jesus Christ, because no creature can be equal to the Creator. He also denied the proper humanity of Christ, disbelieved the dogma of the Trinity, and believed that the Virgin Mary had other children besides Jesus her 'first-born.'

European Wars. The two greatest of modern history are the Seven Years' War and the War of Europe against Napoleon I. In the Seven Years' War (q.v.) England, Sweden, and Prussia opposed Russia, Austria, Saxony, and France. In the Napoleonic war England, Russia, Prussia, Austria, Spain, Portugal, &c., combined to dethrone the 'disturber of nations.'

Euse'bians. Another name for Arians, so called from Eusebius, bishop of Nicomedea, who supported Arius, condemned by the Council of Nice A.D. 325.

This was not Eusebius the historian.

Eutych'eans, or 'Monoph'ysites,' A.D. 448. Followers of Eutychès the archimandrite, who maintained that Christ was not man, but God only; and that his humanity was absorbed in his divine nature, 'as a drop of rain by the sea.' His heresy was condemned by the Council of Chalcēdon in 451.

Euxine Sea (The). The hospitable sea. Originally called 'the Axine,' or inhospitable sea. Similarly, the Cape of Good Hope was first called 'the Cape of Despair'; Beneventum was originally called 'Maleventum'; and Dyrrachium was called 'Epidamnus,' till the Romans thought -damnus too much like damnum to be lucky.

Evangelic League (The), 1613. A confederacy of the Lutherans and Calvinists of Bohemia against the Kaiser Mathias. It was counterbalanced by another confederacy, called 'the Catholic League,' and the contests of the two leagues kept Germany in a most disturbed state through the entire reign. Mathias died in 1619, and was succeeded by his cousin Ferdinand II., when the Thirty Years' War between Catholics and Protestants deluged Germany in blood. See next article.

Evangelical Alliance (The).
I. 1608. An alliance of the Protestant states of Germany in self-defence. It was opposed by the Holy Alliance, formed in 1609.

The chief Protestant states of the alliance were the Electoral Palatinate, Würtemberg, Hessen-Cassel, and the margraviate of Baden-Durlach.

II. 1845. The alliance of all Christians without regard to denominational distinctions; for the advancement of 'evangelical' religion; the counteraction of infidelity, romanism, and mere ritualism; and for the strict observance of the Christian sabbath. See 'Nine Articles.'

Evangelical Community (The). The Moravian Association so called themselves. It was a kind of social republic. The chief ecclesiastics, called 'the Ancients' (elders), regulated all the acts, both civil and religious; presided over the education of the children, enjoined penances, pronounced excommunications, and determined the rank of each member of the community.

Evangelical Doctor (The). John Wyclif (1324–1384). Called a heresiarch by Catholics, but 'the morning star of the Reformation' by Protestants. Bouillet numbers among his sins: 'Wiclef exaspéré attaqua dès lors la puissance papale au spirituel et au temporel, et traita le pape d'Antéchrist. Il niait la transsubstantiation; la nécessité de la confession pour qui a la contrition; la damnation des enfants morts sans baptême [!!]; l'efficacité des indulgences; la primauté du siège de Rome; la hiérarchie; le droit des clercs et des moines aux biens temporels,' &c. ('Dictionnaire Universel,' p. 2010, col. 2.)

 No doubt Wyclif was morally aided in his work by the 'Great Schism of the West' (q.v.), when the pope of Rome and pope of Avignon never tired of cursing and excommunicating each other.

Evangelical Prophet (The). Isaiah is so called from his clear and constant allusions to the Messiah. Isaiah was cut to pieces by a wooden saw, B.C. 698, aged 60.

Evangelical School (The). Of Germany under the leadership of Schleiermacher, whose 'Discourses on Religion,' 1804–1828, made a new era in German theology; but his greatest work is 'Christian Faith' (1768–1834).

Evangelical Symbols. The symbols of the four Evangelists, taken from Ezekiel's cherubim (see 'Cherubim') are—a man, a lion, an ox, and an eagle, mentioned in Rev. iv. 6–7 as supporting the throne of God. Jerome was the first to give the present appropriation of the man to Matthew, the lion to Mark, the ox to Luke, and the eagle to John. Matthew begins with the human descent of Christ from David, and Luke has the ox because his gospel begins with the account of Zacharias serving in the temple. The eagle refers to the doctrine of the logos, and the lion to the beasts in the desert where Jesus was tempted with which Mark begins his gospel. The union of the four symbols in one creature is called a TETRAMORPH.

Often the four Evangelists bear four bannerols on which are respectively inscribed the initial sentence of each gospel. Perhaps the oldest symbol is a mountain from which issues four streams, and a lamb standing at the top.

In frescoes, windows, &c.
Matthew is represented with a pen, writing at the dictation of an angel.
Mark is represented writing, and with a winged lion at his feet.
Luke has a pen, but is not writing. He is studying a scroll.
John is represented as a youth rapt in thought, and an eagle about to take flight to heaven stands by him.

Evangelical Union (The), 1608. An alliance of the Protestant states of Germany formed at Auhausen in Bavaria; it was opposed in 1609 by the Holy Union, formed at Würzburg.

Evangelical Unionists (The), 1840. A religious sect founded in Scotland by James Morison, who taught that the greatest sin is want of belief in the universal atonement of Christ—i.e. that Christ, by his death, saved all men, past, present, and yet unborn.

There are also the Evangelical Free Church, the Evangelical Mission, the Free Evangelical Christians, the Working-man's Evangelical Mission, and, in the middle of the 19th cent., the 'Low Church party' of the Anglican Church were called 'Evangelical' (Churchmen), and the German Protestant Church is called officially the 'Evangelical Church.'

Evangelics and Papalins. So Strype designates the Protestants and Papists at the accession of Queen Elizabeth. By 'Papalins' he means, not Roman Catholics, but the half-and-half Papists, the compromisers of a papistic bias.

Evans Prize for Theology. Value about 9*l.* Founded in the University of Cambridge by the friends of the Venerable Robert Wilson Evans, D.D., archdeacon of Westmoreland 1869. (See 'Regius Professor of Divinity.')

Evem'erism. See 'Euhemerism.'

Ev'erest (3 syl.), probably the highest mountain in the world, is named after Sir George Everest, surveyor-general of India. The mountain, which is in the Nepaul range of the Himalayas, is 29,002 feet above the level of the sea (nearly 5½ miles).

Evergreen Pam. Lord Palmerston, or Henry John Temple, third Viscount Palmerston, 1784–1863. He was born 20 Oct., died 18 Oct., was buried in Westminster Abbey 27 Oct., entered Parliament 1807. Was M.P. 56 years, and died at the age of 79.

Everlasting Aris'teas (The). A mythical character of ancient Greece, like the Wandering Jew of more modern times. He taught Homer (about B.C. 900), and reappeared in sundry places 400 years afterwards.

Exalta'dos (The) of Spain, 1819, &c. The extreme radical party in the reign of Ferdinand VII.; they were especially irate because the Inquisition was restored. The Exaltados were composed of disbanded soldiers, with a sprinkling of Spanish dons. The high tory party were called 'Absolutists' (q.v.).

The Exaltados were called 'Constitutionalists' because they wanted to restore the constitution given to Spain in 1812, abolished by Ferdinand VII. in 1814.

Exaltation of the Cross (The). 'Exaltatio Crucis.' A festival held 14 Sept. Instituted in 642 in memory of 'la vraie croix que Chosroës, roi des Perses, avait élevée 14 ans auparavant.'

Ex Apostolatus Officio. A bull by Paul IV., wherein 'by his apostolic authority' he ratifies 'all and singular sentences, censures, and penalties of excommunication, suspension, interdict, deprival, at any time decreed or promulgated by pope, council, decree of the fathers, canons, apostolic constitution, or ordinance, against heretics and schismatics.'

Exarch. I. A viceroy of the Byzantine empire in the West. He had the government of a province, as the exarch of Rome, the exarch of Africa, the exarch of Italy, and the exarch of Ravenna.

II. The Ecclesiastical exarchs were delegates of the patriarch of Constantinople or of some synod, charged to visit a diocese and see to the moral conduct of the clergy. At the present day an exarch of the Greek Church is tantamount to a legate of the Western Church.

Many bishops and archbishops of the Greek Church are called exarchs.

Exchequer (The). Low Latin scaccarium, Norman French eschequier. The word is generally ascribed to a 'chequered table, much like a chessboard, at which the barons sat,' and in defence of this etymology it is said that the use of this 'chequered table' was to assist the board in its calculations. This is Camden's suggestion. Chevellet connects the word with the German Schatz (a treasure), and the Court of the Exchequer would then mean the court of the royal revenues; but Scheler says of this suggestion: 'C'est incontestablement une erreur.' The court was established by William the Conqueror in the Aula Regis, and its chief work lay in the assessment and collection of the revenue.

Exchequer (Court of). See under 'Court.'

Exchequer Bills, 1696. Bills for money, or promissory bills issued from the exchequer by authority of parliament. They vary from 100*l.* to 1,000*l.*, and bear interest at 2½*d.* per cent. per diem. They form the chief part of the unfunded debt of the nation. Government from time to times gives the holders of these bills the option of having the bills paid off at par or of receiving new bills. Charged on the Consolidated Funds from 18 April, 1861.

Excise—Customs. Excise is a duty imposed on home goods, made, manufactured, or grown. This sort of tax was first imposed on beer 1648. It was introduced by Pym, the republican (German accise, 'tribute'). Customs, an impost on things of foreign growth or manufacture.

Exclusion (The Bill of), 11 Nov., 1680. To exclude James duke of York from the throne after the death of his brother Charles II. The bill passed through the Commons, but was thrown out by the Lords.

James duke of York did succeed to the throne, but being a Papist William and Mary were invited over by the Protestant party. James fled, and it was declared that he had abdicated.

Exclusionists, 1680. Adherents of the Exclusion Bill (q.v.). They were the Whig party.

Excommunication—Interdiction. Excommunication is exclusion from Christian fellowship. Interdiction is a prohibition to perform a religious rite, service, or ceremony. In mediæval times the excommunication of a king absolved his subjects from allegiance.

Execra'bilis (The Bulls), 1460. In which Pius II. forbids appeals to a future council.

1530, in which Clement VII. condemns the divorce of Henry VIII.

1606, by which Paul IV. forbids the Catholics of England to take the oath of allegiance.

10 June, 1809, launched by Pius VII. against Napoleon I. This was avenged by the captivity of the pope.

Executive Council of the State (The), 1648. The Council of Forty, with John Milton the poet for secretary. Appointed to govern the nation after the execution of Charles I. There was to be a parliament convened for six months every two years, and for the other eighteen months the council was without control.

Executive of the University of Cambridge (The). The Chancellor, the High Steward, the Vice-Chancellor, a Commissary, the Sex Viri, the Public Orator, the Librarian, the Registrary with his assistant, the two Proctors, the two Pro-proctors with their two assistants, the two Esquire Bedells, the University Marshal, the two Members of Parliament for the University, the Counsel, the Solicitor, and the Syndics. See each.

Exempt Lords. In the Commonwealth meant lords suspended or debarred from exercising the functions of their office.

'14 May, 1660. The Lords passed a vote for calling on all those lords who had formerly been exempted for siding with the king.'

Exeter College, Oxford, 1314. Founded by Walter de Stapledon, bishop of Exeter. The Head-master is called the Rector. See 'Pusey and Ellerton Scholarships.'

Exeter Hall is quite another place. It is a large proprietary building on the north side of the Strand, London, completed in 1831, and used for concerts and public meetings. The Handel festivals and the 'May Meetings' (q.v.) have rendered the place famous. It is 131 feet long, 76 feet wide, and 45 feet high.

Exhibition, London. I. The World's Fair, opened 1 May, 1851, and closed 15 Oct., 1851. The building was a monster glass palace, and the exhibition consisted of manufactured articles, works of art, jewellery, and curiosities.

II. The International Exhibition was opened 1 May, 1862, and closed 1 Nov., 1862.

Similar exhibitions have been since opened in numerous places. The first in Paris, called 'the Universal Exhibition,' was opened 1 April, 1867, and closed 1 July, 1867. The Paris Exhibition of 1889 surpassed all the others for splendour of design and variety of exhibits. The Eiffel Tower was a prominent feature.

Exhibitioner. In Oxford University one who holds an exhibition; a kind of scholarship in Corpus Christi; and in Worcester College. Exhibitioners are now called scholars.

Exon. A title applied to certain officers of the Yeomen of the Guard. Latin exon-erarius, i.e. one relieved from work or active service, but still remaining in a position of dignity and ease. Exons are also called exempts.

Exon Domesday. The statistical survey of the Conqueror's commission for the monastery of Exeter, containing the counties of Wiltshire, Dorsetshire, Somersetshire, Devonshire, and Cornwall. This survey contains, what is omitted in the great Domesday Book, the tally of live stock, as well as the names of landowners, the amount of land held by each, the number of vassals, villeins, cottars, and serfs, the amount of pasture land and arable land, the number of mills and fishponds, &c.

Exorcist. This officer of the Greek and Latin churches had nothing to do with the act of exorcising, but only to discriminate between the really possessed and those who pretended or were supposed to be so. In the fourth Council of Carthage it was prescribed that the bishop, when he ordained an exorcist, should place a book in the hand of the aspirant, and say to him, 'Take this book, study it, and receive power to lay hands on the possessed, whether they be baptized or only catechumens.' The exorcism itself was delegated to certain priests by the bishop of the diocese.

Ex-oukontians. Arians were so called by their opponents, because by their tenets Christ was created out of nothing (ex-ouk-onta), in which respect alone He differed from man.

Expectation Sunday. The Sunday before Whit Sunday. Acts i. 4, Christ commanded the disciples 'that they should not depart from Jerusalem, but wait for the promise of the Father.' They waited till the day of Pentecost and the promise was fulfilled. See 'Sundays.'

Expectation Week. The week preceding Easter, commemorative of the waiting or expectation of the apostles for the outpouring of the Spirit, which came at Pentecost.

Expectative Canons. Canons without revenue or prebend, but possessing the title of canon, with a voice in the chapter, and a place in the choir till a prebend became vacant.

Expectatives (4 syl.), or 'Mandates.' Letters of request from the pope praying that benefices be conferred on certain individuals nominated in the letters.

Experimental Physics (Professorship of). In the University of Cambridge, 1871, founded by the University. Stipend 850*l.* a year.

Explanation (Act of), 1649. A bill brought into parliament by the Duke of Ormond, lord-lieutenant of Ireland, to confirm the Protestants in the estates confiscated from Irish Catholics, after what is called the 'Irish Rebellion.' This act was quaintly called the 'Magna Charta of the Protestants of Ireland.'

Expositor (The). Averroës, the Moorish expositor of Aristotle; born at Cordōva, in Spain, 1120; died between 1196 and 1206.

Exsurge, Domine (The Bulls). I. 1377. By Gregory XI. against Wyclif.

II. 1520. by Leo X. against Luther. This bull was publicly burnt 10 Dec., 1520, at Wittenberg by Luther.

Pronounce Ex-sur'-ge Dom'-i-ne.

Extension Teaching, 1887. Extending the voluntary popular education to a regular course of instruction covering between two and three years. The instruction to contain two groups—(1), natural, physical, and mathematical science; and (2) history, political economy, mental science, literature, and art. It requires the students to attend a consecutive series of lectures for six terms in a group of subjects, and an examination proof of efficiency either in Latin or some modern language, the first three books of Euclid, and algebra as far as quadratic equations.

Extradition Treaty. For the mutual surrender of criminals (not political) who have taken refuge in another kingdom. Concluded between England and France 18 Feb., 1843, and the same year between England and the United States of America.

Since 1843 similar treaties have been made with other nations, so that now we have extradition treaties with Austria, Belgium, Brazil, Denmark, [France], Hayti, Italy, Luxemburg, Netherlands, Prussia, Salvador, Spain, Sweden and Norway, Switzerland, Tonga [the United States], &c.

Extravagants or 'Extravagantes Constitutiones,' in canon law are decretals or constitutions published after the Clementines (q.v.), not at first included in the Corpus Juris Canonici, but forming a supplementary volume. They consist of the Extravagants or papal constitutions of John XXII. and a few of his successors. They were added to the Corpus Juris Canonici by John Lancelot in the time of Paul IV. (1555–1559).

The whole Corpus Juris Canonici consists of (1) the Decretals of Raymond of Penaforte (1234), in 5 books; (2) the Sixt, or continuation of the Decretals, also in 5 books; and (3) the Extravagantes Communes, consisting of the Clementines, in 5 books, and Extravagantes Joannis in 1 book. Subsequently 5 books of Communes were added, being the rescripts of later popes.

Ezra. Same as Esdras, Zoroaster, or Zerdusht. The last is the Persian translation of Ezra, which means 'help.' He died B.C. 440, aged 99.

F. The three F's. Mr. Butt's Irish platform (1876): F[ixity of tenure], F[ree sale], F[air rent]. The principle of compensation for unexhausted improvements was introduced in Ireland in the Land Act of 1870; that of the Three Fs in the Land Act of 1881.

Fabian Method (The). Delay. Fabius Maximus, instead of attacking Hannibal, harassed him by marches and countermarches. Hence the proverb, 'To win, like Fabius, by delay.'

Fabius of America (The). George Washington (1732–1799).

Fabius of Austria (The). Marshal Daun, able and cautious (1705–1766).

Fabius of France (The). Anne Montmorency (1493–1567), so called from the way he conducted his expedition against Kaiser Karl V.—annoying him in every way, alluring him from place to place, and never coming to a general battle.

Fable of Jenkins' Ear (The), 1738. Capt. Robert Jenkins, master of a sloop trading from Jamaica, was boarded and searched by a Guarda Costa (Spanish coastguard), and barbarously ill-treated. He affirmed that the Spanish captain had cut off one of his ears, and Jenkins carried about with him an ear wrapped in wadding. On 16 March he appeared at the bar of the House of Commons, and Pulteney, Barnard, Wyndham, and Pitt made political capital out of the story to embroil the nation with Spain; but Burke dubbed the whole story a fable. This incident or fable led to a declaration of war with Spain.

Fabliaux, 1150–1350. Short fables or tales in verse, such as 'Reynard the Fox' and Parnell's 'Hermit.' The fabliaux poets were wandering minstrels very inferior in position to the Troubadours and Trouvères. The best of all this immense pile of French verse which has come down to us is the fabliau of 'Aucassin and Nicolette,' which is tender, natural, and full of interesting situations.

Fabulæ Atella'næ. A species of farce written in the Oscan language, which was spoken in all the south of Italy, and, from its resemblance to Latin, was understood by educated Romans.

Atellanæ, from Atella, a city of the Oscans, in Campania, where these farces were performed.

Fact and Right. See 'Right and Fact.'

Factory Act (The), 9 Aug., 1870 (33 & 34 Vict. c. 62). Working hours, 6 to 6 or 7 to 7, except Saturdays, when work is to close at 2 p.m. Extra hours 6 to 8 p.m., 7 to 9 p.m., or 8 to 10 p.m., not more than five days in any week, and not more than forty-eight days in any year. This not to be allowed in any wise except two hours are allowed for meals, at least half an hour of the time being at five o'clock p.m. The Factory and Workshop Act of 1878 (41 Vict. c. 16) repealed all previous acts, and consolidated them into one comprehensive statute. It was amended in 1883 (46 Vict. c. 53).

In 1890 there was a European clamour for higher wages and a reduction of working time to eight hours a day.

Factory King (The). Richard Oastler (1789–1861).

Faculty (A Grant of). Is an order by the bishop of a diocese to do something or enjoy something not permitted by common law; such as an alteration in a church, the erection there of a gallery or organ, to place a tablet on the church walls, to obtain a particular seat in a church, and so on.

Faculty of Advocates (The), 1424. Scotland. The college or society of advocates who plead in all actions before the courts of sessions, justiciary, and exchequer.

The statute runs: 'Gif there bee onie pure creature, for faulte of cunning or dispenses, that cannot or may not follow his cause, the king . . . sall ordaine the judge before quhom the cause suilde be determined, to purvey and get a leill and a wise advocate to follow sik pure creatures' causes; and gif sik causes be obteined, the wranger sall assyith baith the partie skaithed and the advocatis coastes and travel.'

Fagot Votes. See 'Dictionary of Phrase and Fable,' p. 283. From the following quotation it would seem that this term is literal, and that buying a few fagots and hiring for a few pence a room in a hut gave a person a vote at elections for members of parliament.

Fagot voters were there in plenty, renting a room of some old crone at a penny or so a week, lighting a fire with a small faggot of sticks, and thus standing in freedom's might an elective burgess.—C. THOMSON, Autobiography, p. 53.

Fainéants, i.e. worthless. A term applied to the latter Merovingian kings of France, in which reigns the mayors of the palace really governed the kingdom, and the kings were mere puppets.

They were Thierry III., Clovis III., Childebert III., Dagobert III., Chilpéric II., Thierry IV., and Childéric III., dethroned in 750. Of these seven kings, five were the third of their name. See 'Fatal Three.'

 Louis V. was also called 'le Fainéant.'

Fair Maid of Galloway (The). Margaret, sister of Earl William of Douglas, on whom descended the estates of Galloway, Wigton, Balvenie, Ormond, and Annandale, after the execution of William in 1440. She married William, heir of James the Gross, her cousin-german.

Fair Maid of Kent (The). Joan, daughter of the earl of Kent. She was the wife of the Black Prince, and mother of Richard II., born 1326, married 1361, died 1385.

The Black Prince was born in 1330. At his marriage he was 31 and his wife 25 years of age. Edward died 1376, so his widow survived him nine years. Her son was crowned 1377.

Faire Ruelle. To receive guests in one's bedchamber.

Armande Béjart had made a start by receiving her guests, sumptuously attired and reclining on a state-bed. The guests passed on both sides of the bed. This was called faire ruelle.—Nineteenth Century (June 1889, p. 798).

Faithful Norman (The). Prendergast (in the reign of Henry II.). When MacGallapatrick of Ossory sought a safe-conduct to the Norman camp in Ireland to exculpate himself from treason his friend Prendergast was appointed his escort. On his reaching the camp, O'Brien insisted on his death, but Prendergast, drawing his sword, swore on the cross that no harm should befall the man who had confided in his honour; and he was allowed to conduct his friend back again in safety.

Fakirs (Fa-keers'). Paupers; a species of religious recluse common in India and the East generally. They live on alms, but subject themselves to great hardships to earn eternal happiness. Some neither lie nor sit for years together. Some hold their hands over their heads all life long. Some go about well-nigh naked, exposed to heat, cold, and the stings of insects. Some live in ditches. Some carry fire on their heads. Some condemn themselves to perpetual silence. And all live an ascetic life.

Falaise (The Treaty of), 1174. William king of Scotland (brother of Malcolm IV.) invaded Northumberland, but was made prisoner at the battle of Alnwick and taken to Henry II., who was at Northampton. The Scotch redeemed their king by making him liegeman to Henry, and the treaty was signed at Falaise, in Normandy. This treaty is important, as it made the king of England the overlord of the king of Scotland. Richard I. cancelled this treaty for a sum of money equal to 100,000*l.* of the present day.

Falczy (Peace of), 24 July, 1711. Between Russia and Turkey, by which Czar Peter I. the Great agreed to restore Azof to the Porte.

Falk Laws (The), 1873. So called from Dr. Falk, who insisted on the compulsory education of the clergy of Prussia. The laws are four in number: (1) The first was directed against the abuse of ecclesiastical discipline for political purposes, such as 'boycotting,' excommunication, and anathemas; (2) the next regulated the effect of secession from the Church on the obligation to meet certain taxes; (3) the third law was directed at the evasions of Roman Catholics of State education incumbent on all Germans; and (4) abolished the legality of papal tribunals, recognising the judgments of the German ecclesiastical courts as the only authority on Church matters. In 1874 these four laws were supplemented by others to ensure more perfect obedience.

Dr. Adalbert Falk was appointed by Prince Bismarck 'Minister of Public Worship' 22 Jan., 1872. In 1872 Prince Bismarck carried through the Prussian Houses a bill to transfer the control of primary education from the Church to the State authorities.

Falkenstein (Battle of), 1814. Called 'The Battle of the Rocks'; in which a party of French mountaineers defended themselves from an army of Germans and Cossacks by hurling rocks upon them.

Fall of the Leaf (The), 1712. The Act 10 Anne, c. 19, A.D. 1712 imposed a stamp-duty on newspapers, and so many were consequently discontinued that it was called the 'Fall of the Leaf.'

False Coiner (The). Philippe III. 'Le Hardi' of France was so called because he debased the coin. (1245, 1270–1285.)

False Decretals (The), 835–845. A shameless forgery purporting to be forty-nine rescripts of bishops in the first four centuries. Signed by such names as St. Anaclētus (who died 78), St. Alexander (who died 109), St. Fabian (who died 236), Julius (who died 337), and St. Athanasius (who died 373). The object of the Decretals is to diminish the authority of metropolitans over their suffragans, by establishing an appellant jurisdiction of the Roman See in all causes, and by forbidding national councils to be holden without its consent. Every bishop is made amenable only to the tribunal of the pope. Every accused person might appeal to the pope from any civil sentence. The pope only could make new sees or translate from one see to another. Upon these spurious decretals has been built the great fabric of papal supremacy. Koch says that this book 'produced enormous changes in the Roman hierarchy, doctrine, and discipline; and has to an incalculable extent raised the authority of the pope.'

They assume to have been compiled by St. Isidore of Pelūsium, who died 450, but certainly had no existence for nearly 400 years later.

The 'False Decretals' are subdivided into three parts:

Part I. contains 61 decretals of popes in the first three centuries (from Clement, A.D. 91, to Sylvester, A.D. 314).

Part II. contains the Canons of the Councils.

Part III. contains the decretal epistles from Sylvester to Gregory the Great (34-590).

The False Decretals assert that Constantine the Great ceded to Pope Sylvester and his successors the empire of the West, and that the Church of Rome has the charge of the whole flock of Christ, as the successor of St. Peter. That every bishop emanates from Rome, and that the power of the pope overrides that of the councils.

 It is passing strange that a vile forgery should have been accepted and appealed to as authority by the Catholic Church for nearly 1,000 years. It was appealed to in 865 by Nicholas I.; by the Ecumenical Council in 870; again by Leo. IX. (1048-1054). It was made the basis of the Hildebrandine system (1073-1080); was referred to as authority by the Abbot Barlaam in 1341; by the Council of Florence, 7 May, 1437; and was confirmed by the Council of Trent in 1564.

They were proved to be forgeries by Nicolas Cusanus in 1432; by Laurentius Valla in 1457; by Contius in 1586, but his evidence was suppressed; and by Blondel in 1628, but his book was placed in the 'Index.' At length, Pope Pius VI., in 1789, had the honesty and courage to declare the author of the book Impostor Nequissimus, and the decretals 'infamous forgeries.' See 'Literary Forgeries.'

The author of these decretals was either Isidore Mercator a Cenobite, or Benedict Levita of Mentz, or Riculfe archbishop of Mentz who brought them to France in 811.

False Hermit (The). Enrico the Italian was so called by the Catholics because he was a hermit of the 'heretical' Waldenses. He was condemned to death in 1134 by the Council of Pavia, but escaped and died in 1147.

Families (The). A secret society founded by Auguste Blanqui and Bernard, chiefs of the French Socialists and Communists. This red republican party were greatly instrumental in bringing about the revolution of 1830.

Familist. 1540. One of the religious sect called 'the Family of Love' (q.v.).

Under the head of Independents . . . . were the Arminians, Millenaries, Baptists, Anabaptists, Familists, Enthusiasts, Seekers, Perfectists, Socinians, Arians, and others.—HOWITT, History of England (Charles I., ch. vi. p. 278).

Familists. A religious sect in New England in the 17th cent. This sect looked for rare revelations and forsook the revealed word (JOHN HARVARD, 1628).

The Davidians (q.v.) are so called in England and Holland.

Family Feud, or 'Blood Feud.' See 'Vendetta,' 'Rimbecco.'

Family Pact (The), 'Pacte de Famille,' 15 Aug., 1761. A secret compact made at the instigation of the Duc de Choiseul by all the crowned heads of the Bourbon race to stand together in defence of each other, and put an end to the British maritime supremacy. The family consisted of Louis XV. of France, Carlos III. of Spain, Ferdinand IV. of Naples, and Filippo of Parma. Spain bound herself to deprive Great Britain of her commercial privileges in America, and to transfer them to France. France bound herself to aid Spain in the recovery of Gibraltar. The 'Pact' was quite effete, and was broken up by the revolution in 1789.

Louis XV. was the fourth of the Bourbon dynasty (founded by Henri IV.); Carlos III. was the fifth of the Bourbons in Spain (founded by the grandson of Louis XIV.); Ferdinand IV. was Carlos's son; and Filippo of Parma was son of Charles de Bourbon.

Family of Love (The), or 'Familists, 1540. A religious sect founded by Henry Nicholas, a mercer of Delft, and introduced into England in 1570 by Vitells. These sectaries made all religion consist of inward love to Christ They rejected infant baptism, the divinity of Christ, and original sin.

Fanariotes (4 syl.). Greek dragomans residing at Fanar, in Constantinople, and exercising considerable induence in Turkey in the 17th and 18th centuries. The insurrection of the Greeks in 1821 put an end to their power.

Faneuil Hall. In Boston, Massachusetts. Built in 1742 by Peter Faneuil and presented by him to the town for public meetings, &c.

Fanny (Lord). John lord Hervey (1696–1743). Lord Privy Seal in 1740; 'half wit, half fool; half man, half beau.' It is said that he used rouge, drank asses' milk, and took Scotch pills.

These lines are weak, another's pleased to say,
Lord Fanny weaves a thousand such a day.
POPE, Sat. and Ep., i. 6.

Like gentle Fanny's was my flowery theme,
A painted mistress or a purling stream.
POPE, Prologue (Sat. and Ep.), line 149.

Far'andole (3 syl.), or 'Faran'dola.' A sort of country dance peculiar to the South of France and North of Italy, akin to the Carmagnole (q.v.). It was under the excitement of this dance that Maréchal Brune was murdered at Avignon in 1815.

Farmer George, or 'The Farmer King.' The sobriquet of George III.

Farmer Godric and his Cummer Godgifu. Henry I. of England and his wife Matilda (daughter of King Malcolm of Scotland and Margaret sister of Edgar the Atheling). By this marriage the blood of Cerdic and Alfred was blended with that of Rolf and the Conqueror.

Farmers General. In French 'Fermiers Généraux.' Those in the ancient régime of France who farmed the public revenues, such as tallage, gabelle (or tax on salt), the tax on tobacco, the octrois, and so on. Originally forty in number, but afterwards increased to sixty. They were immensely rich, and were appointed by the 'ministre de finances,' who expected his pot-de-vin for the appointment. Suppressed by the Assemblée Constituante in 1790.

Farnese (3 syl.). A princely Italian family, famous for their patronage of the arts. In their palace at Rome they possessed some of the finest sculptures of the world, as the Farnese Bull, now at Naples; the Farnese Flora, Herculès, and Gladiator.

Fast Days. In the Catholic Church Wednesday was a fast in commemoration of the day when Jesus was betrayed and taken prisoner, and Friday the day of his crucifixion. To these was added Saturday to commemorate the entombment.

The quadrigesimal or Lent fast commemorates the forty days passed by Jesus in the wilderness; it was originally only forty hours.

There are four different sorts of fast: (1) Jejunium generālé (binding on all); (2) Jejunium consuetudinarium (a local fast); (3) Jejunium pœnitentiālé (by way of penance); and (4) Jejunium votivum (consequent on a vow).

The Mohammedans fast the whole month of Ramadan, when the Prophet brought the Koran from heaven.

Fasti. In ancient Rome days when the law-courts were open; 'Nefasti' days when they were closed. Also public registers. These registers were of two sorts, Fasti Kalendārés (or Sacri) and Fasti Annālés. The Fasti Kalendares were almanacs. The Fasti Annales were chronicles of the year containing the names of the consuls and other magistrates for the current year, and a brief notice opposite each day of some past historic event in Roman history.

Ovid's Fasti is a poetical companion to the calendar published by Julius Cæsar.

Fat Thursday. See 'Zobia grassa.'

Fat Tuesday. See 'Mardi Gras.'

Fatal Stone (The). A palladium, as the 'Fatalé Marmor' or 'Stone of Destiny' (q.v.) of Scotland. The Fatal Stone of Artizoe, of the Persians, mentioned by Pliny. The 'Black Stone' of the Seids. The 'Fatal Stone' is described as a large mass of very rich grey silver ore of an Indian South American tribe, removed from place to place, as the tribe fled before the Spanish invaders. See 'Caaba.'

Probably the 'Great Goddess Diana which fell from heaven' was a meteoric stone, like the 'Fatal Stone' referred to above.

Fatal Three. The succession of three brothers has been singularly fatal in France. The CAPETIAN dynasty terminated with the three succeeding brothers (sons of Philippe IV. le Bel), viz. Louis X., Philippe V., and Charles IV. The Valois line came to an end by the succession of the three sons of Henri II., viz. François II., Charles IX., and Henri III. Similarly, the Bourbon dynasty terminated with the three sons of Louis the Dauphin, viz. Louis XVI., Louis XVIII., and Charles X. The empire also consisted of Napoleon I., Napoleon II., and Napoleon III.

After Charles IV., the third brother of the Capetian dynasty, came Philippe de Valois, a collateral branch. After Henri III., the third brother of the Valois dynasty, came Henri de Bourbon, a collateral branch. After Charles X., the third brother of the Bourbon dynasty, came Louis Philippe, a collateral branch. And with the third of these triplets monarchy in France died out. Of the seven Rois Fainéants of France, five were the third of the name—Thierry III., Clovis III., Childebert III., Dagobert III., and Childeric III. And after Napoleon III. the empire was converted into a republic.

Fatale Marmor, the 'Lia Fail' (q.v.), or 'Stone of Destiny.' See above, 'Fatal Stone.'

Fatale, pronounce Fay-tā'-le.

Father Fritz. The name of endearment given to Friedrich II. the Great by his Prussian subjects (1712, 1740–1786).

Father Violet. Napoleon I. (1769–1821, emperor 1804–1815). So called after his banishment to Elba, because he assured his partisans that he would 'return to France with the violets.' Violets are still the symbol of imperial proclivities in France.

Father of Biblical Criticism (The). Origen is called the father of Biblical criticism and exegesis (185–254).

He was accused and tortured for heresy. He denied the inspiration of scripture, rejected much of the historical portions of the Bible, and disbelieved in eternal punishment.

Father of Botany (The). Tournefort (3 syl.), 1656–1708. Linnæus followed him in all the main parts of his system.

Father of British Inland Navigation (The). Francis Egerton, duke of Bridgewater (1736–1803). Brindley constructed for him a canal between his coal pits at Worsley to Manchester, which reduced the carriage of coals from 12*s.* to 6*s.* a ton, and their price from 7*d.* to 3*d.* a cwt.

The 'Bridgewater Canal,' commenced in 1758, was by no mean the first canal in the British Isles

The New River Canal was begun in 1608, the Carmarthenshire Canal in 1755, the Droitwich to the Severn in 1756, &c. But it was the first great navigable canal.

Father of Burlesque Poetry (The). Hippōnax of Ephesus (B.C. 566–520), a Greek poet.

Father of Chronology (The). Josephus Justus Scalĭger (1540–1609). His great work is 'De Emendatione Temporum.'

Father of Church History (The). Eusebius, first of the Greek Fathers (q.v.) and author of an Ecclesiastical History in ten books (Greek) from A.D. 1 to 324. Also called 'Father of Christian History' (265–338).

Father of Cruelty. Alhakem I. of Cordŏva who exiled to Africa 40,000 of his own subjects for rebellion A.D. 818. He was also called 'He of the Suburbs,' because he razed to the ground the suburbs in which the above-mentioned rebels resided.

Father of English Poetry (The). Geoffrey Chaucer, the greatest English poet up to the time of Shakespeare. There were English poets before him, but Chaucer was inter ignes Luna minores.

Father of French Chemistry (The). Arnaud de Villeneuve (1238–1314). He discovered sulphuric, muriatic, and nitric acids; obtained alcohol from fermented liquors; and procured the spirit of turpentine by dissolving in alcohol the juice of pine-wood.

Father of French Philosophy (The). D'Alembert, mathematician, littérateur and encyclopædist (1717–1783). Called the 'Mazarin of Letters.'

Father of French Poetry (The). Thibault (1210–1253), comte de Champagne, and afterwards king of Navarre. He introduced the alternate masculine and feminine rhymes.

Feminine rhymes for the most part end in e or es; silent in prose, but pronounced slightly in poetry at the end of a line.

Thibault, pronounce Tee'-bo.

Father of French Satire (The). Mathurin Regnier (1573–1613).

Regnier, pronounce Rain'-yea.

Fathers of French Sculptors (The). Goujon and Pilon (16th cent.). The former, called the Correggio of sculptors, was slain in the Bartholomew massacre.

Father of French Surgery (The). Ambroise Paré (1517–1590), author of a treatise on Gunshot Wounds.

Father of French Tragedy (The). Robert Garnier (1534–1590). The foreboding dream in his 'Hippolyte' has nothing superior in Corneille or Racine. However, Corneille is generally looked on as 'the Father of French Tragedy.'

Father of Grace and Elegance (The). So the French style Du Bellay, one of their Pleiad poets, also called 'the French Ovid' (1524–1560).

Father of Landscape Gardening (The). Lenôtre (1613–1700). He laid out the gardens of Versailles, the Tuileries, St. Cloud, St. Germain, Fontainebleau, Clugny, Chantilly, Meudon, and Sceaux. He died at the age of 88, never having had a day's illness in his life.

Father of Letters (The). Louis XII. (1462, 1498–1515).

François I. (1494, 1515–1547).

Lorenzo de Medicis of Florence (1448–1492).

Mœcenas, the Roman statesman, was called the Patron of Letters (B.C. 73–8).

Father of Medicine (The). Hippocrătes, B.C. 460–357.

Father of Mesmerism (The), or 'Animal Magnetism.' Mesmer (1734–1815). He taught that there exists a force in man which he could communicate to others, and that this force was of a sedative character, inducing sleep or alleviating pain.

Father of Modern French Literature (The). Claude de Seyssel (1450–1520), celebrated for being the first prose writer in French with any degree of purity.

Father of Modern German Poetry (The). Martin Opitz of Silesia (1597–1639).

Father of Modern Philosophy (The). Roger Bacon, a friar, author of 'Opus Majus' (1214–1292).

Father of Modern Scepticism (The). Bayle (1647–1706), author of a French 'Historical and Critical Dictionary.'

Father of Modern Swedish Poetry (The). Stjernhjelm (Shearnyelm), 16th cent., contemporary with Shakspeare, Lopë de Vega, &c.

Father of Parody (The). Hippōnax of Ephesus (B.C. 566–520), a Greek poet.

Father of Physiology (The). Haller (1708–1777). He wrote eighty-six books on medicine and physiology.

Father of Political Dissenters (The). Sir John Oldcastle, commonly called Lord Cobham (1360–1417). Burnt to death in the reign of Henry V. He was condemned by Archbishop Arundel in 1413, but the sentence was carried out by Henry Chicheley, Arundel's successor, 14 Dec., 1417. Lord Cobham was said to be unsound on these four points: Transubstantiation, penance, pilgrimages, and image-worship.

Father of Satire (The). Archilŏchos of Paros (B.C. 710–690), a Greek poet. He inveighed against Paros, against Thasos, and against Lycambês, who promised to give him his daughter in marriage, but afterwards retracted his word. Lycambês was so pricked to the heart by the satire of the poet that he hanged himself.

Archilochum proprio rabies armavit iambo.
HOR. De Arte Poetica, 79.

Father of Waters. The Irrawaddy (Burmah). Johnson, in his 'Rasselas,' calls the Mississippi 'the Nile of the Father of Waters.'

Father of his Country.

ANDRONICOS Palæolŏgos assumed the title (1260–1332).

AUGUSTUS ('Pater atque Princeps'—HORACE), B.C. 63, 31–14 A.D.

CICERO, who broke up the Catiline conspiracy (B.C. 106–43).

The Romans offered the same title to Marius after his annihilation of the Teutŏnês and Cimbri, but he declined to accept it.

COSMO DE' MEDICI is so designated on his tombstone.

'Cosmus Medices | Hic situs est, | Decreto publico, | Pater Patriæ (1519-1574).

DORIA (Andrea) is so called on his statue at Genŏa (1468–1560).

JULIUS CÆSAR was so styled after he had quelled the Spanish insurrection (B.C. 100–44).

LAURENCE O'TOOLE, archbishop of Dublin, who died 14 Nov., 1180: he was of the illustrious house of O'Tuathal, and was canonised in 1226 by Honorius III.

LOUIS XVIII. of France (1755, 1814–1824).

WASHINGTON (George), 'Defender and Paternal Counsellor of the American States' (1732–1799).

See also 1 Chron. iv. 14.

Father of his People (The). Louis XII. of France (1462, 1498–1515).

Even Louis XI. was so called. The French, as a rule, have not been happy in their royal appellatives.

Father of the English Unitarians (The). John Biddle of Gloucestershire (1615–1662). He was thrice imprisoned by the Long Parliament, and was at last liberated in 1652 by the Act of Oblivion. He was again arrested in 1655, but Cromwell discharged him in 1658; he was again arrested in 1662, and fined 100*l*. Not being able to pay the fine, he died in prison within five weeks.

Father of the Forest (The). It stands in California in Tulare County, is 450 feet high, and 138 feet round the trunk.

Father of the French Drama (The). Rotrou (1609–1650) was so called by Corneille. If not the 'father of the drama,' he was doubtlessly the 'founder of the French theatre' so far as scenery is concerned and the general conduct of the stage.

Father of the German School (The). Albert Dürer (1471–1528).

Fuseli says of Albert Dürer, 'though called the Father of the German School, he neither reared scholars, nor was he imitated by German artists of any age.'

Father of the Land League. Ireland. Michael Davitt, 1879.

Father of the Modern Drama (The). In Germany. Andrew Gryph (1619–1664), prince of the Silesian poets. Shakspeare died the very year that Gryph was born. He wrote both tragedies and comedies, but is pompous, declamatory, and overstrained.

Father of the People (The). Christiern III. of Denmark (1502, 1534–1559).

Died.
317 Lactantius.
397 Ambrose of Milan.
420 Jerome (2 syl.).
430 Augustin of Hippo.
467 Hilāry.

St. Bernard (1091-1153) is called the Last of the Latin Fathers, and was followed by the Schoolmen.

Fatherland. Germany.

What is the German fatherland?
Is't Prussia's realm or Suabian land?
Is't where the Rhenish red grapes hang?
Or where the Baltic sea-mews clang?
Oh! nay, nay, nay, so cribbed a strand
Is not the German fatherland.

Our fatherland all Germany—
Who speak the tongue our sons must be.
God give us courage, will, and strength,
To free it in its breadth and length;
Join every heart, join every hand
Till Germany's one fatherland.
ARNDT (translated by E. C. B.).

Fatigue Party. Men of the rank and file employed on works, such as making roads, digging trenches, moving guns, pitching camps, &c., not their special military work. They are said to be 'men on fatigue.'

Fatimites (3 syl.). An Arabian dynasty in Egypt, founded by Mahadi Obaidallah, a descendant of Fatima, daughter of Mohammed 'the prophet' (910–1171). On the death of Adhid (last of the Fatimites) the dynasty of the Ayubides (3 syl.) succeeded. The Fatimites of Egypt wore red turbans.

The princes of the Fatimites were called Alīades (3 syl.), from Alī, cousin of Mohammed. Alī married Fatima, the Prophet's daughter, and was proclaimed kalif in 656.

Faust (The English). Dr. Dee, the astrologer (1527–1608).

Favoured Child of Victory (The). Marshal Massēna, duke of Rivoli (1758–1817), so called because his whole career in Italy, Switzerland, Germany, and Poland had been an unbroken series of victories. He was foiled by Viscount Wellington (Duke of Wellington) at Busāco 27 Sept., 1810.

Fawkes (Guy, i.e. Guido). Was at the taking of Calais by Archduke Albrecht in 1598. He took part with Catesby and the other conspirators in Gunpowder Plot, 1604–5, was arrested 5 Nov. 1605, and executed at Westminster 31 Jan., 1606.

In 1850, the year of 'the Papal aggression,' the figure of Cardinal Wiseman was substituted for Guy Fawkes in the street processions.

Fealty was performed standing; homage was performed kneeling. Fealty was sworn to by oath; homage required no oath. In fealty the vassal stood before his lord, and laying his right hand on the Bible, said aloud: 'Know ye this, my lord, that I swear to be faithful and true to you, and to bear faith to you for the lands that I shall hold of you. And I will lawfully do unto you the customs and services which I ought to do, and at the times assigned. So help me God and his saints.' Then taking up the book he kissed it, and put it back again. See 'Investiture of Vassals.'

Easter Sunday (q.v.).

Good Friday, the Friday before Easter Day.

Palm Sunday, the Sunday before Easter Day.

Pentecost or Whit Sunday, the seventh Sunday after Easter.

Sexagesima Sunday, (about) sixty days before Easter, second Sunday before Lent.

Trinity Sunday, the Sunday following Whit Sunday.

See each of these in loco. They all depend on Easter Day.

Feasts (Grecian), or Grecian Festivals.

Agraulia, or Agrauria, held at Athens in honour of Agraulos or Agrauros, daughter of Cecrops.

Artemisia in honour of Artĕmis [Diana]; the bread offered to the goddess was called lochia, and the women who performed the sacred rites were called lombai.

Diony'sia in honour of Dionȳsos [Bacchus], observed in Athens with great splendour and numerous ceremonies.

Eleusinia, the most celebrated and most mysterious festival of any in Greece. The greater mysteries were celebrated at Eleusis, in the month Boëdromion (the latter half of Sept. and the former of Oct.).

Panathenaia in honour of Athēnê [Minerva], protectress of Athens. It lasted several days and was celebrated with great magnificence.

The festivals of Greece were very numerous. There were fifty beginning with the letter A. And besides these special festivals there were the times set apart for the Isthmian, Nĕmĕan, Olympian, and Pythian games.

Feasts (Roman), or Roman Festivals.

1. In January: The Agonālia in honour of Janus on the 9th; and Carmentālia in honour of Carmenta (mother of Evander) on the 11th.

2. In February: The Faunālia in honour of Faunus on the 13th; the Lupercālia in honour of Pan, on the 15th; the Regifugium on the 24th, to commemorate the flight of Tarquin; and two or three others.

3. In March: the Matronālia to commemorate the termination of the Sabine war on the 1st; the Liberālia in honour of Bacchus on the 18th; the Quinquatria in honour of Minerva, on the 19th; and two others.

4. In April: the Megalēsia, on the 4th and 5th, in honour of the mother of the gods; the Cerealia in honour of Cerès, on the 9th; and three others.

5. In May: on the 1st the sacred rites of the Bona Dea were performed by the vestal virgins; the Lemuria, to the souls of the deceased, on the 9th; and two others.

6. In June: On the 1st were several festivals, one of which was that of Juno monēta. Other festivals were held on the 4th, 7th, 9th, and 10th.

With the festivals of this month the Fasti of Ovid end. The other six books are lost.

7. In July were seven festivals.

8. In August were four festivals.

9. In September: the Ludi Magni were held on the 4th in honour of the great gods; and on the 13th the consul fixed a nail in the temple of Jupiter.

10. In October were two festivals.

11. In November were two festivals.

12. In December: the Saturnālia were held on the 17th, the most celebrated festival of the whole year, when all persons of every rank gave themselves up to feasting, frolic, and fun.

Besides the time devoted to the games.

Feast of Fools, or 'Festum Fatuorum.' The Christian substitute of the Roman Saturnalia. The same as 'Festum Kalendarum' (q.v.), 1 Jan. Abolished in Germany by the Council of Basel (1431–1449); in France by Charles VII. in 1444. Observed at Antibes (2 syl.) as late as 1644. See 'Festum Asinorum.'

This was not the Ass's Festival, as many assert. The Ass's Festival was the 14th of Jan., and commemorated the 'Flight into Egypt,' whereas the Feast of Fools was New-year's day, and thence called 'Festum Kalendarum.' It was called Festum hypodiaconorum, 'non quod revera soli Subdiaconi has scelestas choreas ducerent; sed quod hac joculari appellatione indicare voluerint festivitatem hanc fuisse ebriorum clericorum vel diaconorum.' DU CANGE, vol. iv. p. 288, article 'Kalendæ.' It was a day of drunkenness and debauchery, in which the clergy took a leading part.

Feast of Liberty (The). A festival held by the Athenians every five years, in commemoration of the victory of Salamis over Xerxes and his host. It was celebrated on the battle-field of Platæa.

Feast of Nature (The), 10 Aug., 1793. To celebrate the 'perfected constitution.' Séchelles and David the painter were the chief devisers. A plaster statue of Nature was erected on the Place de la Bastille, having two streams of water sprouting from her breasts. The front of the pedestal bore the words, 'We all are her children.' Other mottos were 'Hell vomits kings,' and 'Hell vomits priests.' The chief members of the Convention, public committees, and commune kneeled in adoration to this plaster image, praying her to receive the eternal devotion of the French. Then followed firing of cannon, scattering of flowers, kissing, and dancing. The nurses of the foundling hospital brought their children to 'Mother Nature,' and the Dames de la Halle were crowned with wreaths. In the Place de la Révolution (now 'de la Concorde') was a gigantic statue of Liberty with a forest of poles bearing red caps, and inscribed, 'Imitate us; we are free.'

Feast of Pikes (The), 14 July. So the 'Feast of the Federation' is called by Carlyle, because the Bastille was taken on 14 July, 1790, by the mob, for the most part armed with pikes.

France roared simultaneously to the welkin, bursting forth into sound and smoke at its Feast of Pikes.—CARLYLE, French Revolution, vol. iii. bk. ii. 1.

Feast of Reason (The), 10 Nov., 1793. Celebrated by decree of the Convention at Paris.

Feast of Reconciliation (The), 25 Jan., 1555. A grand religious procession in London, in the reign of Queen Mary, to commemorate the return of England to the See of Rome. It was to be held annually on St. Andrew's day (25 Jan.).

The bishops were empowered to 'reconcile' all to the Catholic Church, and enter their names in registers. Those who did not give in their names were to be proceeded against as heretics. This was followed by four years of persecution, when about 300 suffered death.

Feasts of the Être Suprême (The), 8 June, 1794. Celebrated by decree of the Convention at Paris. See also 'Festa,' 'Festum,' and 'Fête.'

Feathers Tavern Association (The), 1771. An association opposed to the abolition of subscription to the Thirty-nine Articles and confessions of faith. Its name is derived from the place of meeting. In 1772 the association presented a petition to parliament on the subject. It was signed by 200 clergymen and 50 laymen, chiefly lawyers.

Febron'ianism, anti-papalism. John Nicholas von Hontheim, who assumed the pen-name of Justinus Febronius, wrote a book, 'De Præsenti Statu Ecclesiæ,' published in 1767, to prove the independence of national churches, and the 'home rule' of diocesan bishops. It met with the severest censures of the Roman tribunals.

February Patent or Ordinance (The), 1861. Promulgated for the establishment of a central Reichsrath, consisting of a house of lords and house of representatives from all the provinces of the Austrian empire. Hungary refused to send any representative, and in 1867 Hungary was granted its present form of government.

February Revolution (The), 1848 (22, 23, 24). In which the government of Louis Philippe of France was overthrown. It began at a reform banquet with the cry of Vive la Réforme! and ended in three days with the cry of Vive la République! The king fled, and a republic was proclaimed 24 Feb.

Fedavees. A company of young men, agents of the Chief of the Assassins, a secret society of Asia. They dressed in white, with red bonnets and girdles, and were armed with daggers; but they assumed all sorts of disguises.

Federalism, 1792, 1793. A scheme proposed by the Girondists (q.v.) to form the different departments into a federacy, like the United States of America.

Federalists (The), 1841. Ireland. When the House of Commons decided that demands for the repeal of the Union were unconstitutional, the repealers called themselves 'Federalists,' and declared that their platform was not identical with the repeal for which Daniel O'Connell had previously been agitating. They said they were opposed to the dismemberment of the Imperial Parliament, but favoured the idea of an Irish Parliament to have jurisdiction in exclusively local affairs. O'Connell accepted the new programme.

Federals (The), 1861–1866. In the American Civil War the Federalists were those who armed to preserve the Union against the Confederates (q.v.) or Southern States.

Federate Republicanism, 1793. A French federation against the Convention. The chief league consisted of Lyons, Marseilles, and Toulon. Kellermann was sent with 30,000 troops to reduce Lyons to obedience, and the siege lasted from 19 Sept. to 9 Oct., 1793, when the city surrendered, and 2,000 of the inhabitants were put to death. Toulon was set on fire, and the federation was stamped out.

Federation of the Champ de Mars, or 'Fête of the Federation,' 14 July, 1790. The first anniversary of the taking of the Bastille in Paris, when 60,000 persons assembled, and Louis XVI. swore to preserve the constitution worked out by the Constituent Assembly.

A second federation was held 14 July, 1792.

A third was held during the famous Hundred Days (q.v.), 26 May, 1815. This is more properly called the Champ de Mai, but it was held in the Champ de Mars of Paris. Here Napoleon the Great proclaimed what is called 'L'Acte Additionnel'—that is, the act which Napoleon, during the Hundred Days, 'ajouta aux Constitutions de l'Empire.' This assembly, announced for 26 May, did not really take place till 1 June.

Fee-penny (The). A fine paid or exacted of a debtor if his debt was not paid to time. Sir Thomas Gresham, writing from Flanders, frequently requests the English government to settle its debts 'to save the fee-penny.'

Fehmgerichte (4 syl.), or the 'Holy Fehm.' A secret tribunal of the middle ages, in Westphalia. Its object was especially to terrorise the barons, whose lawless conduct was the curse of the land. These tribunals were at their climacteric in the 14th and 15th cents.

The members of the tribunal were called 'Wissende' (3 syl.), the initiated.

The district over which it exercised judicial authority was called the 'Red Land.'

The assessors of the court and executors of its sentences were called 'Freischöffen' (free justices).

The presiding judge was the 'Freigraf' (free count).

The kaiser (king of Germany) was ex officio one of the 'Wissende.'

Felix'ians, 8th cent. A Spanish sect so called from Felix bishop of Urgel. He taught that Christ in respect of his divine nature was the Son of God by generation; but in respect of his human nature was only the adopted Son of God, like other holy men. This was called the 'Adoption Controversy.'

Elipandus (archbishop of Tolêdo) was a Felixian.

Fellow Commoners, in Cambridge University, are students who pay higher fees, wear a distinctive costume, and 'common' or dine at the Fellows' Table. They were called in Oxford University 'Gentleman Commoners.' They are generally either noblemen or married men.

Female High Sheriff (The). Anne countess of Pembroke, a staunch royalist in the reigns of Charles I. and II. On the death of her father, the Earl of Cumberland, in 1643, she succeeded to the hereditary office of Sheriff of Westmoreland, attended the judges of assize, and sat with them on the bench at Appleby.

Fencing the Tables. Keeping from the eucharist all whom the 'Fencers' thought unworthy to be communicants. One clergymen of Dumfries forbade from the table all who used minced oaths, such as 'heth, teth, feth, fegs, losh, gosh, and lovenenty.'

Fénelon of Germany (The). Lava'ter (1741–1801). Born at Zürich; the founder of physiognomonie, or the art of reading character by physiognomy.

Fénelon of the Reformation. Johann Arnd of Anhalt (1555–1621).

Fenian Heroes (The). The heroes of Finn, called by Ossian 'Fingal.' 'Gal' means the alien or foreigner, as Wales, &c.

Fenians, or Fenian Brotherhood. An association of Irish rebels ill-disposed to the British government, and bent on a separation of Ireland from England. It was organised in America by James Stephens in 1858. The leaders were called 'Head-Centres,' and their subordinates were called 'Centres.'

It was introduced into Ireland in 1865 by James Stephens, the 'head-centre,' who was imprisoned in Dublin, 11 Nov., but made his escape, 24 Nov., by the connivance of the turnkey.

This society, which made the most reckless attacks on life and property, was condemned, 12 Jan., 1870, by Pope Pius IX., and on 14 Oct. by General Grant, president of the U.S. of America; but it still remains active for mischief.

18 Sept., 1867, Sergeant Brett was killed; and on 13 Dec. the wall of Clerkenwell House of Detention was blown up by these miscreants. The attack on Clerkenwell prison was for the rescue of Richard Bourke.

12 March, 1868, O'Farrell, a Fenian, made an attempt to assassinate in Sydney the Duke of Edinburgh, the second son of Queen Victoria.

In May 1882 Lord Frederick Cavendish (the newly-appointed viceroy of Ireland) and Thomas A. Burke, under-secretary, were savagely assassinated while walking in Phœnix Park, Dublin.

In March 1883 simultaneous attempts were made to blow up the offices of the Local Government Board and the office of the 'Times' newspaper.

In 1884 the Fenians attempted to blow up with dynamite four of the chief railway stations.

 The name 'Fenian' is a base dishonour to the famous national militia, the Fianna Eirin, whose achievements formed a source of song and romance honourable to Ireland. Fingal, son-in-law of King Comhal or Combal (A.D. 212–353), little thought his name would be so degraded in the 19th cent.

Sir Walter Scott alludes to the Fenians in 'The Antiquary,' but not the Fenians condemned by every right-thinking man, under the patronage of Michael Davitt.

Fer, aut feri; feri, ne feriare (Suffer or strike; strike lest you be stricken), or thus, 'Aut fer, aut feri; ne feriare, feri.' The jingling words incessantly muttered by Queen Elizabeth while she remained in doubt whether to sign the death-warrant of her cousin Mary or not.

Ferdinand I. Kaiser-king of Germany of the house of Austria (1503, 1556–1564).

Father, Philipp the Handsome; Mother, Juaña, daughter of Ferdinand and Isabella; his elder brother was KARL V., and his grandfather was Kaiser MAXIMILIAN I.; Wife, Anna Jagellon of Bohemia; Son and successor, MAXIMILIAN II. Contemporary with Mary and Elizabeth.

Ferdinand II. Kaiser-king of Germany of the House of Austria. He was son of Karl duke of Styria, and succeeded his cousin Mathias on the throne of Germany (1608, 1637–1657). He began the infamous thirty years' religious war against the Protestants.

Father, Karl archduke of Styria; Mother, Maria of Bavaria; Son and successor, FERDINAND III. Contemporary with James I. and Charles I.

FERDINAND I. had two sons, viz. MAXIMILIAN II., who succeeded him, and Karl, who died duke of Styria.

Karl of Styria (the 2nd son of Kaiser Ferdinand I.) had for issue FERDINAND II., who succeeded his cousin Mathias on the throne of Germany.

Ferdinand III. Kaiser-king of Germany (1608, 1637–1657).

Father, FERDINAND II.; Mother, *; Wives (1) Mary-Anne of Spain, mother of LEOPOLD, his successor; (2) Mary Leopoldina of Austria, and (3) Eleanora of Mantua. Contemporary with Charles I. and the Commonwealth.

Ferdinand the Summoned. Ferdinand IV. of Castile and Leon (1285, 1295–1312). So called because, when he ordered two noblemen, the brothers Carvajal, to execution without trial, they summoned him to appear before the tribunal of God within thirty days, and within the allotted time he died.

Fergus MacIvor (Sir W. Scott's Waverley). The original was Major Donald Macdonald, executed on Saturday, 18 Oct., 1746, with eight others.

Feringhee (Afghanistan). A European.

Fermiers Généraux. A name given in France, before the Revolution of 1789, to a privileged association who 'farmed' the public revenues. It was a shocking jobbery, the fermiers being selected either by the minister of finance (who made his selection for a money consideration) or by the king's mistresses. The number was forty, but rose to sixty a little before the revolution. These farmers paid the king a fixed sum and made what profit they could out of the taxpayers.

Pronounced Fair'-me ay jen-ay-ro'.

Ferney (The Patriarch of). Voltaire (1694–1778). After his departure from Prussia he retired to Ferney, a quiet little spot near Geneva. He died at the age of eighty-two.

Ferocious Beast of Auso'nia (The). So Caracalla, the Roman emperor, was called by the Alexandrians. It is said that the tyrant was pleased with the name, and boasted of it.

Ausonia means Italy.

Ferra'ra (Peace of), 26 April, 1433. Between Venice and Milan, brought about by Nicholas marquis d'Este, the 'Pacificator of Italy.'

Ferry of Death (The). The ferry of the Irtish, leading to Siberia. So called because it leads the Russian exile to political death.

To cross the Ferry of Death, to be laid on the shelf in political life.

Fertile Periods. Plato tells us there are times when the powers of minerals, vegetables, and animals sympathise magically with superior natures, and have a greater aptitude to participate in those superior powers. At those periods 'miracles' abound, for inferior things partake of the Divine powers. When no such celestial powers are inherent in minerals, vegetables, and animals, Plato says it is a 'barren period.'

Festa Brachio'rum, or 'Festa Manuālia,' 1493. Days on which no works requiring the aid of horse and cart might be done. Manual labour means such as is done by the skill of the hands; but brachial labour is such as is done by the muscular force of the arms.

[Festa] 'Manuālia' seu 'Brachiōrum' vulgo appellantur, in quibus videlicet ipsa prohibitio per totam diem ad ea duntaxat opera et negotia quæ sine equis et carrucis fieri possunt se extendebat.' —Statuta Ecc. Meldens. 1493. See Historia Meldens. Inter Instrum. p. 542.

Festa Capit'uli, i.e. those fête days 'quæ Capitulum habent': as All Saints', Annunciation, Ascension, Assumption, Epiphany, Michaelmas Day, Nativity of Christ (Christmas Day), Nativity of John the Baptist, Pentecost, Purification of the Virgin Mary, and the Resurrection. Add to these the fête day of Mary Magdalene, and that of Hugh of Lincoln.

Festa Domin'ica. Sacred festivals set apart in honour of some saint, martyr, or confessor of the Christian Church, called in English a saint's day.

Festival of St. Napoleon (The), 1806. 15 Aug., the birthday of Napoleon, was so designated by the first Emperor of the French.

Festival of the Sacrifices (The). 'Id-al-Azha,' or 'Kurbân Bairâm,' the second or Great Bai'râm, is observed by Mohammedans in commemoration of Abraham offering his son. It is observed seventy days after the Lesser Bairâm, and lasts four days.

Festum Ar'chitricli'ni. The second Sunday after Epiphany, the gospel of which day is John ii.; the marriage feast, when the Architriclinus wanted wine and Jesus miraculously supplied it. See 'Sundays.'

Festum Asino'rum. 14 Jan., to commemorate the 'Flight into Egypt.' Several rituals of this festum are extant. That of Beauvais, in France, has a rubric which orders the priest to bray three times, and the congregation to bray three times in answer. As the ass was led to the altar a hymn of nine stanzas was sung, each stanza ending with hee-haw, hee-haw! The first runs thus (see 'Feast of Fools'):—

Orientis partibus,
Adventavit Asinus,
Pulcher et fortissimus,
Sarcinis aptissimus.
Hé, sire Âné, hé!

From out the East
Came forth the beast,
Both strong and fair,
Its packs to bear.
Hee-haw! Sir Ass,
hee-haw!

Festum Bea'tæ Mari'æ de Adventu, i.e. the Conception of the Virgin Mary, 8 Dec. Instituted 1356.

Festum Broncher'iæ, i.e. Festum Brancher'iæ, or Palm Sunday (the Feast of Branches). See 'Sundays.'

Festum Campana'rum. The festival of the Annunciation; the day after Quasimodo Sunday; that is, the Monday next after Easter Monday. So called because on this day 'ad Salutationem-angelicam solemnius pulsantur campanæ' (Du Cange).

With us the Annunciation is called 'Lady Day,' celebrated on 25 March.

Festum Canaba'rum. The Feast of Tabernacles (Lev. xxiii.).

Festum Cande'læ. The founder's day of any church or religious institution when candles were lighted in honour thereof. This festival used to be called in old English Lichtmesse.

Festum Compassio'nis Bea'tæ Mari'æ. Instituted 1423, and held the Friday before Palm Sunday.

Festum Coro'næ Christi. Instituted 1357. Innocent VI. appointed it to be held as the 'Feria 6 post octavam Resurrectionis Dominicæ.'

Festum Corporis Christi, or at full 'Festum Consecratiōnis Corpŏris Christi,' or in brief 'Festum C.C.C.' Instituted 1371. The great C.C.C. festival is '5 feria post Octavam Pentecostes.'

Another festival of 'Corpus Christi' was that called 'Festum Sacrosancti Sacramenti,' in German Frohnleichnamsfest, instituted by Urban IV. in 1264; it followed the octave of Pentecost.

The 'Festum Eucharistiæ,' instituted in 1356, was another 'Festum Corporis Christi.'

Festum de Clav'ibus, 1355. Instituted by Innocent VI. in honour of the nails used in the crucifixion of Christ.

Festum Divisio'nis Apostolo'rum, 5 July. When Bede, Usuard, and others say the apostles parted company, and each went into his special field of labour. Also called the Festival of the Dispersion; instituted 1098.

Festum Duplex. When two fêtes occur on the same day. In which case the greater festival is observed and the lesser one is deferred to the day following.

Festum Fatuo'rum. See 'Fête des Fous.'

Festum Florum. 'Nono Kalendas Junii' (May 24).

Festum Herba'rum. Assumption Day (15 Aug.). This was the day when Roman women carried bundles of herbs to the temples, as offerings to their gods. The [Roman] Catholic Church preserved the custom, but changed the object of veneration.

The Assumption is the act of taking up to heaven the Virgin Mary bodily without dying. This change was made in the 5th cent.

Festum Hypapantes, or 'Purification of the Virgin Mary,' Feb. 2. Also called 'Festum Lumĭnum.' Instituted 542.

Hypapante means 'meeting together.' It was on this day that Mary met Simeon and Anna the Prophetess.

Festum Hypodi'acono'rum. The fête of the Subdeacons, a part of the Saturnalia, when archbishops and bishops, with all the inferior clergy, played practical jokes on each other, and all forms of distinction were, for the time being, held in abeyance. The general character of the feast was gross drunkenness, and the name was a satire on the worldly lives of the general clergy. As Belĕtus says, 'hac joculāri appellatione indicare voluerint, festivitatem hanc fuisse ebriorum clericorum.'

Festum Kalenda'rum. A Christian substitution of the Roman Saturnalia, at the close of the old year and beginning of the new. It was a time of unbridled license, when slaves and servants were on equal footing with their masters. Men, women, and children dressed up as beasts, and ran about the streets braying, roaring, barking, and indulging in the coarsest practical jokes. The early Church, unable to abolish the custom, tried to divert its object, and introduced innovations scarcely less objectionable than the old Roman licentiousness. One day of the feast was a satire on the drunkenness of the clergy, and was called 'Festum Hypodiaconorum' (q.v.), or the Subdeacons' Fête, where subdeacon included all ecclesiastics, from the archbishop to his curate.

Augustine refers to the feast in his 'Sermo de Tempore,' 215; and in the 'Life of Eligius,' bk. ii. chap. 15, we read 'Nullus in Kalendis Januarii nefanda et ridiculosa, vetulas, aut cervulos, aut jotticos (practical jokes) faciat.'

Festum Lu'minum, or 'Festum Hypapantes.' The Feast of Purification (Greek ὑπαπαντή), from the meeting of Simeon and Anna with Christ, whom they had long waited for in the Temple

Also called 'Festum St. Simeonis.'

Festum Oliva'rum. The Sunday before Easter day, generally called Palm Sunday. See 'Sundays.'

Festum Sancti Petri ad Vin'cula, 1 Aug. Instituted by the order of Eudoxia, wife of the Emperor Theodosius. This was the continuance of an old heathen festival in honour of the victory of Actium, in which Octavius overcame Antony. The festival was continued, but its object was changed.

Festum Translatio'nis Jesu, or the 'Day of Transfiguration.' Instituted 6 Aug., 1498. (Matt. xvii. 1–18.)

See also under the word 'Feast.'

Fête Days. See 'Holy Days.'

Fête de l'Âne. Introduced into Paris in the 15th cent.; was a ridiculous caricature of the Flight into Egypt. A young woman with an infant in her arms was seated on an ass, led by an old man representing Joseph, and followed by a long procession to the cathedral church, accompanied by bishops and their clergy. As it went along, chanting the appointed canticles, the crowd responded hinha! hinha! imitating the bray of an ass. It was not discontinued till the close of the 16th cent.

Other similar processions were the 'Marche du Bœuf Gras' (q.v.), 'La fête de la Bouteille,' 'La fête des Cornards,' 'La fête des Fous' (See Fools, Feast of'), and 'La fête du Géant aux Ours' (on 3 July).

Pronounce Fate de lahn, Fate d'la Bou-tay'-e, Fate dê Foo.

Fête des Fous. January, in commemoration of the Flight into Egypt. This profane exhibition was immensely popular in France from the 12th to the 16th cent.

Fête-Dieu, 1246. A festival instituted by Urban IV. in honour of the host or consecrated wafer, called 'Festum Corpŏris Christi,' and held in France on the Sunday following Trinity Sunday. At one time it was celebrated with street processions and great pomp, but the street processions ceased in 1830.

Except in France the festival is held on the Thursday following Trinity Sunday.

Fête of the Federation. See under 'Federation.'

Fêtes. See 'Holy Days.'

Fetichism. An idolatry of the grossest sort. The name was given by the Portuguese to the adoration paid by negroes in Africa to the fetiches, such as fire, water, animals, trees, stones, and invisible beings such as the Grisgris of Central Africa, the Manitous and Ockis of America, the Burkhans of Siberia.

The priests of this idolatry are called griots in Africa, jongleurs in America, and shamans in Central Asia.

If a worshipper does not get what he prays for, he will address his idol thus: 'How now, dog of a spirit! We give you lodging in a magnificent temple, we gild you handsomely, feed you well, and offer incense; yet, after all this, you are so ungrateful as to refuse us what we ask.'—ASTLEY, Collection of Voyages.

Fetters of Greece (The). Demetrias, Chalcis, and Corinth were so called by Demetrius Poliorcētēs of Macedon.

'The freedom promised,' said the Ætolians, 'was an illusion . . . The fetters of Greece would only be clasped lighter by a stronger hand.'—The Students' Rome, p. 336.

Feu Sacré, or 'Mal des Ardents.' A terrible malady which appeared in Paris A.D. 945; in Scotland in 954; and in Italy and Germany in 985. 'Ce mal [says Sauval] brûlait à petit feu, et consumait sans qu'on y pût remédier . . . elle brûlait les entrailles ou toute autre partie du corps, qui tombait en lambeaux. Sous une peau livide, elle consumait les chaires en les séparant des os. Ce que ce mal avait de plus étonnant, c'est qu'il agissait sans chaleur, et pénétrait d'un froid glacial ceux qui en étaient atteints; et qu'à ce froid mortel succédait une ardeur si grande dans les mêmes parties, que les malades y éprouvaient tous les accidents d'un cancer.'

Feudal System (The). Holding estates by military service. William I. divided the kingdom of England into 700 fiefs and about 60,000 knights' fees (or holdings). These knights' fees or secondary holdings were held, not of the crown immediately, but of one of the 700 crown vassals under similar service. The 700 vassals were bound to supply the crown with soldiers according to a fixed scale, and the secondary holders supplied the vassals under whom they held in a similar way. Bishops and abbots were bound, in times of war, to supply the king with soldiers in proportion to their possessions.

Feuillantines (4 syl.), 1583. Reformed Feuillants, an order founded by Marguérite de Polastron. Anne of Austria, in 1622, founded a house of Feuillantines in the Faubourg St. Jacques, Paris.

Feuillantism. The political principles of the Feuillants in the French revolution. It was reformed monarchism.

Feuillantism—that party which loves liberty yet not more than monarchy.—CARLYLE, French Revolution, vol. ii. bk. v. 10.

Feuillants (The), 1577. Reformed Benedictines, founded by Jean de la Barrière, Abbé de Notre Dame de Feuillant, in France. They go about bareheaded and bare-footed, sleep upon wooden pallets, eat kneeling, and impose on themselves incredible austerities. Their robe is white, with a white hood. In 1630 Urban VIII. separated the Feuillants of Italy, and called them 'Reformed Bernardins.' The Feuillans or Feuillants are often called the Barefooted Monks.

Pronounce Fuh'e-yahn'.

Feuillants' Club (The), or 'Club des Feuillants,' 1790. The more moderate of the Jacobins. So called because they held their meetings at a convent of the Feuillants (see above), near the Tuileries. The chief of the club were Lafayette, Bailly, Duport, and the brothers Lameth. Their enemies nicknamed them the 'Club Monarchique.' Extinguished Nov. 1791.

The original name of the club was the 'Company of 1789.'

Fez (The), or 'Council of Tara,' in Ireland. The triennial meeting of the subordinate chieftains, priests, and bards, held at Tara in Ireland, and instituted by Ollav Fola about 900 years B.C. Ollav Fola reigned forty years and died in peace.

In the second year of his mission Patrick presented himself before the Fez . . . and Logary the king declared himself a convert.—The Britannica (article 'Ireland,' p. 465).

ff for Pandects. ℱ is a corrupt way of making the Greek Π, π, the initial letter of Pandects.

Fiacre. A French cab, so called because the first fiacres were made in the Hôtel St. Fiacre, Rue St. Martin.

St. Fiacre is the patron saint of gardeners.

Fian'a Er'ion (The). A very celebrated Irish militia commanded by Fingal (or Fein M'Cooil), in the reign of Cormac, grandson of Conn. It consisted of 9,000 men of great strength, activity, and intelligence, who were bound to choose wives solely for their merits, never to ill-treat a woman, and never to turn their backs on a foe. This force was annihilated at the battle of Gabra, or Gawra, in Meath, where Oscar, the son of Ossian the poet, fell.

Fiann (The). An ancient order of warriors in Ireland. No man of the order was allowed to marry a dowered wife, lest he might choose her for her money and not for her merits. No man of the order might use his strength against a woman. None might assert his own rights selfishly against another's wants.

Fief or Feud. Conquered land let out, not for money, but military service. The Romans let out conquered land for usufruct, called Emphyteusis (grafting), the grantor was the 'stock,' the tenant was only the graft. Feud is a corrupt contraction of 'phūt', fūt, feud. And fee, fief are variants of the same Latinised Greek word.

Field Conventicles (Act against), 1670. A field conventicle is 'any unauthorised meeting for religious worship, even in a private house, if any of the hearers stand in the open air.' Every minister who preaches and prays on such occasion during the three following years shall incur the forfeiture of his property and the punishment of death.

Field Fortification has for its object the protecting of camps, villages, posts, passages of rivers, and the construction of such works as may be required to aid the operations of an army in the field. Trenches and offensive works executed on the spot in carrying on a siege also belong to 'field fortification.'

Field of March (The), or 'Champ de Mars.' A national convention or assembly held during the first dynasty of France. It was revived by Pepin d'Héristal, but after A.D. 755 was held in May, and called Champ de Mai. Napoleon I. revived these assemblies in the 'Hundred Days' (June 1, 1815).

Pronounce Sharnd Mars, Sharnd Ma'-e.

Field of the Cloth of Gold (The). Called in French history Le Champ du Drap d'Or. The site between Guisnes and Ardres, where in June 1520 was held an interview between Henry VIII. and François I. of France. So splendid and gorgeous was this fête, that the site where it was held was called 'The Field of the Cloth of Gold.'

Fiery Cross (The). A blazing torch in the form of a cross, carried from hill to hill to summon the clans to battle. Sir Walter Scott speaks of it in 'The Lady of the Lake.' He says the chaplain slew a goat, and dipped the cross in its blood. It was then delivered to a swift runner, who ran with all his speed to the next hamlet, where he presented it to the principal person, who was bound to send it on. Every man, from 16 to 60 years of age, was expected instantly to repair fully equipped for war to the place of rendezvous on pain of 'fire and sword.' In the civil war of 1745–6 the Fiery Cross was sent round thus.

The 'fiery cross' was borne swiftly through the townships and parishes (of Upper Canada), calling forth a levy en masse of the loyal inhabitants, who rushed to the defence of the capital.—HOWITT, Hist. of Eng., 1837, p. 869.

Fiery Tears of St. Lawrence (The). The shooting stars which appear with considerable regularity between the 9th and 14th of August. The festival of St. Lawrence is the 10th August.

Fieschi Laws, 1837. Some very stringent laws against the French press, published after the attempt of Fieschi on the life of Louis Philippe, king of the French, by the 'infernal machine' (q.v.). Enormous fines were imposed on those who ridiculed the king, or disputed the wisdom of any act of his government, or who avowed themselves republicans, or who published a print of any sort without subjecting it first to the minister of the interior.

The fines were from 400*l.* to 2,000*l.* sterling for the first offence, double that for a second offence, and so on.

Pronounce Fe-esk'ke.

Fifteen (The). The judges of the Supreme Court of Session in Scotland.

Fifteen (Out in the Fifteen). A partaker in the Derwentwater rebellion, 1715. See 'Forty-five.'

Is it so singular that a man should have been out in the forty-five? . . . your father, I think, . . . was out with Derwentwater in the fifteen.—Sir W. SCOTT, Redgauntlet, chap. vii.

Fifteen Mysteries (The), in Catholic theology. See 'Five Joyous Mysteries,' 'Five Dolorous Mysteries,' and 'Five Glorious Mysteries.' Observe the triplet.

Fifteen Years' Farce (The). The Great French Revolution which ended in the coronation of Napoleon I. (1789–1804).

La comédie de quinze ans was admirably played in France . . . but what have been the results?—MAZZINI, Faith of the Future.

Fifth Doctor of the Church (The). So Pius V. called Thomas Aquinas (1224–1274).

The Four Doctors of the Latin Church, emphatically so called, were St. Ambrose (340–397), St. Jerome (345–420), St. Augustine (354–430), and St. Gregory. The fifth doctor was similar to such phrases as the 'Tenth Muse,' the 'Eighth Wonder of the World,' &c., meaning one of supereminent merit.

Fifth Monarchy Men appear in 1654. They believed in the four great monarchies of Antichrist, marked out by the prophet Daniel (ch. vii.), viz. the Assyrian, Persian, Macedonian, and Roman, the fifth being that of Christ on earth. In politics they were republicans, acknowledging no earthly king but Christ; and they conspired to murder Cromwell, the lord-protector. In the reign of Charles II., led by one Venner, a wine-cooper, they proceeded to 'take the kingdom of heaven by force, without waiting for Christ'; the king sent the military against them, and after some severe fighting, the ringleaders were taken captive and executed 1660, and the sect died out.

Filibuster. A corrupt spelling of the French 'flibustier,' called in English a buccaneer (q.v.). Filibusters were piratical seamen, resolved to force their way into the New World jealously guarded by the Spanish. The most famous were Morgan (a Welshman), who took Panama in 1670; Pierre Legrand of Dieppe, who with twenty-eight men took the ship of a Spanish admiral; Nau l'Olonnais, Michel le Basque, who made themselves masters of Vera Cruz in 1683; and Monbars the Exterminator, who in 1683 took Vera Cruz. After the accession of William III. the French flibustiers and the English buccaneers were in deadly antagonism; but after the Treaty of Ryswick in 1697, the piratical expeditions were put an end to.

Filio'que Controversy, which long disturbed the Church, was this: 'Did the Holy Ghost proceed from the Father by the Son, or from the Father and the Son (filioque)? The Greek Church maintained the former, the Latin Church the latter dogma. The phrase was added to the Creed by Recared in the Council of Toledo A.D. 589; was adopted by Charlemagne in 788; and by Benedict VIII., at the instance of Kaiser Heinrich II., in 1014. This question is often called 'the Procession of the Holy Ghost.'

It must be confessed that the authority is not very satisfactory. Recared, Charlemagne, and Heinrich II. of Germany are not the names we should select to settle a point in divinity. Recared, or Recarede, was the seventeenth king of the Visigoths in Spain, who compelled his subjects to embrace the Christian faith, and was therefore called 'The Catholic.' He was converted only two years and a few months before the Council of Toledo was convened. The addition of filioque to the Nicene Creed created a flame of discord between the Eastern and Gallic Churches. Pope Leo III. was averse to the addition.

Filius Nullius, or 'Filius populi,' a bastard. In the eyes of the law an illegitimate son is nobody's son; and as such a son has no 'blue blood' he is only a commoner, or one of the ignobile vulgus.

Filles Bleues (Les), 1604. Also called the 'Celestial Annunciades' (4 syl.). A religious order instituted by Maria Victoria Fornaro. They wore blue mantles, and hence their name.

Pronounce Fee-yâ bluh.

Filles de Sagesse (Les). The grey nuns of St. Laurent.

A host of other religious communities might be added, as:

Filles de Ste Geneviève	Filles Repenties
Filles de la Providence	Filles St. Thomas, &c.
Filles du Calvaire	See 'Founders.'

Filles-Dieu. Hospitallers, at one time called Sœurs de St. Gervais, because in 1300 they were charged with the hospital of that name. Their dress is a white gown and black mantle.

Filmerite (3 syl.), 17th cent. A disciple of Sir Robert Filmer (*—1688), author of 'The Anarchy of a Limited and Mixed Monarchy,' opposed to a Williamite or adherent of the House of Orange. The Filmerites, like Archbishop Sancroft and Dean Hickes, believed in the 'divine right of kings,' and were therefore zealous Jacobites and advocates of the political doctrine of 'Passive Obedience' or 'Non-resistance' (q.v.).

Fine of Leinster (The). Exacted for more than 500 years, and paid by more than forty kings to the king of Meath. It consisted of 3,000 cows, 3,000 hogs, 3,000 sheep, 3,000 copper caldrons, 3,000 ounces of silver, and 3,000 mantles, and was paid every second year till A.D. 963, when it was remitted. For the reason of this fine see 'Boârian . . . Tribute.'

Fines (Statute of), 4 Henry VIII. This was a renewal of the law of Edward IV., by which entails could be cut off at pleasure, and thus the great landowners were enabled to divide their estates amongst their children, bequeath them, or sell them.

Fingal. The Territory of the Fingal or White Strangers, consisting of Dublin and certain parts to the north thereof. See 'White Strangers.'

Staffa is called 'Fingal's cave;' or, more strictly speaking, the cave in the Isle of Staffa is so called.

Macpherson's Fingal was Finn, rig [king] of the Leinster Finns or Finians, who resided at a dun or fort at Almhain [Allen] in Kildare. Transferred by Macpherson to Morven in Scotland.

Finn's Fingers. Five enormous stones, each about 5 feet in height, and some 4 tons in weight, on the top of the hill of Shanthamon, in the county of Ca'van, Ireland.

Finns, the Fenni of Tacitus, and Phinni of Ptolemy, belonging to the Ugrian race or Ogres, probably of Mongolian origin. They were divided into five groups: the Finns of Finland; the Lapps; the Permian Finns; the Volga Finns; and the Ugrian Finns, to which group the Magyars [Mard'-yahs] belong.

Firbolgs (The). The remnant of the old Thracian Nemedians which returned to Ireland under the conduct of the five sons of Dela. The tribe had been driven from the island by the Fomorians, said to be African pirates, descendants of Ham. The sons of Dela, according to Irish tradition, divided the island into the five kingdoms of Leinster, Munster, Ulster, Connaught, and Meath, each of the sons being ruler of one of these principalities. The rule of these princes continued forty, or, as some say, eighty years, when they were dispossessed by the Danaans under Tuatha-na-Danaan (q.v.), a people famed for necromancy.

The Irish still call strangers 'Fawmorries (Fomorians). The Nemedians are said by chroniclers to have been descendants of Japhet, through Nemedius. Of course all this is only Bardic history. The Firbolgs were probably Belgæ, or Belgæ who migrated from Britain.

Fire and Water Interdicted. 'Aquæ et Ignis Interdictio.' The judicial form of words used to signify that the person referred to was banished from Italian soil. He might go where else he liked, but must not remain in Italy.

Fire Brigade Committee (The Metropolitan). Responsible for the management of the 700 men and the state of their 150 fire-engines, 150 fire-escapes, 150 horses, and 28 miles of hose. Since 1889 the number of fire-engines has been increased in London to 170. The whole city and county of London is divided into four districts, A, B, C, D, each district being under a separate superintendent, who is paid 195*l.* a year.

All the districts are connected by telegraphs and telephones.

The average number of fires in the metropolis is about 2,000 a year.

Fire Cross (The). See 'Fiery Cross.'

'Fire First.' 'Gentlemen of the French Guard, fire' (said Lord Charles Hay); to which the Comte d'Auteroche replied, 'Fire yourselves, gentlemen of England; we never fire first.' The battle of Fontenoy, 10 May, 1745.

Quant à moi, je tiens le mot de M. d'Auteroche, Messieurs les Anglais, tirez les premiers,' très authentique. . . . Les deux troupes sont en présence. Lord Hay crie, s'avancant hors des rangs: 'Messieurs les gardes françaises, tirez.' M. d'Auteroche alors va à sa rencontre, et le saluant de l'épée: 'Monsieur (lui dit-il), nous ne tirons jamais les premiers; tirez vous-mêmes.' —M. E. FOURNIER (an eye-witness).

Cet engagement se fit à distance si rapprochée que les officiers anglais, au moment d'arrêter leur troupe, nous saluèrent le chapeau à la main; les nôtres ayant répondu de même à cette courtoisie. . . . Lord Charles Hay sortit de son rang, et s'avança; le comte d'Auteroche, lieutenant des grenadiers, se porta alors au-devant de lui. 'Monsieur (dit le capitaine, lord Hay), faites donc tirer vos gens;' 'Non, Monsieur (répondit d'Auteroche), nous ne tirons pas les premiers;' et s'étant de nouveau salués, ils rentrèrent chacun à son rang.—L'Esprit dans l'Histoire, chap. iii. pp. 348, 349 (Paris, 1883).

Lord Charles Hay gives a different version: 'When we came within 20 or 30 paces of [the French], I advanced before our regiment, drank to them, and told them we were the English guards, and hoped they would stand still till we came up to them, and not swim across the Scheldt, as they did the Mein at Dettingen. Upon which I immediately turned about to our regiment, speeched them, and made them huzzah, I hope with a will. An officer [d'Auteroche] came out of the ranks, and tried to make his men huzzah; however, there were not above three or four of the brigade that did so.'—Letter (now in the possession of the Marquis of Tweeddale, at Yester House).

Fire of Antwerp (The), 29 July, 1588. So the Spaniards called the fire-ships sent by Drake and Hawkins into the Armada. The eight vessels, under charge of Capt. Young, ran right into the Spanish fleet in full blaze, sending forth explosion after explosion. The Spaniards, remembering the Dutch fire-ships, shouted, 'The fire of Antwerp! The fire of Antwerp!' and every vessel was put in motion to escape in the darkness as best it might. The confusion was terrible, ships running foul of each other, and escaping from Ostend to Calais. A thunderstorm, with a furious gale of wind from the south-west, added to the terrors of that terrible night.

Firman (A). A decree issued by the sultan, signed with his cipher, and sealed with his signet. Also a passport given to travellers by a pacha.

First Book of Discipline (The), 1561. A book of church polity drawn up by John Knox and five others for the use of Scotland.

First Book of Homilies (The), 1547. In which is comprised the doctrines of the Church of England, as established in the reign of Edward VI., declaring that salvation rests solely on a lively faith in the merits of Jesus Christ; and that no works without such faith are good works in a scripture sense.

First Communion Office (The), 1548. In the reformed Church of England.

First Day of the Republic (The). French history. 20 Sept., 1792. When the National Assembly at the proposal of M. d'Herbois rose en masse, and, waving their hats, shouted, 'We declare royalty in France abolished for ever.'

First English Liturgy (The), or 'Book of Common Prayer,' 1548. The Second Liturgy was in 1552. The Forty-two Articles in 1553; reduced to Thirty-nine in 1563; and modified to their present form in 1571.

First English Martyr (The), 1401. William Sawtre, rector of St. Oswyth, London, a Lollard, in the reign of Henry IV., was the first person who suffered at the stake in England for religious opinions.

There is a tradition that St. Alban fell a martyr in the persecution of Diocletian A.D. 305. The tale is that he served in the Roman army, but, having offered an asylum to Amphibălus, a Christian priest, in order to save his guest he changed dresses, and being apprehended was beheaded at Verulamium. It is said that a church was afterwards erected on the spot, and the name of the town was changed to St. Albans.

First-fruits, or 'Annats.' The first year's income of a church living paid to the pope, forbidden in 1534 (by 25 Hen. VIII. c. 20). Granted to the crown in 1534 (26 Hen. VIII. c. 3); restored to the church in 1555 (by 2, 3 Phil. & Mar. c. 4); again granted to the crown in 1559 (by 1 Eliz. c. 4); restored to the church by letters patent of Queen Anne, 3 Nov., 1703. See 'Queen Anne's Bounty.'

Abolished in France in 1438 by the 'Pragmatic Sanction,' under Charles VII.

Abolished in Ireland in 1833 (3, 4 Wm. IV. c. 37).

Ceased in Spain under Carlos V. (1519–1558).

In Germany it formed one of the Centum gravamina presented to the emperor in 1521, and the claim ceased.

When Dr. Benson in 1883 was made archbishop of Canterbury his fees amounted to 885*l.* 5*s.* The amount for this presentation has now been reduced to 281*l.* 5*s.* 6*d.*

First Gentleman of Europe. George IV. (1762, 1820–1830).

Louis d'Artois of France was so called also.

First Martyr of Liberty (The), 1770. North America. Christopher Snider, a Boston lad. Theophilus Lillie, a Boston shopkeeper, persisted in selling English goods after they were tabooed. His shop was attacked by the mob, and one of his shopmen, named Richardson, fired on the mob and killed the boy Snider, who was followed to the grave by a procession reaching a quarter of a mile, and the boy was exalted into a martyr.

First Year of Equality (The), 1792, beginning 22 Sept. The address Monsieur was abandoned, and the word Citizen substituted in its stead.

Fishing Inquiry (A). In parliamentary language means an inquiry at large; an inquiry into a given question not for the sake of solving that question, but with the hope that something may turn up.

This is what is called in the familiar language of lobbies of parliament 'a fishing inquiry.' Fishing for something to say about the matter; but you cannot get your fish if the fish will not come into your net.—W. E. GLADSTONE, Speech at Calder, 17 Nov., 1885.

Fitzwilliam Museum (The). Of books, paintings, illuminated MSS., engravings, &c. in Cambridge; to which has been added, in 1834, the Mesman collection; in 1850 eighty-three ancient marbles collected by John Disnay. In 1861 John Ruskin gave twenty-five water-colours by J. M. W. Turner, R.A.; and in 1862 Mrs. Elizabeth Ellison presented to the museum thirty pictures of modern English masters. Since then many other valuable presents have been added by different donors, and the university has purchased numerous rarities. Founded by Viscount Fitzwilliam of Trinity Hall in 1764.

Five (Council of), 1722. The Earl of Arran, the Earl of Orrery, Lord North, Lord Gower, and Atterbury bishop of Rochester. A junto constituted to bring back the Stuart dynasty after the birth of Charles Edward.

Five Acts (Sidmouth's and Castlereagh's), 1819. After the Manchester Massacre (q.v.) Lord Sidmouth brought in three bills in the House of Lords, and Lord Castlereagh two bills in the House of Commons to prevent large gatherings of a political character and political articles like those of Hone calculated to disturb the public peace. The five bills all passed, and were

(1) An Act to prevent the training of persons to the use of arms (Sidmouth).

(2) An Act to prevent and punish blasphemous and pernicious libels (Sidmouth).

(3) An Act to authorise justices of the peace to seize arms collected for riotous purposes (Sidmouth).

(4) An Act to impose stamp duties on newspapers (Castlereagh).

(5) An Act to prevent blasphemous and seditious meetings (Castlereagh).

Five Articles (The), 1559). Drawn up by Convocation at the beginning of Queen Elizabeth's reign, and forwarded by Bonner to the lord keeper to be laid before parliament. They were these: (1) The corporal presence to be maintained; (2) the elements after consecration are no longer bread and wine; (3) the mass is a propitiatory sacrifice; (4) the lawful successor of St. Peter is the supreme head of the Church; and (5) the clergy only are to settle all matters bearing on doctrine and church discipline. No notice was taken of this petition. See 'Articles.'

Five Articles of Dort (The), 1618–1619. Calvinistic views of (1) absolute predestination and election; (2) redemption only through the death of Christ; (3) original sin and human corruption; (4) conversion not of ourselves, but the gift of God; (5) the final perseverance of the saints.

In church government the Synod of Dort decidedly preferred Presbyterianism to Episcopacy.

Five Articles of Perth (The), 1618. (1) The communion shall be received kneeling, and not sitting; (2) in extreme cases the communion may be privately administered; (3) in extreme cases baptism may be privately administered; (4) young people, when advanced to a suitable age, shall be confirmed by the bishop; (5) the five following days shall be holidays—viz. Christmas Day, Good Friday, Easter Day, Ascension Day, and Pentecost. These five enactments were passed by a parliament held at Perth, in the reign of James I. of England, and were designed as the thin edge of a wedge to introduce into Scotland a form of worship similar to that of the Anglican Church.

Five Burghs of the Danes (The). Derby, Leicester, Lincoln, Nottingham, and Stamford. These five burghs were called the 'Danelagh' (Dane-Law), because they were ruled by Danish and not by English law. Recovered from the Danes in 941 by Edmund.

Five Christian Verities (The). In Catholic theology.

1. The child Jesus, conceived in the womb of the Virgin Mary, was verily and indeed the Son of God, and the second person of the Trinity.
2. This Jesus is true God, one with the Father and the Holy Ghost.
3. The two perfect natures exist in one only person. The divine nature received from God the Father, and the human nature from his mother Mary.
4. All that pertains to the person of Christ as a substance is unique; but all that pertains to his nature is double.
5. The Virgin Mary is veritably and properly the Mother of God.

(Mgr. Guérin, Vies des Saints, vol. iii. pp. 625, 626.)

Five Dolorous Mysteries (The). In Catholic theology.

1. The agony of Christ in the olive garden.
2. The scourging.
3. The crowning with thorns.
4. The burden of the cross borne to Calvary.
5. The crucifixion.

Five Glorious Mysteries (The). In Catholic theology.

1. The Resurrection.
2. The Ascension.
3. The descent of the Holy Ghost on the day of Pentecost.
4. The assumption of the Virgin, body and soul, to heaven.
5. The consummation of her glory by her triple coronation of grandeur, power, and goodness. See 'Crowns.'

Five Good Emperors (The) of Rome. They succeeded the Flavian Emperors (q.v.). They were Nerva, Trajan, Hadrian, Antonīnus Pius, and Marcus Aurēlius.

Five Hundred (The). See 'Council of 500.'

Five Hundred (The), or Les Cinq-cents, 1795. One of the two legislative councils of the 'Constitution of Year III.' in French history. Dispersed by Napoleon I. in 1799. See 'Council of 500.'

Five Hundred of Athens (The). The original number of the senate appointed by Solon was 400, a hundred for each tribe, but Klisthenês increased the number to 500. B.C. 401 the constitution of Athens was changed into an oligarchy of 500, but this state of things only lasted from March to June, when the democracy was restored.

Five Joyous Mysteries (The). In Catholic theology.

1. The annunciation and conception of the Word or Logos in the Virgin's womb.
2. The visitation and influence of grace on John the Baptist, who 'leaped in the womb.'
3. The birth in Bethlehem.
4. The purification and offering made by Mary in the temple.
5. Christ's visit to the temple at the age of twelve, when he was found by his mother among the doctors.

Five Kings (The). I. B.C. 2598–2205, preceded by the three emperors, and forming the tenth or mythic period of Chinese history. The names were Chao-hao, Chouan-hio, Ti-ko, Yao, and Shun. In the reign of Shun is placed the great flood or inundation of China. Next followed the semi-historic period.

II. In A.D. 990, five kings were simultaneously converted to Christianity—viz. Olaf king of Sweden, Harold king of Denmark, Miczyslaf sovereign of Poland, Vladimir grand-duke of Muscovy, and Geisa prince of Hungary. A European panic, that the world was coming to an end, some time between 901 and 1000, may account for the religious fervour of the times. Never were there so many kings entitled 'pious' before or since.

Five Kings of France (The). The five Directors, 1795.

The five kings of France sit in their curule chairs with their flesh-coloured breeches and regal mantles.—Atelier du Lys, ii.

Five Members of the General Assembly (The). In 1605 James I. of England asserted his right to call and dissolve the General Assembly of the Church of Scotland; but several of the Scotch clergy resisted this innovation, and five of them were punished by banishment. See 'Arrest of the Five Members' by Charles I. in 1642.

Five Mile Act (The), 17 Car. II. c. 2, A.D. 1665. This act subjected every Nonconformist minister who approached within five miles of any corporate town, or other place where he had been used to preach, to a penalty of 40*l.*, or six months' imprisonment, unless he would take the oath that 'he deemed it unlawful, under any pretext, to take up arms against the king, and that he would in no wise seek to bring about any alteration of government either in church or state.' Abolished by the 'Act of Toleration' in 1689.

The act aimed at those who had been driven from their livings by the 'Act of Uniformity,' as well as at Nonconformists.

Five Nations (The). The Iroquois, afterwards called 'The Six Nations,' q.v. See also 'Pentapŏlis,' 'History of the Five Nations' (N.Y. 1727, 1866; London 1747, 1755).

Five Orders of the Clergy (The), 3rd cent. Subdeacons, Acolyths, Exorcists, Readers, and Ostiarii, said by the Church of Rome to be apostolic institutions. The duty of sub-deacons is to wait upon the deacons in divine service. In the Roman Church there are seven, in some churches many more. Acolyths did the menial work, such as lighting the candles, carrying the sacred vessels, bread and wine, &c. Exorcists had charge of the dæmoniacs. Readers read the scriptures in that part of the service in which the catechumens were admitted. Ostiarii were the door-keepers.

Five Points (The), 1536. The five points of Calvinism are—(1) Absolute election and reprobation; (2) particular and not universal redemption; (3) the grace of God is irresistible; (4) the will is not free to choose or reject God's grace; (5) the final perseverance of the saints.

Or in brief thus: (1) Absolute election and reprobation; (2) particular redemption; (3) irresistible grace; (4) the will is not free; (5) the perseverance of the saints.

Five Propositions of the Jansenists (The). The bishops of France subscribed a letter to Pope Innocent X. in condemnation of five heretical propositions said to be contained in the 'Augustinus' of Jansenius. They are these:

1. Some of God's commandments are impossible to be kept by the righteous.
2. A man doth ever resist inward grace in the state of fallen nature.
3. In order to merit, or not merit, it is not indispensable to have a freedom of will, but only freedom from restraint.
4. The semi-Pelagians were heretics, because they maintained the necessity of an inward preventing grace.
5. It is heretical to say that Jesus Christ died for all mankind.

Five Races (Period of the), or in Chinese Woo-tae, 420–618. This period includes the 8th, 9th, 10th, 11th, and 12th imperial dynasties, called Tsong, Tsee, Lĕang, Tchin or Chin, and Swi. From 420 to 584 the empire was divided into southern and northern, the former being the imperial line. From 584 to 618 it was divided into the southern, eastern, and western empires. In 618 the three empires were united again under the Swi dynasty.

Five Sacraments (The). (1) Confirmation; (2) Penance; (3) Orders; (4) Matrimony; (5) Extreme Unction. Article XXV says 'these five are not to be counted [by the Anglican Church] for sacraments of the gospel, being such as have grown partly of the corrupt following of the apostles, partly are states of life allowed in the scriptures.'

Five Successions (Period of the), or Heehoo-Woo-tae. This includes the 14th, 15th, 16th, 17th, and 18th imperial dynasties of China, called Hehoo-Lêang, Hehoo-Tâng, Hehoo-Tsĭn, Hehoo-Hân, and Hehoo-Chew. The seat of empire was at Kai-fong-foo. It lasted from 907 to 960. During all this period the Tartars held the north of the empire. The Five Successions gave way to the Song or Tsong dynasty, called the 19th, but the Tartars continued to occupy the north. In 1206 the Monguls established themselves in the west, and Temou-gin assumed the title of Genghis Khan (i.e. supreme khan or over-lord).

Five Thousand (The), B.C. 411. A nominal distinction which included all the citizens of Athens. In contradistinction to the 500 oligarchs. It meant that Athens was to be governed by all the citizens, and not by 500 only; that its government should be democratic, and not oligarchical.

Fives Court (The). The head-quarters of the 'fancy,' during the regency. It was in the neighbourhood of the Haymarket. There was another in St. Martin's Lane. In 'fancy' slang the hand is called 'a bunch of fives.'

Flag Captain, Flag Lieutenant. A captain or lieutenant in a flag ship. A flag lieutenant in the navy is about tantamount to the aide-de-camp of a general in the army. It is his duty to see that the admiral's orders are communicated to the various ships of the squadron. See 'Flag Officers' in 'Dict. of Phrase and Fable.'

Flag of the Prophet (The), or 'Sanjak-Sheriff,' 632. The sacred banner of the Mohammedans. Originally the white turban of the Koreish, captured by Mohammed. Subsequently a green flag was substituted, being the curtain which hung before the door of Ayesha, one of the prophet's wives. It is preserved most carefully in a chapel of the seraglio, and watched over by several emirs.

Flags (Modern National).

America, field with seven red and six white stripes, and a blue canton with stars. 'Stars and Stripes.'

Austria, red, white, and red (horizontally). A shield and crown in the white stripe.

Belgium, black (next the staff), yellow, and red (vertically disposed). A device in the yellow stripe.

Denmark, a red field, with a white cross cutting it into quarters.

France, blue (next the staff), white, and red (vertically disposed).

Greece, a blue field with a white cross in the canton, and four white stripes.

Holland, red, white, and blue (horizontally disposed).

Mexico, a white flag with a black spread eagle, holding in its beak a green serpent.

Norway, a red flag, quartered by blue and yellow stripes, and the first quarter crossed.

Portugal, blue and white, vertically disposed (blue next the staff). Shield and crown in the centre.

Prussia, a white flag with a black eagle and a small black Maltese cross in the top corner next the staff.

Russia, a white flag with two blue stripes running from corner to corner like a St. Andrew's cross.

Spain, red, yellow, and red (horizontally disposed).

Sweden, a blue flag, quartered with yellow stripes. In the first quarter several crosses.

Switzerland, a red flag with a white cross in the centre.

Turkey, a red flag with a silver crescent and star with eight points.

Venezuela, yellow, blue, and red (horizontally). A device in the yellow stripe.

See 'Standards,' and 'Black Flag,' 'Red Flag,' 'White Flag,' 'Yellow Flag.'

Flagellants. Fanatics who appeared at sundry times in Europe, and marched about in procession along the streets and public roads to appease the wrath of God. They marched two and two, singing dolorous hymns, mingled with groans; and every now and then stopped to whip each other with scourges to 'atone for the sins of the people.' They first appeared in the 11th cent. under St. Peter Damian. Again in 1268, when Reinier, a Dominican, formed them into a sect. Again in 1349, when Germany was attacked with the pestilence, called the Black Death (q.v.). Again in 1574, when Henri III. of France joined the sect. They still exist in Italy, France, Mexico, and New Mexico, but their number is small.

The Flagellants were naked to the waist, but on march threw over their shoulders a white cloak, hence they were called 'Blancs-battus.' They threw off the cloak when the scourging began, and insisted that 'Without shedding of blood there was no remission.' They called themselves the Brotherhood of the Cross (q.v.), and wore a cross on their breast, another on their back, and a third on their hat.

Black Flagellants were so called from their black masks.

Blue Flagellants were so called from their blue mantles.

White Flagellants were so called from their white mantles. See 'Blanes-battus.'

Flamin'ian Way (The). The great high road made by Flaminius, the Censor, from Rome, through the Sabine country to Ariminium, B.C. 220.

Flammock's Rebellion, 1495, in behalf of Perkin Warbeck. The most formidable danger which ever threatened the throne of Henry VII. The rebellion was crushed out by the king's artillery at Blackheath. Thomas Flammock, the leader, was hanged at Tyburn in 1497.

Flanders. In 862 erected into a county under Baldwin 'Bras-de-Fer,' continued to 1119. Then follow Charles I. of Denmark, 1119–1127, and William Clinton of Normandy, 1127–1128.

The dynasty of Alsace and Hainault, 1128–1405.

The dynasty of the dukes of Burgundy, 1405–1482.

The Austrian dynasty, 1482–1506.

Charles Quint in 1659 incorporated it with the seventeen provinces called 'The Circle of Burgundy.' Since 1830 it has belonged to Belgium.

Flanders Mare (A Great). So Henry VIII. called Anne of Cleves, who was married to him by deputy, and separated by mutual agreement. Born 1515, married 6 Jan., and divorced 12 July, 1540, died at Chelsea 1557, aged 42.

Fla'via Cæsarien'sis. One of the five provinces into which Britain was divided in the reign of Severus. It consisted of the western portion of the island. It had a separate ruler, but that ruler was subject to the prefect, or governor-general, of the island.

Flavian Emperors (The) of Rome. The successors of the Cæsars, of whom Nero was the last. After a year of anarchy, order was restored by Titus Flavius Vespasian, who gave his name of Flavian to the new dynasty, which consisted of Vespasian, Titus, and Domitian, the 12th emperor. See 'Five Good Emperors.'

Flaxman Gallery (The). A collection of some 140 plaster casts modelled by John Flaxman, R.A., and presented by Miss Denman to the council of University College, London.

Fleet Marriages. Fictitious, clandestine, or irregular marriages, in the 17th and 18th cents., solemnised without banns or licence in the Fleet chapel, or in some 'marriage-room,' dignified for the nonce with the name of chapel, generally some tavern. These marriages were performed by disreputable parsons who lived in the purlieus of Fleet Prison, which were not under the jurisdiction of the bishop. They were declared illegal by Lord-Chancellor Hardwicke's Act, which came into operation 26 March, 1754.

March 25, the day before these marriages became illegal, as many as 217 marriages were celebrated and entered in one of the Fleet register books.

Fleet Prison. A metropolitan prison abolished in 1842, and pulled down in 1845. It was situated on the side of the river Fleet, and was used for persons committed by the Ecclesiastical Courts, the Court of Equity, the Exchequer Court, and the Common Pleas.

It was burnt by Wat Tyler in the reign of Richard II., 1381; again in the great Fire 1666; and again in the Gordon Riots 1780.

Flemish Painters.

Called	Name
Albrecht Dürer	. . . .	1471–1528
Lucas van Leyden	(Lucas Dammesz)	1494–1533

Snyders (1579–1657) the great animal painter was contemporary with Rubens.

Fleshly School (The), 1871. A school of English poetry, of which the chief exponents are D. G. Rossetti, Swinburne, Whitman, and Baudelaire. It means sensuous, voluptuous, amorous poetry, 'verging on nastiness.' The term was given to this school of writers by Robert Buchanan in the 'Contemporary Review,' Oct. 1871.

Fleur-de-lis (The), or 'Lily of France,' first adopted by Louis VII. le Jeune (1120, 1137–1180) as a symbol of the French monarchy. The royal standard was thickly charged with the flower, but Charles VI. (1380–1422) reduced the number to three. The nature of the emblem is uncertain. Some think it is a bee, the emblem of the early kings—Clovis and his successors. Some fancy it is a toad or frog, whence Nostradamus calls the French crapauds. Some think it is the flower of the reed placed in the hands of Christ by the soldiers when they crowned him with a diadem of thorns. And some think it is an emblem of the Trinity, 'tria juncta in uno,' which probably is the basis of the symbol.

Some heralds tell us that when the Franks chose a king they raised him on their shields, and placed a reed, for sceptre, in his hand; hence the ancient kings are represented holding a fleur-de-lis.

Flight into Egypt (The), 14 Jan. The flight of the Holy Family from Bethlehem to Egypt, in order to escape the slaughter of the Innocents about to take place under the orders of Herod the Great.

Flint Jack. A notable forger of prehistoric implements.

Floating Debt. Government loans not funded, but to be paid off in full at a stated time. If the government is unable to meet the demand, the floating debt, or such part of it as cannot be met, is converted into funded debt—that is, a debt on which interest is paid by government either for a fixed term of years or for ever. The former is called terminable annuities, and the latter perpetual annuities.

Flogged by Deputy. When Henri IV. of France abjured, and was received into the Catholic Church in 1595, two ambassadors were sent to Rome to do penance for him. They knelt in the portico of St. Peter's and sang the 'Miserēre,' a blow being given on their shoulders with a switch at each verse.

Lesage, in his 'Gil Blas' (v. 1) makes Raphael the deputy of the marquis's son; but Raphael, not seeing the justice of the substitution, ran away. Strange as it may seem, yet is it sanctioned by both God and man. Thus for the sin of David thousands of his subjects were 'scourged' by a plague. And what else is the entail of Adam's disobedience?

N.B. Flogging in both services was abolished in England in 1882.

Floral Games of Toulouse (The), 1 May, 1322. A literary contest instituted at Toulouse for the encouragement of poetry. The prizes consisted of flowers made of gold or silver, chiefly the violet, eglantine, marigold, amaranth, and lily. The poets who belonged to the institution were called 'The college of the gay science.' The games still exist, and the prizes are given away every year on 3 May.

Florentine Diamond (The). Weighs 139½ carats, and is among the crown jewels of the Emperor of Austria. It has a slight citron tint, and is valued at 105,000*l*. It belonged to Charles the Bold, and after the battle of Granson was picked up by a Swiss, who thought it was a bit of glass, and sold it to a priest for a gulden. The priest sold it for 3 francs, and it was next bought for 200*l*. by Bartholomew May, a merchant who lived in Berne. May sold it to a Genoese for a large sum of money; Ludovico Sforza bought it of the Genoese for double what he had given; it then came into the possession of Pope Julius II., and Pope Julius presented it to the Emperor of Austria.

Flores Historia'rum, or 'Flowers of History,' by Matthew Paris, is in reality the work of Wendover continued by Matthew Paris. It begins at creation and goes down to 1238. Matthew Paris brought it down to 1259, and William Rishanger continued it still further.

Florid or Perpendicular Style. Succeeded the Decorated English in the 14th cent., as the Decorated had succeeded the Early English or Lancet style in the 13th cent. The Florid style is so called from its profusion of ornamental detail. It is called Perpendicular from the perpendicular mullions of the windows, the lines of the panel-work, and the Tudor arch. One of the finest specimens is Henry VII.'s Chapel, Westminster. Its best period was between 1375 and 1598.

The Tudor arch was four-centred. St. George's Chapel, Windsor, and the nave of Canterbury Cathedral are good specimens of this style of architecture.

Florida (U.S. North America). So called by Juan Ponce de Leon, in 1512, because it was discovered on Palm Sunday, called in Spanish '[Pascua] Florida.' The nickname of the inhabitants in this state is Fly-up-the-Creeks.

Flower Badges. Of Families.

Blue cornflower, the badge of William king of Prussia.

Erica cinerĕa, the five-leaved heath, the badge of the Macalisters.

Erica Tetrălix, the cross-leaved heath, the badge of the Macdonalds.

Genista, the badge of the Plantagenets.

Primrose, the badge of the Primrose League, in honour of Lord Beaconsfield.

Rose (red), the badge of the Lancastrians.

Rose (white), the badge of the Yorkists.

Violet, the badge of Napoleon and the French imperialists.

Wild Strawberry, the badge of the Frasers.

Flower Badges. Of Nations.

Athens	The Violet.
Canada	Sugar-maple.
England	Red Rose.
Florence	Giglio (Lily).
France	Iris Lily.
Ireland	Shamrock-leaf.
Prussia	Linden.
Saxony	Mignonette.
Scotland	Thistle.
Wales	Leek-leaf.

As in England the Lancastrian badge was a red rose, and the Yorkist a white one, so in Florence the Guelfs (or papal party) adopted the red lily, and the Ghibellines (or imperial party) a white one.

Flower Symbols. Of Moral qualities.

The amaranth, cypress, laurel, myrtle, oak, olive, asphodel, and rosemary are funereal plants.

Flower of the Levant (The). 'Il fiore di Levante,' Zantê.

Flower of the Sun (The). The Elixir of Life. The alchemists called all sorts of flocculent substances obtained by distillation flower, hence we have 'flowers of sulphur,' 'flowers of benzoin.' The flower of the sun was a bright ruby stone called the 'philosopher's stone.'

> He that has once the 'Flower of the Sun,'
> The perfect ruby which we call elixir,
> Can confer honour, love, respect, long life;
> Give safety, valour, yea, and victory
> To whom he will. In eight-and-twenty days
> He'll make an old man of four score a child.
> BEN JONSON, The Alchymist, ii. 1.

Flower-pot Plot (The), 1692. An infamous imposition got up by Young and Blackhead, who hoped to make money by it, like Titus Oates. These villains wrote an engagement to bring back James II. and seize William. Having forged the signatures of Marlborough, Cornbury, Sancroft (the exprimate), and Sprat bishop of Rochester, they secreted the document in a flower-pot at the bishop's house at Bromley. The bishop was arrested, but denied all knowledge of the plot, and then Blackhead confessed the forgery.

Flower Sermon (The), May 1851. Established by W. M. Whittemore, D.D., rector of the united parishes of St. Katherine Cree and St. James. It is usual to present nosegays, which are then sent to hospitals.

Flowers. According to Herrick the ancient inhabitants of this island used to adorn their houses all the year round with green boughs. At Christmas with bay, rosemary, and mistletoe, up to Candlemas day (2 Feb.); from Candlemas to Easter with box; at Easter with yew; at Whitsuntide with birch and flowers, oaken boughs, and bent (a kind of grass).

Flowers dedicated to Saints.

Baneberry to ... ... St. Christopher.
Bean (the common) to St. Ignatius.
Corn-feverfew to ... St. Anne.
Spider-wort to ... St. Bruno.
Toy-wort to the shepherds, for their purses.
Valerian (blue) to Jacob, for his angels' ladder.

Flowers referring to Saints.

Briony (black) ... ... Our Lady's seal.
Clematis ... ... The Virgin's bower.
Hyacinth (blue) ... St. Dorothy's tears.
Lily of the Valley ... Madonna's tears.
Oleander ... ... St. Joseph's nosegay.

Flowery Kingdom (The). China.

Flowery Land (The), or 'Hwa Kwoh.' China; meaning the 'flower of the world.' Certainly no land is more productive.

It justifies the long-existent and always increasing hope of foreigners that the Flowery Land would eventually adopt this most speedy and effectual mode of locomotion.—FUNG YEE, Nineteenth Century, Feb. 1880, p. 225.

Flowery Land Pirates (The), 1864. 'The Flowery Land' was the name of the pirates' cutter. The captain, the mate, and several others were murdered in the passage from London to Singapore. Five Spaniards were publicly executed at Newgate for this outrage.

Fly (Killed by a). Adrian IV., the only Englishman who has been pope. He was Nicholas Breakspeare of Langley, and succeeded to the papal throne in 1151; died, being choked by a fly, in 1159.

Flying Company (The), 1561. Chosen troops of 100 musketeers for constant service, destined to act in defence of the Vaudois at any point where an attack was threatened by their Catholic persecutors. Two pastors always attended the 'company.'

Flying Dutchman (The), 1806, or 'Ship of Doom.' The reflection of a vessel off the Cape of Good Hope, occasionally seen at a considerable distance, and regarded by sailors with superstitious terror. The tale is that this mirage is the ship of Vanderdecken, who in 1806 tried in vain to enter Table Bay, and swore he would do so, if he 'beat about the Cape till the day of doom.' Out of punishment his ship and crew were turned into phantoms, 'beating about the bay,' and bringing evil to all who view the vessel.

Flying Highwayman (The). Richard (Dick) Turpin, 1711–1739. To-day in town, to-morrow at York, the next day at Chester, 'an alibi personified.' Hanged at York 1739.

Flying Roll (The), 1175. A book compiled by James Jershom White from the writings of Joanna Southcott and John Wroe. It is a jumble of texts from Genesis to Revelation, supposed to have a meaning known only to the initiated.

Flying Squadron (The), 1705. Those members of the Scotch Parliament who professed to act independently, but sought their own ends by joining one of the other two parties (Jacobites and revolutionists) as suited them. Their leader was the Marquis of Tweeddale.

Fo, or Foë. The founder of a religious system in China which may be called Buddhism, or reformed Brahmanism. His birth is placed B.C. 1027. He taught as his fundamental principles truth and altruism, to take the life of no living creature, to abstain from wine, not to steal or covet, to keep the body in chastity and temperance, and to believe in a future state. The priests are called 'Bonzes,' and live in monasteries.

The orthodox or state religion of China is Confucianism (Yu); and there is a third system called Taoism, or rationalism.

Fodrum Rega'le (3 syl.). Certain customary supplies of provisions, at the expense of the city where the German emperor resided when he visited Italy. See Hallam, 'Middle Ages,' vol. i. p. 346.

Folio (Tom). Thomas Rawlinson, a bibliophilist, who flourished 1681–1725.

Folk Mote. The Court of the Hundred in Saxon England. It was held once a month, and was presided over by the alderman and bishop of the diocese. This mote was superior to the Hall Mote and inferior to the Shire Mote.

In the Folk Mote all contracts for the sale of land were made; and such crimes were tried as could not be judged by the lord of a tithing or town.

Folkungs (The). A race of administrators in Sweden, somewhat like the French 'Mayors of the Palace.' They called themselves Jarls, and were in power from 1250 to 1387, when the regency of Sweden was given to Margaret, queen regent of Denmark and Norway. In 1397 by the 'Union of Calmar' the three kingdoms were nominally united in Eric, grand-nephew of Margaret; but Sweden had separate administrators from 1471 to 1523, when Gustavus broke from Denmark, and erected Sweden into an independent kingdom.

Folkungs of Norway (The), from 1319 to 1387. Like the Folkungs of Sweden these rulers were not kings, but resembled the 'Mayors of the Palace' in French history. The Norwegian Folkungs were Magnus VIII., also Folkung of Sweden (1319–1350), Hako VIII. (1350–1380), and Olaf V. (1380–1387).

Folly of Spain (The), or 'Folies d'Espagne.' A lively dance tune. The dancers used castanets. The measure was à trois temps, and the movement moderately fast.

Fomo'rians (The). According to Keating (p. 116), the original owners of Ireland. They supported themselves by fishing and fowling. When Parthoian and his four sons, some 2,200 years before the Christian era, visited Ireland, these Fomorians were found in the island. It is said they were an Iberian or Basque colony. Moore, in his 'History of Ireland,' calls the Fomorians 'African sea-rovers, who infested the coasts of Ireland after the extirpation of Partholan's race.' He says they stamped out the Nemedians, held the island for 200 years, and were succeeded by the Firbolgs. Of course, this is only 'bardic history,' but the storming of Tor Innis by the Nemedians is the subject of a very famous Irish poem.

Fondation Montyon (La), 1825. Founded by J. B. Robert Auget baron de Montyon, who gave 5 million francs aux convalescents sortant des hôpitaux de Paris, qui auraient le plus besoin de secours. The money was invested, and brings an annual interest of 10,000*l.* sterling. Everyone who has been in a hospital for five days receives 1 franc, and the bounty rises to 25 francs.

Pronounce, Lah fonc dah'-se-on Mon-te'-yone.

Fondeurs, or 'Clippers.' Bands of robbers which disturbed France in the unsettled times of Charles VI. and VII. They were often accompanied by the écorcheurs and other vagabonds.

Fontainebleau (Treaties of).
(1) 1542. A treaty of alliance between François I. and Gustavus Vasa.
(2) 2 Sept., 1679. A treaty of peace between France, Denmark, and Sweden.
(3) 10 Nov., 1785. A treaty of peace between Austria and Holland, by the mediation of France.
(4) 27 Oct., 1807. A secret treaty between Napoleon I. and Carlos IV. of Spain, for the deposition of the House of Braganza for refusing to accept the 'Continental System.' By this compact, Portugal was partitioned between the Prince of Asturias and a young libertine named Godoy, chief minister of Spain.

In 1640, Portugal threw off the Spanish yoke and recalled the Duke of Braganza. The concordat between Napoleon and Pius VII. at Fontainebleau took place 25 Jan., 1813.

Fontanges (À la). A style of head-dress in the reign of Louis XIV., in which long streaming ribbons were introduced. Mlle. Fontanges (2 syl.) was maid of honour to Mme. de Montespan, and was a court favourite for a few months; but she died at the age of 20.

Fontenoy (Battle of). See 'Fire First.'

Fonthill Abbey. Was commenced by Beckford in 1795, and sold by him in 1822.

Foolish. More foolish than Abu Gabshan. An Arabian proverb. Kofa made Abu Gabshan intoxicated, and induced him to deliver up the keys of the temple of the Kaaba. When he grew sober he saw the full evil of his folly, but it was too late. The tribe of Khozaab, which had been in possession of Mecca and its temple, were deprived of both by the Koreish, who retained possession till the time of Mahomet.

Fools (Last of the titled) of France was L'Angély (1620–1679), court fool of Louis XIII. He was of good family, but very poor. His satire was so caustic that he grew rich by the blackmail given him to purchase exemption from his sallies.

Armstrong, court jester to James I. and Charles I., was the last of the titled fools in England. He died 1672.

Fools' Fair, 14 Sept. Held in the Broad Gate, Lincoln, for the sale of cattle. Licensed by William and Mary. Called 'Fools' Fair' because the time is so unsuitable for the purpose. Being harvest time, very few can attend it, and Lincoln at the time had no special trade or manufacture. See 'Fête des Fous.'

Fool's-cap Livery (The), 1568. A badge livery adopted by the Calvinists of the Netherlands to show their contempt and abhorrence for Cardinal Granvelle, a pompous, arrogant, bigoted churchman, sent by Philip II. of Spain to introduce Roman Catholicism into Holland and stamp out Calvinism. A party of young nobles, to show their contempt for this churchman, assumed a dress in ridicule of the cardinal's finery. It was something like that of a poor monk, of the coarsest grey cloth, without any ornament except that of a fool's cap and bells embroidered on the sleeves. This was in allusion to the cardinal's custom of calling the Flemings 'fools.' In a few days all the Flemings assumed the new livery.

Foolscap Paper. The smallest folio-sized paper. It used to have the royal arms in the water-mark, but the Rump Parliament ordered the watermark to be changed for a fool's cap and bells. There seems to be a pun in the device from the Italian foglio capo (chief or full-sized sheet of paper).

Foot of a Fine (The). The fifth or last part of a fine, containing all the matter, the day, year, and place, and before what justices the fine was levied. A corruption of the old French la pée or la pés = paix. After proclaiming the fine in the Common Pleas, the justice said, 'Criez la pees' (i.e. Proclaim the peace), and the serjeant read the concord or agreement between the parties. The foot of the fine is, therefore, the paix or final agreement as stated by the countor or serjeant.

Foot-page, or 'Foot-bearer.' An attendant in olden times whose duty it was to squat under the table of kings and other great men, and keep his master's feet warm, by rubbing them with his hands, nursing them in his lap, and even cherishing them in his bosom.

> The foot-bearer shall hold the feet of the king in his lap, from the time he [the king] reclines at the board till he goes to rest; and he [the foot-page] shall chafe them with a towel, and during all that time shall watch that no harm befalls the king. He shall eat of the same dish from which the king takes his food; and shall light the first candle before the king.—SOUTHEY, Madoc (note).

Fops' Alley. A railed-off passage in front of the pit of the Italian opera-house, where dandies lounged who thought their figures showed more to advantage in a standing posture than in a sitting one. They wagged their chapeaux bras, and dropped their canes, and hallooed to their friends in the boxes, being thus an intolerable nuisance.

Forbes Mackenzie Act (The), 1853. For the regulation of public-houses in Scotland (16, 17 Vict. c. 67). Its object was to prevent grocers from being secret publicans for no liquor is to be drunk on the premises where groceries are sold. No liquor is to be sent out from any hotel or inn on Sundays before six in the morning, nor after eleven at night. Some grace was allowed to travellers journeying either on pleasure or business.

Foreign Canons. Such as did not officiate in the canonries to which they were attached. They were the non-residentiary canons.

Foreign Enlistment Acts (The). In 1605 British subjects were prohibited from entering foreign service (3 Jac. I. c. 4, s. 18). In 1835 the prohibition was suspended by order in council.

> The enlistment of foreigners into the British service was permitted in 1854 (18 Vict. c. 2).

Foreigners' Friend (The). Dermot king of Leinster, who brought over English and Welsh allies to assist him in regaining his throne, from which he had been driven by Tiernan O'Ruarc, lord of Breffny, in 1168.

Forest Cantons of Switzerland (The), or the 'Waldstetten,' that is, Schwitz, Uri, and Unterwalden.

Forester (Fanny). The pen-name of Emily Judson (Chubbock), an American author.

Forester (Frank). The pen-name of Henry William Herbert, an English-born American author.

Forfeiture and Corruption of Blood. A law which existed before the Conquest, that a man guilty of treason forfeits his estates to the crown, and can transmit no title of dignity to his heirs.

> In America the law of 'Corruption of Blood' cannot exist, for there are no titles of dignity transmittable.

Forgeries (Literary). See under 'Literary Forgeries.'

Fork-Beard. Sueno (Swe-no) king of Denmark (985–1014).

> He exacted the tribute called Danegeld, and in 1013 was crowned king of England. Tyfve-skeg or Fork-Beard was succeeded by his son Canute.

Form of the Beads (The), 1538. Certain instructions for praying drawn up by Browne, archbishop of Dublin.

Forma Pau'peris (In). By statutes passed in the reigns of Henry VII. and VIII., if a plaintiff swore he was not worth 5*l.* beyond the clothes he was wearing, he had counsel and attorney assigned him by the court gratuitously, and all court-fees were excused him.

Formula of Concord (The), or 'Consensus,' 1576. Drawn up at Torgau; suppressed at Brandenburg in 1614; republished in Switzerland in 1675.

> Torgau, pronounce Tor-gow.

Formulary, or 'Formula.' I. 1653. In which Innocent X. condemned the five propositions of Jansen taught in his famous book entitled 'Augustinus' (q.v.). He commanded the Jansenists to subscribe to it, but they refused to do so.

II. The formulary of 1665, in which Alexander VII. confirmed the formulary of Innocent X. The Jansenists still refused subscription. In 1668 Pope Clement, to prevent a schism, withdrew the formulary, and this is called the 'Peace of Clement IX.'

Fort Adjutant (A). A staff-officer in command of a fortress. They have an extra pay of 4*s.* 9*d.* daily.

Forties (The), 1826. The forty shilling franchise of Ireland, repealed 1829. See 'Forty-shilling Freeholders.'

Mr. O'Connell at the head of the priests and the 'Forties' was declared by the sheriff duly elected. —Howitt, Hist. of Eng., year 1828, p. 117.

Mr. O'Connell had repeatedly declared that he would not accept emancipation if the faithful 'Forties' were to be sacrificed. He would rather die on the scaffold than submit to such a measure. —Ibid. year 1829, p.142.

Fortification (Permanent). The art of shutting in a circumscribed piece of ground, or a city, by defensive masses of earth and ditches, to resist the attacks of an enemy. Every plot of ground so fortified is supposed to be surrounded by a polygon of fortification, and the works constructed on any one side of this polygon constitute a front of fortification. The great mass of earth thrown up from the ditch inwards is the rampart; and the covering shot-proof mass of earth on the outer edge of the rampart is the parapet. The step of earth behind the parapet (about a foot high) is called the banquette.

A rampart is about 7½ feet high.

Fortunate (The). So Philippe VI. de Valois was called, but his whole reign was a series of calamities. In this reign the French lost the battles of Sluys (Slu'iz) and Crécy.

The French have been singularly unhappy in their royal 'pet' names.

Forty. This number is very conspicuous in the Bible and Christian Church.

1. It rained forty days and forty nights in the Flood.—Gen. vii. 12.
2. Moses twice fasted for forty days and forty nights.—Exod. xxiv. 18, &c.
3. The spies sent to Canaan were forty days in searching the land.—Num. xiii. 25.
4. The Israelites wandered forty years in the wilderness.—Ps. xcv. 10.
5. Goliath defied the armies of Saul for forty days.—1 Sam. xvii. 16.
6. Elijah fasted forty days.—1 Kings xix. 8.
7. Ezekiel bore the iniquities of the house of Jacob forty days, a day for a year.
8. Jonah cried to the Ninevites, 'Yet forty days and Nineveh shall be overthrown.'—Jonah iii. 4.
9. Jesus fasted and was tempted forty days in the wilderness.—Matt. iv. 2.
10. Jesus tarried on earth forty days after his resurrection.—Acts i. 3.
11. Jerusalem was destroyed by Titus forty years after the Ascension.
12. According to Church tradition Jesus was forty hours in the tomb.
13. The Lenten Fast continues for forty days, from Ash Wednesday to Easter Sunday. Introduced into England by order of Æbbald king of Kent, A.D. 640.
14. One of the saints of the Catholic Church is called 'Quadragesimus,' said to have been a shepherd, and under-deacon of Pavia. His day is 26th Oct.
15. St. Swithin's days of rain are forty.
16. The Jews were forbidden to inflict more than forty stripes on an offender.
17. The martyrdom. See 'Forty Martyrs.'

Forty (The). I. 'I Quarantia.' A council of state, in Venice, between the Six Sages and 450 representatives, of whose origin and positive duties very little is known. It was a permanent body, which seems to have represented the chief families of Venice, and exercised criminal justice. In the best days the doge had a Council of Six, to which every bill was first submitted. The Six sent it to the Forty, or council of state, and then it was sent to the legislative assembly, consisting of 450 representatives.

The 40 electors of the doge were in 1249 increased to 41 to prevent an equal division. The nomination of these electors was very complex. The Grand Council first selected 30, who were reduced by ballot to 9. These 9 nominated 40, who were reduced by ballot to 12. These 12 elected 25, who were reduced by ballot to 9. These 9 elected 45, who were reduced by ballot to 11. These 11 elected the 41 electors, and the 41 electors chose the doge out of the Grand Council.

II. Besides the council of state in Venice, there were three tribunals, each of which was composed of forty members. (1) The tribunal of appeal from the city magistrates; (2) Another tribunal of appeal from the suburban magistrates; and (3) a high court of assize which took cognisance of all criminal offences except treason.

III. The Académie Française, founded by Richelieu in 1635, consists of forty members, neither more nor less. Its original intention was to fix and purify the French language. Membership is now the highest literary distinction which the nation can bestow.

The election of the 'head administrator' of the Théâtre Français to a seat among the 'Forty' of the Académie is, after the lapse of 200 years, in atonement for the non-election of the founder himself [M. Clarette elected 22 Feb. 1889].—Nineteenth Century, July 1889, p. 68.

IV. The English Academicians are called 'The Forty.'

Mr. Faed lacked not backers all the way up and down among the 'Forty,' and Sir Frederick's threat of resignation had no terrors.—Truth, 13 Jan., 1887.

V. One of the inferior courts of Athens consisted of 40 magistrates (οἱ τεσσαράκοντα), who went on circuit to settle controversies about money, actions of assault and battery, and neglect in attending the public assemblies.

Forty Columns (The), or 'Chihel Sutun.' A lofty erection still existing, but in a somewhat dilapidated condition, in 41° N. lat., on the route of the caravans from Bokha'ra to China (HEEREN, 'Asiatic Nations,' vol. iii. p. 389).

This is the 'Stone Tower' of Ptolemy.—Geographia, bk. i., ch. 12.

'Forty-five (The). The rising which took place in Scotland in 1745. It was an attempt on the part of Prince Charles Edward Stuart to regain the throne of James II. Lewis Gordon, brother of the Duke of Gordon, was one of the adherents.

'Forty-five (Out in the). One of the Jacobites who had taken part in the rebellion of 1745, when the anti-Hanoverian furore ran very high not only in the Highlands of Scotland, but also in England.

He designated the rebellion of 1745 as the affair of 45; and spoke of one engaged in it as a person who had been out in the forty-five.—Sir W. SCOTT, Redgauntlet.

In the 'forty-five, that is, concerned or involved in the rebellion of 1745.

I suffered in the forty-five.—Ib. ch. x.

An old 'forty-five man, one formerly concerned in the rebellion of 1745.—Ib.

Forty-hour Prayers, 1560. Made before the 'saint sacrement' in the times of public calamities, jubilees, 'les jours gras,' and so on. At one time they lasted forty hours without interruption, because Christ was 'forty hours in the tomb.' Indulgences were granted by Pius IV. to those who observed these prières de quarante heures.

Forty Martyrs (The), 320. The martyrs of the famous Thundering Legion, condemned to death by Agricolaus for refusing to offer sacrifice at Sebasté, in Lesser Armenia, in obedience to their commander Licinius. It is said that they were exposed naked on the surface of a pond frozen over, and St. Basil tells us that they lay there for three days, and all their limbs were mortified by the cold (St. Basil, 'Homily' 20, vol. i. p. 452).

Forty-nine Men, or 'The Forty-nine Officers.' Protestant royalist officers who had served Charles I. in Ireland before 1649. These officers by a declaration of Charles II. were to receive their arrears in lands at the rate of 12*s.* 6*d.* in the pound, and an equal dividend of whatever should remain of their security.

Forty-shilling Freeholders (The Irish), 1826. Men entitled to the elective franchise who swore that their tenement was equal to them in value to 40*s.* a year. A hut and small potato plot were sufficient to give a vote. In order to multiply votes farms were cut up into small holdings, whereby a large constituency was created scarcely removed from actual pauperism, and almost entirely under the command of the parish priest. Repealed 1829 (10 Geo. IV. c. 8), after the Bill for the Emancipation of Catholics had passed.

Till 1429 universal suffrage prevailed, but votes were then confined to 40*s.* freeholders in the counties, and the qualification of a county member was the possession of a freehold worth 40*l.* a year, equal to 400*l.* at the present time.

Forty-times Forty Churches (The City of), Moscow.

Forty-two Articles (The), 1552, 1553. The original number of the Articles of the Church of England. In 1562 seven were omitted, and the number was reduced to thirty-nine by the substitution of four new articles.

THE ARTICLES OMITTED.

1. (Art. x.) Of Grace. No man is constrained to sin.

2. (Art. xvi.) Of Blasphemy against the Holy Ghost. That is, perversion of 'God's Word,' or malignant opposition to it.

3. (Art. xix.) All men bound to keep the moral law.

4. (Art. xxxix.) The resurrection of the dead is not past.

5. (Art. xl.) The soul does neither sleep nor perish with the body.

6. (Art. xli.) Of the millenarians. Declaring the dogma a fable derived from Jewish tradition.

7. (Art. xlii.) Not all men will be saved.

The new articles are the v., xii., xxix., and xxx.

Foss of Ma'rius (The), B.C. 103. A canal cut by the soldiers of Marius when encamped against the Cimbrians. It ran from the rear of his camp on the right bank of the Rhône to the coast. Its object was to secure ready access to the sea.

Foujdarry Court (The). In India, the court of criminal law. The 'foujdar' is a magistrate of police who takes cognisance of criminal matters.

Foul Raid (The), 1417. The dishonourable inroad; referring to the raid of the Regent Albany on Roxburgh Castle and the town of Berwick while Henry V. was in France. The Dukes of Exeter and Bedford, with an English army, compelled Albany to raise both the sieges.

The Duke of Albany was prime minister of Scotland to Robert I., Robert II., and James I. (fifty years); he was above eighty at his death (1419).

Foul-weather Jack. The Hon. John Byron, admiral and navigator, who was noted for the tempestuous weather which pursued him in all his voyages (1723–1786).

Founder of Christian Eloquence (The). Bourdaloue (1632–1704), unrivalled for argument, method, and depth of thought. His 'Lent Sermons' are the best known of his works.

Founders of Religious Orders.

Foundling Hospital (The). London, 1739. Founded by Capt. Coram.

One established at Milan in 787.
" " at Paris in 1640.
" " at Stockholm in 1753 by the Freemasons.

Four Ancient Books of Wales (The). 'The Black Book of Carmarthen,' 'The Book of Aneurin,' 'The Book of Taliesin,' and the poetical portion of 'The Red Book of Hergest' (q.v.). It was published in 1868, with an English translation, by the Rev. Canon Williams and the Rev. D. Silvan Evans.

Four Articles (The). Drawn up by Bossuet in the reign of Louis XIV.

1. The ecclesiastical power shall be subordinate to the civil power in France.
2. The decision of a general council shall supersede the dictum of a pope.
3. The church shall at all times conform to local usages and municipal laws.
4. The judgment of the pope even in matters of faith shall not be binding unless ratified by a general council. See 'Articles.'

Four Attributes of Glorified Bodies (The). In Catholic theology: Subtlety, agility, luminosity, and immortality (Mgr. GUÉRIN, 'Vies des Saints,' vol. ix. p. 559).

Four Burghs (The). Edinburgh, Stirling, Berwick, and Roxburgh; noted for their 'Court of the Four Burghs,' superseded by the 'Convention of Royal Burghs,' 1487.

Four Cardinal Virtues (The). In Catholic theology: Fortitude, justice, prudence, and temperance.

Four Credenze (The). After the treaty of Constance (q.v.), 1183, Frederick Barbarossa introduced a podesta or dictator into Milan, not a native, and under him were four estates or credenze: (1) the old consuls and their officers; (2) the capitani or higher nobles, with the archbishop of Milan at their head; (3) the popolani or burghers; and (4) the valvassori or inferior nobles. Soon these four estates practically resolved themselves into the aristocracy and proletariat or popolani.

Four Creeds (The). Of the Catholic Church of Rome: The Apostles' Creed, the Nicene Creed, the Athanasian Creed, and the Creed of Pius V.

Four Days' Battle (The), 1-4 June, 1665. Between the English fleet under the joint command of Prince Rupert and the Duke of Albemarle, and the Dutch fleet under the command of De Ruyter and De Witt off the North Foreland. The English lost ten ships and 1,700 men killed and wounded; the Dutch lost two admirals, seven captains, and 1,800 men, with fifteen vessels of all sorts. The Dutch claimed the victory, and without doubt had the advantage.

Four Hundred (The), B.C. 411. The oligarchical legislature of Athens. This body formed an irresponsible government, and held its sittings in the senate house. In four months the constitution of the 400 was overthrown, and the government placed in the hands of 5,000 citizens instead of the entire male population.

A committee of five was first chosen; this committee chose ninety-five members; and each of the hundred chose three.

Four Hundred and Fifty (The). The legislative assembly of ancient Venice, chosen from the six quarters of the city. The privy council of the doge consisted of the Six Sages; the great council of state of forty members.

Four Masters (The). Rhyming annalists of Ireland. The annals were compiled in the 17th century (1636) by Michael O'Clery, with the assistance of three other antiquaries. Harris tells us they are 'chiefly drawn from the annals of Clonmacnois, Inisfail, and Senat, as well as from other approved and ancient chronicles of Ireland.' A full account may be found in Mr. Petrie's 'Remarks on the History and Authenticity of the Autograph Original of the Annals of the Four Masters.'

Four Points (The), 1854. (1) The cession of the Russian protectorate in the Principalities, and establishment of a European protectorate in its stead; (2) the free navigation of the Danube; (3) an arrangement to put an end to Russian preponderance in the Black Sea, and for bringing the Ottoman government into harmony with European governments; and (4) the renunciation by Russia of a protectorate over the Christian subjects of the sultan.

Four Symbols (The), or standards in Catholic theology.

(1) The Apostles' Creed; (2) the Nicene Creed; (3) the symbol of Constantinople; and (4) the Athanasian Creed.

The Constantinople formulary was made at the Council of Constantinople in 381, and is recited at mass. It is identical with the Nicene Creed, except in the one article about the procession of the Holy Ghost from the father (filioque).

Four Vows of the Order of St. Francis of Paula. Poverty, chastity, obedience, and the quadragesimal life (i.e. the Lenten fast of 40 days).

Fou'rierism. The social system devised by Charles Fourier. He would divide men into groups of 400 families, and these groups into series, and these series into phalanxes. A single group he would place under one immense roof, and there should be supplied every appliance of industry and art. No army would be required, no wars could ever break out, as all the world would be one great family.

Fourteen Saintly Helpers (The). The fourteen saints to whose churches, between Bamberg and Coburg, annual pilgrimages were made, viz. George, Blaise, Erasmus, Vitus, Pantaleon, Christopher, Denys or Dionysius, Cyriacus, Achatius, Eustace, Giles or Ægidius, Margaretha, Catharine, and Barbara.

Fourth Estate (The). The newspaper press. The 'three estates of the realm' in the legislature are the lords spiritual, the lords temporal, and the commons. The newspaper press as a power may well be called 'the fourth estate,' with a moral power far greater than the other three.

Fourth of July (The), or 'The glorious Fourth of July.' In American history is glorious as being the day of the Declaration of Independence (1776).

Fowler (The). Heinrich I. of Germany is so called, because he was flying his hawks on the slopes of the Harz mountains when the messengers came to tell him he had been chosen king.

Fox (A). An old English broadsword. So called because it bore the figure of a fox, the rebus of a famous sword-maker.

Come, come, comrade, . . . put up your fox, and let us be jogging.—Sir W. Scott, Kenilworth, ch. iv.

On point of fox. 'By the sword's point.'

Thou diest by point of fox, if thou comest a-prying to this tower once more.—Ibid. ch. xxix.

(Probably, 'fox' is the Latin falx, which is the Greek φάλκης, a hatchet, axe, or pruning-knife.)

Fox (The). A vessel of 170 tons burden, fitted out by Lady Franklin, and committed to the charge of Capt. McClintock, to go towards the North Pole to ascertain if anything could be learned of the fate of Sir John Franklin or his two ships, the 'Erebus' and 'Terror.' On 6 May, 1859, was discovered in a cairn a document stating that Sir John Franklin had died 11 June, 1847. Numerous relics of the two crews were brought home and publicly exhibited in London. It was also ascertained that Sir John had discovered the long-sought-for North-west Passage.

'Fox's Martyrs.' The 120 supporters of Charles James Fox who lost their elections when parliament was dissolved 25 March, 1784.

Foxites (2 syl.). Quakers, followers of George Fox, founder of the sect (1624–1690).

His muzzle, formed of opposition stuff,
Firm as a Foxite, would not lose its ruff,
Peter Pindar, The Razor-seller.

Fra Diavolo. Michele Pezza, one of the leaders in the Calabrian insurrection. In 1799 Cardinal Ruffo made him a colonel. He was taken captive by the French, and was hanged at Naples in 1806.

Fra Moria'le (4 syl.). Montréal d'Albano, provençal condottiere, died

1354. Being sentenced to death by Rienzi, he 'summoned' the tribune to follow him within a month, and within a month Rienzi was killed by the fickle mob.

France. (a) The three Royal dynasties of France :—

I. The Merovingian race (420–752), gives 34 sovereigns (including Pharamond).

II. The Carlovingian race (752–987) gives 16 sovereigns.

III. The Capetian race (987–1848) gives 37 sovereigns. But the Republic was 1792–1804; the Empire of Napoleon I. was 1804–1814. In 1848 Louis Napoleon was president, and emperor 1852–1871. In 1871 a republican form of government was established.

The Capetian dynasty was often indirect. The first nine kings were in direct descent. Then came Philippe III. Le Hardi, called the Philippine line, 1270–1285; the elder branch gave five kings, 1285–1328; the Valois branch gave seven kings, 1328–1498; then followed the Valois-Orléans branch, Louis XII., 1498–1515; then the Valois-Angoulême dynasty of five kings, 1515–1589; then the Bourbon race from 1589. Louis-Philippe was Bourbon-Orléans.

(b) The six great peers of France. In the time of Henri I. (1031–1060). The Duke of Burgundy, the Duke of Aquitaine, the Duke of Normandy, the Count of Champagne, the Count of Flanders, and the Count of Toulouse. Each of these peers had almost equal power with the king himself.

According to Ronsard (Franciade), the Franks were so called from Francion, son of Hector of Troy. Of course this is a poet's fable.

Franchi (Ausonio). The pseudonym of Francesco Bonavino, the Italian philosopher.

Francis II. (Fránz). Emperor of the Romans and king of Germany. From 6 Aug., 1806, called 'emperor of Austria'; born 1768, died 1835. He reigned as kaiser-king of Germany, 1792–1806; as emperor of Austria, 1806–1835.

Father, Leopold II.; Mother, the Infanta Maria Louisa; Wives, Elizabeth of Würtemberg, mother of Ferdinand his successor, who abdicated; Maria Theresa, mother of Maria Louisa, who married Napoleon I.; Maria Louisa of Austria; and Charlotte Augusta of Bavaria. Francis II. was brother of Marie Antoinette, the unhappy wife of Louis XVI. of France, both of whom were guillotined.

He gave up the Netherlands and Lombardy by the treaty of Campo Formio, but received Venice 17 Oct., 1797.

Gave up all his possessions on the left bank of the Rhine by the treaty of Lunéville, 8 Feb., 1801.

Gave up all his Italian states, Suabia, and the Tyrol, by the treaty of Presburg, 26 Dec., 1805.

Renounced the dignity of emperor of Germany, but retained that of emperor of Austria, 6 Aug., 1806.

End of the Holy Roman Empire, 1806, after lasting 1006 years.

Francis-Joseph (Franz-Joseph), Emperor of Austria and king of Hungary and Bohemia. Born 1830, reigned 1848–

He succeeded his uncle Ferdinand, who abdicated in 1848. Father, Francis (younger brother of Kaiser Ferdinand), son of Francis II.; Wife, Elizabeth of Bavaria; contemporary with Victoria.

His son Rudolph, heir apparent to the throne, was born 1858, married Stephanie of Belgium 1881, and put an end to his life in Feb., 1889.

Franciscans (The), or 'Fratres Minores,' 1209. Followers of the rule of St. Francis of Assisi, originally divided into 'Conventuals' and 'Observantins.' The Conventuals lived in convents and monasteries; the Observantins (q.v.) were hermits, and in France were called Cordeliers, from the cord which they used for belt. The strictest of the Observantins were barefooted.

Récollets of Spain were formed in 1500 by Father John of Guadalupe. 'Le nom Récollets fut donné à ces religieux, parce qu'ils vivaient dans des couvents solitaires, et qu'ils faisaient une profession plus spéciale de la pratique de la retraite et de recueillement' (Guérin, 'Pet. Boll.' xii. p. 43).

Reformed Capucins of Tuscany, 1525; formed by Matteo Baschi of Urbano.

The Capucins 'ont une pièce sur le derrière de leur habit, comme S. François le recommande dans son testament.' They have long beards, but St. Francis himself had a very short beard. Both the Récollets and the Capucins wear a brown dress, but Cordeliers a black one.

Second Order of St. Francis: The Clarisses, or followers of St. Clair. They were called, in France, 'Urbanists,' because they obtained their constitution from Urban IV. (in 1263), but generally they went by the name of 'The poor sisters Clarisses,' or the 'poor Clarisses.'

The Minories of London were so called from the Minory convent of Clarisses.

The Grey Sisters of Flanders were Franciscans who originally dressed in grey, but subsequently adopted either white, black, or dark blue. They took on themselves the vows of poverty, chastity, and obedience.

THIRD ORDER, instituted by St. Francis in 1221, for both sexes. These Franciscans followed their own vocations, married and were given in marriage. The Dominicans, Augustines, Minims, Carmelites, and Servites, all had a similar order.

Penitents were of this order, instituted in 1397 by Angela countess of Civitella. 'Récollettines' are reformed Penitents.

Nurses of hospitals, asylums, &c., who took on themselves the vows of chastity, poverty, and obedience to the bishop of the diocese. They went by various names. In Spain, Minimes infirmiers, or Obregons, from Bernardin Obregon of Madrid. In Flanders, les Bons-Fieux or Bons Fils.

Mgr. Guérin (vol. xii. p. 40) tells us there were 1,500 'maisons de Franciscains' and 480,000 religieux in England in 1380. Introduced into England in 1224. Some Franciscan tertiaries live in convents.

They were called 'Grey Friars' from the colour of their dress, as the Dominicans were called 'Black Friars,' and the Carmelites were called 'White Friars. They were in everlasting antagonism with the Dominicans ever since 1250.

Franco-Austrian War (The), 1859. Between France and Austria, to deprive the latter of Italy. France was victorious. Total loss of life, 40,000. Cost of the war, 60,000,000*l.* sterling.

Franco-Prussian War (The), 1870, 1871. Between Napoleon III. emperor of France, and William I. king of Prussia. The French were defeated in every great battle and in every siege. The chief battles were those of Weissenburg, Wörth, Saarbrück, Vionville, Gravelotte, Beaumont, and Sedan. By these victories William I. became German emperor. This is called 'The Six Months' War' (from 28 July, 1870, to 28 Jan., 1871). Total cost of the war, 500,000,000*l.* sterling. Total loss of life, 225,000. William I., who was king of Prussia, added to his titles 'German emperor' (Deutscher Kaiser).

François I. le Grand. Also called 'Le Père des Lettres.' Of the Capetian dynasty, and second of the Valois-Angoulême line (1494, 1515-1547). The Renaissance period. François I. 'had the largest nose in France, except his jester' (Triboulet).

Father, Charles comte d'Angoulême (great-grandson of Charles V. and cousin of Louis XII., whom François succeeded); Mother, Louise of Savoy; Wives, Claude, daughter of Louis XII., mother of HENRI II. his successor, and Eleanore, widow of Emmanuel of Portugal, and sister of Charles-Quint, emperor of Germany. Contemporary with Henry VIII. and Leo X. His first mistress was the Countess of Châteaubriant; his second was Mdlle. Heilly, created duchesse d'Etampes (that is, she was married, under cover, to Jean de Brosse, who was requited by being made duc d'Etampes). Another of his mistresses was La belle Ferronnière, the nominal wife of one Ferron, an ironmonger.

CHARLES V. had two sons, CHARLES VI. and Louis duc d'Orléans.

From the former descended in direct line CHARLES VII., LOUIS XI. his son, and CHARLES VIII. No surviving issue.

Louis duc d'Orléans had also two sons—viz. Charles duc d'Orléans and Jean d'Angoulême.

LOUIS XII. was son of Charles duc d'Orléans.

Jean d'Angoulême had for son Charles d'Angoulême, whose son was FRANÇOIS I.

François II. of FRANCE (1543, 1559-60). Was son of Henri II. and grandson of François I. While dauphin he married Mary Stuart, daughter of James V. of Scotland. After his death the widow became queen of Scots and married her cousin Henry Darnley. Contemporary with Elizabeth.

Franco'ni (Roi). Joachim Murat. So called by Napoleon for his theatrical display. Franconi was a pompous, conceited director of one of the minor theatres of Paris. Murat, though undoubtedly intrepid, was extremely vain, and used to parade the streets of Naples in silks and satins like a theatre king (1771-1815).

Franco'nia. A large district of Germany lying north and south of the river Main, originally peopled by the Franks. In the early part of the empire this province enjoyed the privilege of electing the king of Germany within its own territory, and of crowning him by the hands of its own archbishop (Mainz), primate of the empire. In 912 Konrad I., count of Franconia, succeeded the Carlovingians in Germany, but gave them only one king; but after the extinction of the Saxon dynasty, the house of Franconia succeeded in the person of Konrad II., and supplied Heinrich III., IV., and V. The house of Hohenstauffen was a branch of the same powerful line. At the close of the Hohenstauffen dynasty Franconia rapidly declined, and now forms a part of the kingdom of Bavaria.

Franconia (House of). Represented in Germany by one king, Konrad I. of Franconia (912-918). Succeeded by the house of Saxony. Another house of Franconia reigned in Germany (1024-1106), represented by Konrad II., Heinrich III., and Heinrich IV.

Frangistan. The country of the Franks. Europe generally was so called by the Saracens.

Others have made private offers . . . to disjoin their forces from the camp of the kings of Frangistan.—Sir W. SCOTT, The Talisman, chap. xv.

Frank Pledge. A law which prevailed in England before the Conquest, whereby every member of a tything was held responsible for the good conduct of everyone within the tything. Hallam says 'ten men in a village were made answerable for each other.'

Frank Tenements, or 'Freeholds.' Lay tenements which were divided into knight-service and free-socage. The former of these was divided into knight-service proper, grand-sergeanty, cornage, &c. Free-socage was divided into petit-sergeanty, tenure in burgage, and gavelkind.

Sergeanty means service rendered to the king. Grand-sergeanty was personal service, petit-sergeanty was a money or other payment as rent. This payment might be merely nominal, as the delivery of a corn of wheat or small tuft of grass, a fish, a flag, and so on.

Franks of Walla'chia (The), 1750. A politico-religious secret society, founded by Frank, a neophyte of Wallachia. He preserved the Jewish doctrines and the Roman Catholic ritual. He was interred at death with royal honours, and his daughter became the Sovereign of the Faithful. The members of this sect are very numerous.

Frankfort (Treaty of), 10 May, 1871. A treaty of peace between Germany and France after the terrible Franco-German war.

Franking Letters. Sending letters by post free of charge. This privilege was claimed by the House of Commons in 1660, when the post-office was first legally established. Each member of parliament was entitled to send ten letters a day (not exceeding an ounce in weight) to any part of the United Kingdom, and to receive fifteen free. Members used to give franks to their friends, relations, and constituents. Abolished in 1840, when the uniform penny-post was introduced.

Cabinet ministers still send letters free of post, and letters from and to the post-office general are all free.

Franklin (Benjamin), 1706-90. Aged 84. Turgot happily said of him:

Eripuit cœlo fulmen, sceptrumque tyrannis.

'Eripuit cœlo fulmen' refers to his lightning conductor, and the latter clause to the part he took in American independence.

Fraternelle (La), 1793. A society of Parisian women, which met under the roof of the Jacobins. Each woman carried a dagger.

These were female patriots, whom the Girondins called "Megæras," and count to the extent of 8,000; with serpent-hair all out of curl, who have changed the distaff for the dagger. They are of the Society called Fraternelle, which meets under the roof of the Jacobins.—CARLYLE, French Revolution, vol. iii. bk. iii. 7.

Fraternity of St. George (The). A military order established in the reign of Edward IV. for the defence of the Irish Pale, or the four counties of Dublin, Meath, Kildare, and Louth. It consisted of 40 knights, 40 squires, and 120 archers.

In the time of John the Pale contained twelve counties.

Frates'chi (The), or 'Piagno'ni.' The disciples and friends of Savonarol'a, or the republican party of Florence.

Fraticelli (The). A section of the Italian Franciscans, founded by Father Maurato and Father de Fossombroni, who lived as hermits, and observed the rule of St. Francis in all its rigour. The Fraticelli gave out that the Church of Rome is the Babylon spoken of in the Book of the Revelation; that the rule of St. Francis was the rule observed and enjoined by Christ; that the sacraments are inutile; and that the perfection of the Christian régime is absolute poverty. This schism had a material tendency to lower the temporal authority of the papacy, and helped greatly to pave the way to the Reformation. They were joined by the Beghards (q.v.).

Sometimes the Fratres Minores are called Fraticelli, which means about the same thing. The term is also applied by way of contempt to the Catharists, Waldenses, and other 'heretics.'

Fratres Cellitæ. A religious order pretty common in Germany and the Netherlands; sometimes called Mexians, from Mexius, their founder.

Fratres Conversi. Lay monks (q.v.).

Conversi proprie dicebantur, qui a seculari vita, quam aliquandiu professi fuerant, vitam monachicam amplectabantur, et ad morum conversionem veniebant. Differebant a Nutritis, qui scilicet ab infantia in monasteriis enutriti eandem vitam amplexati erant.—DU CANGE, vol. ii. p. 703, col. 1.

Fraunhofer's Lines. The dark lines of a solar spectrum, first carefully observed and measured by Fraunhofer in 1815.

Frederick. For German kings see Friedrich.

Frederikshamn, in Finland (Treaty of), 17 Sept., 1809. A treaty of peace between Sweden and Russia, by which Sweden ceded Finland to Russia. Charles XIII. of Sweden also promised his adhesion to the 'continental system,' and closed her ports to British commerce.

Free Bench (The). I. The place where a lodge of the Vehmgericht (q.v.) was held. See 'Frei-grafs.

II. A widow's dower in a copyhold.

Free Burghers. Judges, with the Frei-grafs, in the Vehmgericht (q.v.). The president was called the grand master.

Free Church of Scotland (The), 1843. That part of the Presbyterian Church which resists all interference with the free choice of ministers by the congregations over which they are called to preside. No patron, no board, no trustees can present. They may nominate, but cannot over-ride the will of the congregation. Between 18–30 May as many as 470 ministers and professors signed an Act of Separation, thus renouncing all claim to the benefices which they held. See 'Seven Ministers,' 'Veto,' 'Voluntary Controversy,' 'Non-Intrusionists.'

The chief leaders were Drs. Chalmers, Chandler, Candlish, Welsh, Buchanan, and Gordon, with Messrs. Guthrie, Cunningham, and Dunlop.

Free Communionists, or 'Open Communionists.' Those Baptist dissenters who admit other orthodox Christians to partake with them of the Lord's Supper. John Bunyan, author of 'Pilgrim's Progress,' was a 'Free Communionist.' See 'Close Communionist.'

Free Coup. A term applied in Scotland to a piece of waste land where rubbish may be deposited free of charge.

Free Lances [Middle Ages]. Military rovers collected together under a free captain, and hired out by any government which wanted a ready-made army. In Italy they were called condottieri; in France they were called Compagnies Grandes.

Free Methodist Church (The), 1860. Their distinctive points are simplicity in dress, free pews, extempore preaching, no instrumental music, no choir. They are Wesleyans in doctrine.

Free Socage. Free tenure of land. It was divided into petit-sergeanty, tenure in burgage, and gavelkind.

Free Trade, 1779. This phrase was coined by Grattan in the Irish Parliament, and referred to the restrictions placed on the Irish trade by the British Parliament.

In the reign of Charles II. acts were passed prohibiting the Irish from sending to England either cattle, provisions, or manufactures. As labour was cheaper in Ireland, the English tradesmen, farmers, and manufacturers thought they would be ruined by Irish competition. Free Trade meant the liberty of trading freely with England.

Free Trade Battle (The). The struggle for the reform of our customs and excise laws, which culminated in the abolition of the corn laws in 1846. The battle may be divided into four periods: (1) From 1822 to 1830, in which Huskisson was the moving spirit; (2) from 1830 to 1840; (3) from 1840–1846, when Villiers, Cobden, Sir Robert Peel, John Bright, and Lord John Russell were the most prominent characters; and (4) from the repeal of the corn laws in 1846 onwards.

No nation has followed suit, although Cobden predicted all would within twenty years. On the contrary, all nations of Europe, America, and even our own colonies, think Free Trade a great political mistake (1890).

Free Will. The Arminians insisted on the freedom of the will to choose the right and reject the wrong. Calvinists are what is called 'Necessitarians,' i.e. they deny that the will is free. If the propensities of a man are evil, his will is enslaved by his evil propensities; if his heart has been changed by conversion, his will acts in obedience to the Spirit of God within him.

Freeman (Mr. and Mrs.). The Princess Anne and Duchess of Marlborough mutually agreed to abandon all formalities and court etiquette in their intercourse with each other. To this end Anne and her husband were to be called 'Mr. and Mrs. Morley,' while the Duke and Duchess of Marlborough were to be called 'Mr. and Mrs. Freeman.'

Freeman's Roll (The), 1832. A list of the Freemen (q.v.) made out by the town-clerk of a borough or municipal town (5, 6 Wm. IV. c. 76). As the Reform Bill did not disfranchise the freemen, a list was kept of those then living that they might still retain their municipal rights; but no new freeman was admitted, and the old 'citizens' gradually died out. See 'Burgess Roll.'

Freemason (The Female). The Hon. Mrs. Aldworth of Newmarket, co. Cork, the youngest child and only daughter of the Right Hon. Arthur St. Leger (created Viscount Doneraile 23 June, 1703). The lady concealed herself, it is said, in a clock-case, got frightened, and thus revealed her presence. It was resolved by the brotherhood, to prevent further mischief, to receive Mrs. Aldworth into the craft (née Elizabeth St. Leger).

In 1882 Mdlle. Marie Deraismes was received into the Grand Orient Lodge of Paris.

Freemasons. Grand Lodge held at York, under the patronage of King Edwin, A.D. 926. Henry VI. entered the order in 1442. Duke of Sussex was grand master 1813 to 1843. Besides Edwin and Henry VI., Edward the Confessor, Henry VII., William III., and George IV. were 'free accepted masons.' So were St. Dunstan, William of Wykeham, Sir Thomas Gresham, Inigo Jones, Sir Christopher Wren, and a host of others whose names are household words.

Freemasonry. The tenets and system of the Freemasons: 'l'exercice de la bienfaisance, l'étude de la morale universelle, et la pratique de toutes les vertus.' In French Masonry, in which I was accepted, the initiatory steps are called Voyages, the club-houses are called Lodges, and the head of a lodge is called The Venerable (in English lodges the Master). A lodge formed is called a Temple. There are thirty-three degrees, but the three early ones are most important, called Apprentice, Companion, and Master. (In England the Companion is called the Craftsman or Fellow-craft.) The initiated form a council called The Great East, or Grand Orient; in England the Grand Master. In France there are two annual banquets to celebrate the winter and summer solstice. In England banquets are more frequent, but less significant. French Master Masons wear a highly decorated pale blue scarf, on which are hung the masonic jewels.

Freemasonry is generally traced to the building of Solomon's Temple. It was introduced into England in A.D. 674. The grand lodge at York was founded in 926. In France each lodge has an Orator, and when I was made a Master Mason in Paris the oration made to me was 'On the Immortality of the Soul.' I found the French lodges less social than those of England, but never once entered a lodge without being expected to contribute freely to some charity.

Freemen. Persons in boroughs or municipal towns who had by birth, marriage, adoption, purchase, or apprenticeship the right of citizen, from which right they were the sole electors of the municipality and members of parliament for such town or borough. At the time of the Reform Bill (1831) many of these freemen were in almshouses, many were paupers, many were in workhouses, and many in gaol, but still retained their votes, which were bought for a sum of money varying from 5*l.* to ten times that sum, and in some cases even more.

Freethinkers. Those who are not in bondage to any church formulary, such as creeds, articles of religion, and confessions of faith. They hold themselves free to think for themselves, and feel themselves not bound to think as councils, states, or churches think for them. Their thoughts on religious subjects are not bound, but free.

Freethinking Christians, 1799. They acknowledge no law of church government and no doctrine of faith binding but such as the New Testament teaches. They may be called Unitarians, or Deists, in that they reject the divinity of Christ, the doctrine of the atonement, the notion of original sin, the dogmas of election and reprobation, eternal punishment, angels, the immortality of the soul, and the inspiration of the Bible.

Frei Grafs. The judges of the Vehmgericht (q.v.). See 'Free Burghers.'

French Artists.

1. The Florentine school: Jean Cousin (1492–1570), Nicolas Poussin (1594–1665), &c.

2. The Italian-French school: Vouet (1589–1649), Lesueur (1617–1655), Lebrun (1619–1690), Pierre Mignard (1610–1695), Jouvenet, called the 'Carracci of France' (1647–1707), &c.

3. The Romantic school: Greuze (1726–1805).

4. The Statuesque school: J.-L. David (1748–1825).

5. The Realistic school: Carle Vernet (1758–1836), Horace Vernet (1789–1863), Géricault (1791–1824), &c.

6. The Eclectic school: Paul Delaroche (1797–1856), Delacroix, Hersent, Prudhon, Ary Scheffer, &c.

French Assembly (The). The legislative assembly of France is divided into Right and Left. The Right includes the Legitimists, the Orleanists, and the Imperialists. The Left includes the Republicans and the Radicals. The Legitimists are those who favoured the fortunes of the older branch of the Bourbon family, represented till 1883 by the Comte de Chambord, who was called by them 'Henri V.' The Orleanists favoured the Louis Philippe branch of the Bourbon family. On the death of the Comte de Chambord, in 1883, the Legitimists and Orleanists became united. The Imperialists favour the family of Napoleon. The Legitimists used to constitute the 'Extreme Right,' the Orleanists the 'Right Centre.' The Radicals sit in the 'Extreme Left,' and the Republicans in the 'Left Centre.'

French Byron (The). Alfred de Musset (1810–1857).

Paul de Musset has gone to rejoin his brother, the French Byron—a less powerful Byron than yours, yet a poet to the tips of his fingers.—Ed. About, To the Athenæum, 3 July, 1880.

French Club (The), 1792. A federation of artisans and soldiers of the national guard, who had weapons concealed in the building where they met (near the Tuileries), with which they were to arm themselves and rush to the defence of the king if his life was threatened by any of the desperadoes of the Paris mob. This club cost the court 10,000 francs a day (400*l.*).

French Crown (The). Made in 1791, contained the following diamonds: The Regent, the Blue Diamond, the Sancy, the Golden Blies, the Crown diamond, the Ebenda, the Mirror of Portugal, the Tenth Mazarine, and a large number of others without specific names. Valued at 588,112*l.* when, in 1810, Napoleon commanded the crown jewels to be re-valued; but in 1791 they were supposed to be worth 807,808*l.*

French Ennius (The). Guillaume de Lorris (1235–1265), author of the first part of the 'Roman de la Rose' (q.v.).

French Florentine School of Painters (The). Includes Cousin (1492–1570) and Nicolas Poussin (1594–1665).

French Fury (The), 1582. The Duke of Anjou and Brabant had been recently raised to the sovereignty of the Netherlands; but, finding the Prince of Orange a great check on his actions, resolved to make himself in one day master of all the towns in which were French garrisons. The seizure of Antwerp fell to the Duke's lot, and he assembled his soldiers in the city, ostensibly for a review. At a given sign the French troops fell on the burghers, and set fire to the city. The burghers drove the French soldiers out of the city. Above 1,500 fell, among whom were 260 of noble rank. The biter was bit, and the French were victims of their own 'Fury.'

French Iso'cratês (The). Flé-chier, bishop of Nismes (1632–1710). Florid, antithetical, and elegant in style. His masterpiece is his oration over Marshal Turenne.

French Maccabæus (The). Simon de Montfort (1150–1215), the most celebrated military genius of the 12th cent Entrusted by Philippe II. (Auguste) with the crusade against the Albigenses in the south of France (1208–1218).

French Ovid (The). Du Bellay, one of the Pléiade Française (1524–1560), called also the 'Father of Grace and Elegance.' Spenser speaks of him as 'first garland of free poesy that France brought forth.'

The word Olive, the title of his 115 sonnets, is an anagram of Viole, the name of the lady whom he celebrates, as Petrarch shadowed forth his Laura under the figure of a laurel.

French Painters (Mediæval).

Nicolas Poussin	1594–1665
Claude le Lorrain [Claude Gelée].	1600–1682
Bourdon	1616–1671
Le Sueur	1617–1655
Le Brun	1619–1790

French Peasant Relief Fund (The). Originated by the 'Daily News' Sept. 1870 and closed April 1871.

French Phidias (The). J. B. Pigalle (2 syl.), 1714–1784.

His nude statue of Voltaire is, however, well-nigh ridiculous.

French Pindar (The). Two of the French poets are so designated: (1) Jean Dorat (1507–1588); and (2) Ponce Denis Lebrun (1729–1807).

French Pléiade (The). 'La Pléiade Française' in the reign of Henri III. (1574–1589), composed of the seven poets Ronsard, Du Bellay, Remi Belleau, Jodelle, Baïf, Pontus de Thiard, and the seventh was either Dorat or Amadis Jamyn.

Under Louis XIII. (1610–1643) was a second batch called La Pléiade Française, and consisting of Rapin, Commire, Larue, Santeuil, Ménage, Dupérier, and Petit.

The term is borrowed from the Alexandrians under Ptolemy Philadelphos, who so called seven contemporaneous poets, viz. Lycophron, Theocritès, Arätos, Nicander, Apollonios, Callimachos, and Philiscos (called Homer the younger).

French Propertius (The). Antoine Bertin, who died 1790, at the age of 38. He possessed the brilliant imagination and also the licentiousness of the Latin poet.

French Raphael (The). Lesueur (1617–1655).

French Revolution. I. John Karrion, elector of Brandenburg, more than two centuries before the French Revolution, says of 1789, in his journal (still in MS.): 'Alors sera l'une des plus grandes conjonctions et la dixième totale rénaution (sic) de Saturne, laquelle, après la Nativitey de Nostre Seigneur, mil vii cents et lxxxix, sera totalement accomplie; et si le monde doit après plus durer, nul ne scait (sic) sinon Dieu. O quelles grandes merveilles l'on verra ad'onc (sic), tant de variations et destructions, principalement ès constitutions et ordinances chrestiennes . . . &c.'

Against the year 1525 he has these words: 'Il y auroit grand effusion de sang des chrestiens, et grandes oppressions d'aulcuns grands fiefz.'

II. Between 1719 and 1889 there have been seventeen revolutions in France. The Reign of Terror and that of Napoleon were terrible for their slaughter.

The accumulated deficit of France in ten years, ending 1889, was 240 millions sterling. The revenue has fallen short of the expenses about 24 millions sterling annually.

The financial embarrassment which led to the Great Revolution was a little over two millions sterling.

The financial embarrassment in 1889 was, in round numbers, 1,686 millions sterling.

The public debt of Great Britain in 1890 was 591 millions; of France 1,286 millions.

In ten years the public debt of Great Britain (1889) has decreased 68 millions sterling; of France it has increased 240 millions. Mr. Goschen in 1889 reduced it 20 millions.

French Revolution (The First). From 5 May, 1789, to 27 July, 1794.

Chief Leaders of the First French Revolution:—

Comte de Mirabeau, 1789-1791.
Danton, from the death of Mirabeau to 1793.
Robespierre, from June 1793 to 27 July, 1794.
Next to these three were St. Just, Couthon, Marat, Carrier, Hebert, Santerre, Camille Desmoulins, Roland and his wife, Brissot, Bernave, Sieyes, Barras, Tallien, &c.

Great Days of the First French Revolution:—

1789. 17 June. The Tiers Etat constituted itself into the 'National Assembly'; 20 June, the day of the Jeu de Paume, when the Assembly took an oath not to separate till it had given France a constitution; 14 July, Storming of the Bastille; 5, 6 Oct., the king and National Assembly transferred from Versailles to Paris. This closed the ancient régime of the court.
1791. 20, 21 June. Flight and capture of the king, queen, and royal family.
1792. 20 June, attack on the Tuileries by Santerre; 10 Aug., attack on the Tuileries and downfall of the monarchy; 2, 3, 4 Sept., massacre of the state prisoners.
1793. 21 Jan., Louis XVI. guillotined; 31 May, commencement of the Reign of Terror; 2 June, the Girondists proscribed; 16 Oct., Marie Antoinette guillotined; 31 Oct., the Girondists guillotined.
1794. 5 April, downfall of Danton; 27 July, downfall of Robespierre.

French Revolution of Feb. 1848. See under Revolution,' &c.

French Revolution of July 1830. See under 'Revolution,' &c.

French Roscius (The). François Talma (1770–1826), the greatest of French tragedians. Roscius the great actor was a comedian.

French Theatre (Founder of the). Rotrou (1609–1650). Corneille calls him his father.

French Triumvirate (The), 1560. François duc de Guise, Marshal St. André, and the Comte de Montmorency, who leagued together against the queen mother Catherine de' Medici. They were leaders of the high Catholic party, and irreconcilable enemies of the Huguenots.

French Vegetius (The). The Chevalier de Folard, born at Avignon (1669–1752).

French of the East (The). The Persians. 'Vanity' (says James Morier) 'is their besetting sin, and that alone will account for the lust of compliment which prevails in both nations.'

French of the North (The). The Poles. So called from their vivacity, fickleness, love of society, and quickness of parts.

Frenchmen. It was Voltaire who described his countrymen as 'half monkey and half tiger.'

Frères Bleus (Les). Affiliated Philadelphians, whose object was the restoration of the Bourbons. They were organised by Lieut.-Colonel Oudet. See 'Philadelphic Society.'

Frères Mineurs. See 'Fraticelli.'

Frères Prêcheurs, or 'Preaching Friars.' Dominicans (q.v.).

Frères de la Milice du Christ. See 'Chevaliers Porte-glaive.'

Pronounce Frair d'lah me-leece; She-val-le-ay port glaiv.

Frères de la Mort (Les). The Eremites of St. Paul, 13th cent., whose special province was to look after the sick and preside at funerals. They had on their scapulary a death's head, which they kissed by way of grace before meat, and laid beside them.

Friar Bacon's Study. On Folly Bridge, Oxford. A gateway tower to defend the passage and keep out undesirable intruders.

Friars (The Four Branches of). (1) Augustine Friars, or mendicants; (2) Franciscans, or Grey Friars; (3) Dominicans, or Black Friars; (4) Carmelites, or White Friars.

The Franciscans and Dominicans were always 'cat and dog.'

Friars Conventual. The first order of St. Francis of Assisi was divided into 'Conventuels' and 'Observatins.'

On les appela conventuels parce qu'ils vivaient dans de grands couvents, au lieu que ceux qui suivaient la règle dans toute sa pureté demeuraient dans des ermitages, ou dans des maisons basses et pauvres.—Mgr. GUÉRIN, Les Petites Bollandistes, vol. xii. p. 49.

Friars Observant. Those Franciscans who dwelt in hermitages or huts, observing the rule of St. Francis in all its length and breadth. Those who dwelt in convents were called 'Conventuals' (see above). There were four classes of Observants: (1) the Observatins, constituted in 1368; (2) those who followed the strict observance; (3) those of the Order of Mercy, called 'the Great Observants'; and (4) the Preaching Friars of the primitive observance who were reformed Dominicans.

All the Friars Observant were [1535] ejected from their monasteries and dispersed. Some were thrust into prisons, and others were confined in the houses of the Friars Conventual.—HOWITT, History of England, vol. ii. p. 215.

Friars Minor (The), or 'Minorites' (3 syl.), 1209. Founded by St. Francis of Assisi. They arrived in England in 1224, and were called 'Grey Friars' from the colour of their dress.

Subsequently divided into Observants, Conventuals, Capuchins, Récollets, Cordeliers, &c.

Friday Lucky to the United States. On Friday, 21 Aug., 1492, Christopher Columbus sailed on his great voyage of discovery. On Friday, 12 Oct., 1492, he first discovered land. On Friday, 4 Jan., 1493, he sailed on his return voyage to Spain. On Friday, 14 March, 1493, he arrived at Palos in safety. On Friday, 22 Nov., 1493, he arrived at Hispaniola in his second voyage to America. On Friday, 13 June, 1494, he discovered the continent of America. On Friday, 5 March, 1496, Henry VIII. gave John Cabot his commission. On Friday, 7 Sept., 1565, Melendez founded St. Augustine, the oldest town in the U.S. Or Friday, 10 Nov., 1620, the 'Mayflower, with the Pilgrim Fathers, made the harbour of Provincetown. On Friday, 22 Dec., 1620, the Pilgrim Fathers landed at Plymouth rock. On Friday, 22 Feb., George Washington was born. On Friday, 16 June, Bunker Hill was seized and fortified. On Friday, 17 Oct., 1777, the surrender of Saratoga was made. On Friday, 22 Sept., 1780, the treason of Arnold was laid bare. On Friday, 19 Sept., 1791, was the surrender of York Town. On Friday, 7 July, 1776, the motion was made by John Adams that the U.S. are and ought to be independent. The 'Great Eastern' sailed from Valentia on Friday, 13 July, 1866, and landed safely at Heart's Content (Newfoundland), with the 'cable,' Friday, 27 the same month ('Norfolk Beacon,' U.S.).

Aurengzebe considered Friday a lucky day, and used to say in prayer, 'O that I may die on a Friday, for blessed is he who dies on that day!'

Friday (Unlucky). Friday, 5 Oct., B.C. 105, was marked nefastus in the Roman calendar, because on that day Marcus Mallius and Cæpio the consul were slain, and their whole army was annihilated in Gallia Narbonensis by the Cimbrians.

Considered very unlucky in Spain.

It is deemed an unlucky day by Buddhists and Brahmins.

The reason given by Christians for its ill-luck is because it was the day of Christ's crucifixion; but surely that is not an 'unlucky' event to Christians.

A Friday moon is unlucky for weather.

Friedrich I. Barbarossa, or Red Beard. 'The father of his country.' Kaiser-king of Germany (1121, 1152–1190). Drowned while fording the Selef, a river of Cilicia. Second of the house of Hohenstauffen or Suabia. He was the first king to set pendant seals to diplomas.

Father, Friedrich duke of Suabia, brother of KONRAD III., founder of the dynasty. Mother, Agnes sister of Heinrich the Proud. Wives, Adelaide, repudiated; Beatrice of Burgundy, mother of his son and successor HEINRICH VI. Contemporary with Stephen, Henry II., and Richard I. (Cœur de Lion).

Of course, KONRAD III. was his uncle.

Friedrich II. Iron Tooth, son of Friedrich I. count of Hohenzollern, elector of Brandenburg. So called because he showed his teeth to the unruly barons who presumed on his youth to rebel against him. He abdicated in 1470 in favour of his brother Albert [Albrecht], the Achilles and Ulysses of Germany.

Friedrich II. The Wonder of the World. Kaiser-king of Germany (1194, 1215–1250). Probably poisoned by his son Manfroi, who poisoned his brother Konrad in 1254.

Father, HEINRICH VI. Mother, Constance, heiress of the Two Sicilies. Wives, Constance of Aragon; Yolande, or Iolanthe, daughter of the king of Jerusalem, mother of KONRAD IV., who succeeded him; and Isabella daughter of Henry III. of England. Contemporary with John and Henry III.

Kaiser Otto III. (983–1002) was also called 'The Wonder of the World.'

Friedrich III. the Pacific, or, rather, 'the Indolent.' Second of the Habsburg line of kings (1415, 1440–1493), the longest reign of the kaiser-kings of Germany. Emperor of the Romans 1452, and this was the last time that any German king was crowned at Rome. It was this roi fainéant that adopted the five vowels for the imperial device, meaning 'Austriæ Est Imperare Orbi Universo,' or 'Alles Erdreich Ist Oesterreich Unterthan'; in English, 'Austria's Empire Is Overall Universal.' Like his predecessor and successor Maximilian, he died of dysentery by indulging too freely in a melon. Three successive kings died of melon-colic.

Father, Ernst duke of Austria. Mother, Cimburgis, a Polish princess. Wife, Eleonore daughter of Edward king of Portugal. Son and successor, Maximilian I. Contemporary with Henry VI., Edward IV., Edward V., Richard III., and Henry VII.

 Ernst father of Friedrich III. was cousin of Kaiser ALBERT II., who married Elizabeth daughter of Kaiser SIEGMUND or SIGISMUND.

Friedrich III. kaiser-king of Germany reigned 53 years (1440-1493), and died at the age of 78.
George III. of Great Britain reigned 60 years (1760–1820), and died at the age of 82.
Louis XIV. of France reigned 72 years (1643–1715), and died at the age of 77.

Friedrich the Handsome. A rival claimant of the German throne with Ludwig V. Both were elected and both crowned, but Friedrich, being defeated at the battle of Mühldorf in 1322, was imprisoned, and Ludwig remained king.

Friedrich Wilhelm IV. of Prussia (1795, 1840–1861), son of Frederick William III. Father, FRIEDRICH WILHELM III.; Mother, Louisa Augusta of Mecklenburg-Strelitz; Wife, Elizabeth Louisa of Bavaria; Son, Wilhelm I. king of Prussia and German emperor. Contemporary with Queen Victoria.

Friends (The Society of), 1624. Quakers, a sect founded by George Fox, of Drayton, in Leicestershire, a shoemaker. They believe in the main fundamental principles of what is called 'Orthodox Christianity,' but they express their religious creed in the very words of the New Testament Scripture, and each member has the liberty of interpreting the words. Their main speciality is the belief of 'the Light of Christ in man,' and hence they entertain a broader view of the Spirit's influence than other Christians.

In morals, propriety of conduct, good order, and philanthropy, the Quakers are a pattern society.

Friends of God (The), 1370–1400. A brotherhood formed by Nicholas of Basel, which protested against the sacerdotalism of Germany and Switzerland.

Friends of Liberty and Equality (The), 1794. An Hungarian secret society, organised by Martinovics for the purpose of introducing the principles of the French Revolution. The society had not been in existence many months when it was stamped out, Martinovics and six others being executed by the sword in a field near Buda, still called 'the field of blood.'

Friends of Truth (The). Quakers were so-called in the seventeenth century. They are now called 'Friends.'

Friends of the People (The), April 1792. A political association formed in London for the purpose of obtaining a reform in the representation of the people. Headed by Gray, Baker, Whitbread, Sheridan, Lambton, and Erskine.

Frith Gild. A peace-club or voluntary society pledged to the maintenance of peace and mutual security. A member of the gild was called a 'Frith-man,' and a breaking of the peace was a 'Frith-breach.' These Frithgilds were very general throughout Europe in the 9th and 10th cents. Our friendly societies are 'Frith-gilds.'

Fronde (La), 1648–1653. A French insurrection provoked by the meanness and arrogance of Mazarin, the chief minister, while Louis XIV. was still a minor. At length the chief nobility united in a grand council, and insisted on a reform, such as the abolition of monopolies, the reduction of taxes, the examination of public expenditure, prohibition of arrest without assigning a cause, and so on. Mazarin resisted, and even arrested Blancménil (president of the council), and Broussel, a conspicuous member. All Paris rose in insurrection, and compelled Mazarin to release his prisoners. Mazarin and the queen-mother fled, and both parties prepared for war. The insurgents soon disagreed among themselves, and Mazarin, at the head of 8,000 men, returned to Paris in triumph. The insurgents in this riot were called Frondeurs, and the court party were called Mazarinians (q.v.).

Monglat thus explains the term. He says that the Paris parlement forbade boys to sling stones, and one day a young barrister said, 'Quand ce sera mon tour, je fronderai bien l'opinion de mon père.' Here fronderai means to combat, to oppose: but the whole point of the remark was in allusion to the Fronde war, and therefore it could not have originated the term.

The word became popular slang for several years. Everything was à la Fronde. There were Fronde hats, coats, and gloves; Fronde muffs and fans; Fronde dishes and loaves of bread; Fronde songs and tunes Fronde (The Little), 1650. The great Condé, in the guerre de la Fronde, was originally of the court or Mazarin party, but he quarrelled with the party, and made a split called 'the Little Fronde.' This was a third party, for though Condé hated Mazarin much, he hated the parliamentarians more.

Frondeurs. Slingers, common in the Spanish armies in the 13th and 14th cents. The natives of the Balearic Isles were most noted slingers. The Greeks, Romans, and Carthaginians had companies of slingers; so had the French and German. But the word is chiefly associated with the insurgents of the Fronde war, called les Frondeurs, who were opposed to the court party called Mazarinians (q.v.).

Fruc'tidor (Dix-huit), i.e. 4 Sept., 1797. A noted coup d'état, by the majority of the Directory against Barthélemy and Carnot, and against those members, both of the Conseil des Cinq-cents and of the Conseil des Anciens, thought to be favourable to royalty. The three directors were Barras, Laréveillère-Lepaux, and Rewbell. The result of this revolution was the deportation of the two directors, 11 members of the Conseil des Anciens, 42 members of the Conseil des Cinq-cents, 35 journalists, a host of priests, and numerous others called 'conspirators.'

Fuero Jusgo (The). The code of the Visigoths in Spain.

Fueros (The). The written laws of Jaca (Spain), the most ancient of Europe. They were confirmed by Alfonso III., and called 'the Ancient Usages of Jaca.' Fuero = charter, statute, or code of laws.

There were the 'Fuero of Leon,' the 'Fuero of Naxera,' the 'Basque fueros,' &c., which were charters. These charters were abolished by Espartero, but restored in 1844 by Queen Isabella.

Fugger (Antony). A modern Crœsus. When Charles-Quint was shown by François I. the royal treasury in Paris, he said to the king, 'There is a linen-weaver in Augsburg that could pay for all this out of his own purse.'

Fuh-he. First of the five emperors of China. Like the old kings of Rome, the mythological kings of China represent five periods and not five persons. To Fuh-he is attributed the invention of writing, and he is said to have taught the people the art of rearing cattle, fishing, &c., and to have instituted the rite of marriage. Musical instruments are also attributed to this mythical king.

Fullers and Weavers of Ghent (The), 1344. A trade dispute, in which Jacob von Artevelde, the great brewer, sided with the fullers, and Gerrard Denys with the weavers. In a battle fought in the market-place as many as 1,500 fullers were slain, and trade was utterly ruined. Artevelde (4 syl.) was assassinated 9 July, 1345.

Fum. A kind of cock, often represented on Chinese works of art, and embroidered on the dresses of mandarins of a certain rank. Like the roc of the Arabs and the phœnix of the Egyptians, the Chinese 'fum' is mythological. It is a salamander, with the head of a goose, the hindquarters of a stag, the neck of a snake, the tail of a fish, the forehead and beak of a cock, and the back of a tortoise. It is about 6 cubits high, and is called 'the mandarin of time.'

Fum (George IV.). Fum 'the Chinese bird of royalty' was represented on the ceiling of the staircase at the north end of the main corridor of the Brighton Pavilion (then called the Chinese Gallery).

And where is Fum the Fourth, our royal bird,
Gone down, it seems to Scotland. . . .
BYRON, Don Juan, xi. 78.

One day the Chinese bird of royalty—Fum,
Thus accosted our own bird of royalty—Hum,
In that palace or china-shop, Brighton, which is it?
When Fum had just come to pay Hum a visit.
THOMAS BROWN (MOORE), The Fudge Family in Paris.

Here, 'Fum' seems to mean Louis of France, and 'Hum' George IV.

Fundamental Law (The), 29 Sept. (Oct. 11), 1862, Russia. The whole judicial system of Russia was then settled on a new basis, securing the independence of the courts of justice, the limitation of the courts of appeal, the introduction of the jury system in criminal cases, and the appointment of judges by the state. It is framed in three parts, the first treating of the constitution of the courts in 91 articles; the second of criminal procedure in 157 articles; and the third of civil procedure in 138 articles. By the first, judicial power is vested in justices of the peace, with the senate as a final court of appeal. By the second, prosecution is placed under the control of a public prosecutor. By the third, it was decreed that there should be in future two courts of appeal.

Fuor-Usciti (The), or the 'turned-out ones.' So were called those persons of the Neri and Bianchi (Blacks and Whites) who were exiled by the faction which for the time being had the upper hand. Dante, a White, was one of the Fuor-Usciti (1302). Singular of Fuor-Usciti is Fuor-Uscito.

Let Florence perish, so long as the Fuor-Usciti get back to the city; let her streets run with blood, her treasure be exhausted, her foes victorious, until the Fuor-Usciti be within her walls again.—Mrs. OLIPHANT, Makers of Florence, p. 54.

Furies of the Guillotine (The). The Tricoteuses, or women who frequented the public clubs and revolutionary tribunal of France, where they sat knitting, and openly expressed their approval or disapproval of the proceedings. With the fall of the Jacobins they disappeared.

They were called Tricoteuses from their knitting, and Furies from their violence.

Furor Berser'kicus. An artifice of battle among the Danes, like the Indian war-whoop. In this furor the men tried to resemble wild beasts, such as wolves and dogs. They bit their shields; they howled; they threw off their clothing; they rushed about frantically; they made hideous faces. It was at length made penal.

Eric earl of Norway Omnes berserkos Norwegia exulare jussit (Grettis Saga, p. 142).

Furry Dance (A). A processional dance in May consisting of thirty or more couples, who danced to the ancient Celtic Furry tune in at the front door of houses and out at the back door. It differed from the May dance, which was round a May-pole. In Lithuania processional dances on the octave of May-day have existed from time immemorial.

Sometimes, but erroneously, called the 'Flora Dance,' or Floralia.

Fürstenbund (The), March 1785. The alliance of Friedrich II. (the Great) of Prussia with the Electors of Saxony and Hanover, for the maintenance of the German constitution. By this masterstroke of policy Friedrich defeated the kaiser's plot of adding Bavaria to Austria.

Fuste et bac'ulo. 'By staff and bâton,' commonly called 'tenure by the verge.' A mode of tradition or delivery of real property where there is no house. In France, seisin was made by delivery of a bâton or pair of gloves; in Lombardy by a spear; in Germany by a clod or twig; in Scotland by a pen.

Fuste (Latin) in 2 syl.

Fyzoola Khan. The charge brought by Mr. Wyndham against Warren Hastings, governor-general of India, was his conduct to Fyzoola Khan, the Rohilla chief, 1787. The basis of the charge was this: The Nabob of Oudh wanted to seize certain lands belonging to the Rohilla chief, and gave Hastings 100,000*l.* to help him in this seizure. Hastings now told the Rohilla chief if he would give him one and a half million sterling he would guarantee his retention of these lands. Fyzoola (3 syl.) replied he did not possess so much money, and the matter was allowed to drop.

G. Cornwall. George IV. so signed his private letters to his personal friends. See 'N. & Q.,' 19 April, 1884, p. 305.

G of Edward's Race. There was a 'prophecy' afloat in the reign of Edward IV. that the king's son would perish by the hands of a person whose name began with G. Clarence, the king's brother, was named George, and Edward, with the Woodvilles, always suspected him of aiming at the crown. Fabyan says that Clarence was drowned in the Tower in a butt of Malmsey wine, but he left behind a brother Richard duke of Gloucester, who was generally credited with the death of Edward V. as well as with that of Margaret's son Edward, the Duke of Clarence, Henry VI., and many others.

Gabelle. From the German gabe, tribute, impost, was a tax imposed on salt by Philippe IV. le Bel in 1286, and was one of the causes of the revolution. There were many other gabelles, as the gabelle des draps, gabelle des vins, gabelle de tonlieu (standing in the markets for sale), &c.; but when used alone it always means the tax on salt. The king had the monopoly of this article, and every person was compelled to buy at least 7 lbs. of it yearly, whether wanted or not. Heads of families had to buy the same quantity for each member of their establishment; but no one was allowed to use this salt for pickling or corning beef. Another injustice was this: the price varied in different provinces; thus, what would cost 32*s.* in other provinces, was sold by government in Auvergne for 8*s.* As many as 8,000 persons were annually imprisoned in France for infringing the salt laws. See 'Pays de Grande Gabelle,' 'Pays de Petite Gabelle.'

Not till 1340 was the tax extended to all France. Edward III. with a pun called it La Loi Salique.

HISTORY OF LA GABELLE.

Imposed by the Etats Généraux in 1353, and abolished by the Assemblée Constituante 10 May, 1790. It brought into the revenue at one time as much as 60,000,000 livres, and in the reign of Louis XVI. 38,000,000 francs. Some provinces redeemed the tax, others obtained (from sundry causes) exemption from additions to the original levy, so that the greatest inequality existed, and at the time of the revolution one-third of the country paid two-thirds of the tax. Between 1549 and 1553, Poitou, Saintonge, Aunis, Anjou, Limousin, La Marche, Périgord, and Upper Guienne, redeemed the tax; other provinces bought off a partial exemption; while Artois, Flanders, Hénault, Calais, the Boulonnais, Alsace, Béarn, Lower Navarre, and other modern acquisitions of the crown were, like Brittany, wholly exempt from the tax. This inequality of necessity was the cause of smuggling, and we are told that every year there were more than '4,000 saisies domiciliaires, plus de 3,400 emprisonnemens, et plus de 500 condamnations à des peines capitales ou afflictives.' It seems that a temporary tax on salt was imposed by an ordinance of Louis IX. as far back as 1246, by Philippe le Bel in 1286, again by Philippe VI. de Valois in 1340, and in 1353 by the Etats Généraux 'pour des besoins momentanés.' Discontinued in 1358; but Charles V. (1364–1380) made it a permanent tax. Wholly suppressed 28 March, 1790.

Gaberlun'zies. Licensed beggars who were compelled to wear a badge to distinguish themselves from the Thiggers and Scorners (q.v.). Gaberlunzies were called blue-gowns in England.

Gadel'ian Conquest of Ireland (The). Gadelus or Gathelus, an Egyptian and contemporary of Moses, was the son of Scota (daughter of a Pharaoh of Egypt). He descended on Ireland under the conduct of two sons of Milesius (king of Spain), B.C. 1372, and utterly subdued the race of Tuath. From these Gadelians all the kings of Ireland, down to the English conquest in A.D. 1172, descended, and in Irish history are called the 'princes of the Milesian race.'

We are also told that the Irish are called Scots from Scota, the Egyptian princess. Of course these traditions must not be accepted as historical facts, but they are necessary to be known.

Gaelic. Comprehends the Irish, the Highland-Scotch, and the Manx languages.

Gagging Act (The). In England, 1795 (36 Geo. III. cc. 7, 8), for treason and sedition.

Gaisford Prizes (The). One for Greek prose and one for Greek verse. Oxford University. Founded by subscription in memory of Dr. Thomas Gaisford, dean of Christ Church, regius professor of Greek, 1856.

Galeazzo's Lent. A system of torture calculated to prolong the victim's life for forty days. It was the invention of Galeazzo Visconti, lord of Milan (1277, 1322–1328).

Galenists. A branch of Mennonists, founded by Galenus in 1664. They advocate freer views both in doctrine and discipline than the strict Mennonites. See 'Mennonites.'

Galile'ans. Those Jews who held it unlawful to obey a heathen magistrate. Josephus says they agreed in all things with the Pharisees, but insisted that they owed subjection and obedience only to God. When (Luke xxiii. 5) Jesus was represented to Pilate as a Galilean, an insinuation was made that he acknowledged no obedience to Cæsar.

Probably all that was meant is that he was a native of that province. Julian said in his dying moments, 'Thou hast conquered, O Galilean!' The disciples of Jesus were called Galileans (Acts ii. 7).

Galley Ha'pence (The). Genoan coins brought into England by the galleymen who came hither with wine and other merchandise. They were broader than the English ha'penny, but not so thick. They were prohibited by Henry IV. as a legal tender.

Galleys (The). As a punishment in France was fixed by an ordinance of Charles IX. in 1564, to be not less than ten years. The bagnes were substituted for the galleys in 1748; and the name was changed to travaux forcés by the Constituent Assembly in 1798. By the Code Napoléon in 1810, the sentence of travaux forcés included forfeiture, infamy, and branding. Branding was abolished in 1832, and travaux forcés in 1852.

Gallia. The country of the Galli or Gauls. The Latin Galli and Greek Γαλλάται are classic forms of the word Keltai (Celts). The German form is Waelchs, whence our word Welch. Gallia, Wales, and Walloon, all mean the 'land of the Celts.'

For a familiar instance of the interchange of G and W compare Guillaume and William.

Gallia Bracca'ta. Later on, Gallia Narbonensis. Called 'Braccāta' from the braccæ or trousers worn by the natives.

Gallia Coma'ta. All Transalpine Gaul except Gallia Braccāta (q.v.). So called from the long hair worn (coma). It included Belgica, Celtica, and Aquitanica.

Gallia Narbonensis corresponded with the ancient provinces of Languedoc, Provence, and Dauphiné.

Gallic Cæsar (The). Napoleon I.

Gallican Church (The). The liberties of the Gallican Church were asserted in 1438 in the Pragmatic Sanction (q.v.); and in 1512 by the Concordat (q.v.) between Pope Leo X. and François I.; and were distinctly defined by Bossuet in 1682 in his famous 'Four Articles' (q.v.).

Gallic Confession (The), 1599. One of the chief continental confessions of faith by the Calvinistic or Reformed Church of France. See 'Confessions.'

Gallican Liberties, 1682. As opposed to Ultramontanism (q.v.) were thus summarised by Bossuet:—

Que l'Eglise doit être réglé par les canons; que saint Pierre et ses successeurs n'ont reçu de puissance que sur les choses spirituelles; que les règles et les constitutions admises dans le royaume doivent être maintenus, et les bornes posées par nos pères demeurer inébranlables; que les décrets et jugements du pape ne sont irréformables qu'autant que le consentement de l'eglise est intervenu . . . &c.

 The defenders of the libertés gallicanes were Hinemar, Gerson, Bossuet, the Abbé Fleury, the Cardinal de la Luserne, Bausset, Frayssinous, Guillon, Boyer, Affre, &c.

Gallican Liturgy (The). Dates from before the time of Pepin (9th cent.). It is based on the Oriental liturgies, because the first missionaries of Gaul were from Greece. It remained in use till Charlemagne introduced the Gregorian liturgy. The liturgy now used in France is the Roman, with some slight alterations. See 'Ambrosian Liturgy,' 'Spanish Liturgy,' &c.

Gallicans (The). Catholics who insist on what they call the libertés gallicanes, one of which is the distinct separation of the spiritual and temporal powers. They place 'infallibility' not in the pope, but in the whole church presided over by the pope. They acknowledge the authority of General Councils. See 'Gallican Liberties.'

Gal'lowglasses and Kernes. 'Gallowglasses' were ancient Irish heavy-armed foot-soldiers; but 'Kernes' were Irish foot-soldiers of very mean condition, and without armour. See the 'Cent. Mag.' 1890, p. 296.

Game Chicken (The). Pearce, the prize-fighter. He fought with John Gully, who was taken out of the debtors' prison by Colonel Mellish to fight this champion of the ring. Gully was beaten, but afterwards fought Gregson twice, and then retired, to settle at Newmarket.

Game Laws. Before the Carta de Foresta, 1224, the killing of game was punishable with death. Qualifications to kill game were introduced in 1389. Annual certificates required by 25 Geo. III. c. 50 (1785). Permission to sell game given by 1, 2 Will. IV. c. 32 (1831).

In France game laws were abolished in 1789.

Game includes hares, pheasants, partridges, grouse, heath and moor fowls, black-game, and bustards. The close season is their respective times of breeding and rearing.

Gangway. To sit below the gangway in the House of Commons, to sit among the independent members. The gangway is a passage running across the house, which separates the supporters of the government and the opposition from the independent members.

In a ship the gangway is the way out or into the ship. Ang.-Sax. gangan, to go.

Gants Glacés (Les). The Black Mousquetaires during the Fronde war. Very dandified, but brave and daring. See 'Mousquetaire.'

Gaoler of Napoleon at St. Helena (The). Sir Hudson Lowe, military governor of St. Helēna while Napoleon was there in banishment.

Gaping Gulf (The). A book published by John Stubbs, a student of Lincoln's Inn, showing how undesirable it was that Queen Elizabeth should marry the Duc d'Anjou, especially after the frightful massacre of the Huguenots on St. Bartholomew's eve. Stubbs and his publisher were seized and taken to the market-place of Westminster, where both had their right hand cut off by driving a cleaver through the wrist with a mallet. The moment Stubbs lost his hand, he waved his cap with his left hand, crying 'Long live the queen!'

Garde Doloureuse. A castle in the marches of Wales, so called because it was greatly exposed to attacks by the Welsh.

Garde Impériale (La), 1804. Called before the Garde Consulaire, and organised in 1799. It first consisted of 9,775 men, but in 1814 the number was increased to 102,706 men. In 1809 it was subdivided into the Vieille Garde and the Jeune Garde, and admission into it was given only as recompense for merit, and after having served in three campaigns.

It was re-established in 1856 by Napoleon III.

Garde Mobile (La), 1848. Composed chiefly of young soldiers, and ranking between the Garde Nationale and the general army. It was a species of Garde Nationale Mobile for Paris only. It consisted of 24 battalions of 1,000 men each.

Garde Municipale de Paris (La), 1802–1813, and again 1830–1848. The guard charged with the preservation of good order in the city of Paris. In the old monarchy this guard was called the guet, suppressed in 1792, when it was supplanted by the gendarmerie, changed in 1795 into the Légion de police générale of 5,844 men. In 1813 it took the name of the Gendarmerie Impériale de Paris, and in 1816 the Gendarmerie Royale de Paris, and consisted of 1,021 men and 471 mounted police. From 1830–1848 it was called the Garde Municipale, and consisted of twelve companies, four of which were mounted. It was suppressed in 1848, and its place supplied by the Garde Républicaine and the Gendarmerie Mobile. It next became la Garde de Paris, and in 1852 the Gendarmerie de Paris.

Garde Nationale (La), 1789. Improvised by the municipality of Paris on 13 July, and called at first the Garde Bourgeoise. Its badge was a blue and red cockade (the colours of the city); white, the royal colour, was afterwards added by its general, Lafayette. Charles X. disbanded the guard in 1827 for insubordination. It was reorganised in 1830. In 1848 it became a mere mob army of some 200,000 volunteers, but Napoleon III. reduced it to order in 1852, and gave it for motto 'Liberté, ordre public.'

Garde Royale (La), 1815. A corps instituted by Louis XVIII., and consisting of picked men, to which were added two régiments Suisses. Dissolved in July 1830, when they tried in vain to defend Charles X.

Gardes de la Marche (Les), who accompanied the king wherever he went. They consisted of 24 picked noblemen from the Gardes du Corps du Roi (q.v.). See 'Gold Stick.'

Gardes du Corps du Roi (Les), or 'Garde Ecossaise,' 1448. Organised by Charles VII. of France. They consisted of 300 archers, all of whom ranked as gentlemen, and were sumptuously armed, equipped, and mounted. Each one was allowed a squire, a valet, a page, and two yeomen, with corresponding equipage; so that cadets of the best families in Scotland were sent to serve in this honourable corps. They wore the Scotch bonnet and feather, and, in the reign of Louis XI., a massive silver brooch, called a 'Virgin Mary,' the Virgin Mary being made by him their colonel. They wore a loose surcoat of rich blue velvet, with a large white St. Andrew's cross of silver bisecting it before and behind. Suppressed in 1791, but restored by Louis XVIII. in 1814, and formed into six companies, called the Corps Ecossaise, the Corps de Gramont, the Corps de Poix, the Corps de Luxembourg, the Corps de Wagram, and the Corps de Raguse. Finally disbanded in 1830.

One of the two yeomen attached to these guardsmen was called his 'knife-man' (couteliер), from a large knife which he carried to despatch those whom his master had thrown to the ground in a mêlée.

Gardes-côtes (Les). French coast-guards, created in 1791; reorganised in 1799; suppressed in 1814; and re-established in 1831. 'Ils se forment six compagnies de canoniers.'

Gardes Françaises (Les), 1553. Formerly a part of the royal household troops, consisting of ten companies of 100 men each, and having barracks in the faubourgs of Paris. This guard took rank above all the rest of the army. In 1789 it fraternised with the insurgents, and became a part of the Garde Nationale de Paris.

Garden of England. Worcestershire and Kent. Both so called.

Garden of Erin. Carlow, in Leinster.
— Europe. Italy and Belgium. Both so called.
— France. Amboise, in the département of Indre-et-Loire.
— India. Oude.
— Italy. Sicily.
— South Wales. The southern division of Glamorganshire.
— Spain. Andaluci'a.
— the Argentine. Turcuman, a province of Argentinia.
— the East. Ceylon and Burmah. Both so called.

Ceylon is also called 'The Resplendent'; the 'Jewel of the Eastern Sea': the 'Gem of Paradise.' Its climate and productions are quite unrivalled.

— the West. Illinois and Kansas. Both so called.
— the World. The region of the Mississippi.

Garden and the Lane (The). Covent Garden Theatre and Drury Lane Theatre.

The old-fashioned friendly rivalry between the Garden and the Lane is renewed this year [Dec. 1887].—Newspaper paragraph.

Garden of the Mid-West (The). Evesham, in Worcestershire. Famous for table-fruit and kitchen produce.

Garden Sect (The). The disciples of Plato were so called because they attended his lectures in the Academy, a garden in the suburbs of Athens which once belonged to Academos. Epicūros taught in his own private garden.

Garigliano (Rout of the), 1503. The rout of the French, led by Saluce and Bayard (the chevalier sans peur et sans reproche), by Gonsalvo the Great Captain. Above 4,000 French fell in this rout, with all their standards and baggage, tents, provisions, stores, and splendid artillery. A capitulation was signed the next day. In 1860 (Nov. 3) Francis I. king of Naples was routed on the banks of the same river by Victor Emmanuel.

Garrick Fever (The), 1742. A contagious disorder which broke out in Dublin, ascribed to the heat of the theatre crowded to hear Garrick during unusually hot weather.

Garter King of Arms (The), 1417; also 'Principal King of Arms.' Two separate offices held by the same person. It was Henry V. who instituted the Garter King to attend upon knights at their solemnities, call them to their installation, see that their arms are hung over their stalls, to grant arms, and to marshal national funeral processions. See 'Heralds.'

There are altogether four Kings of Arms for England: Garter and Bath; and the two provincial kings CLARENCEUX and NORROY: the former having jurisdiction over all parts south of the Trent, and the latter over all parts north of that river. BATH King of Arms, though not a member of the college, takes precedence next to Garter. The office was created in 1725 for the service of the Order of the Bath. The King of Arms of Scotland is 'Lyon,' and for Ireland 'Ulster.'

Gas from coal. Described by Clayton in 1739. First applied to illumination in 1792 by Murdoch. Introduced into Paris in 1802, into London by Winsor in 1803. Came into general use in London in 1814, and in Paris about 1820. The Gas Company was chartered in 1810 (50 Geo. III., c. 163).

The meter was invented by Crosley in 1815, Clegg's meter in 1816.

Gastein Convention (The), 1865. In which Austria and Prussia agreed to a joint occupation of Schleswig, Holstein, and Lauenburg. See 'Schleswig-Holstein Question.'

Gate of France (The Iron) Longwy, a strong military position.

Gate of Italy (The). That part of the valley of the Adige (3 syl.) which is in the vicinity of Trent and Roverēdo. It is a narrow gorge between two mountain ranges.

Gate of Science (The), or 'Daur ul Ilm.' Shiraz was so called of old. Sadi and Hafiz were both born in Shiraz.

Gate of Tears (The). Babelmandeb, the passage into the Red Sea.

Like some ill-destined bark that steers
In silence through the Gate of Tears.
MOORE, Lalla Rookh (The Fire Worshippers).

Gate of the Mediterranean. Gibraltar.

Gates (The). In Scripture language means the towns and fortresses.

Thy seed shall possess the gate of his enemies.—Gen. xxii.

∴ Gates of Hell = the power or dominion of Satan.
Gates of the Grave = the brink of death.

Gates or Mountain Passes of ASIA MINOR.

The Albanian Gates. Either the pass of Derbend along the Caspian Sea or else the Sarmatian Pass.

The Amanian Gates. Tamir Kapu (or the Iron Gate of the Turks), a Cyclopean arch, where the hills come down to the sea-beach at the head of the gulf.

The Cappadocian Gates. The pass described by Strabo and explored by the Euphratês expedition, leading through Taurus to Marash (ancient Germanica).

The Caspian Gates, 'Caspiæ Portæ' or 'Caspiæ Pylæ,' a defile near Teheran [Teh-ran'], in ancient Media.

The Caucasian Gates. A defile in the Caucăsus range leading from Mosdok to Tiflis. In this narrow valley Strabo tells us the river Arăgon flows. Now called 'Dariel.'

The Cilician Gates. The Taurus Pass (Kulak Bughaz or Gölek Bógház).

Darius's Pass. Across the Amănus, north of Issus, and near the Amanian Gates.

The Gates of Syria. The Pass of Ballan. Pictănus of the 'Jerusalem Itinerary'; Erăna of Cicero. Near this pass was the battlefield of Issus.

Thermop'ylæ, or 'the Hot Gates,' generally called 'Pylæ' or 'The Gates.' The celebrated pass between Thessaly and Locris, immortalised by the heroic defence of Leonĭdas and 300 Spartans against the enormous host of Xerxês.

Gates of China (The). The cluster of rocky islets called 'the Ladrones.'

Gates of the Caspian, or 'Pylæ Caspiæ.' See above, 'Caspian Gates.'

Gates of the Occult Sciences (The). Forty, or as some say forty-eight, books on magic in Arabic. The first twelve on sorcery and enchantment; the thirteenth on disenchantment.

Gatton and Old Sarum. Although without inhabitants, had the right, before 1831, of returning two members of parliament. In the reform agitation 'Gatton and Old Sarum' proved a tour de force.

Gaudents (Les Chevaliers), 1204. A religious order of Italy, whose special work is to protect the widow, the orphan, and the poor. They wear a white dress with a red cross, surmounted with two stars, and follow the rule of the Dominicans, but may marry if they like. Both father and mother must be of noble birth.

Gaul. See 'Gallia.'

Gaultier. 'As aspish as Gault.er. Claude Gaultier was a French advocate (1590–1666), referred to by Boileau.

Dans vos discours chagrins plus aigre et plus mordant
Qu'une femme en furie, ou Gaultier en plaidant
Sat. ix.

Gaurian Dynasty (The). So called from Gaur in West Afghanistan, because Hussein Mahmoud Ghori was governor of Gaur under the Gaznevides (8 syl.), before he declared himself independent in 1155. He overthrew them in 1158, and usurped the kingdom; but the Gaurians were in turn overthrown by the Khans of Kharism in 1218.

The second Gaurian Dynasty was the 'House of Khilji,' which succeeded in 1288. The last of the house (Khusru) was dethroned and put to death, 22 Aug., 1321, by Ghâzi Khan Toghlak, who founded 'The House of Toghlak.'

Gau'tama (Prince). Prince Siddâr'tha, born on the borders of Nepaul B.C. 600, died B.C. 543 at Kusinag'ara in Oudh. He became a Buddh, and was the founder of the Buddhists, which embrace more than a third of the human race.

Father, Suddhôd'ana king of Sâk'ya. Mother, Queen Maya. Wife, Yasôd'hara. City, Kapilavas'tu. Son, Rahûla.

His horse was Kantăra; his pleasure-palace Vish'ramvan'; his charioteer Channa.

As Buddha he dwelt first on the rock Munda by the village of Dâlidd'; then in the solitudes of Senâ'ni; his dress a yellow robe.

 Buddhism consists of four truths and eight precepts which lead to Nirvâ'na, i.e. sinless rest which never changes. The four truths are: Sorrow; desire the cause of sorrow; the conquest of self; and the victory over sorrow. Eight precepts lead to victory. The five commandments of Buddha are: (i.) Kill not; (ii.) Give freely; (iii.) Bear no false witness; (iv.) Shun intoxicating drinks; (v.) Touch not thy neighbour's wife. The eight precepts are: Right doctrine, right purpose, right converse, right conduct, right purity, right thought, right lowliness, and right rapture. (Sir Edwin Arnold, 'The Light of Asia,' bk. i.)

'Lord Buddha — Prince Siddârtha styled in earth.'

Gavelkind. A law whereby all the sons succeed alike. By this tenure an estate does not escheat to the lord (in case of felony), the maxim being 'The father to the bough [gallows], the son to the plough [land].' In default of sons the property descends to daughters.

Suppose A, B, C, to be three sons, and A dies, leaving a daughter; then A's daughter takes her third with B and C.

Gay (Joseph). The pen-name of Captain John Durant Breval, who wrote 'The Confederates,' 1717; 'The Progress of a Rake,' 1733; 'The Lure of Venus,' 1733; &c.

The fabulist and author of the 'Beggars Opera' was John Gay (1688-1732).

Gay Science (The), or 'The Joyous Science,' that of minstrelsy. In Norman French, the Joyeuse Science.

'[I am] an unworthy graduate of the Gay Science, my lord,' said the musician, 'yet let me say for myself, that I will not yield to the king of minstrels, Geoffrey Rudel, though the king of England hath given him four manors for one song.'—Sir W. SCOTT, The Betrothed, ch. xix.

Gazari, Gazeri, or Gacari. The same as the Cathări or Paterini, meaning Puritans. Called in Italy 'Paterini,' 'Cathari,' or 'Gazari'; in France, 'Les Vaudois,' and 'Les Pauvres de Lyon.'

The Albigenses were quite another sect, although both protested against the dogmas of the Catholic Church, and the evil lives of its clergy.

Gazette (The). Published at Venice in 1563.

Published at Paris by Renaudot, 25 May, 1631.

Published at Oxford 1665. See 'Pall Mall.'

The gazette now means with us an official newspaper in which proclamations, notices of appointments, bankruptcies, dissolutions of partnership, and so on are published by government. It is issued every Tuesday and Friday.

Gaznevides (3 syl.). A Tartar and Musulman dynasty which lasted 184 years (999–1183), so called from Gaznê, the birthplace of Alp Tekin the founder. It succeeded the Samanides (3 syl.). The greatest of the Gaznevides was Mahmoud, who reigned in the eastern provinces of Persia (967, 927–1030). He was 'the slave of the slave of the commander of the faithful,' and was the first who was ever called sultan.

Gelal'ean Era (The). This era began 15 March, A.D. 1079. So called from Gelal Eddin Malek Shah, who reformed the old Egyptian calendar.

The reign of Malek was illustrated by the Gelalean Era, which surpasses the Julian and approaches the accuracy of the Gregorian style. GIBBON, chap. lvii.

Gelosi (I.). A celebrated troop of Italian comedians who acted in Venice. They went to Blois in 1577, and then to Paris. In 1588 a fresh company of Gelosi appeared at Blois, and then at Paris, where they acted till 1604.

Gema'ra (The). The second part of the Talmud, or commentary on the Mishna, regarded as the text. There are two commentaries—viz. the Babylonian Gemára (completed A.D. 500), and the Jerusalem Gemára (middle of the 4th cent.), the former of which is by far the better one.

Gemblours (Battle of), Jan., 1578. In which Don John of Austria defeated the Dutch, and spread consternation throughout the Netherlands.

Gemon'iæ Scalæ. The staircase in Rome down which criminals condemned to death descended from their prison cells to execution. It was near the Tiber.

Gemotes (2 syl.). There were several in the Saxon period, as—

The Shire-gemote, or county court, which met twice a year.

The Burg-gemote, met thrice a year.

The Hundred-gemote, met monthly.

The Halle-gemote or 'court-baron.'

The Witena-gemote, which corresponded to the Reichstage (2 syl.) of the Franks. A national assembly.

Gendarme (2 syl.), i.e. gens armata. The men who accompanied a feodal lord to battle. In 1453 Charles VII. appointed a permanent gendarmerie. In the reign of Louis XVI. it was replaced by the Gendarmerie de Luneville. In 1791 the Constituent Assembly converted it into the Gendarmerie départementale; under Napoleon I. it was called the Gendarmerie d'élite; at the restoration it was called the Gendarmerie Royale; in 1830 it was replaced by the Garde Municipale, called in 1848 the Garde Républicaine, and in 1852 the Gendarmerie de Paris.

A Provincial has authority over all the convents, &c., of a province.
A General has authority over all provinces.

General Assembly (The), 1689. The supreme court of the Scotch Kirk, composed of delegates from every presbytery in the church. Two elders are elected by the Town Council of Edinburgh, one by each burgh, a representative is elected by the senate of each of the four universities, and an elder by the church in India. It meets annually in May, and sits for ten days; and if any business is left over it is settled by a commission nominated by the General Assembly.

General Assembly of the Presbyterian Church of Ireland (The), 1840. The union of the General and Secession Synods. It contains about 500 congregations under forty presbyteries.

General Baptists. Those dissenters of the Baptist connection who uphold the doctrine of general redemption in contradistinction to the Particular Baptists, who maintain the Calvinistic doctrines of election, predestination, and reprobation. See 'Free Communionists.'

General Boum. Nickname of Mons. Thiers the French historian (1797–1877). See 'Attila le Petit.'

Thiers, pronounce Te-air.

General Councils. The first at Nice, A.D. 325, against Arius, who denied the divinity of Christ. The second at Constantinople, 381, against Macedonius, who denied the true humanity of Christ and the Holy Ghost. The third at Ephesus, 431, against Nestorius, who said the Virgin Mary was the mother of Jesus, but not θεοτόκος (the mother of God). The fourth at Chalcēdon, 451, against Eutȳchēs, who maintained that the human nature was merged in the divine nature. The fifth at Constantinople, 553, which condemned Origen's doctrine that parts of the scripture are either allegorical or figurative. The sixth at Constantinople, 680, against the Monoth'elites (4 syl.), who maintained that, although Christ had two natures, He had but one will, that of his divine nature. These are the only councils of acknowledged authority.

Council 1 declared Christ to be God ἀληθῶς (truly). Council 2 declared Him to be God and Man τελέως (perfectly). Council 3 declared Him to be God and Man ἀδιαιρέτως (indivisibly). And Council 4 declared him to be God and Man ἀσυγχύτως (distinctly). The decisions of these four councils are acknowledged by the Church of England. See 'Ecumenical Councils.'

Of the Western Church:

1, 2, 3, 4. All of the Lateran in Rome, A.D. 1123, 1139, 1179, 1215 (or 10, 11, 12, 13).

5, 6. Both at Lyons, AD. 1245, 1274 (or 14, 15).

7. Council of Vienne in France, A.D. 1311 (or 16).

8. Council of Constance, A.D. 1414 to 1418 (or 17).

9. Council of Basel, Ferrara, Florence, A.D. 1431 to 1443 (or 18).

10. Council of the Lateran, AD. 1511 to 1517 (or 19).

11. Council of Trent, A.D. 1545 to 1563 (or 20).

12. Council of the Vatican, 1869–1870.

General Non-subscribing Presbyterian Association (The), Ireland, 1850. The union of the three non-subscribing presbyteries of Ireland—viz. 'The United Presbytery or Synod of Munster,' 'The Presbytery of Antrim,' and 'The Remonstrant Synod of Ulster.' They claim the right of private judgment and non-subscription to creeds or confessions of faith.

General Privilege of Peter III. The Magna Charta of Aragon, 1283. The Fueros de Aragon contain a series of provisions against tallages, spoliations of property, sentences of the justiciary without assent of the Cortes, appointments of foreigners to judicial offices, trials of accused persons in places beyond the kingdom, the falsification of the coin, bribery of judges, absolute power, and so on. It was an improvement on our own charter.

Generalissimo Procession (A). An extraordinary religious procession, in which all the chief men of the state took part. In the Generalissimo Procession of Paris, 29 Jan., 1535, the king, François I., all the clergy, ambassadors, lords, presidents of the courts of justice, and all the notables took part. The reliquary of the St. Chapelle was carried through the streets; the head of St. Louis; a piece of the true cross, the crown of thorns, a real nail, the spear head, and the shrine of Ste. Geneviève. The king went bare-headed, holding a lighted torch. Every house passed by was lighted with tapers, and the inmates holding lighted candles sank on their knees.

Généralité, in the ancient régime of France, was the jurisdiction of an intendant-general of finance. The number of these généralités varied. In the 14th century there were four; under François I. the number was increased to sixteen; in 1787 there were thirty-two. Abolished in 1789.

Geneva—Rome, Protestantism—Catholicism. Strictly speaking, Geneva means Calvinism.

I would have you know I care as little for Geneva as for Rome; as little for homilies as for pardons. —Sir W. SCOTT, The Abbot, ch. xvi.

Gene'va Bands, 1652. Clerical bands in imitation of those worn by the Calvinistic Protestants of Geneva. Till the last quarter of the 19th cent. they were worn by the clergy of the established church and university men; but since the Oxford Tract movement both the bands and the black gown have been almost entirely abandoned by clergymen.

Gene'va Bible (The), 1560. The Bible translated by the English exiles at Geneva. The exiles who assisted in this translation were Knox, Coverdale, Goodman, Gibbs, Samson, William Cole, Whittingham, and Gilery. It was the first Bible in Roman letter, divided into verses. This is the famous 'Breeches Bible,' based on Tyndale's translation. See 'Bibles.'

Coverdale had already produced his own translation in 1535, and had superintended the production of the 'Great Bible,' 1539.

Geneva Catechisms (The), 1536. A larger and shorter formulary, the work of Calvin. A standard work in Switzerland, the Netherlands, France, and Hungary.

Luther published a larger and smaller catechism 1529; and a larger and shorter catechism were compiled in the reign of Edward VI., the shorter one by Cranmer, and the larger one by Peynet or Ponet. There is also a larger and shorter catechism of the Presbyterian Churches, the shorter one published in 1647, and the larger one in 1648. These form part of the 'Westminster Confession of Faith.'

Geneva Convention (The), 1863. An international agreement to respect the persons and property of those who give voluntarily their services in times of war to attend on the sick and wounded. They must have a recognised costume, flag, and arm-badge (a red cross on a white ground). If taken prisoners they are to be discharged without ransom. Often called 'The Red Cross Society.'

First brought into operation in the Franco-German War 1870-71. The idea was popularised by a book written by M. Durant, Un Souvenir de Solferino, 1862, and the Convention was held the following year at Geneva, attended by delegates from Austria, Baden, Bavaria, Belgium, France, Great Britain, Hanover, Hesse-Darmstadt, Italy, Prussia, Russia, Spain, Saxony, Sweden, Switzerland, and Würtemberg.

Gene'va Formula (The), 1543. Published six years before the First Book of Edward VI. It was the first to originate the idea of making the singing of psalms take the place of vocal response on the part of the people. Provision was made for extemporaneous prayer, and for prayer on special occasions.

Geneviève (Canons Regular of Ste.), 1615. Ratified by Gregory XV. The abbey of Ste. Geneviève was built by Eugenius III. in 1148.

Pronounce Zhan'-ve-ave.

Gengiskha'nians (The), or 'Gengisk'hanides' (4 syl.). A Persian dynasty (1225-1258), which supplanted the Kharis'mians (q.v.).

The four kings were Gengis Khan, 1225; Oktai, 1229; Kaiouk, 1242; and Mangou, 1250. Mangou sent his younger brother Houlagou to conquer the west of Asia. This done, the conqueror fixed his residence at Tauris, in Persia; took Bagdad in 1258 from the Califs; and carried his conquests into Syria. He succeeded Mangou in 1258, and formed a branch line of the Gengiskhanians, which continued to 1350, when it gave place to the Ilkhanians.

Genoese War (The), 1378-1381. The Venetians call the 'War of Chiozza' (q.v.) the 'Genoese War.' And the new nobles aggrandised after the war they call 'The Nobles of the Genoese War' ('I Nobili della Guerra di Genova.') See 'Nobles of the, &c.'

Genovefains. Canons of the abbey de Ste. Geneviève, which formed what is called the 'Congrégation de France,' instituted by Clovis in 500. They followed the rule of St. Augustine, and wore a white robe with a rochet, but when abroad a black cloak.

Gente Grassa (The). The substantial tradesmen of Italy, like the Medici.

Gente (2 syl.).

Gentilhomme de la Peinture (Le). Rubens (1577–1640) is so called by Charles Blanc.

Gentiluom'ini (The). The masters of Venice both by sea and land, corresponding with the burghers of Florence. The lowest class was the popolari or plebeians, then the cittadini, then came the gentiluomini, about 3,000 in number.

Gentle (The). Izaak Walton, the Angler (1593–1683). Angling is called 'The Gentle Craft.' Probably there is something of a pun in the phrase, referring to the bait of gentles used by anglers.

Gentle Shepherd. George Grenville (1712–1770).

In 1763 Sir Francis Dashwood proposed a tax upon cider and perry, which Pitt (Earl Chatham) objected to. Whereupon George Grenville declared the tax inevitable, and added, if Pitt objected to it, 'Let him tell me where the money is to be raised, let him tell me where,' he repeated. Pitt, who sat opposite, hummed, in tone mimicking Grenville, the beginning of a popular tune of the day, 'Gentle Shepherd, tell me where?' The House was convulsed with laughter, and Pitt walked out.

Gentleman George. George IV., also called Handsome Al Raschid. See 'Fum.'

Gentleman Highwayman (The). I. Tom King, friend of Richard (Dick) Turpin; the 'Pyladês and Orestês of the road.' Accidentally shot by Turpin in a scuffle, in 1739.

George I. First of the Hanoverian dynasty in England. He died on his road to Osnaburg, and was buried in Hanover (1660, 1714–1727). He could not speak a word of English, and looked on Great Britain only as a useful appendage to Hanover.

Father, Ernestus duke of Brunswick, &c.; Mother, Sophia daughter of Elizabeth, granddaughter of James I. of England; Wife, Sophia Dorothy of Zell, only daughter of George William duke of Brunswick and Zell; Issue, George [II.], his successor, and Sophia, who married Frederick William of Prussia, and was the mother of Frederick II. the Great.

His style.—George, Dei Gratia, of Great Britain, France, and Ireland, king; Defender of the Faith.

His Mistresses were the Countess Platen and Madame Herrengard Melusina von Schlemberg, who said to the London rabble: 'Mein people, why do yo abuse us thus? We do be come here to England only for all your goods.'

* * Of course George I. had no hereditary right to the throne of England, but only a parliamentary right. His mother was a granddaughter of James I., and the line of his father runs back to Maud, daughter of our Henry II.

George II. King of Great Britain, second king of the House of Hanover (1683, 1727–1760). He died on Saturday, 25 Oct. Like his father, he looked on Great Britain only as the appendage of Hanover.

Father, George I.; Mother, Sophia Dorothy daughter of George William duke of Zell; Wife, Caroline Wilhelmina of Anspach; Issue, three sons and five daughters. Frederick Lewis (Prince of Wales), father of George III., died about ten years before his father, George II. His nickname was Prince Tite.

His style and title.—George, Dei Gratia, of Great Britain, France, and Ireland, king; Defender of the Faith.

From Frederick Lewis prince of Wales the Princess Alexandra is descended, thus: His youngest daughter, Caroline Matilda, married Christian VIII. of Denmark, the son of whom was Frederick VI. of Denmark; the son of Frederick VI. was Frederick VII.; the son of Frederick VII. was Christian IX., whose daughter is Alexandra princess of Wales (great-great-great-grandchild of George II.).

George III. Son of Frederick Lewis prince of Wales, and grandson of George II. (1738, 1760–1820), born in London, and the first of the line of Brunswick who was a Briton born. He married Charlotte daughter of Charles duke of Mecklenburg-Strelitz, by whom he had fifteen children, viz. nine sons and six daughters. The eldest son George [IV.] succeeded to the throne, but he had previously been prince-regent. Familiarly called 'Farmer George,' or 'the Farmer King.'

Style and title.—From 1760 to 1800:

George, D.G. of Great Britain, France, and Ireland, king; Defender of the Faith. From 1800 to 1820: George, D.G. of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, king; Defender of the Faith.

GEORGE III. was the father of GEORGE IV., WILLIAM IV., and Edward duke of Kent (the father of Queen VICTORIA.)

George IV. King of Great Britain, &c., Electoral Prince of Brunswick-Luneburg, Duke of Cornwall and Rothsay, Earl of Chester and Carrick, Baron of Renfrew, Lord of the Isles, hereditary Grand Steward of Scotland, &c. Born 1762, regent from Feb. 1811, king 1820, died Saturday, 26 June, 1830.

Father, GEORGE III.; Mother, Sophia Charlotte of Mecklenburg-Strelitz; Wife, his cousin Caroline, daughter of the Prince of Brunswick; Issue, Charlotte, who married Leopold (afterwards king of Belgium). Nicknames: The Magnificent (from his love of gorgeous apparel), Prince Florizel, Fum the Fourth, The Fat Adonis of Fifty, the First Gentleman of Europe. Style and title, as George III. after 1800.

At the age of sixteen he fell in love with Mrs. Robinson, an actress, who received an annuity of 500*l.* a year; in 1785 he married Mrs. Fitzherbert, a widow, but the marriage was a 'German one.' After his marriage with Caroline of Brunswick his favourite lady was the Countess of Jersey.

George (A St.). A badge worn over the armour by every English soldier in the 14th cent., and subsequently. On the invasion of Scotland by Richard II., in 1386, and at the battle of Agincourt, it was ordained that Everi man, of what estate, condicion, or nation they be of, so that he be of oure partie, shall bere a signe of the armes of St. George, large (bothe before and behynde) upon pareil that yf he be slayne or wounded to deth, he that hath so doon to hym shall not be putte to deth for defaulte of the crosse that he lacketh. And that non enemy do bere the same token or crosse of St. George, notwithstandyng if he be prisoner, upon payne of deth.

' The St. George is a red cross on a white field. In the Order of the Garter it is a figure of St. George on horseback piercing the fallen dragon, on a mount.

Geougen (The). A gang of Tartar robbers, enlisted under Moko, slave of a Topa prince. The gang swelled into a camp, then into a tribe, and then into a numerous people. The posterity of Moko assumed the title of Khan or Cagan A.D. 400.

German Athens. Wittenberg was so called by Giordano Bruno.

German Catholics. A religious party in the German Catholic Church with independent congregations. They call themselves 'Christian Catholics.' They are not Protestants. This party sprang into being in 1844, when Bishop Arnoldi appointed a pilgrimage to the Holy Coat at Trèves, which called forth a protest from J. Ronge (2 syl.), a priest of Silesia, who characterised the relic as the 'coat of idolatry.'

German Confederation (The). I. 'Der Deutsche Bund,' 8 June, 1815; constituted by treaty of Vienna, after the battle of Waterloo, to create a barrier against French aggression. Its object was to grant to the thirty-nine states of Germany external and internal security. Of the states Austria and Prussia were large kingdoms, and Bavaria, Saxony, Hanover, and Würtemberg were minor kingdoms; the other thirty-three states were grand duchies, free cities, &c. Each state was bound to supply 1 per cent. of its population to form an army in time of war. Austria presided, but in 1866 was excluded from the Bund by the treaty of Prague.

The princedom of Gotha became extinct in 1826; the duchy of Anhalt-Cothen was annexed to Anhalt-Dessau in 1847; the principalities of Hohenzollern-Hechingen and of Hohenzollern-Sigmaringen were annexed to Prussia in 1849; the duchy of Anhalt-Bernberg became extinct in 1863; and in 1866 Hanover, Hesse-Cassel, Nassau, Frankfort, and part of Hesse-Darmstadt were annexed to Prussia.

II. 1871. During the Franco-Prussian war (Nov. 1871), Bavaria, Würtemberg, Baden, Hesse-Darmstadt, and Saxony joined the North German Confederation, which consisted of Prussia and the states north of the Main. By this extension the North German Confederation was changed to the 'German Confederation,' and on 18 Jan., 1871, the king of Prussia was elected German emperor.

After the Seven Weeks' War, 1866, the following states formed a part of Prussia:—The kingdom of Hanover (annexed); Hesse-Cassel, Nassau, and Frankfort (annexed); Lauenburg (since 1865), Schleswig and Holstein (annexed); Kaulsdorf, Gersfeld, and Orl (ceded by Bavaria); Hesse-Homburg, Amt-Homburg, Amt-Meisenheim (ceded by Hesse-Darmstadt).

German Emancipation War (The), 1813. That is, to emancipate Germany from the hands of Napoleon. The battles fought in 1813 were Lützen and Bautzen, Grossbeerin, Katzbach, Dresden, Culm, Dennewitz, Leipzig, and Hanau. The last of the battles was that of Waterloo in 1815.

German Emperor. Not 'Emperor of Germany,' but either 'Deutscher Kaiser' or 'Kaiser des Deutschen Reiches' (Kaiser of the German Dominion). See 'Prussia (King of)' for his various titles.

German Florence (The). Dresden, noted for its architecture and collections of art.

German Herrick (The). Paul Flemming of Silesia (1609–1640). Some of his Anacreontic odes are equal to those of the great Greek erotic poet. His sonnet on 'Myself,' and his 'Epitaph,' are gems of heaven-born poetry.

German Iliad (The). The Nibelungen Lied, the most important poem of the middle ages. It is in thirty-nine books, and is about as long as Milton's 'Paradise Lost.' The poem is divided into two parts. The first part contains the marriage of Siegfried and Kremhild, and ends with the death of the bridegroom; the second part is the marriage of the widow with Etzel, in order to revenge the murder of her first husband.

German Knights of the Cross (The). The 'Teutonic knights' (q.v.).

Ghaz'nevides (3 syl.). A Tartar Musulman dynasty, which reigned over a large part of Persia and Hindûstan. So called from Ghazna or Gazna, the birthplace of Alp-Tekin, who drove out the Samanides (3 syl.). There were only four kings of this dynasty—viz. Alp Tekin (960–975), Sebek Tekin (975–999), Mahmoud (999–1028), and Masoud (1028–30).

The Ghaznevides, called the sixth dynasty, contemporary with the Califs, reigned only over a part of Persia. It was succeeded by the Seldjûks of Persia.

Ghib'ellines (3 syl.). A political party in Italy which maintained the supremacy of the German kaiser-kings over the Italian states in opposition to that of the pope. The Guelfs were supporters of the pope and of Italian independence. The Ghibellines were the imperial party, the Guelfs were the papal party. The strife began with a dispute about investiture between Gregory VII. and the kaiser-king Heinrich IV. The first time the names were used as a battle-cry was at the combat of Weinsberg, between Konrad of Franconia and Heinrich the Lion, in 1140. The names continued in use till 1450.

The commander of the Imperialists at the battle of Weinsburg was Friedrich duke of Suabia (the king's cousin), who lived at Weblingen, corrupted into Ghibelline. Guelf was the name of the leader of the papal army.

Ghebres (The), i.e. infidels. All non-Musulmans except Jews and Christians. The appellation is more especially applied to the followers of Zoroaster the fire-worshipper. Also called Parsees, from Farsistan, their original locality. They are gentle, faithful, benevolent, and hospitable. (Persian ghebr, an infidel.)

Ghebres, pronounce Ge'bers (hard g).

Ghengis Khan (Dynasty of), 1222–1259. Ghengis (the Great Warrior) is a Chinese title given to Temudgin for his vast exploits. His empire included Persia. In 1250 his fourth son, Mangou, succeeded his brother in China, and for eight years Persia had no separate sovereign.

Ghent. Notorious for its rebellions. In the public library of Flanders is a book entitled 'The 120 revolts of the good city of Ghent.'

Ghent, pronounce Gah'n (with n nasal).

Ghent (Peace of). 24 Dec., 1814. Between Great Britain and the United States, bringing to an end the second American War.

Ghorides (2 syl.), 'Gaurides,' or 'Ghorians.' A dynasty which reigned in Persia from 1158 to 1213, founded by Hussein Mahmoud Ghori, governor of Gaur or Ghor in Afghanistan. Under Ala Eddin they conquered all Persia and drove out the Ghaznevides (3 syl.) in 1158; but in 1213 they were supplanted by the khans of Kharizm.

A branch of the House of Ghor reigned in Hindûstan from 1152 to 1215, when the Kharismians drove them out; but the Kharismians, in 1526, were in turn supplanted by the Pathans.

Giants' Stairs of Venice. A flight of forty-five stone steps leading to the doge's palace at Venice. Marino Falie'ri was beheaded on the landing of the staircase Friday, 16 April, 1355. On the same landing the doge was accustomed to take the oath after his election, before he entered the palace. The giant stairs are guarded by two noble statues of Mars and Neptune, emblems of the military and naval power of Venice; the works of Sansovi'no of Florence (1479–1570).

Giaour, a corruption of the Turkish 'Yaoor,' is applied by Moslems to a Christian, and means an infidel.

Pronounce, djowr.

Gibraltar (Siege of), Sept. 1782. Gibraltar was taken by Sir George Rooke in 1704, and ceded to the English in 1713 by the treaty of Utrecht. Several efforts have been made to wrest it from our hands, but the most serious was the siege in Sept. 1782, when the Spaniards invested the fort, which was gallantly defended by General Elliott. When all hope of reducing the place was abandoned, the Spaniards determined to intercept the supplies and starve the garrison into a surrender; but Lord Howe succeeded in supplying abundant food, and the Spaniards raised the siege.

Gibraltar of America, or the New World. Quebec, a city on Cape Diamond in the province of Quebec.

Gibraltar of Greece. A precipitous rock 700 feet above the sea.

Gibraltar of the West Indies (The). The Bermudas.

These islands were discovered by Juan Bermudes, a Spaniard, in 1552; but, being colonised by Sir George Somers, they are sometimes called 'Somers Isles.'

Gilbert's Act, 1782. To incorporate parishes into unions, whereby parishes under the power of landlords were not depopulated in order to save poor rates.

Gilbertines (3 syl.). A religious order founded by St. Gilbert of Sempringham in England, who lived 1084–1190.

Gilded Youth (The). See 'Jeunesse Dorée.'

The prisons of Lyons, Avignon, Marseilles, Tarascon, and Toulon were no sooner filled with Jacobins than they were broken open by what were called the 'gilded youth,' and the prisoners massacred.—HOWITT, Hist. of Engl. (Geo. III. 1795, p. 143).

Gillies' Hill (The), 1314. The hill behind which the gillies were stationed at the battle of Bannockburn to guard the luggage. When they saw the battle was going in favour of the Scotch, they could restrain themselves no longer, but rushed forwards to share the victory and the booty. The English, thinking them to be a body of reserves, lost heart and fled, and the Scotch obtained a complete and signal victory.

The g of 'Gillies' is hard, and not like j, as in gin.

Gilt Lance (A). A symbol of vassalage. A royal vassal, when he first paid homage, received a gilt lance to denote that he was henceforth the king's man [puer regis].

Gin Act (The), 1736. Sir Joseph Jekyll, greatly concerned at the excess of gin drunk by the poor, proposed to put a heavy tax on it, so as to put it out of the reach of the operative. The duty he suggested was to be 20*s.* a gallon on all gin sold retail, and 50*l.* yearly for the licence to a retailer.

Gipsy (The). I. Dudley earl of Leicester (1532–1588).

II. Antonio Sola'rio, the painter and illuminator, was called 'Zingaro' (1382-1455).

The favourite greyhound of Charles I. was named 'Gipsey.' See 'Memoirs,' 329.

Giraldus Cambrensis, i.e. Gerald the Welshman. His father was a Norman and his mother Welsh. His name was Gerald or Girauld de Barri (1147–1222).

Gir'lingites (3 syl.). The followers of Mary Ann Girling, of Tiptoe, Hordle, Hampshire. According to her manifesto, dated 1883, Jesus Christ was not only God and man, but man and woman; the only visible part being the man nature. Mrs. Girling says: 'I am the second appearing of Jesus, the bride, the Lamb's wife, the God-mother, and there will not be another.' This crazy woman had some thousands of deluded followers.

Girls' Friendly Society (The), 1875. The objects are (1) to band together in one society ladies as associates, and girls as members, for mutual help, sympathy, and prayer. (2) To encourage purity of life, dutifulness to parents, faithfulness to employers, and thrift. (3) To provide the privileges of the society for its members, wherever they may be, by giving them an introduction from one branch to another.

Giron'dins (Les). In English 'The Giron'dists.' The pure republican party in the National Assembly and National Convention of the first French revolution. So called because it consisted mainly of the deputies of the Gironde. This party was distinguished for its oratory, and for a time dominated the assembly; but, horrified at the September massacres, they condemned the Reign of Terror, and tried to bring in more moderate measures. This drew upon them the hatred of the demagogues; and on 31 May, 1793, some twenty-nine of the Girondists were arrested at the instigation of Robespierre, and on 31 Oct. twenty of them were guillotined, amongst whom were Brissot, Gensonné, Vergniaud, Ducos, and Silléry. Valazé stabbed himself while he stood in the dock under his mockery trial.

They were called Federalists, because they wanted to unite all the departments of France into a Federacy like that of the United States of America.

Girton College, 1873. A college for ladies, about two miles from the town of Cambridge.

Gisors', in Normandy (Peace of), March 1114. A treaty between Henry I. of England and Louis VI., in settlement of certain disputes respecting the rights of William the son of Henry I. to certain territories in France. By this treaty Maine and Brittany were ceded to Henry.

Giunta (The). Of Venice. Consisted originally of ten patricians, but at a later period of twenty. It was sometimes called 'The Twenty.'

Gladiatorial War (The), B.C. 73. Headed by Spartăcus, a Thracian, who had served in the Roman army, but had turned brigand, and, being captured, was made a gladiator. Crassus brought this war to an end at Brundusium, but Pompey claimed the honour because he accidentally intercepted 5,000 fugitives and put them to the sword. Crassus hanged 6,000 of the captives along the road from Rome to Capua.

Glasgow Arms (The). A tree, a bird, a bell, and a ring. For the legend see 'Phrase and Fable,' p. 345.

> Here is the tree which never grew;
> Here is the bird which never flew;
> Here is the bell which never rang;
> Here is the fish which never swam.

The tree is the hazel, which supplied St. Kentigern with the torch with which he lighted the lamps of Culross Cathedral.

The bird is St. Serf's robin-redbreast restored to life by St. Kentigern.

The bell is the one brought by the saint from Rome, and hung in the tree to summon the people to prayer.

The fish is the salmon caught in the Clyde, containing the ring given to Oina, the faithless queen, as a love-token by the king (7th cent.).

Glass Houses. Those who live in glass houses should not throw stones. When the Scotch came over in throngs with James I., the English were greatly enraged against them; and, instigated by the Duke of Buckingham and others, the windows of the houses occupied by these interlopers were broken in all directions. A party of Scotchmen combined and retaliated by smashing the windows of Buckingham's mansion, which was called 'the Glass House,' and the duke brought his complaint to the king, who answered, 'Those who live in glass houses, Steenie, shouldn't throw stones.'

Glassists or 'Glassites' (The), 1728. Followers of John Glass, afterwards called 'Sandemanians' (q.v.). This Scotch sect was founded in the 18th cent. Members are admitted by a holy kiss, and abstain from all animal food that has not been well bled. John Glass condemned all national establishments of religion, and maintained the 'congregational system.'

Robert Sandeman was a disciple of John Glass.

Glencoe. See 'Massacre of Glencoe.'

Glipping. Eric V. or VII. king of Denmark was so called because of his incessant habit of winking (1249, 1259–1286); murdered 22 Nov.

Globe Theatre (The). Of which Shakespeare was a shareholder; was built in 1598, and a patent for it was granted in 1603 by James I. It was burnt down in 1613, rebuilt in 1614, and demolished somewhere between 1640–1650.

Glomerel Schools, 14th cent. Grammar schools in Cambridge connected with the University. In these schools the lads were taught the elements of Latin. A dozen glomerel schools were under the inspection of a Master of Glomery (Magister Glomariæ), who had a bedell to attend him. On these glomerels the University conferred the degree of 'Master in Grammar.'

Gloria (The), or 'Great Doxology' (Luke ii. 14). 'Glory to God in the highest, and on earth peace, good will towards man.' The 'Gloria in excelsis,' sung in the Latin Church after the introitus (except on the penitential days of Advent and during Lent).

Called the 'Great Doxology' to distinguish it from the 'Glory be to the Father, and to the Son, and to the Holy Ghost,' sung at the end of each psalm.

Glorieuse Rentrée (La). The 'Glorious Return,' 1689. The return of certain of the Vaudois under the leadership of Arnaud. They had been driven from their homes by Duke Victor Amadeus, at the command of Louis XIV., who threatened to invade Savoy if the Vaudois were not driven out. Most of them took refuge in Switzerland, and about 800 contrived to get back.

Glorious First of June (The).

I. In English history, 1 June, 1794. The victory of Lord Howe, with 25 ships, over the French fleet, with 26 ships. Probably the phrase is French, and refers to the sinking of 'Le Vengeur.'

II. In French history, 1 June, 1794. When it is said that 'Le Vengeur' refused to surrender to Lord Howe, but, instead of so doing, the crew sank the ship, and all went alive into the deep, shouting, 'Vive la République!' Villaret de Joyeuse had command of the vessel.

The English version is that Lord Howe, with 25 ships, encountered the French fleet of 26 ships off Ushant. In less than an hour the French admiral fled. The English captured two ships of eighty guns, and four seventy-fours. Another seventy-four sank immediately after it was captured. As for the 'Le Vengeur,' the crew craved help, and many were picked up by the victorious English. All London was illuminated for three nights for this victory, and King George visited Lord Howe personally on board his flagship, gave him a sword, and made him a Knight of the Garter.

Glorious Fourth (The), i.e. of July. The day on which Americans celebrate the anniversary of their independence (1776).

Glorious Three Days (The). In French history. Tuesday, Wednesday, and Thursday, 27, 28, and 29 July, 1830, when Paris rose in arms against Charles X., compelling him to flee and abdicate. Thursday the 29th is called 'The Glorious Third.'

Glory and Sun of the East (The). Kharim Khan, vakel (regent), 1753–1779. He constituted Shiraz the capital of Persia, and restored peace to the country.

He never would take the title of shah.

Glory of Bristol (The). The 'Great Britain,' an iron steamship built at Bristol. Its dimensions were 1,795 tons register, and 3,270 tons burden. Launched in 1845. The engineers were I. Brunel, jun., and Mr. Bremner.

Gloucester. Called the 'Good Duke of Gloucester,' Lord Protector of England. Was born 1391 and 'found dead' in 1447. He was the brother of Henry V., and named protector during the minority of his nephew Henry VI. He married Eleanor Cobham in 1435, who was accused of witchcraft and imprisoned in 1441. Gloucester was arrested for high treason 11 Feb., and found dead (probably the work of Cardinal Beaufort) 28 Feb., 1447.

Glover's Roll, 1586. A copy of the famous Roll of Arms made by Glover, Somerset Herald, and preserved in the College of Arms. It goes back to the reign of Henry III. The original vellum roll is lost.

Gloves. Bishops, in the Catholic Church, wear violet gloves, cardinals scarlet, and popes white.

In maiden assizes, both in England and Scotland, the presiding judge is presented with a pair of white kid gloves.

Women first used gloves in France in the reign of Henri III. They were knitted gloves. Leather gloves were not introduced till the reign of Louis XIV. Their importation into England was forbidden in 1766 (6 Geo. III. c. 19).

The Greeks and Romans did not wear gloves, but used an armour to protect their hands in war.

Gluckists, 1774–1780. Followers of Johann Christoph von Gluck, of Bohemia, in the great musical war between Piccini and Gluck. Gluck tried to reform the Neapolitan school, in which the dialogue and business of opera were wholly subsidiary, and the music was the only thing regarded. The scenes were unconnected, and only served as vehicles for the airs and orchestra. Those who thought Gluck's reform an improvement were called Gluckists, but those who thought the music only was worth consideration in opera were called Piccinists, from Nicolo Piccini of Naples, a contemporary composer.

Piccini's fame rests on his 'Didon,' 1783, and 'Roland,' 1778; Gluck's fame rests on his 'Orfeo,' 'Alceste,' 'Armida,' 'Iphigénie en Aulide,' and 'Iphigénie en Tauride.' The 'Alceste' (of Euripedes), 'Iphigénie en Aulide' (of Racine), and the 'Iphigénie en Tauride,' are in the French language. The 'War' in France was musico-political. Marie Antoinette, a German by birth, was a Gluckist, and therefore all her enemies were Piccinists. Wagner followed Gluck in his operatic reforms.

A free translation of a French squib:—

One day the Muses had a quarrel
To whom they should present the laurel—
Whether to Gluck or to Piccini;
They could not for the world agree
'Twixt tweedledum and tweedledee;—
'There's not a pin to choose between ye.
So Pic or Gluck (say I) or neither,
Or both, for aught I care, or either;
More undecided than Babouc,
Here's heads for Pic, and tails for Gluck.'

Glutton-masses. Celebrated five times a year. The people in the vicinity brought to the secular clergy all sorts of roast and boiled meats, with pasties and other viands, with strong drinks of every sort. As soon as mass could be despatched, the clergy and people of the different parishes set to in good earnest to see who could devour and drink the most in honour of the Blessed Virgin.

Gnosticism. The Gnostics taught that God lived in divine light, called πλήρωμα, and was all in all. The next stage was a long succession of æons, in which the Demiurgos, or Creator, appeared. Then followed Man, an earthy compound with an imprisoned soul. Those souls which shall be able to throw off corruption will join the pleroma, the rest will pass into other bodies. They supposed man to be tripartite, having a πνεῦμα or spirit derived from the pleroma, a ψυχή or soul bestowed by the Demiurgos, and a body or ὕλη of matter. Christ came to liberate the pneuma from the psychê and hylê. They despised the body and mortified it, and of course preferred celibacy to wedlock. For the same reason they denied the resurrection of the body, and maintained that its only resurrection was in baptism. They rejected the divinity and humanity of Jesus. His divinity, in that He was inferior to God; his humanity, in that his body was only a sort of phantom. All diseases they ascribed to malignant imps who had power over nature.

Evil, say the Gnostics, is the opposite of Good, and therefore of God. If God is a spirit, matter is the opposite, and evil must be in matter, and hence the antagonism between matter and God.

Of Gnostics there were more than fifty sects, of which the chief were the Basilidians, Valentidians, Marcionites, and later on the Manichæans. They flourished in the 2rd cent., and disappeared in the 5th.

Gnostics. All those multifarious sects which welded Greek, Roman, and other philosophies with Christianity. Such as the systems of Aristotle, Plato, Pythagŏras, Heraclītos, Empedoclês, Mysticism, Demonology, and the science of Cabbala. Thus, accepting the person of Christ, the Gnostics taught that he was an æon sent from heaven to reclaim the better part of the human race. Some maintained that the divine and human nature of Christ united at baptism, and separated at the crucifixion, when 'God forsook him.' Others maintained that his humanity was a mere illusion. Their canonical books are widely different to those received by the Christian Church in our days.

They are the 'Prophecies of Cain,' the 'Writings of Pachur,' the 'Psalms of Valentinus and Bardesanês,' 'Gnostic Hymns by Marcos,' the 'Books of Adam, Enoch, Moseh, Eliah, Isajah,' with books called 'Barkor,' 'Armagil,' 'Barbelon,' 'Balsamum,' 'Lensiboras,' &c.

Gnostics. Of Syria: Saturninus, Bardesanês, Tatian, and Sevērus.

Of Asia: Cerdo, Marcion, Lucian or Lucan, and Apellês.

Of Alexandria: Valentīnus, Basilidês, Carpocrātês, Heracleon, Ptolemæus, Secundus, Marcus, Colobarsus.

Lesser Gnostic Sects: Sethians, Cainites, and Ophites.

All in the first two centuries.

Gobbo (Il). The Hunchback. I. Peter Paul Bonzi of Cortōna, the famous painter (1580–1640).

II. Lonati of Milan, the famous violinist (17th–18th cents.).

Gobelin Tapestry, or 'Tapestry of the Gobelins.' A famous tapestry made in the Faubourg St.-Marcel, Paris, and so called from the brothers Gobelin, dyers from Reims, who made a fortune by their scarlet dye in the reign of François I. Louis XIV. in 1667 converted the business into a royal manufacture, and employed eminent artists, like Lebrun, to invent designs. It was then designated 'The Royal Hotel of the Gobelins,' and the manufactures produced were called 'The Tapestry of the Gobelins.'

The tale is that a dyer of Leyden one day left on a window seat lined with tin a bottle of aqua regia near some cochineal which he was using. The bottle was accidentally thrown down, and mixing with the cochineal produced an exquisite scarlet dye. The man thought the tin had something to do with it, and by mixing in cream of tartar first some finely-powdered cochineal and then some tin in solution succeeded in discovering the famous dye.

God of Flowers (The). So Simon Varelst, the great flower-painter, called himself.

God save the King. The nations' anthem of Great Britain and of Prussia. Was (according to Cappell) the work of Dr. Henry Carey, both words and music (1696–1743). Cappell says it was composed as a birthday hymn for George II., and performed for the first time in 1740 at the Mercers' Company.

The words are an imitation of the 'Domine salvum fac regem' of the Catholic Church service. Some still ascribe the words and music to Dr. John Bull (1563-1591), professor of music in Gresham College, and chamber-musician to James I.

God-Bote. An ecclesiastical fine paid for offences against God.

Man-bote was a fine paid for slaying a man.

God's Congregation of poor unarmed Christian Brothers, 1537. So Simon Menno of Friesland called his followers. See 'Mennonites.'

God's House (The League of). 'La Ligia de la Chiada.' Switzerland; for the independence of the territory previously subject to the Bishop of Coire. Formed between 1424–1436.

God's Peace, 1035. See 'Holy Peace.'

God's Truce, 1040. A suspension of arms from sundown on Wednesday till sunrise on the Monday following, and on all festivals. It superseded the 'Holy Peace' (q.v.), 1035, which was an entire cessation of arms. All princes and barons bound themselves to abstain from feuds and spoliation on the days prohibited.

Goddess of Liberty (The), 10 Aug., 1793. The Goddesses of Liberty and of Reason were enthroned by the French Convention at the suggestion of Chaumette, and the cathedral of Notre Dame de Paris was desecrated for the purpose. The wife of Momoro the printer was the best of these 'goddesses.' The procession was attended by the municipal officers and national guards, while troops of ballet girls carried torches of truth. Incredible as it may seem, Gobet (the archbishop of Paris), and nearly all the bishops, vicars, canons, priests, and curés of Paris, stripped themselves of their canonicals, donned the red nightcap, and joined in this blasphemous mockery. So did Julien of Toulouse, a Calvinistic dissenting minister. See 'Goddess of Reason.'

Mrs. Momoro, it is admitted, made one of the best goddesses of Reason, though her teeth were a little defective.—CARLYLE, French Revolution, vol. iii. bk. v. 4.

Goddess of Reason (The), 10 Nov., 1793. A festival was given at Notre Dame, Paris, in honour of the 'Goddess of Reason,' who was personated by Mlle. Candeille of the Opera, one of the earliest of these 'goddesses.' She wore a red Phrygian cap, a white frock, a blue mantle, and tricolour ribbons. Her head was filleted with oak-leaves, and in her hand she carried the pike of Jupiter-Peuple. In the cathedral a sort of temple was erected on a mound, and in this temple (called the Temple of Philosophy) Mlle. Candeille was installed. Young girls crowned with oak-leaves were her attendants, and sang hymns to her honour. See 'Goddess of Liberty.'

The two goddesses—one of Liberty and one of Reason—have caused some confusion of names; and similar installations were repeated at Lyons and other places, as well as at Notre Dame and St. Sulpice.

Mlle. Maillard, the actress, is mentioned by Lamartine as one of the goddesses, who was compelled, much against her will, to play the part.

And Mlle. Aubray was one of the goddesses of Reason.

A new religion. Demoiselle Candeille, of the Opera; a woman fair to look upon when well rouged. She, borne on palanquin, shoulder high, with red woollen nightcap, in azure mantle, garlanded with oak, holding in her hand the pike of the Jupiter-Peuple, sails in, heralded by white young women girt in tricolor. This . . . . is our new divinity—Goddess of Reason, worthy, and alone worthy of revering.—CARLYLE, French Revolution, vol. iii. bk. v. 4.

Goderic. A nickname given by the Normans to Henry Beauclerc. They called his wife Matilda by the nickname of Godithe or Godiva, because, as Wace says, they 'tint la terre si sagement.' The sneer would be better understood by 'The goody king and queen.'

Gold Coined. By Darius, son of Hystaspês, B.C. 521–485. First coined at Rome A.D. 207. First coined in England by Henry III. in 1257.

Gold Keys (The). The badge or token of office given to the groom of the stole and mistress of the robes.

The queen [Anne] had repeatedly insisted to Marlborough that the duchess should deliver up the gold keys . . . . but that resolute woman refused to comply.—HOWITT, Hist. of England (Anne, 274).

Gold Mine of Europe (The). So Transylvania was once called; but the supply of gold now obtained thence is so much decreased that the title is no longer applicable.

Gold People (The). So the Arabs style the people of the towns of Barbary; the inhabitants of the Tell or cultivated lands they call the Silver people; and the inhabitants of the Sahara they call the Camel people.

Gold Purse of Spain (The). Andalūsia, the city from which Spain derives her chief wealth.

Gold Rings. By Roman law, were restricted by Tiberius (A.D. 22) to citizens with certain property qualifications. Sevērus (193–211) conferred the privilege on the army. Justinian in 529 removed all restrictions, and allowed any one who liked to wear them.

Gold Stick. The colonel of the 2nd Life Guards, who stands next to the sovereign on state occasions, and carries an ebony staff surmounted with a gold head engraved with the royal cypher and crown. He is assisted by another officer called the Silver Stick. The following extract from the standing orders of the 2nd Life Guards was supplied to me direct from the Lord Chamberlain's Office, St. James's Palace, July 1890.

'In consequence of a conspiracy existing in 1528, the king's person [Henry VIII.] was supposed to be in danger. It was, therefore, ordered that one of the captains commanding the Life Guards should wait next to his Majesty's person, before all others, carrying in his hand an ebony staff with a gold head engraved with his Majesty's cypher and crown. Another principal officer, carrying an ebony staff with a silver head, was ordered to be near the captain to relieve him occasionally. They were to be in attendance on the king's person whenever he walked, from his rising to his going to bed, except in the royal bedchamber.' See 'Golden Staff.'

The 'Morning Post,' describing the investiture of the royal princes in 1890, says: 'General Earl Howe, C.B., was introduced to her Majesty's presence by the Lord Chamberlain, and received from her Majesty the gold stick of office as colonel of the 2nd Regiment of Life Guards.'

Gold of Affliction (The).

A personal tribute in the Eastern empire on the industry of the poor. Abolished by Anastas'ius about 500.

Timotheus of Gaza chose this tax as the subject of a drama. He made it necessary for a father to send out his own daughter to earn money to pay the tax by the wages of unrighteousness. This play contributed 'n no small measure to the abolition of the tax.

Gold of Tolo'sa, or Toulouse Gold, ill-gotten and ill-starred wealth. It is said that Cæpio the consul, on his march against the Cimbrians, stole from the temple of Tolosa the gold and silver deposited there. His subsequent defeat was regarded as a divine punishment for this sacrilegious act; and hence arose the Latin proverb, Aurum Tolosanum habet, meaning 'his ill-gains will never prosper.'

Golden Age (The).

The Greeks and Romans placed their golden age under the rule of Saturn.

Hesiod described five ages, and Byron adds a sixth, the 'Age of Bronze.' Hesiod's five ages:—

The Golden Age, or patriarchal, under the rule of Saturn.

The Silver Age, or voluptuous, under the rule of Jupiter.

The Brazen Age, or warlike, under the rule of Neptune.

The Heroic Age, or renaissant, under the rule of Mars.

The Iron Age, or utilitarian, under the rule of Pluto.

The Bronze Age (of Byron), under Napoleon Bonaparte.

Golden Age of Italian Art (The).

See 'Cinque Cento.'

Golden Age of Poland (The). That of Sigismund I., the Great, and his son Sigismund II., Augustus (1506–1572).

Golden Age of the Roman Empire (The). The age of Antoninus Pius (138–161).

The reign of Augustus is called the Augustan Age.

Augustus	B.C. 63—A.D. 14
Livy (historian)	59–17
Ovid ('Metamorphoses')	43–18
Horace (poet)	65–B.C. 8
Virgil (poet)	70–B.C. 19

And many others. See 'Augustan Age.'

Golden Angel, Golden Fleece, Golden Spurs. See under 'Order,' &c.

Golden Ass (The). A romance by Apulēius. It is the adventures of Lucian, a young man, metamorphosed into the form of an ass, but still retaining his manly intelligence. This satire contains the exquisite episode of Cupid and Psyche (Sī'-ke).

Golden Book (The). 'Il Libro d' Oro.' The register of Venetian nobility. Anyone enrolled in the 'Golden Book,' if 25 years old, was a member of the Grand Council.

When Bonaparte took possession of Venice in 1797, the 'Golden Book' was burned at the foot of a Tree of Liberty.

The attainment of the chancellorship was more than once preferred to inscription in the 'Golden Book.'—History of Venice, vol. i. p. 206 (Murray, 1831).

Golden Bull (The).

I. Of Hungary, 1222. Wrung from King Andrew II. by his nobles, just as Magna Charta was extorted from John. Andrew II. of Hungary, surnamed 'Hi'erosolymitānus,' was a feeble, self-willed, worthless king, like our John.

The nobles and the church were to be exempt from taxes.

The daughter of a noble without male heir shall inherit one-fourth of his property.

No noble shall be obliged to follow the king in any foreign war.

The palatine (i.e. mayor of the palace) shall be the supreme judge.

No foreigner to hold office or dignity without consent of the council of the realm.

The king shall not grant counties or offices of any kind in perpetuity.

If the king violates any of the laws in this bull, it shall not be treason to levy war on him.

Called the 'Golden Bull' because the attached seal was enclosed in a golden case or box.

 It is rather remarkable that one of the very first countries in Europe to effect the liberty of subjects should have been one of the last-born nations, the Huns of Hungary.

II. Bulla Aurea of the Empire, 1356. Published by Kaiser Karl IV. at the Diet of Nürnberg. Considered the Magna Charta of Germany. It prevented a repetition of the contests which had hitherto arisen whenever a vacancy in the throne occurred; and regulated the functions, number, and privileges of the electors. Called 'golden' because the seal attached to the parchment was of gold instead of lead, or else that it was enclosed in a golden case.

Since 1440 the electorate has been merely nominal, as the House of Rudolph has been permanently established.

It limited the number of electors to seven (three prelates and four lay princes). The prelates were the three Archbishops of Mainz, Cologne, and Trèves; the lay princes were the King of Bohemia, the Duke of Saxony, the Margraf of Brandenburg, and the Pfalzgraf of the Rhine. Their persons were declared sacred. Every question was to be decided by majority and without appeal. Frankfort was appointed the place of session, and Aix-la-Chapelle the place of coronation.

Golden Cord (The Society of the), 1888. Organised by Mr. Scadding, an American minister, among the boys of his parish. The majority of the members are newsboys, from nine to thirteen, and they are pledged to keep five rules: (1) To be loving and lovable; (2) to be pure in heart, mind, and body; (3) to pity and help the poor and weak; (4) to be kind to dumb creatures; (5) to hate all shams, meanness, and dishonesty. Having signed this pledge, the boy receives the badge—a knot of golden cord.

Golden Dragon of Bruges (The). Taken in one of the crusades from St. Sophia, in Constantinople, and placed on the belfry of Bruges (1 syl.).

Philippe van Arteveide transferred it to Ghent, where it is still.

Golden Election (The). The election of Addison, Hugh Boulter (afterwards primate of Ireland), and Wilcox, as demies of Christ Church, Oxford.

Addison was born 1672, Boulter 1671, Wilcox 1673.

Golden-footed Dame (The). Leader of a troop of women who rode in the attitude and armour of men, under the banner of Conrad, in the second crusade. The leader of the Amazonian band wore buskins and gilt spurs.

Golden Gate (The).

I. The entrance of the land-locked bay on which San Francisco is seated.

II. Or 'Gate of the Seven Towers' (Jedicula Kapi) of Constantinople. Dr. Smith says that over this gate was the following inscription:

Hæc loca Theudosius decorat post fata Tyranni
Aurea secla gerit, qui portam construit auro, and adds, 'cited by Sirmond, in his notes upon Sidonius.' It still exists; and near it is a smaller arch, also called the Golden Gate.

Golden Gate of Constantinople (The). The entrance of the Golden Horn (q.v.) or port of Constantinople. It has no connection whatever with the Lofty Gate or Sublime Porte of the vizier's official residence.

The Bosphorus and the Hellespont may be considered as the two gates of Constantinople. . . . When these gates were shut, the capital still enjoyed every production which could supply the wants or gratify the luxury of its inhabitants . . . but when the passages of the straits were thrown open, they admitted the natural and artificial riches of the north and south, the Euxine and Mediterranean.—GIBBON, xvii.

Strange, after this, that Gibbon should more than once speak of 'battering the Golden Gates of Constantinople with axes.'

Golden Gate of Salo'na (The). A gate in the palace of Diocletian, in Dalmatia. It was to his palace in Dalmatia that the emperor retired after his abdication. The gate, which still opens into the market-place, was probably gilt when it was first built.

Golden Girdle. Louis VIII. made an edict that no courtesan should be allowed to wear a golden girdle under very severe penalties. Hence the proverb: 'Bonne renommée vault mieux que ceinture dorée.'

Golden Hand. General Zelislaus lost his right hand in battle, and Boleslaus III. gave him a gold hand. See 'Silver Hand,' 'Iron Hand,' and 'Steel Hand.'

Zelislaus ducis pariter atque militis officio functus contra Moravos dextram amisit. Eum Boleslaus III., Polonorum rex, ex laudatum pro meritis et virtute, aurea manu donavit.—Hist. Polon. book v.

Golden Hind (The). Sir Francis Drake's ship, on board which Queen Elizabeth on one occasion dined.

Golden Horde (The), or 'La Horde d'Or.' The Tartars of the Kaptschak, who established themselves in 1463 in the Crimea, the chief city of which peninsula was called Or or Perekop, the Greek Taphros. The Tartar word Or, the Slavonic word Perekop, and the Greek word Taphros, all mean the same thing, that is, a 'ditch or trench.' The Horde d'Or simply means the 'Horde of the Isthmus.' Our 'Golden Horde' is a blundering translation of La Horde d'Or, which should be the Horde of Or, or of Perekop. Compare Greek οὐρός, ὅρος (a channel, a boundary).

The usual explanation is this. The horde was called 'the golden' from the gorgeous tapestry of the Khan's tent, and that a present of the emperor of China to Ghengis Khan of a rich tent suggested the title. The suggestion is utterly worthless.

Golden Horn (The). A branch or gulf of the Bosphorus, called also the Port of Constantinople. It runs from Galata north-westward, and is called golden from its great beauty and the wealth of the cities on each side.

The harbour of Constantinople obtained, in a very remote period, the denomination of the Golden Horn. The curl which it describes might be compared to the horn of a stag or of an ox. The epithet of golden was expressive of the riches which every wind wafted into the capacious port. GIBBON, ch. xvii.

Golden Legends (The), 13th cent. A collection made by James de Voragine (8 syl.), a Dominican. There are 177 sections, each of which is devoted to a particular saint. That of Felix listening to a bird, rendered into verse by Longfellow in 1851, is what is distinctively meant by 'The Golden Legend.'

Golden Mass. 'Missa Aurea,' a mass in celebration of the Virgin Mary; so called from its great pomp and magnificence. See 'Mass.'

Golden Mouth (The). I. John of Antioch, called Chrysostom (A.D. 347–407). He was archbishop of Constantinople.

II. Dion the rhetorician (90–117).

Golden Number (The). The 'Meton'ic Cycle' or 'Cycle of the Moon,' B.C. 432, devised by Meton. It ranges from 1–19, because 19 years make a cycle. The number used to be engraved in letters of gold on pillars of marble.

Add 1 to the date of the year, and divide by 19. The remainder is the golden number. If no remainder, then 19 is the golden number. This number determines the epact, and the time of Easter. Thus the epact for 1890 is 9.

Golden Rose (The). A rose wrought of gold, and blessed by the pope on Mid-Lent Sunday (Lætare Sunday, q.v.), and presented to some Catholic whom the pope thinks proper to honour. Du Cange fixes the origin to Innocent IV. (1243–1254).

Isabella of Spain, and Eugénie the wife of Napoleon III., have both received the Golden Rose. Isabella of Spain was certainly no model queen. Henry VIII. also received one from Clement VII. (!)

Golden Rule (The). In Arithmetic the Rule of Three.

In Morals, 'Do unto others as you would be done by.'

Golden Shield (Knights of the). A French military order instituted by Louis II. for the defence of the country. Motto: 'Allons.'

Golden Spears (The). The title and ornament of the best army of the Persians, consisting, in the days of Chosroes II., of 50,000 men. Cut to pieces in the great battle of Nineveh, 1 Dec. A.D. 627 (Gibbon, xlvi.).

Golden Speech, or Chrysolŏgus, Pietro bishop of Ravenna (*433–450).

Golden Spurs (Order of the), 1539. Instituted by Pope Paul III. Regulated anew by Gregory XVI. in 1840.

Golden Staff. Thomas Mowbray first earl marshal of England was so created by Richard II. He and his successors were authorised by charter to carry before the king a gold staff surmounted with the royal arms, and having the Mowbray arms at the lower end. All other marshals carry a wooden staff. See 'Black Rod,' 'Gold Stick,' &c.

It is said that William Marshall, who married Isabel daughter of Strongbow, by whom he came into possession of the palatinate of Leinster held by her father, carried a gold staff at the coronation of Richard I.

Golden State (The). California, in North America.

Golden Stream (The), or 'Chrysorroas,' Joannes Damascēnus (676–756). The first to apply the logic of Aristotle to Christian dogmas and doctrines.

Golden Tongued (The). See 'Golden Speech.'

Golden Valley (The). The eastern part of Limerick is so called from its great fertility.

Golden Veil (The). The Khalif of Bagdad was inaugurated by a golden veil, strongly perfumed with musk, being thrown over his head.

Golden Verses of Oppian (The). The Κυνηγετικά, a Greek poem on hunting, for which the Emperor Caracalla paid him a piece of gold for every line. He also wrote a poem on fishing. Oppian died A.D. 213, aged 30.

Golden Verses of Pythagoras (The). May be thus rendered into English:—

Ne'er suffer sleep thine eyes to close
Before thy mind hath run
O'er every act, and thought, and word,
From dawn to set of sun;
For wrong take shame, but grateful feel
If just thy course hath been:
Such efforts day by day renewed
Will keep thy soul from sin.

Golden Violet (The). The original prize given by the 'Gaie Société des Sept Troubadours de Toulouse,' founded in 1328, for the best poem sent in by May-day every year. This society was the origin of the 'Academy of Floral Games,' in France.

Goldsmiths' Company (The). London, 1393. Incorporated by Richard II.

Goldsmiths' Notes. Bank-notes were originally so called, because the bankers were all goldsmiths.

Golspie Stone (The). A stone in Sutherland, with an Ogham inscription. See 'Dogmael's Stone.'

Other stones in Scotland with inscriptions in Ogham are the Newton Stone and Logie Stone in Aberdeenshire, and the Bressay Stone in Shetland.

G. O. M. 'The Grand Old Man.' So W. E. Gladstone, in his last premiership (1881–1885), was called, half in ridicule and half in admiration. Born 1809.

Go'marists or 'Anti-Remonstrants,' 1611. Calvinists, so called from Frans Gomar of Bruges (1563–1641), who put forth a strong 'Counter-Remonstrance' against the Arminian 'Remonstrance' (q.v.) presented to the States of Holland, in 1610. This Counter-Remonstrance dogmatically affirmed the dogmas of absolute predestination and reprobation.

Gombette (La loi), A.D. 502. A Burgundian code of considerable repute, often printed, even so late as 1855. It was so called from Gombaud or Gondebaud, the third king of Burgundy, who died A.D. 516. A second part was added in 519 by Sigismond, the son and successor of Gondebaud. Gombette (2 syl.).

I observe that this code is often erroneously called by English authors La loi Gourbelic, originally, without doubt, a typographical error.

Gonfalon'iere (The), 1292. The title given to the chief magistrate of Florence. Subsequently, a gonfalonier of justice, with eight priors, constituted the Signoria, held office for two months, and lived in the palazzo at the public charge. In other Italian republics the gonfaloniers were officers of justice, varying in number, and commanders of regiments. In France, a gonfalonier was the person who carried the gonfalon, or grand banner of the church. This sacred flag was always committed to the charge of the avoués, or temporal defenders of the churches and abbeys.

Gon'falons (The). Of Florence, were the sixteen standards of the four quarters of the city. The quarters were named from the four chief churches (Santo Spirito, Santa Croce, Santa Maria Novella, and San Giovanni); the gonfalons were named after the devices blazoned on them.

The four gonfalons of the Santo Spirito quarter were the Ladder, the Shell, the Whip, and the Dragon.

The four gonfalons of the Santa Croce quarter were the Car, the Ox, the Golden Lion, and the Wheels.

The four gonfalons of the Santa Maria Novella quarter were the Viper, the Unicorn, the Red Lion, and the White Lion.

The four gonfalons of the San Giovanni quarter were the Black Lion, the Dragon, the Keys, and the Vair.

The standard-bearers were called the 'Sixteen,' and next to the Signory the office was the most honourable in Florence.

Gongorism. A stilted bombastic style, called sometimes Estilo culto. The word is derived from Luis de Gongora y Argotê, a Spanish poet born at Cordŏva (1561–1627).

G. H. Lewes, speaking of Calderon, says: 'I seriously declare that his poetry does not seem to me a whit richer in thought or feeling than that of Lopê de Vega, while it is even more defaced by hyperbolical conceits and frigid Gongorisms.'

Gonville Hall, Cambridge, 1348. Founded by Edmund Gonville, rector of Terrington and Rushworth, in Norfolk. See 'Caius College' (Keys College), by which name it is now generally called.

Gonville Hall was enlarged by Bishop Bateman in 1353.

Gonza'ga (The House of). A long line of sovereign dukes of Mantua and Montferrat (1328–1665), when the territory was taken possession of by the kaiser-king Joseph I.

Good Bishop of Marseilles (The). Henri François Xavier de Belsunce (1671–1755), who night and day, with heroic courage, exerted himself to succour the dying during the plague of 1720–21, to cheer the despairing, to comfort the afflicted, and to point all to that source of help which alone holds the issues of life and death.

A similar devotion was shown in the 19th cent. by Father Damien, a Belgian priest, who spent sixteen years at the leper settlement at Molokai, a Hawaiian island. This devoted priest caught the disease, and died from it in May 1889.

Good Cousins, 1808. The initiated of the Carbonari. There were (1) apprentices, (2) masters.

Good Duke (The). Edward duke of Somerset, lord Seymour, governor of the person of the king's [Edward VI.] Majesty and protector of all his realms; lieutenant-general of all his armies, both by land and sea; lord high treasurer, earl marshal of England, knight of the most noble order of the garter, &c. If honours make goodness, he must have been 'good' indeed. Yet all his greatness and goodness did not save him from a traitor's death. He was made lord protector in 1547, and was beheaded on Tower Hill 22 Jan., 1552.

Good Duke Humphrey (The). Brother of Henry V. and lord protector of England during the minority of Henry VI. His brother John duke of Bedford was regent of France (1391–1447).

He was arrested for high treason 11 Feb., 1447, and found dead 28 Feb. Probably murdered by Cardinal Beaufort.

Good Duke of Argyll (The). John Campbell, duke of Argyll (1678–1743).

Good Friday. The Friday before Easter Day. Kept sacred in commemoration of the crucifixion on Calvary. It seems to have been set apart by Constantine the Great, who forbade 'the holding of law-courts and markets' on that day. In England and Ireland it is a dies non.

The day of the Crucifixion is by no means certain. Supposing the 'Last Supper' to be the pascha, the three synoptists say that the Crucifixion took place the day after, i.e. 15th Nisan; but John informs us that the pascha occurred after the Crucifixion.

Good Friend, 1854. A nickname given to Napoleon III., from a letter which he wrote to the Emperor Nicholas of Russia. The letter began 'Sire,' and not 'Sire, my brother,' and ended 'Your Majesty's good friend.' The letter was published in the 'Moniteur,' and was like a red flag to the Russian autocrat.

Good Lord James (The) of Douglas, the friend of Bruce (died 1330). He was entrusted with the heart of Bruce, to carry it to the Holy Land and bury it there; but, on reaching Seville, he entered the service of Alfonso against the Moors, and was slain. The heart was brought back and buried in Melrose Abbey.

Goodman of Ballengeich. The name assumed by James V. of Scotland when he made his disguised visits in the districts round Edinburgh and Stirling.

Goodman's Fields, Whitechapel, London. So called from a large farmer of the name of Goodman.

At this farm I myself in my youth have fetched many a ha'p'orth of milk, and never had less than three ale-pints in summer and one in winter, always hot from the kine and strained. One Trolop, and afterwards Goodman, was the farmer there, and had thirty or forty kine to the pail.—STOW, Survey of London (1598).

Good Men. So the Waldenses (q.v.) were called in Germany, from the sincerity of their persuasion and purity of their lives.

Good Men of St. Martin (The). 'Buonomini di San Martino.' A charitable society of twelve men, founded in the middle of the 15th cent. by Antonino (afterwards archbishop of Florence, and known as St. Antonio). Called 'San Martino' from the little homely church of St. Martin, the headquarters of the brotherhood. It still exists in Florence. The object of this charity was the relief of those who had fallen into poverty, but were unable to earn their bread, and were ashamed to beg.

Dante was married in this church, and was born within sight of it.

Good Parliament (The), 1376. In the reign of Edward III. So called from its sturdy opposition to the illegal government of the Crown, or royal council. The speaker was Sir Peter de la Marc, and the Black Prince most heartily supported the Commons. It denounced the mismanagement of the French war, the oppressive taxation, and John of Gaunt the duke of Lancaster, who was obliged to withdraw from the council. It demanded a strict account of how the public money had been expended. It exposed a terrible list of abuses; not sparing the king himself and his mistress Alice Perrers. Alice was driven from the court, and made to swear never to return again. It impeached Lord Latimer and William Lyons; and presented 160 petitions of grievances. It demanded the annual assembly of parliament and freedom of election; denounced the papal aggressions, and demanded a more vigorous prosecution of the war. See 'Parliament.'

The taxes levied for the pope were five times those levied for the king.

Good Queen Anne (The). The wife of Richard II. of England. On her marriage she was 15 and Richard 16. She was the daughter of Karl VI. kaiser of Germany, who attended his father, the blind old King of Bohemia, at the battle of Crécy, and was granddaughter of Sigismund. Anne of Bohemia was good looking and most amiable. She married Richard 14 Jan., 1382, and died at Sheen 7 June, 1394, aged 27.

Many suppose the phrase is meant to apply to Anne daughter of James II., because she transferred to the church the money called 'Queen Anne's Bounty' (q.v.); but Anne Stuart was the mere tool of stronger minds.

Good Queen Maud. First wife of her cousin Henry I. of England, and daughter of Malcolm of Scotland. Married 1100, died 1118.

Good Regent (The). James Stewart, earl of Murray (or Moray), natural son of James V. of Scotland, by Margaret, daughter of John 4th lord Erskine. Assassinated by Hamilton of Bothwellhaugh 21 Jan., 1570.

Good Swordsman (The). 'Le bon sabreur,' Joachim Murat, marshal of France (1771–1815).

Good Templars (The Independent Order of). This order is pledged to total abstinence. It was formed in New York in 1852, and introduced at Birmingham in 1868. The president is styled the 'Grand Worthy Chief.'

This order has no connection with the 'Knights Templars' (q.v.).

Goody Palsgrave. So Anne (wife of James I. of England) used to call her daughter Elizabeth, after her marriage with Frederick elector palatine and 'king of Bohemia.' She had eight sons and five daughters. 'Goody' was a term of contempt. Elizabeth is often called 'queen of Bohemia.'

Grave Maurice [i.e. the Graf Moritz] and Prince Rupert, so celebrated in the wars of England between Charles I. and his parliament, were her sons; and Sophia, the mother of George, was her daughter.

Goorkha (India). A cow-herd; a name applied to every native of Nepaul. It properly belongs to the Gorkhalis, a Hinduised and warlike race of Nepaul.

Goose Moon (The). So the North American Indians call the month in which the flocks of geese from the Arctic shores arrive. These geese supply the Indians with a much-coveted food in winter.

Goose Tower (The). The tower of the Castle of Gurve, built by Valdemar I. of Sweden in 1166. In this tower captives taken in war, called geese, were confined.

Gordon Riots (The), 1778. Riots organised by Lord George Gordon as a protestation against the relaxation of the penal code against English Roman Catholics. 2 June, 1780, Lord George Gordon, with some 100,000 followers, left St. George's Fields, with the view of presenting a monster petition (containing 120,000 names) for the repeal of the late act. The soldiers were called out; only eight persons in the House voted with Lord George; but the mob were riotously inclined, and went about destroying Roman Catholic chapels, the shops of Roman Catholics, and molesting those who resisted their foolish fanaticism. This went on for six days; on the ninth Lord George Gordon was apprehended on a charge of high treason. Twenty-one of the rioters were executed in July 1780, but Lord George was acquitted as of unsound mind. He ultimately died in Newgate of a fever in 1793.

On 2 June, 1780, the chapel of the Sardinian minister was razed to the ground.
On 5 June a Catholic school and three priests' houses were destroyed.
On 6 June Newgate was forced, and 300 prisoners were released; and in the evening several houses were set on fire.
On 7 June King's Bench Prison, the Fleet Prison, Bridewell, and several private houses were destroyed.

Gorham Case (The). A dispute between the Rev. George C. Gorham and the Bishop of Exeter, who refused to institute him to the vicarage of Bramford Speke in Devonshire, in 1848. Gorham applied to the Court of Arches, and his application was dismissed by Sir Herbert Jenner Fust (2 Aug., 1849). An appeal was then made to the Privy Council, which reversed the order of the Court of Arches (8 March, 1850). The bishop then applied to the Court of Queen's Bench, but was cast (15 April, 1850). Another application by the bishop to the Court of Common Pleas also failed (2 May, 1850). Ultimately Gorham was instituted, 7 August, 1850. The case created an immense sensation, as it was a combat between the Evangelical Church party, represented by Gorham, and the High Church party, represented by the Bishop of Exeter.

A somewhat similar contest occurred in 1889, when the Bishop of Lincoln was summoned to appear before the Archbishop of Canterbury for what were called 'Rubrical offences.' See 'Lincoln Impeachment,' &c.

Görlitz Process (The), 1850. A celebrated trial which took place in Germany. The Countess of Görlitz was strangled by a servant named Johann Stauff, whom she had caught stealing articles from a desk in her sitting-room. The case was tried at Darmstadt, and the prisoner pleaded 'Not guilty,' but was imprisoned for life. The main interest of the case rested on this point: the body of the countess was burnt, and Dr. von Siebold maintained it was destroyed by spontaneous combustion, while the chemists Bischoff and Liebig denied the possibility of such combustion.

Gortonists. A religious sect in New England, so-called from Samuel Gorton (1600–1677), a sectary who denied the humanity of Christ. Extinct.

Go'schens, 1888. A Stock Exchange term for the new 2¾ per cent. stock, which was for the first time officially quoted 30 March, 1888. Named after George Joachim Goschen, chancellor of the exchequer, who projected the conversion.

Gospellers, 1549. A religious party in England, said to have been very profligate in their lives, and thus to have brought scandal on the Reformed Church. Article 38 of the Church of England is aimed at these men: 'The goods of Christians are not [in] common . . . as certain Anabaptists do falsely boast.'

When two ministers read the communion service, the one who stands on the north side of the table is called the Gospeller because he reads the Gospel.

Irenæus (i. 17) tells us that the Gnostics, in the 2nd cent., had an innumerable multitude of spurious books; and in the following age the number greatly increased. In the 4th cent. there were at least 80 gospels. See under 'Gnostics.'

Gotescalc, surnamed The Second Effulgence. A German heretic (806–868). His 'heresy' seems to have been the Calvinistic doctrines of absolute election and reprobation. He was condemned by the Council of Mayence in 848, imprisoned by the order of Hincmar archbishop of Reims, and died in gaol in 868.

Go'thamite. A New Yorker.

Gothamist, a man of Gotham, in Nottinghamshire.

Gothic Architecture (Pointed style). Originated about 1190.

Gothic Code (The), or 'Codex Legum Barbarorum.' The laws of the barbarians codified by Alaric, king of the Visigoths, and augmented by his successors. See 'Codex.'

Gothic Liturgy (The). Same as the 'Mozarabic Liturgy' (q.v.).

Gothic War (The), A.D. 331. The Sarmatians being threatened by Alaric, king of the Goths, applied to Constantine the Great for protection. The emperor gladly responded to the request, and after three or four engagements of varying success, the Goths retreated across the Danube, and Constantine received the honours of a triumph.

Goth'icus. Claudius II. of Rome was so called because he defeated the Scythians, Herŭli, and Goths, who had invaded Mœsia, A.D. 269. In the great battle at Naïssus there were more than 320,000 Goths, and as many as 50,000 were slain.

Goths (The). Part of the great Teutonic swarm at one time dispersed about the southern and eastern shores of the Baltic. Afterwards they moved towards the Black Sea, where, in the middle of the 3rd cent., they split into two parts. Those who remained in the east of Europe were called the Eastern [Ostro] Goths; and those who journeyed westwards were called the Western [Visi] Goths.

Gottesfreunde (The), or 'Society of the Friends of God,' who strove to establish the unio mystica, or loving intercourse with deity.

Gourides (2 syl.). A dynasty which reigned in Persia in the 12th cent., founded by Hussin Mahmoud Gouri, governor of Gour under the Gaznevides. He declared himself independent in 1155. Under Alah Eddyn the Gourides conquered all Persia, and drove out the Gaznevides in 1158; but in 1213 they were in turn driven out by the Carizmians.

Government (The Act of), 1657. The act which made Cromwell the Lord Protector. The Speaker, in the name of the Commons, invested him with a mantle of state, placed the sceptre in his hand, and girt the sword of justice by his side. By this act of government Cromwell was allowed to name his successor, but in all after cases the office was to be elective.

The Commons had previously offered Cromwell the title of king, but the army disapproved; and Cromwell told the Commons he could not undertake the government burdened with such a title.

Government of July (The). The Royal Republic, with Louis Philippe, an elective king, called 'King of the French,' not 'King of France.' From 9 Aug., 1830, to 24 Feb., 1848.

Government of the Cortês (The), 1814–1823. The constitutional monarchy established in Spain after the fall of Napoleon.

Government of the National Defence (The), 2 Sept., 1870, to 13 Feb., 1871. After the battle of Sedan, when the French emperor (Napoleon III.) yielded up his sword to William king of Prussia, certain persons arrogated to themselves the offices of state under the title of 'The Government of the National Defence'; but they resigned their office to the National Assembly, when M. Thiers was appointed president of the new republic. (Thiers, pronounce Te-air.)

Government of the 400 (The), B.C. 411. An oligarchy instituted in Athens for the democracy, by the persuasion of Alcibiadês. The 400 were chosen by five presidents, and in them was lodged absolute power. This form of government lasted only four months.

Governor-General of India, or 'Governor-General of the United Colony,' i.e. Bengal, Bombay, and Madras, 1786. Each of these provinces has a governor, but that of Bengal has precedence.

Gower. A part of Glamorganshire, colonised by Flemings in the reign of Henry I. These colonists did not speak Welsh.

Gownsmen. Men who had risen by their wise counsel in civil affairs; in contradistinction to military heroes, called Men of the Sword. The terms were common in Queen Elizabeth's reign. We still use the phrase 'Carpet Knights' for lord mayors and other civil officers who receive the order of knighthood.

Gowrie Conspiracy (The), 5 Aug., 1600. The king's version is that during a hunting expedition Alexander Ruthven informed him that a mysterious stranger with stores of gold was in Ruthven Castle, and that it would be desirable for the king to see him. The king went to the castle with a few attendants, and was taken by Alexander to a high tower, where, instead of a stranger, he found Henderson, one of Gowrie's servants. He says that Alexander tried to murder him, but he called out 'Treason,' and, some of his attendants coming to his rescue, Alexander was slain. The noise of the scuffle roused the house, and the Earl Gowrie, with seven retainers, rushed into the tower, whereupon a scuffle ensued, and Gowrie fell dead at the hand of Sir John Ramsay. Some say the whole tale is most improbable, and that it is more likely that James was the aggressor, and murdered the two brothers to avenge an insult offered to him by their father, in the 'Raid of Ruthven' (q.v.). The clergy generally disbelieved the king's version, and refused to offer up thanks to God for his deliverance; but a day was, nevertheless, set apart for the purpose. The truth of the matter seems to be that the two brothers wanted to kidnap the king, but met with their death and the king escaped.

Graal (The), or 'The Holy Graal.' A miraculous chalice made of a single emerald, which possessed the power of preserving chastity and prolonging life. Said to have been the cup from which Christ drank at the last supper, and in which Joseph of Arimathea caught the last drops of blood as Christ was taken down from the cross. In 1170 Chrétien of Troyes sang of the search by knights for this miraculous cup, which was a very favourite subject in the middle ages.

Grace was the title assumed by Henry IV. of England on his accession in 1399. 'Excellent Grace' was assumed by Henry VI. in 1425, and was retained till Henry VIII. adopted the word 'Majesty' (q.v.). An archbishop or duke of the United Kingdom is still addressed as 'Your Grace.'

Grace (A). In the University of Cambridge means a proposal by the Council offered to the Senate to be confirmed. All laws, all degrees, all permits, all licences, connected with the University are graces before they take effect by the authority of the Senate (q.v.).

A grace for a degree is called a supplicat.

Grace (The Act of), 1696. Provides maintenance for debtors in Scotland when imprisoned by their creditors.

In England general pardons at the beginning of a new reign, or on other special occasions, are called Acts of Grace. In the reign of William and Mary, at the dissolution of the United Ministry of Whigs and Tories, a general pardon for all political offences, called an Act of Grace, was sent down to the House, 1689.

Grace (Days of). See 'Days of Grace.'

Grace Darling, 6 Sept., 1838. The 'Forfarshire' steamboat, with sixty persons on board, was wrecked on its passage from Hull to Dundee. A few escaped in the larboard quarter-boat, but the vessel itself went to pieces on a rock near the Farne Islands. Half the ship was carried away, with all the persons in the cabin or on the stern and quarter-deck, but the other half stuck fast on the rock. Grace Darling, who was living with her father in the Longstone lighthouse, heard the screams, and induced her father to go with her in a lifeboat to the rock. The sea was very rough, the wind high, and the rain heavy, but Grace and her father saved nine persons. This heroic maiden died 20 Oct., 1842, of consumption, aged 25.

Graceless and Godless Florins (The). The florins struck in 1849 by Mr. Sheil, Master of the Mint. The legend was only 'Victoria Regina,' both F.D. (fidei defensor) and D.G. (Dei gratia) being omitted. This gave great offence, and the coins were called in the same year.

Graces (The). Articles of the covenant between Charles I. and the great landed proprietors of Ireland. Charles had quartered a large military force on the Irish; and the chief proprietors agreed to pay the king 120,000*l.* to be secured in their rights and properties.* The Graces provided: That the king's claim to lands in Ireland should be limited to sixty years; that the proprietors of Connaught should receive new patents; that the exactions of the soldiery should be restrained; that the fees of the king and the powers of the court should be defined; and that a general pardon for past offences should be granted. The articles were never carried into effect.

* That is, that the Discoverers (q.v.) should not be sent to examine the titles of their estates.

Gradual. That part of the Mass which intervenes between the epistle and the gospel; it consists of a few verses of the psalms chanted on the steps (gradus) of the altar.

Gradual Psalms. 'Psalms of the Steps,' 'Songs of Degrees,' Psalms 120–134. The meaning is uncertain. Probably they were the psalms sung during the time of burnt-sacrifice, called olut, m-olut (of degrees).

Graf. In Germany a reeve, as in our word sheriff, i.e. shire-reeve. Subsequently it was a mere honorary title, somewhat like the French count. The original function of the reeve was to collect the revenues of his district. The word is very old, and occurs in the Lex Salica (5th cent.). Charlemagne divided his vast empire into grafschaften or districts, over each of which was a chief magistrate called a graf. See 'Margraf,' 'Pfalzgraf.'

Graham's Dyke. The rampart running along the line of the detached forts which Agricola planted A.D. 81 between the firths of Clyde and Forth, to serve as a defence against the Picts and Scots. Also called the 'Wall of Antoninus.'

Called the 'Wall of Antoninus' because it was made by Lollius Urbicus, general of the Emperor Antoninus. The 'Dyke of Urbicus' connects these forts together. See 'Grimes Dyke.'

Grahamise. To open letters at the post office in order to trace crime. 'Harcourting' is a word of the same meaning, introduced while Sir William Harcourt was home secretary (1880–1885).

Grammarians, or 'Grammatici.' Philologists of ancient Rome. Suetonius has written a history of the Grammatici. The most famous were Aristarchus, Dionysius, Didymus, Flaccus, and Quintilian. But of the second century of the Christian era the following names are well known: Pollio, Eutychius, Athenæus, Julius Pollux, Macrobius, and Aulus Gellius.

Gramota Soudebnaia. The code of laws drawn up for the people of Novogorod by Jaroslaf I. of Russia (1015–1055). The code is still in force.

Granary of Athens (The). The district about Kertch. The buckwheat of this district carried off the prize in the Great Exhibition of London in 1851.

Granary of Europe (The). Hungary, famous for its cereals. Sicily was so called at one time.

Granary of Turkey (The). So Egypt used to be called.

Grand Alliance (The). I. Of Kaiser Leopold and Holland against Louis XIV., signed at Vienna 12 May, 1689. Joined by England 20 Dec., 1689; by Spain 6 June, 1690; and by Saxony 2 June, 1694.

II. Against Louis XIV. and the Spanish Succession. Between the kaiser, Great Britain, Holland, Prussia, and Hanover; signed at the Hague 7 Sept., 1701.

III. Against Napoleon I., 3 March, 1813. This was the 6th and last coalition against Napoleon, encouraged by the disastrous Moscow expedition. The alliance, signed at Reichenbach, consisted of Prussia and Austria, Russia, Sweden, and Great Britain. Denmark joined 14

Jan, 1814. Before this Denmark had thrown in her lot with Napoleon.

Grand Assize (The). Appointed by Henry II. to supersede trials by battle. A freeholder might refer his dispute to twelve legal knights, and, if they agreed in their verdict, their judgment was final; if not, others were selected till the verdict was unanimous.

Grand Climacteric (The) of man's life is 63, the compound of the two mystic numbers 7 × 9. Of course it needs hardly be added that this year is not more fatal to man than any other.

Certainly 9×9 is far nearer the psalmist's 'four-score' years. As a rule, five times the years of full growth is the natural term of animal life.

Grand Companies (The), or 'Free Companies.' Troops of adventurers that desolated France in the reign of Jean II. le Bon, and the first part of the reign of Charles V., his son. The nucleus of these bandits was the disbanded German mercenaries after the battle of Poitiers (1356). Being without employment, they enlisted under any daring leader that would hire them, and spread themselves abroad as a desolating scourge. To free the country of this pest Charles induced them to take service under Duguesclin, and sent them to the Spanish war, where they were either slain or took service under the Black Prince (1367–1369).

Grand Corneille (Le). Pierre Corneille (1606–1684). Thomas Corneille was also a dramatist (1625–1709).

Grand Corrupter (The). Sir Robert Walpole (1676–1745). He was expelled the House 17 Jan., 1712, being found guilty of 'a high breach of trust, and notorious corruption.' There is no doubt that he always had a profound faith in bribery, and never scrupled to exercise it.

Grand Council (The). 'Consiglio Grande.' An assembly of Venetian noblemen over the age of 25. All persons eligible were inscribed in the Golden Book. The Grand Council chose a committee of 11 to elect the members of the Grand Council; the Grand Council, after 5 ballots and 5 scrutinies, elected the Council of Forty; and the Council of Forty elected one of the Grand Council for doge.

Grand Coutu'mier of Normandy (The). A collection of the ancient laws of Normandy, compiled in the 3rd year of Henry III., and containing the laws and customs prevailing in the reigns of Henry II., Richard I., and John.

Grand Days. Those days in the term which are 'dies non juridici,' in the Inns of Court and Chancery, as Candlemas day in Hilary—Ascension day in Easter—St. John the Baptist's day in Trinity—and All Saints' day in the Michaelmas term.

In the French monarchy the annual assizes were called the Grand Jours, especially the extraordinary assizes of the kings of France in the provinces. In the reign of François I. there were many such, e.g. in Poitiers 1531, and again 1541; at Moulins in 1534, 1540, 1545; at Troyes in 1535; at Angers in 1539, &c. The last Grand Jour was held by Louis XIV. in 1665 at Clermont-Ferrand.

Grand Duke of the West (The). The Duke of Burgundy. Philippe III. le Bon (1396, 1419–1467) was 'duc de Bourgogne, de Lorraine, de Brabant, de Limbourg, et de Gueldres; comte de Flandre et d'Artois; comte-palatine de Hainault, de Zeeland, de Namur, et de Zutphen; seigneur de la Frise, de Salins, et de Malines.'

Grand Master. The head of the Hospitallers, Templars, Teutonic Knights, and Freemasons respectively.

Grand Monarque (Le). Louis XIV. (1638, 1643–1715). He was for twenty years the pupil of Mons. Beauchamp, the dancing-master, and in his wars with Marlborough reduced France to the verge of bankruptcy. His religious persecutions were almost as disastrous to France as his wars with England. It is well for a nation not to have such 'great kings' as Louis XIV.

It is truly pitiable to call such a man as George IV. 'the First Gentleman of Europe,' or Louis XIV. the 'Grand Monarque' of France. Henri IV. was twice as 'Great' as the pupil of M. Beauchamp.

Grand Old Man (The), or G.O.M. I. William Ewart Gladstone was so-called in his last administration, 1881–1885. Lord Rosebery first used the expression 26 April 1882, and the Right Hon. Sir W. Vernon Harcourt repeated it, 18 Oct. the same year.

II. Dr. Hook, when vicar of Leeds (1837–1859), addressing a working class, said, in reference to the 'Messiah,' Handel, 'the Grand Old Man,' entertained the town with that oratorio for a whole week (Leeds Weekly Express, 9 Nov., Local Gossip).

Grand Pensionary (The). In Holland, or 'Assessor juris peritus,' the chief minister of the States, and chancellor of the exchequer. The office lasted for five years, but the same person was eligible for re-election. The most famous were Jean de Witt (died 1672) and Heinsius (1689–1720). Office abolished by Napoleon I. in 1795.

There used to be a pensionary in each of the main cities of Holland.

Grand Privilege (The). 'Groot Privilegie.' The Magna Charta of Holland, granted 1477 by Mary duchess of Burgundy.

Grand Remonstrance (The), 22 Nov., 1641. Adopted by the Long Parliament against the measures of Charles I. It was brought in by Pym, who declared it was not the intention of the parliament to abolish episcopacy, but only to limit and reduce the power of the bishops. It repudiated the charge of being revolutionary. It demanded the observance of the laws against papistry; securities for the even administration of justice; and the employment of ministers who had the confidence of parliament.

Grand Serjeanty. An ancient English tenure by which a man holds his lands and tenements of the king by service, such as carrying the royal banner or king's lance; leading an army; carrying the coronation sword; being the king's carver, butler, chamberlain, and so on.

Grand Tour (The). The tour made by wealthy Englishmen through France, Switzerland, Italy, and home by Germany.

Grand Vizier. Chief minister of the Ottoman empire, introduced by Amurath I. in 1386; abolished by Mahmoud II. in 1838; but restored by Abdul Medjid in 1839.

In 750 the chief minister of the kalif was called vizier.

Grande Mademoiselle (La). Anne Marie Louise d'Orléans, duchess of Montpensier, and first cousin of Louis XIV. She was the daughter of Gaston duc d'Orléans, and Marie de Bourbon-Montpensier. Louis XIII. was her uncle. La Grande Mademoiselle was one of the richest heiresses in Europe.

Grande Semaine (La), 27, 28, 29 July, 1830. Tuesday, Wednesday, and Thursday of the Insurrection of Paris which drove Charles X. from the throne, and substituted for him Louis Philippe, called the Citizen-king. Semaine (2 syl.).

Grandees, 1648. So the members of the council of officers were called in the reign of Charles I. The members of the inferior council were called Adjutors, and subsequently Agitators.

Grandes Compagnies (Les), 14th cent. Gangs of adventurers which desolated France in the reigns of Jean II. and Charles V. They were recruited by strangers of all nationalities, especially by the Germans whom Edward III. had set at liberty after the treaty of Brétigny in 1360. The populace rose up against them and put them down for a time, but they reappeared in 1361 under the name of Tards-Venus. Duguesclin had the wit to enrol them in the army of Enrique of Trastamare, and employed them in the Spanish war against Pedro the Cruel.

Grandes Précieuses (Les). The learned women of the Hôtel Rambouillet, in contradistinction to the Précieuses Ridicules.

Les Grandes Précieuses sont de ces choses excellentes aptes à être imitées par de mauvais singes.—MOLIÈRE.

Grandison-Cromwell. So Lafayette (1754–1834) was called by Mirabeau. He wanted to appear a Christian gentleman, like Richardson's 'Sir Charles Grandison,' but in his heart of hearts he had the ambition of a Cromwell.

[Paris rang] with endless talk about English Monk, nay about Cromwell. O thou poor Grandison-Cromwell!—CARLYLE, French Revolution, vol. ii. bk. vi. 1.

Grangerite (A). One who extends and supplements a book by collateral matter culled from all sorts of sources, as prints, maps, newspaper cuttings, selections from other books, pamphlets, autograph letters, and so on. So called from the Rev. J. Granger (1710–1776), who 'grangerised' a biographical history of England (1769) with 'supplement' (1774).

See BOWDLERISE. There are also the words

'Grangerise,' 'Grangerism,' 'Grangerisation,' &c. Forster's 'Life of Dickens,' 3 vols. was 'grangerised' to 9 vols. in America, by playbills, engravings, portraits, views, catalogues, illustrations, and other supplemental matter.

Granite City (The). Aberdeen, Scotland. Many of the houses are built of the granite which abounds in the neighbourhood.

Granite Redoubt (The), 14 June, 1800. The grenadiers of the Consular Guard of Bonaparte (First Consul) were so called from the stand which they made at the battle of Marengo against the Austrians.

Granth. The sacred book of the Sikhs. There are really two Granths: one the Adigranth by Arjunmall, and the other by Guru Govind Sinh. Both are metrical and very bulky.

Under me (Govind) the bows of the Singhs have proved triumphant over the sabres of the Moslems; and the precepts of the Granth over the cowardly doctrines of the Vedas and Shastras.—GOVIND, History of his Wars.

Grape-stone (Killed by a). Anacreon the poet was choked by a grape stone, B.C. 478, aged 85. The favourite concubine of Yezid II., kalif of the Saracens, was also killed in the same manner, A.D. 726. See 'Eating Fruit.'

Grasshopper (The). Callimĭdês, an Athenian, in the time of Philip of Macedon; so called on account of his vivacious wit and liveliness.

Grateful Order of St. Catherine (The), 1712. A Russian order founded by Peter the Great, in gratitude to his wife for delivering him from captivity by bribing the Turkish vizier.

Grateley (Synod of). During the reign of Edgar. Made ten regulations for the Church, by far the most important ever passed:

1. Regulated tithes.
2. Authorised judges to execute sentence on those condemned by the trial of ordeal.
3. Against witches and highwaymen.
4. Names the towns authorised to coin money.
5. Awards the punishment for debasing coin.
6. Regulates ordeals.
7. Forbids buying and selling on Sundays.
8. Against perjury.
9. Commands bishops to assist the judges.
10. Against remiss and negligent magistrates.

Gratian's Decretal, or 'Decrētum Gratiani.' A part of the 'Corpus Juris Civilis' collected by Gratian, a Benedictine monk of the 12th cent. in Tuscany. The collection took him twenty-four years to compile.

Grattan's Parliament. Consisted of a house of lords and house of commons. It was altogether Protestant, and was elected exclusively by Protestants till towards the close of its career, when Catholics were admitted to the franchise. It was eminently the representative of the property class of Ireland, and many of its members were the nominees of the British government. Pitt based his argument for the Union mainly on the ground that the Irish Parliament was not workable. In 1780 Grattan proposed in the Irish Parliament the abolition of 'Poyning's Act' (q.v.). It was not then carried, but in 1782 he moved what is called the 'Declaration of Rights'—that any claim out of Ireland to bind the kingdom of Ireland is illegal. In April the same year he assumed the question to be carried, and declared that henceforth no body of men, except the Irish Parliament, has any right to make laws by which Ireland shall be bound. In May C. J. Fox repealed the bill of 6 Geo. I., and Ireland was set free. Grattan was rewarded by a grant from the Irish Parliament of 50,000*l*. See 'Parliaments.'

Grattan's Parliament passed 54 coercion acts. It began in one revolution, and ended after the putting down of an insurrection. The Irish parliament was united to that of Great Britain in 1800, by what is called the 'Act of Union.' Grattan's statue in Dublin was erected in 1876.

Grave of the Russians (The), 1733. On the death of Augustus II. of Poland, Stanislaus Leczinski was elected king, but his election was opposed by Austria and Russia. Stanislaus fled, and shut himself up in Dantzic, where he was besieged by the Russian army, but made so stout a defence that a place is still shown on the fortifications of Dantzic called 'The Grave of the Russians.'

Grave-clothes (The), in which the body of Christ was wrapped after the crucifixion, are thus tabulated by hagiographers: Aix-la-Chapelle contains some the parts deposited at Besançon were thrown away at the Revolution; Cadouin, in the diocese of Périgueux, claims to possess a cloth, somewhat more than two yards and a half in length, and a yard and a quarter in breadth; Cahors is especially rich in the sacred grave-clothes, it claims to possess the cloth which covered the head of Jesus, it is of Egyptian linen 'trois doubles superposés'; Carcasso, in Italy, contains some of them; Chambéry has one beautiful bit of linen cloth, said to have been employed on the occasion; Mayence has some of the grave-clothes; in Rome several churches profess to contain some of these relics; Toulouse has some; and in Turin is a square of linen four and a half yards long, spotted with blood, and said to be the napkin wrapped round the head. See 'Crucifixion, Relics of the.'

If all the grave-clothes said to be relics were used, it must have taken considerable time to have folded them up neatly and placed them on the seat where the body was laid.

Grave-stones (Jewish). An image or effigy with uplifted hands, signifies a Jewish priest. A vase of water delineated on a grave-stone signifies a Levite, who bathed the hands of priests or poured water over them.

In Catholic symbolism figures with their hands on their breasts, and chalices, denote priests.
Figures with crozier, mitre, and pontificals, represent prelates.
Figures with armour represent knights.
Figures with legs crossed represent either crusaders or married men.
Figures with mantle and large ring represent nuns.

Gray. See 'Grey.'

Gray's Inn. One of the four Inns of Court, having the sole power of calling persons to the degree of barrister.

The four Inns of Court are the Inner Temple, the Middle Temple, Lincoln's Inn, and Gray's Inn. New Inn is affiliated to the Middle Temple; Thavies Inn and Furnival's Inn to Lincoln's Inn; Clifford's Inn and Clement's Inn to the Inner Temple; Barnard's and Staple's to Gray's Inn.

Greased Cartridges, 1857. In January, a man employed in India in making cartridges for the new Enfield rifles just supplied to our native soldiers, asked a sepoy of the 2nd Grenadiers for a draught of water from his drinking-pot. The high-caste sepoy was indignant, for if the pot but touched the lips of the artisan, it would have been polluted for ever. The man replied with a sneer that the sepoy need not be so squeamish, as the new cartridges were greased with bullock fat, and every sepoy would lose caste in biting off the end. The horrible tale spread like wildfire. The Hindûs were told the grease was that of the sacred cow, the Moslem soldiers were told it was the grease of the unclean swine. Others asserted it was a mixture of cow and pig fat. And this led to the Indian Mutiny (q.v.).

Great Antiquity (The). The revised records and chronicles of Ireland by the suggestion of St. Patrick. Parts existed for many centuries, as 'The Book of Armagh,' 'The Psalter of Cashel,' 'The Book of Glandaloch,' 'The Leabhar Gabala,' and others, from which much of the ancient history of Ireland is derived.

'The Psalter of Cashel' was compiled by King Cormac. It was a book of annals, very valuable, but unhappily lost.

Great Bear (The), or 'Ursa Major.' The finest of the northern constellations, consisting of seven great stars. Called 'Ceorl's Wain' (the churl's waggon), corrupted into King Charles's Wain. Also called the plough. The figure of a bear with a fox's tail is certainly a funny anomaly.

Great Beds. I. Deut. iii. 11. The bedstead of Og king of Bashan was 9 cubits long and 4 cubits wide, after the cubit of a man, i.e. 18 in. In English measure the length was 13 ft., and the width 6 ft.

II. The Great Bed of Ware is 12 ft. long and 12 ft. wide, said to have been made for Warwick, 'the King-maker.'

III. The bed of Reims Cathedral in which Louis XVI. and Marie Antoinette slept at their coronation was 7 ft. 10 in. long, and 7 ft. 8 in. wide. Its height was 8 ft. from the ground, which must have been most inconvenient.

Great Bible (The), or 'Great English Bible,' 1539–1541. Published in the reign of Henry VIII. A translation under Archbishop Parker, who induced the bishops and other learned men to undertake it in portions. The different parts were afterwards joined together and printed with short notes in folio. In 1589 an octavo edition was brought out. In 1572 another folio edition was printed with corrections, and several prolegomena. This was called 'Matthew Parker's Bible.' See 'Bibles.'

The Great Bible was based on Tyndale's translation.

Great Britain. A name adopted on the legislative union of Scotland and England by the Act of Union passed 16 Jan., 1707. It was provided by this act that the two kingdoms of England and Scotland should be united into one under the name of Great Britain.

Great Bullet-head (The). George Cadoudal, the French royalist (1769–1804). He was head of the Chouans after the death of Jean Cottereau, and in 1802 joined Pichegru's conspiracy (q.v.).

Great Captain (The). I. Hernandez Gonzalo de Cordŏva y Aguilar (1443–1515). Called El Gran Capitan in 1496 after reducing Upper Calabria, surprising Laino, and going to the aid of Ferdinand at Atella in the first half of the year 1496.

He finished up the year by expelling the French from Naples.

II. Manuel I. emperor of Trebizond (1120, 1148–1180).

Great Cham of Literature (The). Dr. Samuel Johnson (1709–1784).

Great Civil War (The). The war in the reign of Charles I.

Nor was he less affected when his aunt narrated the sufferings and fortitude of Lady Alice . . . during the Great Civil War.—Sir W. Scott, Waverley, chap. v.

Great Commoner (The). I. Sir John Barnard, who, in 1717, proposed to reduce the interest of the National Debt from 4 to 3 per cent. Any creditor, however, was at liberty to receive his principal in full, if he liked. It was William Pitt (Lord Chatham) who gave this designation to Sir John Barnard.

Mr. Goschen in 1888 reduced the interest from 3*l.* to 2½*l.* per cent.

II. William Pitt (afterwards Earl of Chatham), 1708–1778. Buried in Westminster Abbey.

Great Company (The). I. 1343. The first was commanded by the German Guarnieri or Duke Werner, who wrote on his corslet 'Enemy of God, of Pity, and of Mercy.' It was employed against the Visconti by the league of the Montferrat, La Scala, Carrara, Este, and Gonzaga houses.

II. 1353. Bands of adventurers under the command of Fra Moriale, and afterwards of Conrad Lando. It consisted of 40,000 men, of whom 5,000 were cuirassiers. It hired itself out to anyone who wanted a ready-made army, and exacted blackmail from cities and castles to be secure against depredations. See 'Pind'aris.' (See Hallam, 'Middle Ages,' vol. i. p. 498.)

Les Compagnies Grandes were the condottieri or free-lances of France: the chief were under Sir Hugh Calverley, Sir Matthew Gournay, and the Chevalier Verte. Under Duguesclin they enlisted in the Spanish army, and disappeared from history 1360.

Great Condé (The). Louis prince de Condé. Died 1674, aged 65.

Great Council (The), 1173. A Venetian council of 480 members, who represented the general assembly of the whole people, and was renewed every year. The electors were a committee of twelve, two from each of the six districts or Sestieri. From this body a committee of sixty formed the senate and assisted the doge.

Great Council of the Peers (The), 24 Sept., 1640. Assembled at York by Charles I., who was unwilling to summon a parliament because the parliament always insisted on redress of grievances before they would grant supplies. This great council was called to grant supplies to raise an army to resist the Scots, who had recently encamped on a hill called Dunse Law, and threatened to advance.

Great Council of the Realm (The). The witenagemote, or parliament of the Norman kings of England. All tenants who held directly of the crown, all bishops, and the greater abbots, with the great officers of the court, constituted this council. It was not so much an assembly of 'wise men' as an assembly of feudal vassals. In the reign of Henry I. the lesser barons were excused attendance, though their right of doing so remained. In 1265 Simon de Montfort summoned knights from each county and two burgesses from each town to his parliament. From 1295 the great council had become the parliament of the realm, in which every order of the state was represented, and having the control of the legislation and executive government of the nation.

Great Cromwell Bible (The), 1538–39. The first edition of the folio Bible, printed in the reign of Henry VIII. The edition contained 2,500 copies, one of which was set up in every church in England, and secured to a desk by a chain. Within three years seven editions were published. See 'Bibles.'

This was not Oliver Cromwell, but Thomas Cromwell, who was beheaded in 1540.

Great Dauphin (The). Louis, son of Louis XIV. (1661–1711).

The son of the Great Dauphin was called 'The Little Dauphin.' Both died before Louis XIV.

Great Disease (The). Leprosy.

Great Duke (The). The Duke of Wellington (1769–1852).

Bury the Great Duke
With an empire's lamentation;
Let us bury the Great Duke
To the noise of the mourning of a great nation.
TENNYSON.

Great Earl of Cork (The). Richard earl of Cork, lord high treasurer of Ireland in the reigns of James I. and Charles I.

Great Eastern (The). The iron 'leviathan' steamship built by Brunel in 1857. It made its first voyage across the Atlantic in 1860. It was broken up in 1888.

Great Elchi (The). Stratford Canning (Lord Stratford de Redcliffe), ambassador to the Ottoman Porte 1841–1858; born 1787, died 1880.

The Turks called him the 'Padishah of the Padishah.'

Great Elector (The). Frederick William elector of Brandenburg (1620–1688).

Great Fire (The), or 'The Great Fire of London,' 1666, the year after the Plague, which it put an end to. It broke out at a bakehouse near London Bridge. Only six persons perished in the fire, though 600 streets, 13,000 houses, 80 churches, St. Paul's Cathedral, the Custom-house, Guildhall, and 4 stone bridges were destroyed. The people, to the amount of 200,000, camped out in the fields of Islington and Highgate.

Great Harry (The), 1509. The first double-decker built in England; it had three masts. It was 1,000 tons burden, and cost 14,000*l*. This ship was built by order of Henry VII., and was completed in the year of his death. It was accidentally burnt at Woolwich in 1553. (See 'Archæologia,' vol. iii. p. 266.) See 'Henri Grâce à Dieu.'

The second great ship was the 'Henri Grâce à Dieu,' and the third was the 'Sovereign of the Seas.' See 'Great Michael.'

Great-head, or 'Caenmore.' Malcolm III. of Scotland, who married Margaret sister of Edgar Atheling (1024, 1057–1093). See also 'Grostête.'

Great King (The). The King of Persia was so called during the prosperity of that empire.

Great Light (The), or Llever Mawr. Cyllin or Linus (2 Tim. iv. 21), brother of Claudia (wife of the senator Pudens, and grandfather of King Lleirwg [Lucius], who is said by some to have introduced Christianity into Britain A.D. 59).

Of course the introduction of Christianity into Britain by King Lucius is generally denied; but other conjectures, no less fanciful, are: St. James the son of Zebedee (Ussher); Simon Zelôtês (Cave); Joseph of Arimathea (Gildas); St. Paul (Eusebius); St. Peter; Aristobûlus, &c. All that is certain is this: Christianity was introduced by someone, probably in the 1st or 2nd cent. In the Council of Arles, 314, the British Church was represented by three bishops (York, London, and Lincoln).

Great Magician of the North (The). Sir Walter Scott is so called by Professor John Wilson (1771–1832).

Great Marquis (The).

I. James Graham marquis of Montrose (1612–1650).

II. Dom Sebastiano Jose de Carvalho marquis of Pombal, the greatest of all the Portuguese statesmen (1699–1782).

Great Michael (The). A monster ship constructed by James IV. of Scotland. Its sides were 10 ft. thick; its length was 240 ft., breadth 36 ft. It required 300 mariners to work her, and would hold 1,000 soldiers. A cannon ball would not pierce her sides. See 'Great Harry,' and 'Henri Grâce à Dieu.'

Great Mogul (The), 1526. A title first assumed by Baber, fifth in descent from Tamerlane. The sovereigns of Delhi continued the title.

Great Mogul Diamond (The). The history of this diamond runs back to B.C. 56, but little is known of it till the 14th cent., when it was held by the rajah of Malwa. Later on it fell into the hands of the sultans of Delhi, after their conquest of Malwa. Tavernier tells us he saw it among the jewels of Aurengzebe, and says in the rough state it weighed 793⅝ carats. The Shah Djihan sent it to Hortensio Borgio, a Venetian lapidary, to be cut, when it was reduced to 186 carats. Djihan was so enraged at this great waste that he not only refused to pay the lapi-dary, but he also fined him 1,000 rupees. This is all that is known of the 'Great Mogul Diamond,' but it is supposed that the Koh-i-noor is the same stone—under which name the rest of its history will be found. See 'Diamonds.'

Great Moralist (The). Dr. Samuel Johnson (1709–1784).

Great O (The). Daniel O'Connell (1775–1847).

As to O'Connell, depend upon it that whatever Mr. Stanley may wish to do, Mr. Stanley's masters have other uses to make of the great O than to sag him.—GLEIG, Life of Wellington (year 1830).

Great Pan (The). Voltaire (1694–1778). Also called the 'Dictator of Letters.'

Great Paschal Period (The). 532 years. See the 'Dionysian Period.'

Great Peace (The), 8 May, 1360. The peace-treaty of Brétigny between France and England, whereby Edward III. renounced his pretension to the crown of France, and his claim to Normandy, Anjou, and Maine. He still, however, retained Calais, Guisnes, Guienne, and Poitou.

Great Plague (The). In French, 'La Grande Peste,' 1580. It began in Portugal, and Lisbon was well-nigh depopulated. It was very fatal in Provence and Aix. In 1581 it appeared in Marseilles, where it carried off all the inhabitants, except 3,000. In Paris it appeared, and the city was overrun with thieves. See 'Plagues.'

Great Power of God (The). Simon Magus (Acts viii. 10).

Great Rebellion (The). The civil war in England which broke out between Charles I. and the Parliament. It began 22 Aug., 1642, and practically terminated with the defeat of the king at Naseby in 1645.

Great Roll of the Pipe (The). A record made up year by year of the revenue accruing to the crown in the different counties of the realm. The certain revenues consisted of farms, fees, castle-guard, and other rents; the casual revenues consisted of fines, amercements, wards, marriages, reliefs, and other profits which fell to the crown by virtue of its prerogatives. The series of these pipe rolls, according to Madox ('History of the Exchequer') goes back to 1155, continues unbroken to 1834, and contains invaluable notices of distinguished persons in English history through all that time by contemporaries. There is one roll of a still earlier date. It has been printed, and Mr. Hunter has shown that it belongs to the 31st year of Henry I. These records and 'Domesday Book' are documents unequalled for antiquity in all Europe.

The office (Clerk of the Pipe) is so called because the whole receipt of the court, says Lord Bacon, is finally conveyed into it by divers small pipes, as water is conveyed into a cistern.

Great Sabbath (The), or Holy Saturday. The day between Good Friday and Easter Sunday.

Idem dicitur SABBATUM LUMINUM, in Chronico Orientali (page 125), quod in eo baptismi fierent quos φωτισμοὺς vocant Graeci.—DU CANGE.

Great Schism of the West (The), 1378–1429. The time when there were two or more contemporary popes, one chosen by French cardinals and the other by Italians. On the death of Gregory XI. the Italians chose Urban VI., a Neapolitan, for his successor; but the French cardinals, who were far the greater number, nominated one of their own countrymen, who was crowned by them as Clement VI. (1378). Urban held his court at Rome, and Clement at Avignon. England, Italy, Bohemia, Germany, Prussia, Poland, and the Scandinavian kingdoms acknowledged the Roman pope; but France, Scotland, Spain, Sicily, and Cyprus acknowledged the French pope.

In this unseemly schism sometimes there were three contemporary popes, as for example Gregory XII., Benedict XIII., and Alexander V.; and sometimes as many as four, as John XXIII., Gregory XII., Benedict XIII., and Martin V.; and again John XIII., Gregory XII., Clement VIII., and Martin V. This disgraceful schism continued for more than half a century.

Great Sea (The). The Mediterranean was so called by the ancient Jews, Greeks, and Romans.

Great Storm (The), 27 Nov., 1703, in the south of England. The damage in London was some two millions sterling, and at Bristol about a quarter of a million. In Little Wild Street chapel, Lincoln's-Inn Fields, a sermon is annually preached on the 27th Nov. to commemorate this national calamity.

It suggested to Addison that happy line—
Rides on the whirlwind and directs the storm.

Great Unknown (The). Sir Walter Scott. So called because his principal romances and novels were not issued under his name, and speculation was agog as to the real author (1771–1832).

Great Unpaid (The). Justices of the peace, whose sentences on offenders have given great dissatisfaction to those who love even-handed justice. Thus at Dulverton, March 1886, Sarah Ann Blackmore was sentenced to 12 months' hard labour for stealing turnips to the value of 4*d*. The very same week Riva Eugene, accused of stealing a policeman's cape, was dismissed, 'because the weather was cold, and policemen should not leave their capes about to tempt cold people.' In the same week William Maltby, aged 10, was sentenced to one month's imprisonment and four years in a reformatory for stealing a shillingsworth of onions, at Southampton.

Great Unwashed (The). The artisan class were first so called by Sir Walter Scott.

Great Wall of China (The). Completed B.C. 214 by Chi-Hwang-Ti of the Tsin dynasty. Every third man of the whole empire was employed on the work, and half a million of them died of starvation. All the houses of Great Britain would not suffice to build such a wall, the contents of which would be enough to build two walls 6 ft. high and 2 ft. thick round the equator.

Great Week (The). Hebdomada Magna. The 13 days between the 5th Sunday of Lent and Easter Sunday (neither of the Sundays included). These 13 days were called Passion Week (q.v.).

Great Western (The). A steamship which sailed from Bristol to New York in 1838. See 'Great Eastern.'

Grecian Year of the World (The). This was 1 Sept., B.C. 5598.

Grecizing Jews. Descendants of Abraham born in foreign countries where Greek was spoken. They were the Greek Hebrews, in contradistinction to the Hebrew Hebrews, who spoke Aramaic or debased Hebrew.

Greco. An Italian who made an attempt on the life of the Emperor Napoleon III. (q.v.), 14 Dec., 1863.

Greek (The Pronunciation of). See 'Greeks and Trojans.'

Greek Cap (The). Was egg-shaped; made, according to a bust of Ulysses, thus:—

See 'Caps,' and 'Hats.'

Greek Church (The). 'The Eastern Church,' and 'the Russian Church,' at one time united with the Church of Rome. In 588 the bishop of Constantinople assumed the title of patriarch, and in 600 the title of pope was restricted to the bishop of Rome. The Greek Church rejects the dogma of purgatory, the celibacy of the clergy, and of course the infallibility of the pope. It administers the eucharist in both kinds, and objects to images, though not to pictures. Greek Catholics believe in consubstantiation, and, like the Roman Catholics, adore the Host.

What is absurdly called The Schismatic Greek Church is that which denies the procession of the Holy Ghost from the Father and the Son, called the Filioque (q.v.), introduced into the creed in 589 by Recared, and sanctioned by the Council of Toledo. Of course, if there is any schism at all about the matter, it was not by those who adhered to the old creed, but by those who introduced the new departure and their followers.

Greek Church Catechism (The), 1642. Prepared by Peter Mogilas. It received authority as a standard or symbolical book from the synod of Jerusalem in 1672, and is often called the 'Larger Russian Catechism,' to distinguish it from the Smaller Russian Catechism prepared by the order of Peter the Great.

Greek Fathers (The Ten). Called, with five Latin ones, the 'Later Fathers' (4th cent.), viz.: Eusebius, Athanasius, Basil, Gregory Nazianzen, Gregory of Nyssa, Cyril of Jerusalem, Chrysostom, Epiphanius, Cyril of Alexandria, and Ephrem the Syrian. See 'Latin Fathers.'

Greek Fire. A terrible weapon invented by Callinĭcus, a native of Heliopŏlis in Syria, who imparted the secret to the Greek government. It was used in battles and sieges, by sea and land. It was either poured from the ramparts from large boilers, or hurled in red-hot balls of stone or iron. Sometimes fire-ships were charged with it, and sometimes it was blown through long copper tubes from the prows. We are told it was made of naphtha, that it caught fire immediately it came in contact with the air, and that it produced a great smoke, a loud explosion, and a fierce flame.

It seems to have been rock oil, as the inflammable liquid sprang from the earth, and to have been mixed with sulphur and pitch from evergreen fir-trees. It was treason to reveal the secret. It continued in use till the 14th cent., when gunpowder took its place.

Greeks and Trojans (The). I. The advocates of Greek literature in the reign of Henry VIII. were called the Greeks, and those who held fast to the old Latin schoolmen were called the Trojans. Both Oxford and Cambridge furiously resisted the introduction of Greek literature, and denounced the Greek Testament as heterodoxy. It was prohibited in the University of Cambridge under very severe penalties. Henry VIII. commanded Greek to be taught in Oxford, and established a Greek professorship at Cambridge. Erasmus tried to teach it, but was unable to resist the opposition he met with.

II. A fiery contest respecting the pronunciation of Greek introduced by Sir John Cheke (1514–1557), Regius Professor of Greek in the University of Cambridge. Sir John (then a Protestant) introduced a new pronunciation of Greek which Gardiner, the chancellor, condemned. Sides were chosen by the scholars: those who supported Sir John were called 'Trojans,' those who opposed him called themselves 'Greeks.' As Gardiner was a Catholic the contention was really Protestants v. Catholics. Many a street fight was fought by the scholars; but at length the king in council commanded the innovation of the regius professor to be discontinued. See 'Ramists.'

Green was the colour consecrated to the Fatimites; White to the Ommiades; Black to the Abbassides (each 3 syl.).

Green-aprons (The). Nonconformist preachers.

Unbeneficed Noncons that live by alms, and no Paternoster no penny, say the Green-aprons.—HICKERINGILL, Priestcraft, pt. i. p. 21.

Greenbacks. A popular name for the paper currency of the United States, from the colour of the printing on the backs of the notes.

Green Bag Inquiry (The). I. On 3 Feb., 1817, the celebrated green bag was sent by the Prince-regent to the Lords, and another on the following day to the Commons. These green bags (always referred to as one), stuffed with documents regarding the occurrences in the Midland counties, as the Derbyshire insurrection (q.v.), the Blanketeers (q.v.), &c. were to be examined by secret committees in both houses. The Lords committee produced their report on 23 Feb., the Commons produced theirs on the 27th. From documents dated 1816 they said there could be no doubt that schemes of conspiracy were in agitation, and the events in 1817 in Derbyshire and Yorkshire confirmed these averments. The insurrections, however, were not formidable, and the mass of the people took no part in them. The committee condemned the ministry for their arbitrary measure in suspending Habeas Corpus, for having executed three men at Derby, and for imprisoning or transporting twenty others. Mr. Tierney called the whole affair 'absurd, contemptible, and ludicrous.' See 'Spencean Philanthropists.'

II. 1820, an inquiry into the conduct of Queen Caroline, the wife of George IV., accused of adultery with Bergami, her chamberlain. The evidence was inclosed in sealed green bags, which were laid on the table of the House of Lords and Commons for investigation. The bags contained documents connected with a commission sent to Milan in 1818; but as far back as 1806 the queen was charged with having given birth to a child at Blackheath, after her separation from the king. The queen was tried and acquitted.

Sir Samuel Romilly says the boy was Billy Austin, son of Sophia Austin, born in Brownlow Street Hospital 11 July, 1802, and taken by the [queen], then Princess of Wales, into her house the same year.

Green Book (The). The register of the South Sea Company, so called from the colour of its covers. When the bubble exploded, Mr. Knight, the cashier, fled to France, carrying the green book with him. General Ross declared the swindle to be 'the greatest villany and fraud ever contrived to ruin a nation.'

Green Books (The). In Italy. Corresponds to our blue-books (q.v.). They contain all sorts of government reports, papers, and other documents.

Green Cap. To wear a green cap, to be a bankrupt. In France, 'porter le bonnet vert.' This phrase rose from an ancient custom which was common even in the 17th cent. of compelling bankrupts to wear a green cap, out of disgrace, and to put men on their guard against them.

Green Cloth (Board of). A court of justice held in the counting-house of the British monarch's household, and composed of the lord steward and inferior officers. To this court is committed the charge and supervision of the royal household in matters of justice and government, with power to correct offenders, and to maintain the peace of the jurisdiction of the court-royal, which extends 200 yards, every way, from the gates of the palace. Without a warrant from this court no servant of the household can be arrested for debt. It takes its name from the green cloth spread over the board at which it is held (Wharton, 'Law Dictionary').

The Board of Green Cloth executed in 1849 the remaining functions of the 'Marshalsea Court.'

Green Cockade (The), 1789. The cockade worn by the French insurgents at the commencement of the Great Revolution. Camille Desmoulins, on one occasion, snatching a green twig from a tree after addressing the mob, stuck it in his hat as a cockade. The whole mass of people followed his example, and a woman brought out a great roll of green ribbon and cut it into bows as far as it would go. This was the revolutionary cockade till the militia of 48,000 was embodied, when a cockade of red and blue (the Parisian colours) was substituted instead.

Green Count (The), 1348. Amadeus VI. count of Savoy (1334, 1343–1383) was so called because he appeared in green at a tournament and was so announced.

Green Crescents. The symbol of the orthodox Moslems. See 'Green Turbans.'

Green Flags (The). The soldiers of the Fatimites. Hence the banner of the sultan of Damascus was a crescent on a green flag. The Abbassides (3 syl.) have a crescent on a black flag, and the Ommiades (3 syl.) a crescent on a white flag. Ordinarily by 'green flags' we mean the Arab troops.

As a railway signal a green flag signifies caution.

Green Isle (The). Ireland is so called from its brilliant verdure.

Green-Mountain Boys (The), 1775. Three hundred men, led by Ethan Allen, who, in the American war of independence, joined the volunteers, who undertook to secure the passes into Canada. They came from the Green Mountains which run through a large part of Vermont.

Green-ribbon Club (The). An anti-popery club held at the club-house in Fuller's Rents, London, in the reign of Charles II., known in history chiefly by its procession on 17 Nov., 1680, organised under the auspices of the Earl of Shaftesbury. It went from Moorgate to Temple Bar, where, in front of the club-house, the whole array of popish effigies which had been carried in the procession were burnt amid fireworks and tremendous shouts. It is said there were at least 100,000 spectators.

The club-house, says Roger North, was a sort of carrefour at Chancery Lane.

Green Room (The). The actors' muster-room in theatres. So called because it is painted green to relieve the eyes of the actors distressed with the glare of the foot-lights. To this room they retire when they make their exit from the stage.

Green Scarfs (The). The badge of Mazarin, Isabella, and the family of Condé.

Red Scarfs, the badge of Henri III. and Charles IX.; White Scarfs, the badge of Crusaders, Armagnacs, and Huguenots; Tricolour Scarfs still worn in France by the municipal magistrates and commissaire of police. White Hoods, the badge of the Burgundians.

Green Silver. A halfpenny tax paid yearly to the feudal lord, as rent, by every tenant in the manor of Writtel, Essex, whose front-door opens on Greenbury.

Green Spectre (The). Irish Rebellion. See 'Irish Associations.'

It is worth while to consider what means can be adopted to prevent the periodical reappearance of the Green Spectre of Ireland.—Irish Seditions from 1792 to 1880, p. 64.

Green Standard (The). Of the Turks; never unfurled except in danger. Said to have been given to Mohammed by the Angel Gabriel, and hence called 'The celestial standard.'

Green Thursday, or 'Dies Viridium' (Luke xxxiii. 31). Maundy Thursday, the day of absolution in the Lutheran Church, preparatory to the Holy Communion, which is celebrated the day following (i.e. on Good Friday). In German called 'Gründonnerstag.'

Green Turbans. The descendants of Fatima, in Turkey, called emirs or shereefs, wear green turbans; but the Fatimites of Egypt wore red ones, like the unorthodox Persians.

In Afghanistan every synd, or Afghan descendant of the Prophet, is entitled to wear a green turban.

Green Vault of Dresden (The). Grüne Gewölbe'; is in the Zwinger, a group of buildings erected by Augustus II. as a vestibule to his new palace. It is called 'Green' from the colour of the paper or hangings with which it was originally covered. The regalia used at the coronation of Augustus (a present of Karl V.) are still kept in the seventh apartment. The 'Emerald of the Green Vault' is in the eighth or last apartment.

Greens and Blues (The). The livery colours of opposed charioteer factions in Constantinople, which in the time of Justinian verged on sedition. Like our Light and Dark Blue, which are the livery colours worn by the contending Universities of Cambridge and Oxford in athletic contests such as the boat race. The Blues in Constantinople denoted the votaries of Justinian, and the Greens those of Anastasius.

Cambridge is Light Blue, Oxford is Dark Blue. In Constantinople there were two minor factions, called the Whites and the Reds; but these merged into the other two, the Whites into the Blues, and the Reds into the Greens.

Gregorian Calendar (The), 1582. The calendar reformed by Pope Gregory XIII. by expunging ten days, in order to restore the equinox to March 21, the day on which it fell in the Council of Nice in A.D. 325. In order to prevent the recurrence of a like error in future, he ordered that of years ending centuries only those divisible by 400 should be accounted leap years (excepting 400, and all multiples of 400). Introduced into Italy, Spain, and Portugal in 1582; into France a few months later; into Catholic Switzerland, Germany, and the Netherlands in 1583; into Poland in 1586; into Hungary and Denmark in 1700; into Protestant Switzerland in 1701; into England in 1752; into Sweden in 1753; but Russia still retains the old style.

The centuries 1700, 1800, 1900 are not leap years, because 17, 18, 19 will not divide by 4; but the years 1600, 2000, and 2400 are leap years, because 16, 20, 24 are multiples of 4.

Gregorian Chant (The). The chant of Ambrose (bishop of Milan), which had only four tones, extended to eight tones by Gregory the Great (591–604). It was taken from the Greek chant used in the mysteries of Eleusis.

The Ambrosian chant had four tones or modes, called the Dorian, Phrygian, Lydian, and Mixolydian.

Gregorian Epoch (The). Begins March 1582, when the New Style or Reformed Calendar was introduced by Gregory XIII.

Gregorian Liturgy (The). This is the Roman liturgy (q.v.).

Gregorian Mass. 'Missa S. Gregorii,' a mass 'quæ juxta ritum Gregorianum celebratur.' See 'Mass.'

Gregorian Year (The). The civil year of the Gregorian Calendar.

Gregorians (The), 1376. A religious society named after Gregory the Great, founded in Holland by Geert Groote and Florentius Radewin. Not unlike the subsequent society known as Moravians or the United Brethren. They acknowledged no conventual distinctions, and enjoined community of goods, ascetic habits, and the use of the vernacular tongue in all religious services.

Gregory Act (The). By which tenants in Ireland could not get relief from the workhouse if they held more than a quarter of an acre of land, without surrendering their holding.

Grenville Collection (The), 1846. Added to the British Museum Library by the Right Hon. Thomas Grenville. It consists of 20,240 volumes, and cost about 54,000*l*. It contains the Mazarine Bible (2 vols. 1455), a copy of 'Livy' on vellum (1469), the Aldine 'Virgil' (1505), a Shakespeare (1623), Azzoduidi's 'Ovid,' a series of early editions of 'Orlando Furioso,' &c.

Gresham Lectures (The), 1575. Lectures on the seven sciences (divinity, astronomy, music, geometry, law, physic, and rhetoric), delivered in Gresham College, and founded by Sir Thomas Gresham, the merchant. The lectures were neglected from 1700 to 1762, and then the building was sold to the government for the site of an excise office. Some attempts have been made to revive the lectures, which were delivered in the Royal Exchange till the fire of 1838. The new buildings were opened in 1843.

The lectures were established in 1575, but the college was not completed till 1579.

Gretna Green Marriages. When Lord-Chancellor Hardwicke, in 1754, brought in his bill for the virtual abolition of Fleet marriages by compelling the publication of banns on three successive Sundays, or else an expensive licence; he wished to extend the operation of the bill to Scotland also; but, failing in this, marriages at Gretna Green without banns, notice, or licence continued to the close of the year 1856, when by 19 & 20 Vict. c. 96, s. 1, they were declared to be irregular.

Grey (Lady Jane), 1537–1554. Reigned ten days, and was beheaded. She was persuaded or forced by her father-in-law (the Duke of Northumberland) to usurp the crown. Her name is not received in the list of English monarchs.

HENRY VII. was the father of HENRY VIII. and Mary.
HENRY VIII. was the father of EDWARD VI., MARY, and ELIZABETH (no issue).
Now take Mary, Henry VII.'s daughter: her second husband was Charles Brandon duke of Suffolk, by whom she had Frances [Brandon], who married Henry Grey; and the Lady Jane was their daughter.
Lady Jane Grey married Lord Guilford Dudley (fourth son of the Duke of Northumberland), aged sixteen.
 Lord Guilford Dudley was the grandson of the scandalous lawyer of the firm Empson and Dudley so notorious in the reign of Henry VII.

Grey Friars (The). So the Franciscans were called from the colour of their dress, as the Dominicans were called 'Black Friars,' and the Carmelites were called 'White Friars.'

Grey League (The), 1424. 'Graubünden' or 'Lia Grescha,' one of the three unions of the Grisons. So called from the grey homespun worn by the unionists, whence the word 'Gris-ons' and the German 'Graubünden.' In 1427 the three leagues united into a general federation, and formed an alliance with the Swiss cantons.

The other two unions are the Cadelan League (q.v.) and the League of the Six Jurisdictions.

Grey Sister of Hearts (The). Julienne Wittinghoff, baroness von Krudener (1764–1824), a mystic, credited with prophesying Napoleon's flight from Elba and his fall at Waterloo. Alexander I. of Russia was one of her disciples; and when she went to Paris during its occupation by the allies, her religious 'drums' were the fashion of the hour.

The baroness promoted the 'Holy Alliance' in 1815, and died in the Crimea, 13 Dec. 1824.

Grey Sisters (The), 1634. Sisters of Charity, so called from their grey dress. A society of unmarried women, whose functions are to nurse the sick, and do what they can to relieve the sufferings of all inmates of hospitals. The society was founded in France by Vincent de Paul and the widow Legras. Suppressed at the Revolution, but restored by Napoleon in 1807, under the presidency of the empress-mother.

Greysteil. Lord Ruthven, son of the Lord Ruthven who murdered David Rizzio, was so called from Sir Greysteil, the hero of a metrical romance very popular at the time. He was honoured for his courage and hardihood, in which respect he resembled Greysteil.

Griffith's Valuation, 1826. To provide for the more equal levying of grand jury cess and county charges. Made by Richard Griffith, the commissioner appointed under Act 7 Geo. IV. c. 62, for Ireland.

The Tenement Valuation, 1846-7, amended by Act (1852) was used for all public and local assessments, as well as for all imperial purposes, till the new assessment came into operation.

Grimes Dyke, A.D. 140–141. A rampart and ditch formed by Lollius Urbicus, general of Antonīnus Pius, from Dunglass Castle (on the Clyde) to the heights above Caer Ridden Kirk. It had nineteen forts, with an average interval of two miles. Also called Graeme's and Graham's Dyke.

Grimes is Keltic for 'great.'

Grimm's Law. The formula of Jacob Louis Grimm, the philologer, for the variation of consonants as a word passes out of one country into another.

For example: the Latin, Greek, or Sanskrit p becomes f in English: thus pater becomes father, &c.

Grise League (The), 1424. The second league of the Grisons for independence.

Grisognel the Grey Cloak. Geoffrey of Anjou, father of Henry II. (1113–1151).

His son was called 'Curtmantle.'

Grist Tax (The), 1815. An absolute prohibition on the delivery of wheat out of warehouse, and its importation for home consumption till the price reached 80*s.* per quarter was imposed. In 1822 this act was amended, and in 1828 a sliding scale was established ('Notes and Queries,' 2 May, 1889, p. 180).

Groans of the Britons (The), A.D. 426. A letter addressed to Aetius, the popular captain of the day, to come and help the English against the constant irruptions of the Picts and Scots. But the Romans were at the time dreading the advance of Attila; and the Britons, left to the tender mercies of their ravagers, invited over the Saxons.

Grostête or Grosseteste. Robert Copley, bishop of Lincoln (1175, 1235–1253). Sometimes Anglicised into 'Greathead.'

Grub Street Journal, London. Grub Street is now called Milton Street, famous at one time for trashy literature. The journal was a folio in size, and continued to be issued to the end of the year 1737. It then became a quarto, and was entitled 'The Literary Courier of Grub Street.'

He, honest man, was deep in Grub Street and polemical divinity.—ANDREW MARVELL, The Rehearsal, &c. See also 'Dunciad,' i. 88.

Grumbletonians, 1692. The anti-court party, or out-of-office party. By a refined euphemism the court party was called 'The Patriot Party' and the Grumbletonians the 'Country Party.' Bolingbroke and Walpole were the two representative men in 1723 (MACAULAY, 'Hist. of Eng.,' chap. xix.).

Grypus (γρυπός, Hooked Nose). So Antiochus VIII., king of Syria, was called (B.C. 141–196).

Guard. See 'Garde.'

Guardian and Lieutenant of the Realm. So George I. called the Prince of Wales, when left in charge of the United Kingdom, in 1716. He was extremely jealous of his son, and would not hear of his being called regent. It was not, however, a new title, as the Black Prince had borne it in 1338, &c.

Guebres [Infidels]. So the Moslems call all, except Jews and Christians, who do not profess Islamism; but generally the Parsees are meant. See 'Giaours.'

Guelf Fund. A considerable amount of money which falls annually to the emperor of Germany, and is not dependent on the consent of parliament. A part is paid to subsidise newspapers, and 50,000*l.* is spent yearly in secret service. It is called the 'Guelf Fund' because it arises from the interest of the sequestered property of the Hanoverian dynasty.

Guelfs and Ghibellines (The), 12th cent. The Guelfs were dukes of Bavaria, who contended with the house of Hohenstauffen for pre-eminence. From a mere German feud the contention advanced to a long and bitter struggle between the civil and spiritual powers. The Guelfs were the pope's party, and laboured to set the pope above the crowned princes. The Ghibellines were the imperial or civil party, and tried to set the kaiser above the pope.

In consequence of this rivalry, we find two rival contemporary popes, Alexander III. (A.D. 1159) the Guelfic pope, and Victor IV. (A.D. 1159) the kaiser's pope. Of course the latter was called an anti-pope by the Roman party. Guelf was duke of Saxony; Ghibelline, or rather Waiblingen, is a town of Würtemberg, the patrimonial seat of the Hohenstauffen family. . . . The words were first used as the battle cries in 1138 when Guelf, the brother of Henry the Proud, was defeated by Konrad of Hohenstauffen at Weinsberg.

 [After the reign of Kaiser Heinrich VII., in 1313, the terms 'Guelf' and 'Ghibelline' completely changed their original meaning. The Ghibellines were originally the imperial party, but from 1313 Italian rebels were called Ghibellines. This was because the German emperors were for ever disturbing the government of the Italian states; and as these emperors were Ghibellines, so the word came to denote a disturber of the state, a rebel, or insurgent. Of course, the insurgents were not slow to retort on the government party the nickname of Guelfs. The Hanoverian British line is that of the Guelfs. See 'Tories.'

Guercino (Squint Eye). Gian Francesco Barbieri, a famous painter of the Bolognese school. His masterpieces are the fresco of 'Aurora' in the Villa Ludovisi, the 'Persian Sibyl,' and 'St. Petronilla' (1590–1666).

Gue'rinets (The), 1684. Enthusiasts and visionaries in France; a sort of Illuminati.

Guerra de las Comunerades (5 syl.), 1520–1521. The insurrection of the Comuneros under Padilla, a young nobleman of Toledo. The insurgents were defeated at Villala, and Padilla was executed. See 'Comuneros.'

Guerra di Candia (Una). 'War to the knife.' A Venetian expression alluding to the siege of Candia by the Turks (1667–1668). This siege cost the lives of 30,000 Christians and 120,000 Turks. Candia was ultimately obliged to surrender.

Guerrillas. Petty wars, or partisan warriors; armed bands of peasants are so called in Spain. The insurrections of Jack Cade, Wat Tyler, and Robert Kett would be so called in Spain. From 1808 to 1814 guerrillas were regularly organised against the French, and the names of Empecinado, the Pastor Merino, and Mina, as leaders, are well known.

Mina's band joined Wellington, and did good service in the Peninsular war. The guerrillas also joined the Carlists, and distinguished themselves.

Guet (Le). The police of the old régime of France, changed, in 1789, into the Garde Municipale de Paris. It was reorganised in 1254 by St. Louis [IX.], who subdivided the corps into the Guet Royal, and the Guet assis or des mestiers. The Guet Royal consisted of twenty sergents à cheval and twenty sergents à pied. The Guet assis consisted of bourgeois and artisans, the former being the night watch, and the latter orderlies of the Guet Royal. The Constituent Assembly replaced the Guet by the Gendarmerie.

Pronounce Gu-ay.

Gueux. 16th cent. ragamuffins. The revolutionists in Spain and the Netherlands in 1566. There were 300 deputies of the Calvinistic party, headed by H. de Brederode (a descendant of the counts of Holland) and Louis count of Nassau, who demanded of Margaret, the governor, the abolition of the Inquisition. When Margaret seemed about to give way the Count of Barleymont, her counsellor, recommended her to dismiss the deputation, saying to her, 'Ce ne sont que des gueux.' The word was caught up; they called themselves 'Les Gueux,' and took for their badge a wallet and porringer. The 'Gueux des bois' combated on land, the 'Gueux de mer' sought a refuge at sea.

Pronounce Lay gewz ; Gewda bwă ; Gewd mair.

Guillemites (3 syl.), 1153. A religious congregation founded at Pescara by St. Gulielmus of Malaval. They soon spread over Italy, France, and Germany. From 1256 they had a monastery at Montrouge, near Paris. They were called White Mantles (Blancs-Manteaux) from the great white mantles which they wore. They ceased to exist long before the Revolution.

Guillotine (The), 31 May, 1791. Joseph Ignace Guillotin, M.D., induced the Legislative Assembly of France to adopt the machine which bears his name for the execution of criminals condemned to death. But it was not till 20 March, 1792, that a special decree was made for its universal use. It was not the invention of Dr. Guillotin, for a like instrument was used in England in the time of Edward III. 'The Maiden' of Scotland was used in 1578. The Halifax 'Maiden' was well known. And a similar instrument had been used in Germany, Bohemia, and Italy.

The Regent Morton, who introduced the 'Maiden' into Scotland, was (according to tradition) the first to suffer by it.

Guinea. The English gold coin, equal to 21*s*., first coined in 1662. Withdrawn from circulation in 1817.

Physicians, barristers, schoolmasters, clergymen in temporary office, artists, &c., still preserve the word 'guinea,' and are paid by guineas instead of sovereigns. Honoraria and many subscriptions to charities are also paid in guineas. In fact, it is esteemed a more 'aristocratic' payment. The gold of the first specimens came from the coast of Guinea.

Guinegate, or 'Guinegatte.' In France. Noted for the 'Battle of the Spurs' [p. 80, col. 1], won by Henry VIII. over the French. Here, on 7 Aug., 1479, had been fought another battle, between Louis XI. and Maximilian of Austria, to which Philippe de Comines (2 syl.) refers:—

Remember Guynegate, a warning against the allurements either of plunder or of prisoners; for Guynegate was lost in the very moment of victory by our too great eagerness for pillage.

Guinever (The Canons Regular of St.). See 'Geneviève.'

Guirlande de Julie. This Julie was the celebrated Julie Lucie d'Angennes, daughter of the Marquis de Rambouillet, who presided over the society called L'Hôtel de Rambouillet, and married the Duc de Montausier. When the duc was paying his court to the witty Julie, he made her a present of a MS. book of select poems, which he called the 'Guirlande de Julie,' illuminated with flowers painted by Robert. The poems were in the handwriting of Jarry. The book was in the family of the Duc d'Uzès in 1870, and probably is there still, but it has been printed and published.

Pronounce Gir-land d'zhu-le.

Gulistan (Peace of), 1813. Between Persia and Russia.

Gunpowder Plot, 1605. A conspiracy to destroy the king, lords, and commons, by springing a mine secreted under the houses of parliament, on 5 Nov., the day of the king's speech. The plot was projected by Robert Catesby, who was joined by many Roman Catholics of high rank. Guido Fawkes (Guy Faux) was employed to fire the train, but was apprehended in the vaults under the houses of parliament. Sir Everard Digby, Rockwood, Winter, Garnet (a Jesuit), Guy Faux, and some others were executed 31 Jan., 1606. Robert Catesby was shot 8 Nov., 1605, while attempting to raise an insurrection in Worcestershire; and Thomas Percy, of the family of Northumberland, was shot at Holbeach the same day.

Gunter's Chain, 1624. A chain used for land-measuring. It is 22 yards long, the square of which is 484. Now an acre is 4,840 square yards, and therefore a square chain is a tenth of an acre, or 10 = 1 acre. Again, a chain contains 10,000 square links, and, as 10 chains = an acre, it follows that 100,000 square links = an acre. So that, in measuring a field by a Gunter's chain, all that is required is to divide the result by 100,000, or (which is the same thing) to cut off the last five figures, to obtain the area in acres.

Gunter's Line. A logarithmic line engraved on scales and sectors, serving to perform the multiplication and division of numbers instrumentally.

Gunter's Quadrant. A quadrant for finding the hour of the day, the sun's azimuth, and other problems of the sphere.

Gunter's Scale. For resolving questions in navigation by the aid of a pair of compasses. Called by seamen 'The Gunter.'

Gurgoyles (2 syl.), familiarly called 'The Gurgs,' 1775–1855. A society which flourished for eighty years at Lincoln's Inn, being a revival of the old Cambridge Shakespeare Society. It was never formally dissolved.

Guy's Hospital, 1721. Founded by Thomas Guy, a London bookseller, who was M.P. for Tamworth (1694–1707).

Gwynn (Nell, or Eleanor). It is said that her real name was Margaret Symcott. The dukes of St. Albans are descended from this mistress of Charles II.

Gymnos'ophists (4 syl.), or 'Naked Philosophers.' Indian philosophers, so called by the Greeks because they went about naked. The two best known are Calānus and Zarmenochegas. The former followed Alexander the Great from India, and, being taken ill, burnt himself alive in the presence of the Macedonian army, B.C. 323. The latter burnt himself alive at Athens in the presence of Augustus.

They are now represented by the 'sky-clad' branch of the Jains. At present they eat their meals without any clothing.

Gypsy (plu. Gypsies). Called also 'Egyptians,' 'Bohemians,' 'Gitanos,' 'Zingari,' or 'Zingali.' Are mentioned in 1122 in the German paraphrase of Genesis. They appeared in Hungary, Wallachia, and Cyprus in 1320; in Germany between 1416–1420; at Zürich in 1418; in Italy in 1422; at Paris in 1427; in Scotland in 1506.

Gypsies forbidden to dwell in the land:—

H, on pennypieces, 1875, &c., stands for H[eaton]—the firm of Ralph Heaton & Sons of Birmingham, which supplied the mint with 100 tons of the bronze pennypieces. Their first issue was 1875; and the officers of Tower Hill, in order to identify the coin, had the letter H impressed on the dies.

Habeas Corpus (Suspension of the). In times of great political excitement the operation of the Habeas Corpus Act is usually suspended, by which persons committed are not allowed to be bailed. The committing magistrate has to bear, in such cases, all the responsibility of the commitment.

Habeas Corpus Act (The), 1679, (31 Car. II. c. 2), securing English subjects against arbitrary imprisonment.

This is provided for by the writ called 'Habeas Corpus ad Subjiciendum' which is addressed to any person who detains another in custody, commanding him to produce the body of the prisoner, and to state the day and cause of his capture and detention. This done, the court decides whether the prisoner shall be liberated, admitted to bail, or remanded.

Habsburg (House of). Incorrectly written 'Hapsburg.' I. Furnished Germany with Rodolf I., Adolf of Nassau, and Albert I. of Austria (1273–1308).

The word Habsburg or Habichts-burg, built in the 11th cent., means 'hawk's castle.' The castle stood on the right bank of the Aar, in the Swiss canton of Aargau.

II. Of Austria. Began with Albert [Albrecht] II. the Illustrious (son of Albert IV. duke of Austria), and son-in-law of Siegmund the preceding kaiser. Albert was also called 'the Magnanimous' and 'the Grave.' This line of kaisers began in 1438, and still continues in that part of Germany called Austria and Hungary.

The Habsburgers of direct male descent ceased in 1806; Karl VII., son of Maria Theresa, was a Habsburger on his mother's side only.

Hadith. Traditions about Mohammed the prophet, complementary to the Koran.

Hadrian's Rescript. A letter to Serēnius Graniānus, proconsul of Asia, respecting the way he was to treat Christians. 'If anyone shall prove any offence against the laws to have been committed by Christians, proceed against them as the law directs; but if the charge brought against them be mere calumny, then punish the accuser as he deserves.' See 'Trajan's Rescript.'

Hæcceity. A term in school divinity meaning the principle of individuation. The Realists maintained that universals only were real, and that they formed individuals by the intervention of the principle of hæcceity.

Hæret'ico comburendo (De). A writ against heretics, who, being convicted of heresy by a bishop abjured it, but afterwards relapsing, were delivered over to the secular power to be burnt alive. Abolished by the pension parliament in 1677 (tempore Charles II.).

Hag'gada. The rabbinical interpretation of scripture for homiletical purposes. See 'Midrash.'

Haileybury College, 1806. Founded by the East India Company at Great Amwell, Herts, for the education of 105 students intended for the civil service in India.

Hair.

GREEKS. The Spartans combed and dressed their hair carefully, especially when about to encounter any great danger; as Leonīdas and his 300 did before starting for Thermopylæ. Sailors both in Greece and Rome shaved off their hair after a shipwreck or other calamity, and dedicated it to some deity. In mourning, Greek and Roman women cut their hair short, but the men in both countries left their hair rough and unkempt, as if their grief was too great for their concerning themselves about personal adornment.

In childhood both Greeks and Romans wore long hair, but the boys, on reaching puberty, had their hair clipped and dedicated to some river-god. At Athens this ceremony took place on the third day of the festival called 'Apaturĭa.'

Slaves, both in Greece and Rome, were always shaved, and vestal virgins, like Catholic nuns, cut off their hair when they took their vows.

One way of supplicating was pulling out one's hair. After this manner Agamemnon presented himself before Zeus, when Hector had given the Greeks an overthrow.—Iliad, xx. 15.

ROMANS. Men wore their hair long till about B.C. 300, when short hair and shaving came into vogue. Scipio Africānus (B.C. 234–183) was the first Roman who shaved. Under the empire the style of dressing the hair was extremely finical. Mark Antony (B.C. 80–30) is represented as wearing his hair in sausage curls arranged in rows all round his head. The Emperor Gallienus (A.D. 260–268) had his hair powdered with gold-dust.

In Hadrian's time (76, 117–138) full beards and short hair were in vogue, and this fashion continued to the end of the empire.

The GAULS and ancient BRITONS. The Teutonic tribes wore their hair long, as did the ancient Gauls and Britons. That part of Gaul the furthest remote from Roman influence was called Gallia Comāta (long-haired Gaul), to distinguish it from the half-Romanised Gallia Togāta.

The SAXONS and DANES wore long hair and long beards, but the NORMANS shaved their chins, and sometimes the back of their heads also.

ENGLAND. In the reign of Henry I. (1100–1135) the gentlemen rivalled the ladies in the length of their hair, and long hair prevailed till the time of Henry VIII. (1509–1547), when short hair came into vogue. In the reign of Charles I. (1625–1649) ringlets and love-locks were affected by the Cavaliers, but Puritans cropped their hair close to the head. In the reign of Charles II. (1661–1685) enormous wigs flowing over the shoulders were worn, and this fashion continued up to the reign of George III. (1760–1820).

In 1765 the wig-makers petitioned the king against the discontinuance of wigs, praying for their reintroduction. An excellent satire was set on foot praying his Majesty to introduce the fashion of wooden legs for the benefit of carpenters.

At the close of the 18th cent. the disgusting habit of plastering the hair with flour, powder, and pomatum, to the amount of 2 lbs. or more, was introduced. My father used to tell us how, when he was a young man, and was going to a public entertainment, the hairdresser was generally obliged, from stress of business, to come the day before 'to make his head,' which was the usual phrase; and that he was obliged to sleep in an armchair for fear of deranging his hair. When the head was 'unmade' the lard and powder taken out would fill a small basin. He said that every gentleman used to carry a 'scratcher,' with an ivory hand at one end to scratch the back, and a sharp point at the other to scratch the head, because the parasites were so troublesome. In my young days, gentlemen wore their hair smooth, with a pig-tail and bag or pig-tail and knocker. Not long after William Pitt introduced his tax on hair-powder, the hair was cut short as it is at present (1890).

The style of dressing hair among ladies is far too long a subject for this note-book, but foolery reached its climax in the time of Marie Antoinette. My mother says that in her days the hairdresser was provided with steps, that he might pile up the hair high enough.

Hair as a sign of Rank.

The PARTHIANS and ancient PERSIANS of high rank wore long flowing hair.

Homer speaks of the 'long-haired GREEKS' by way of honourable distinction. Subsequently, the Athenian cavalry wore long hair, and all the Lacedæmonian soldiers did the same.

The GAULS considered long hair a mark of honour, for which reason Julius Cæsar obliged them to cut off their hair in token of submission, for all slaves were shorn.

The FRANKS and ancient GERMANS considered long hair a mark of high birth. Hence Clodion, the Frank, was styled 'the Long-haired,' and his successors were spoken of as les rois chevelures.

The GOTHS considered long hair a mark of honour, and short hair a mark of thraldom.

For many centuries long hair was in FRANCE the distinctive mark of kings and nobles, and in the time of Charles II. the Cavaliers gloried in long hair.

Hair shaved off.

MOHAMMEDANS shave the scalp, but leave a tuft of hair for the 'angel to lay hold of when he carries the dead to paradise.'

The CHINESE shave all the head except the top, where the hair is suffered to grow into a long pig-tail. This was a Tartar custom.

The Buddhist priests shave all the head.

Catholic priests shave their head more or less. The part shaved is called the 'tonsure.' St. Peter's tonsure is quite round the head, to indicate the crown of thorns. St. Paul's tonsure is the whole head shaved like a Buddhist priest's. Simon Magus's tonsure is a semicircle shaved from ear to ear above the forehead, but not extended to the back of the head. This sort of tonsure is natural baldness.

Catholic priests shave their faces quite clean, and the same custom is affected by the 'High Church party' of the Anglican Church. However, Christ and his apostles are always represented with moustaches and long beards.

Hair Powder, 1590. An aristocratic badge of the Guise party, opposed to Henri IV. The Guise party put forward the old Cardinal de Bourbon whom they called king, and in courtly flattery whitened their hair, and wore white plumes or white cockades. Originally hair-powder was an aristocratic distinction of the high church and state party in France. It was taxed in England in 1795 (1*l.* 3*s.* 6*d.*), which brought in 20,000*l.* a year. Nowadays hair-powder is worn only by some of the footmen of the nobility and higher commoners. The number of powdered footmen in 1890 was under 900.

Hakem (A). A Musulman magistrate under a cadi.

Hal'danites (3 syl.). Followers of James Alexander Haldane (1768–1857) of Aithrie, near Stirling. They are the Scotch Baptists, commonly called 'Maclean's People.'

Halifax, capital of Nova Scotia, 1749. So named in honour of the Earl of Halifax, then president of the Board of Trade in England. When the army was reduced in consequence of the peace of Aix-la-Chapello, a great number of soldiers and sailors were thrown out of employment. It was resolved, therefore, to grant to every settler in Nova Scotia a free passage, 50 acres of freehold land, and another 10 acres for each child. Some 4,000 men with their families accepted the offer, sailed to Nova Scotia under Colonel Cornwallis, and founded the town of Halifax, now the capital of the province.

Halifax Law. Whoever committed a theft exceeding 13*d.* in value in the liberty of Halifax was summarily executed on the 'jyn' of Halifax, a kind of guillotine. Taylor the Water-poet (1630) refers to this law and this jyn.

Hall—College. Colleges are corporate bodies. Halls are not incorporated.

Hall Marks of gold and silver articles.

Silver articles have now four marks and a cartouch. Beginning on the left hand we have (1) the head of the reigning sovereign; (2) the date-letter; (3) the leopard's head, the company's mark; (4) the lion passant, the national mark; and (5) the cartouch containing the initials of the manufacturer.

The head of the sovereign was first added to the marks in 1784.

The leopard's head was adopted as the company's mark in 1300.

The date-letters have been in use since 1438. The custom for the last 200 years has been to use capitals and small letters alternately every twentieth year.

As all common alphabets have been exhausted, the shape of the shield will distinguish a modern mark from a more ancient one of the same character. Thus in 1876 Roman capitals were employed; so they were in 1796. But the shields were different; the shield of 1876 being and that of 1796

and of course the sovereign's head differs.

A is the 1st year, B the 2nd year, C the 3rd year, and so on, omitting J and the last six letters.

The character of letters hitherto used are as follows:—

1438-1457 Lombardic, simple, small letters.
1458-1477 „ with external cusps.
1478-1497 „ with double cusps.
1498-1517 Black letter, small.
1518-1537 Lombardic, simple, capitals.
1538-1557 Roman caps, with border.
1558-1577 Black letter, small.

From this date the letters are placed in shields.

1578-1597 Clarendon caps, in shield.
1598-1617 Lombardic, with external cusps, in shield.
1618-1637 Italic, small, in shield.
1638-1657 Court hand „
1658-1677 Black letter caps „
1678-1696 Black letter, small „
1696-1715 Court hand „
1716-1735 Clarendon caps „
1736-1755 Clarendon, small letters, in shield.
1756-1775 Old English caps „
1776-1795 Clarendon, small letters „

From this date caps and smalls alternate.

1796-1815 Roman capitals, in shield, flat bottom.
1816-1835 Roman small letters „ „
1836-1855 Old English caps, in shield, pointed bottom.
1856-1875 Old English smalls, in shield, pointed bottom.
1876-1895 Roman caps, in shield, pointed bottom.
1896-1915 Roman smalls „ „

Clarendon, i.e. Roman letters with no fine strokes, but all black alike.

 The assay-marks guarantee the exact proportion of alloy contained in the article. The standard of perfect purity being assumed to be 24 carats; the figures —such as 12, 15, 18, 20, &c.—marked on gold and silver articles mean that 12, 15, 18, or 20 carats of the 24, are pure metal, and the rest is alloy.

Some silver has been assayed out of London, and instead of the leopard's head the following marks are used:—

For Birmingham	...	An anchor.
„ Chester	...	Three garbs and a dagger (the City arms).
„ Exeter	...	A castle with 3 towers.
„ Newcastle-on-Tyne		Three castles.
„ Sheffield	...	A crown.
„ Edinburgh	...	A thistle.
„ Glasgow	...	Tree, fish, and bell (the City arms).
„ Dublin	...	A harp crowned.

(A garb in heraldry is a sheaf of grain.)

Hall Mote. The court held in Saxon times in the castle hall of the lord of a town or tithing, to punish by fines thieves, vagrants, and disorderly persons. It was inferior to the 'Folk Mote' (q.v.).

Hallamshire. So called from the manor of Hallam, or Hallun, north of Rivelin, and 'in the parish of Sheffield.' Before the conquest Attercliffe and Sheffield were integral parts of Hallam manor, but after the conquest the manors of Hallam, Ecclesfelt, Bradfield, and Hansworth were all occupied by one baron, and called the Manor of Sheffield. Leland says:—'Halamshire beginneth a ii mile from Rotheram. Sheffield iii miles from Rotheram, wher the lord of Shrewsbyre's castle is, the chese-market towne of Halamshire. And Halamshire goith one way vi or vii miles above Sheffilde by west, yet as I here say, another way the next village to Sheffilde is in Derbyshire. Al Halamshire go to the sessions of York, and is counted as a membre of Yorkshire. Æglesfild and Bradfield ii townelettes or villages long to one paroche chirche. So by this meanes ther be but iii paroches in Halamshire that is of name, and a great chapelle' ('Itin.,' vol. v. f. 94). See 'Hoyland.'

Hallelujah Band (The). A Protestant religious sect whose services consist entirely of thanksgiving.

Hallelujah Victory (The), or 'Victoria Alleluiatica,' 30 March, A.D. 430. A legendary victory of St. Germanus bishop of Auxerre and Lupus bishop of Troyes over the Picts and Saxons at Mold in Flintshire. So called because the Britons led by them shouted 'Hallelujah' so loudly that the enemy was panicstruck and fled.

St. Germanus was chosen commander against the Saxons; and not by the clang of trumpets and clash of arms, but by singing hallelujah, he routed the foe, and they perished in the sea.—NENNIUS, Hist. of the Britons, § 47.

Halley's Comet, 1682. Dr. Halley determined the recurrence of this comet by supposing it to be the same as that which appeared in 1607 and 1531. If so it would appear again in 1759, and so it did. M. Damoiseau calculated that it ought to appear again in 1835, and so it did.

It will be seen that these intervals vary from 70 to 80 years; the variation is occasioned by the attraction of the planets on the motion of the comet.

Hallow Eve Fires, 1 Nov. The bonfires kindled in Scotland for the harvest-home festival. The Highlanders keep their bonfire festival, called Beltein (q.v.), on May-day, old style. Gregory IV. changed the feast of All Saints or All Hallows from May-day to 1 Nov. Hence the double feast. The Romans held the festival of Cybelê on May-day, and Gregory IV. changed the day for the sake of changing 'Cybelê and all the gods' into 'St. Mary and all the saints.'

Hallow-e'en. The eve of All Hallows (31 Oct.), or day before All Saints', which is 1 Nov.

Halt (Robert). The pen-name of M. Vieu.

Hamadanites (4 syl.), 892–1001. Of the tribe of Hamadan. A dynasty of Mesopotamia, including Mosul and Aleppo, occupied by Arabian princes of the tribe of Hamadan. Their history is a tissue of treachery, parricide, and assassination.

The poets of their court said the Hamadanites were formed with beauty of person, eloquence of speech, and arms of valour.

Hamadites (3 syl.), 1015–1091. A Spanish dynasty, established by Soliman, after the defeat of Mohammed II. of Cordŏva.

Hamburg (Treaty of), 22 May, 1763. A treaty of amity between Sweden and Russia, on the death of the Czarina Elizabeth.

Hamilton (Patrick), 1504–1528. A Scotch reformer and martyr, of whom it was said, 'The reik of Patrick Hamilton will infect as many as it blows upon.'

This sentiment was like that uttered by Bishop Latimer, at the stake, 1555: 'We shall this day light up such a blaze in the land as shall never be put out.'

Hammer and Scourge of the English (The). William Wallace, the Scotch patriot (1270–1305), is so called by Fordun.

Hammer of Scotland (The). So Edward I. is styled on his tomb in Westminster Abbey.

Hampden Clubs, 1816. To prosecute the cause of parliamentary reform, and to unite the reformers in one system of action. These clubs were established in every town in the kingdom, and in many villages; but the great central club was held at the 'Crown & Anchor,' Strand, the president being Sir Francis Burdett. The leading members were William Cobbett, Major Cartwright, Lord Cochrane, and Henry Hunt.

Hampton Court Conference (The), 12 to 18 Jan., 1604. Between prelates and Puritans; James I. presided. This conference was convened to take into consideration the 'Millenary Petition' (q.v.), and it was decided that no change was required. On 16 Jan. the petitioners were called before the king, and, according to the account of James himself, he 'peppered them soundly.' On the 18th judgment was given adverse to the petitioners and the Puritan party.

Han Dynasty (The), B.C. 202—A.D. 25. The second historical and fifth imperial dynasty of China. It was divided into two parts: the first sixteen emperors being Si-Hân or Western Hân, and the last fourteen being Tong-Hân or Eastern Hân. It was preceded by the Tshin dynasty, and succeeded by the Sân-Kuo or Three States. It gave 16 emperors, lasted 227 years, and held its seat of government at Yn.

From A.D. 25 the dynasty was called Tong-Han, which gave 14 emperors and continued to A.D. 220. So that some say the dynasty of Han lasted 422 years and gave 30 emperors.

This was one of the most illustrious of all the dynasties of China.

Hanaper. A treasury, answering to the modern term exchequer. From hanaperium, a hamper or basket used anciently by our sovereigns for holding their money when they journeyed from place to place.

'Hanap' is French for a goblet or cup, and these gold and silver vessels being packed in hampers, like the coined money, was the origin of the word hanaperium.

Hanaper Office. An office belonging to the common-law jurisdiction of the Court of Chancery. So called because all writs relating to the business of a subject, and their returns, were formerly kept in a hamper [in hanaperio].

Hand (The). The hand engraved on the keystone of the arch of the Gate of Justice in the Alhambra, and on several Mahometan mausoleums, signifies the five prophets—Mahomet, Ali, Hassan, Hosein, and Fatama.

Handelists. A musical faction in England in 1720–1730, opposed by the Bononcinists or the Italian school. The Prince of Wales was a leader of the Handelists, supported by Pope and Dr. Arbuthnot; while Marlborough and many others of the nobility were adherents of Bononcini and the Italian music. Some of the admirers of Handel erected an academy in the Haymarket, to secure a supply of operas by Handel, and under his direction. It succeeded for about ten years, when it was closed, because the rage for Italian music was so great that Handel could not resist it. In 1742, however, his popularity returned.

Handkerchief (The) with which Seraphia is said to have wiped the face of Jesus on his way to Calvary, and on which was miraculously impressed a likeness of the sufferer, is preserved at Rome. It was placed in the Vatican by John VII. in 707; and it is now enshrined in one of the four huge supports of St. Peter's dome. See 'Crucifixion, Relics of the.'

Philip of Bergamo says that Tiberius Cæsar sent his friend Volusian, a valiant soldier of the imperial guards, to escort Seraphia to Rome. The emperor was ill at the time, but the moment he set his eyes on the handkerchief he was completely cured. This miracle, he adds, made so great an impression on Tiberius, that he wanted to enrol Jesus among the Roman gods; but the senate would not listen to the proposal, so the emperor was obliged to content himself with a statue of the Nazarene in his palace. Of course the tale is a mere myth.

Handsome Al Raschid. George IV., also called Gentleman George. Called Al Raschid on account of that oriental toy palace built by him at Brighton.

Handsome Englishman (The). John Churchill duke of Marlborough was so called by Turenne, 'and his manners were as winning as his person' (1650–1722).

Hanging Hill. On Haywood Oaks Manor, near Black Gate, is where forest dogs were 'expeditated,' and forest offenders were 'swung to death.'

Expeditate is to cut out the balls or claws of a dog's forefeet for the preservation of the king's game.—Old Forest Law.

The 'canes Leporarii,' which as our record sings, 'Might never be expeditate,—they are our lord the king's.'

The Regards of Brian d'Insula, 1202.

Hanging Judge (The). I. Sir Francis Page (1718–1741).

II. John Toler earl of Norbury, Chief Justice of the Common Pleas in Ireland from 1820 to 1827.

Hango Massacre (The), 5 June, 1855. By Russians, on a party covered by a white flag. While the allied fleet of Great Britain and France was off Cronstadt, certain prizes had been made by the allies, who agreed to set at liberty seven of the prisoners. These were sent in a boat under a flag of truce to Hango; but no sooner had they been set ashore, than a party of Russians from ambush fired on the defenceless crew, spite of the white flag, killed 6 and wounded 4 of the crew, and 4 of the Russian liberated captives. The entire crew consisted of only 11 men. See 'Massacre.'

Haniflites, or Haneflites (3 syl.). The most ancient of the four principal orthodox sects of the Musulmans, founded by Abou-Hanifa, called the Socrates of the Musulmans, put to death in 767.

Hannibal of Batavia (The). Civilis (1st cent.).

Hannibal of China (The). Chee-wang-tee the Great, who reigned thirty-seven years (B.C. 246–209). He completely reorganised the Chinese empire, and finished the great wall begun by Tchao-siang-wang. Chee-wang was contemporary with Hannibal.

Hannotin of Flanders. The nickname given to Jean Sans-Peur duke of Burgundy by his Flemish subjects.

Hanover (Line of). George I., George II., George III., George IV., William IV., Victoria.

George I. was the son of Sophia and Ernest Augustus duke of Brunswick, both descendants from Henry II. of England

SOPHIA thus: HENRY II., JOHN, HENRY III., EDWARD I., II., III., Lionel duke of Clarence, Philippa, Roger Mortimer, Ann Mortimer, Richard duke of York, EDWARD IV., Elizabeth wife of HENRY VII., Margaret wife of James IV. of Scotland, James V. of Scotland, Mary queen of Scots, JAMES I. of England, Elizabeth wife of Frederick king of Bohemia, Sophia.

ERNEST AUGUSTUS thus: Maud daughter of HENRY II., Otto duke of Brunswick, Albert I., Albert II., Magnus, Bernard, Frederick, Otto II., Henry, Ernestus, William, George, Ernest Augustus, who married Sophia.

All either sons or daughters of the name preceding.

Hanover (Treaty or Convention of), 3 Sept., 1725. Signed at Hanover between Great Britain, France, Prussia, and afterwards by Denmark and Holland, to balance the alliance recently made between Spain, Austria, and Sweden. It protected England from the demand of Spain to surrender Gibraltar; and it defended Hanover from the aggressions of Russia. (Tem. Geo. I.)

Maria Theresa refused to join the treaty, and Prussia withdrew in 1727.

Hanover Rat (A). Originally meant a partisan of the first George elector of Hanover. As these partisans were converts from the true royal line to the German indirect line, a rat soon became a contemptuous word for a turncoat.

The origin of the term was this. About the time of the Hanoverian succession it was observed that the English black rat was being supplanted by the larger and fiercer grey rat from Astrakhan, which first appeared in Europe at the beginning of the 18th cent., and reached Britain about the middle of the cent. The Jacobites chose to associate the Hanover kings and the grey rat together, for both came into England at the same time.

Hanoverian Succession (The). The crown of Great Britain settled on Sophia duchess dowager of Hanover in 1702 (by 13, 14 Will. III., c. 6). Further secured by 6 Anne cc. 41 and 66.

Hanoverian Tories, 1705. A party bent on securing their interest with the house of Hanover, after the Hanoverian succession was resolved on. The Jacobites, strange to say, joined this party, to weaken the government and strengthen the chance of the Pretender.

Hanoverians (The). So the Whigs or Court party were called in the early part of the reign of George I., because they were favourable to the Hanoverian section. Those opposed to them were called Jacobites or favourers of James II., who had abdicated.

The whole history of England shows that our kings owe their accession to the sanction of parliament only, and not to the 'divine right,' blood inheritance, or royal succession. See 'English Sovereigns.'

Hanoverians and Jacobites. So Whigs and Tories were called in the reign of George I. The Whigs or Hanoverians supported George I. and the Hanoverian succession. The Jacobites supported Jacobus (or James) the Pretender (son of James II.).

Hanse Parisienne (La). An association of Paris 'marchands d'eau,' constituted under Philippe Auguste. It had a monopoly of the navigation of the Seine. Suppressed in 1672 by Louis XIV.

Hanse Towns (The). The three republics of Hamburg, Bremen, and Lübeck. Hanse means a league or union. See below.

Hanseat'ic League (The), 1241. A trades-union to protect merchandise from pirates and the pillage of nobles. It began with the three towns of Hamburg, Bremen, and Lübeck, but ultimately contained 85 trading towns. The league was divided into four colleges, viz. Lübeck, Cologne, Brunswick, and Dantzig. Of these Lübeck was the chief, and presided in all the conferences. The league had four principal factories in foreign parts, viz. at London, Bruges, Bergen, and Novogorod.

In the 15th cent. it reached its culminating point; in 1598 it came into collision with England; in 1630 most of the cities fell off.

Harakiri. Disembowelling oneself; either by legal sufferance, to prevent a public execution, whereby a man's goods are confiscated and his family attainted,—or to save the dishonour of failure, the scandal of insult, or the sickness of disappointed hope. A Japanese custom (hara = the belly, kiri = cutting open). See R. M. JEPHSON, &c., 'Our Life in Japan,' pp. 392, 393 (1869). Abolished.

The practice of harakiri in duelling had a quaint touch of humour. The challenger and challenged went home, arranged their affairs, and then disembowelled themselves.

Harcourt's Round Table. A private conference in the house of Sir William Harcourt, 14 Jan., 1887, with the view of reuniting, if possible, the Liberal party, broken up by Mr. Gladstone's Irish policy. In March a quarrel between Mr. Gladstone and Mr. Chamberlain broke up the conference.

The phrase 'Round Table' is American, meaning what the French call a cercle, or club meetings at each other's houses.

Har'courted. Letters secretly opened at the Post Office to learn their contents. The word was adopted by the Parnellites when Sir William Harcourt was secretary for the home department (1880–1885). The word 'Grahamise' means the same thing.

It was not unusual for the Parnellites to write on their letters 'Not to be Harcourted.' The subject of Harcourting letters was brought to the attention of parliament.

Hardham's No. 37. A particular mixture of snuff made by John Hardham, tobacconist and snuff merchant, Fleet Street, London. This Hardham, by a puff of Garrick, realised in a few years a fortune of 22,000*l.*, which at death he left to the poor of Chichester, his natal town. The interest amounts to 682*l.* yearly.

. . . Each connoisseur, a transient heaven
Finds in each pinch of Hardham's 37.
COLTON, Hypocrisy.

Hardwicke's Act (Lord), 1753. Directing all marriages to be by licence or banns, and to be solemnised in some church or chapel where banns are usually published.

By this act St. Paul's Cathedral and Westminster Abbey were excluded, as no banns are ever published in these places. It also rendered Fleet marriages unlawful, and thus abolished an abominable church scandal.

Hare (Knights of the). A military order of twelve knights instituted by Edward III. while he was in France. It is said that a hare ran before the French camp, when the soldiers raised a loud shout. Edward thought it was the cry of battle, and hence the order. Obsolete.

Hare Prize (The). For an essay on Greek or Roman history or philosophy. Given once in four years to any member of the University of Cambridge who has not graduated more than ten years. Value about 50*l.* Founded by the University in honour of Archdeacon Hare, of Trinity College, Cambridge, in 1861.

Hargrave Collection of MSS. (The), 1813. Purchased for the library of the British Museum for 8,000*l.* of the representatives of Francis Hargrave. It consists of 500 volumes, chiefly belonging to the faculty of law.

Harklensian Version. See 'Philoxenian,' &c.

Harkness Scholarship. For geology and palæontology. Value 250*l.*, tenable for one year by any member of the University of Cambridge. Founded in honour of Robert Harkness, professor of geology at Queen's College, Cork, 1887.

Harlaw (The). I. A municipal regulation made after the battle of Harlaw (24 July, 1411), in which the provost of Aberdeen was killed—that the chief magistrate of Aberdeen should in future leave the precincts of the liberty only a very brief space.

II. The battle of the Harlaw.

James I. also reduced to obedience the Highland chiefs who . . . had forgotten the terrors of the Harlaw.—Sir W. SCOTT, Hist. of Scotland, xviii.

Harleian MSS. (The). A collection of MSS. formed by Robert Harley earl of Oxford (1661–1725), and purchased by government in 1754 of the Duchess of Portland (his grand-daughter) for 10,000*l.* There are 14,236 original rolls, charters, and other deeds, besides 7,639 volumes. The collection is very miscellaneous, but its main character is historical. It is rich in heraldic and genealogical MSS., in county visitations, parliamentary and legal proceedings, original records and calendars, abbey registers, missals, antiphonaries, and other Catholic service-books, ancient English poetry, and works on arts and sciences. It is kept in the British Museum library.

It also contains the oldest known MS. of Homer's 'Odyssey,' two very early copies of the Latin Gospels in gold letters, 200 MS. Bibles or Biblical books, 200 volumes of the Fathers, &c.

Harmony (The Patriarch of). Nicholas Porpora of Naples (1685–1767), author of thirty-eight operas. He was a pupil of Scarlatti, and Farinelli (the best male singer on record) was his pupil.

Harmony Hall, 1844. A building and family collected together in Hampshire by Robert Owen, organised on his socialistic principles. Religion, marriage, competition, rivalry, were either abolished or remodelled, and all the inmates were to live in perfect harmony, seeking only the general good, without regard to personal or individual ambition or indulgence. The scheme proved an utter failure.

Harmony of the Spheres (The). Pythagoras taught that the motions of the stars through space must of necessity produce sounds, like the motion of any body through the air. As the stars differ in size and velocity, the sounds must differ in tone, and these different notes produce a harmony called the 'Music of the Spheres.'

Harness Prize (The). For the best essay on some subject connected with Shakespearian literature. Value about 50*l.*, and given once in three years to any member of the University of Cambridge who has not graduated more than three years. Founded by subscribers to a memorial fund of the Rev. William Harness, of Christ's College, Cambridge, in 1870.

Harold Blue-tooth (Blaatand). The 31st king of Denmark, descendant of the mythical Skiold, founder of the Skioldung dynasty (B.C. about 60 to A.D. 1044). Harold was the son of Gorm, and succeeded him to a peaceful and undivided kingdom, so that he is often called the 'first of the Skioldungs,' or the first who reigned over all Denmark (A.D. 930–980).

Harold Harefoot (*, 1035–1040). Harold I., a king of England before the Conquest. Swiftness of foot is often spoken of by Homer as a great military virtue. Thus his great hero was called by him 'The swift-footed Achillês.'

Harp (Cradled in a). Aslauga, wife of Ragner Lodbrok the sea-king, was cradled in a golden harp.

Etenim tractus illius incolæ constanter referunt, sequo a majoribus suis accepisse perhibent, inventam apud se in exiguo sinu angulove maris citharam auream, cujus cavitati inclusa fuerit parvula virgo.—Series Reg. Dan. iv. chap. 4.

 Ragner or Regenfrid was surnamed Lodbrok (Hairy-breeches) from the magical garment (daubed with sand, pitch, and hair) which he wore when he slew the guardian serpent of the Princess Thora, his first wife.

Harp Lords (Cromwell's). Those soldiers and partisans of Cromwell put into the Irish confiscated estates after the 'Irish Rebellion' had been crushed out in 1648. On the return of Charles II. these lords of the soil were turned out, and the estates restored to their original possessors. Called Harp lords from the Irish harp; meaning Brummagem lords, as Harp shillings (worth about 9*d.* each) mean counters current for a time and then called in. Lords in this phrase do not mean noblemen, but lords of the confiscated soil.

Harp of Ireland (The). One of the very early lords of Ireland was named David, who took for his cognisance a harp, in honour of the harp of the sweet singer of Israel.

Harrisburg (Pennsylvania). So named from Mr. Harris, by whom it was first settled, in 1788, under a grant from the Penn family.

Harry (Blind), 15th cent. Author of a poetical romance entitled 'Sir William Wallace,' 1488. It contains 11,861 lines of ten syllables in rhyming couplets.

Harvard University, 1639, New England. Founded by John Harvard, whose father carried on his business at the Boar's Head, exactly opposite St. Mary Overies, in London (1607–1688).

Harvest Months.

JANUARY.—The greater part of Chili, portions of the Argentine Republic, Australia, and New Guinea.

FEBRUARY to MARCH.—The East Indies.

APRIL.—Mexico, Egypt, Persia, and Syria.

MAY.—Japan, China, Northern Asia Minor, Tunis, Algiers, Morocco, and Texas.

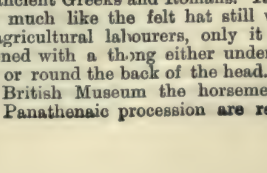
JUNE.—California, Spain, Portugal, Italy, Sicily, Greece, and some of the southern departments of France.

JULY.—The larger part of France, Austria, Southern Russia, and the larger part of the United States of America.

AUGUST.—Germany, England, Belgium, Netherlands, part of Russia, Denmark, part of Canada, and the N.-E. States of America.

SEPTEMBER.—Scotland, the larger part of Canada, Sweden, Norway, and the north midlands of Russia.

OCTOBER.—The northern parts of Russia, and the northern parts of the Scandinavian peninsula.



Hash'emites (3 syl.). The followers of Haschem the Scherif, who declared himself to be of the issue of Mahomet. He was king of Fez in 1508, and founded the dynasty of the Scherifs in 1509.

Hassan ben Sabah. 'The Old Man of the Mountain,' founder of the Assassins or Hassanis.

Hastings (Impeachment of Warren), from Feb. 1786 to April 1795. Warren Hastings was governor-general of India 1774–1785. He was born 1732, and died 1818. Burke brought before the House of Commons the first charge against Hastings Feb. 1786. Sheridan the third charge (Hastings's treatment of the Begums). This speech lasted five hours, and produced such a sensation that the House arose after it and adjourned till the next day. The fourth charge (Hastings's selfish contracts and high salaries) was made by Sir James Erskine. The sixth charge (Hastings's conduct to Fyzoola Khan the Rohilla chief) was brought before the House by Wyndham. Sheridan made the seventh charge (Hastings's receipt of bribes). Francis, the supposed author of 'Junius's Letters,' made the eighth charge (Hastings's mismanagement of the revenues). The case being carried to the House of Lords, it was appointed to begin at Westminster 13 Feb., 1788. The defence began 2 June, 1791. The trial terminated in an acquittal 23 April, 1795 (having lasted over six years). See 'Sheridan's Begum Speech,' 'Begums,' and 'Fyzoola Khan.'

Hate of Englishmen (The). So Shane O'Neill, lord of Ulster, called the fortress which he built on his border.

Hats. I. The Petăsus. A felt hat with broad brim and low crown, used by the ancient Greeks and Romans. It was very much like the felt hat still worn by agricultural labourers, only it was fastened with a thong either under the chin or round the back of the head. In the British Museum the horsemen in the Panathenaic procession are represented wearing these sorts of hats. See Caps.'

II. The Pillos. The ancient Greeks wore a close-fitting skull-cap called a

'pillos.' Ulysses is generally represented wearing such a cap.

III. The Galērus. The Romans wore a skull-cap of some animal with the hair left on, outside, called 'galērus.' The pontifical galērus had a spike of olive wood at the top, and strings. See 'Caps.'

Hats and Caps (The), 1738. Two political factions which arose in Sweden in the reign of Adolf Frederick (1720–1771). The Hats were the anti-Russian party, who were violently opposed to the late treaty with Russia, and wanted to recover all the provinces ceded to that power. This was the French or Chapeau party. The Caps were for peace with Russia, economy, and retrenchment. This was the Russian party, and the distinguishing characteristic of a Russian was the Muscovite cap. The accession of Gustavus Vasa in 1771 put an end to these factions. No king of Sweden since the time of Charles XII. (1697–1719) to that of Gustavus III. (1771–1792) could speak the language of the country.

Count Gyllenborg was the leader of the Hats, and Count Horn of the Caps.

Hatted King (The). Kaiser Joseph II., son of Maria Theresa, was so called by the Hungarians, because he refused to be crowned.

Hatti-sheriff, or 'Scherif.' An irrevocable order issuing immediately from the sultan. A Turkish word brought into use at the time of the battle of Navarino (1827).

Lord John Russell in 1828 said: 'The government issued a sort of hatti-sheriff for the purpose, calling upon everyone within their influence who possessed the faith of a true Mussulman to follow them in opposing the measure' [i.e. the repeal of the Test Act].

Haudriettes (3 syl.). Religious Hospitallers who followed the rule of St. Austin; so called from their founder, Etienne Haudri, secretary of Louis IX. Haudri followed his master to the Holy Land. He abandoned his house to twelve religious paupers, and endowed the society.

Haute Justice (La). The gallows-tree.

Romsey Abbey possessed many extraordinary privileges, amongst others the rare and anomalous right of la haute justice, or gallows-tree; a privilege of which the records do not mention any use having been made.—Cassell's History of England, vol. i. p. 149.

Hawkubites (3 syl.). A turbulent set of young men in the reign of Queen Anne, whose delight was to molest and ill-treat the old watchmen, women, children, and feeble old men found after sunset in the ill-lighted streets of London. The Mohocks, Scourers, and Hawkubites were contemporaneous, about 1711–1714. Hawkubites, an Indian tribe of savages. See 'Street Bullies.'

'From Mohock and from Hawkubite,
Good Lord deliver me,
Who wander thro' the streets at night
Committing cruelty:
They slash our sons with bloody knives,
And on our daughters fall;
And if they murder not our wives
We have good luck withal.
Coaches and carts they overturn . . .'

An Argument to prove the present race of Mohocks and Hawkubites are the Gog and Magog mentioned in the Revelation.

Head-Centres. The leaders of the Fenian Brotherhood of Ireland; their lieutenants were called 'centres.' James Stephens was appointed the first head-centre of Ireland 11 Nov., 1865. O'Mahoney was the first head-centre of the brotherhood in America, 1858.

Head Pacificator (O'Connell's). Tom Steel, who looked up to his hero with the veneration of Boswell for Dr. Johnson.

Heads of Houses or Colleges (The).

In Cambridge: The Head of King's is styled the Provost; of Queens', the President; of all other colleges, the Master.

In Oxford: The Heads of University College, Balliol, and Pembroke are styled the Master; of Oriel, Queen's, and Worcester, the Provost; of Trinity, St. John's, Magdalen, and Corpus, the President; of Merton, All Souls', Wadham, New College, and Keble, the Warden; of Jesus, Brasenose, and Hertford, the Principal; of Lincoln and Exeter, the Rector; of Christ Church, the Dean.

Healing Declaration (The), 6 Nov., 1660. The declaration of Charles II. for the settlement of most Church matters by 'competent persons' approved of by the king. The idea was to have a united convention of suffragan bishops and synods, or presbyterians; but the bishops refused to meet the synod. It was ultimately decided to unite the presbyterian and episcopal establishments, and of these the king was to select a certain number to revise the liturgy, and consider such moot points as standing or kneeling to receive the sacrament, signing infants with a cross, bowing at the name of Jesus, and wearing surplices. The bill was thrown out by the parliament, which re-assembled 6 Nov.

Heart of Midlothian (The). The Tolbooth (a prison), of Edinburgh, is popularly so called. Sir Walter Scott's novel of the same name gives a graphic description of the Porteous riot, and the execution of Capt. Porteous by the mob. See 'Mids of Mar.'

Hearts of Steel, 1764. Irish insurgents in Ulster, roused to rebellion by high rents and the rapacity of the agents of absentees. It was a part of the great southern brotherhood called Whiteboys. See 'Irish Associations.'

Hearth-tax (The), 1662. A tax of two shillings for every fire-hearth and stove, 'payable on the feast of St. Michael and the feast of the Blessed Virgin Mary' (13 & 14 Car. II. c. 10). Repealed by the special desire of William III. in 1689. A hut with two chimneys paid as much as a house or hall with the same number. The hearth-tax and the window tax were certainly the worst and most oppressive taxes ever laid on the people.

Heaven (The). A public-house in Whitefriars, kept in the reign of Charles II. by Bradley. Charles, with Buckingham, Monmouth, Lord Howard, and other debauchees, visited this house, and drank punch there till their wits were out. Colonel Blood and Titus Oates also frequented the house. See 'Gone to the "Devil."'

Heaven-born Minister (The). William Pitt was so called in a parliamentary oration by Mr. Drake. Prime minister 1783–1801, and again 1804; died 1806.

Heavy Peg, 1412, &c. A heavy cannon by which Friedrich count of Hohenzollern, who had lately bought Brandenburg of the Kaiser Siegmund, reduced the turbulent barons to order by blowing up their castles.

Hebdom'ada. For other weeks see the English equivalent. For example—

For Hebdomada	Casta	see Chaste Week
"	Crucis	" Week of the Cross
"	Expectationis	" Week of Expectation
"	Magna	" Great Week
"	Muta	" Silent Week
"	Paschalis	" Easter Week
"	Passionis	" Passion Week
"	Penitentialis	" Penitential Week
"	Pentecostes	" Whitsun Week
"	Trinitatis	" Trinity Week

Hebdom'ada de Excepto. The last week in Advent is so called in the Ambrosian ritual.

Hebdom'ada Grassa (Meat Week). The week preceding Quinquagesima Sunday, the last week before Lent. The third day after Quinquagesima Sunday is Ash Wednesday, therefore the week preceding was the last in which meat was allowed to be eaten.

Hebdom'ada in Albis. An octave, beginning the Sunday after Easter and ending the following Sunday, when those baptized on Palm Sunday laid aside their white stoles.

Hebdom'ada Indulgentiæ, or Absolution Week. Between Palm Sunday and Holy Saturday, when penitents received indulgence or absolution.

Hebdom'ada Major. Same as Holy Week (q.v.). Passion Week, which lasted thirteen days, was Hebdomada

Magna; but the last seven of these days constitute Holy Week, or the 'Greater Week' of the 'Great Week.'

Hebdom'ada Mediana. Beginning with the third of Lent, called in French Mi-carême (Mid Lent). In this week some slight relaxation was allowed of the long Lenten fast.

Hebdom'ada Pœna'lis, 'Laboriosam Hebdomadam' vocant Latini Patres. Also called Hebdomada Pœnosa. Du Cange says: 'Illa qua Christus crucem subiit, et quod jejuniis et laboribus transigatur ad memoriam passionis Christi.'

Hebdom'adal Council (The), 1631. Oxford University. So called because it assembles weekly. This weekly board discusses all measures of reform before they are sent to the House of Congregation (q.v.). The ex-officio members are the chancellor, vice-chancellor, ex-vice-chancellor, and the two proctors. There are also eighteen members—viz. six heads of houses, six professors, and six members of Convocation, of not less than five years' standing. The council meets every Monday during term time.

Hébertists. The followers of Hébert, the coarsest and most vulgar-minded of the three leaders in the Reign of Terror, the other two being Danton and Robespierre. It was Hébert who instituted le culte de la raison.

Anacharsis Cloots, Ronsin, Vincent, and Momoro were Hébertists.

Hebrew of the Hebrews (A). A descendant from Abraham.

Hebrew Prize. Worth about 20*l.* Founded in the University of Cambridge by subscription, 1866; increased 1867. See 'Tyrwhitt Scholarship.'

Hecatæos the Abderite (3 syl.). Said to have been the author of a 'History of the Jews,' frequently referred to by Josephus, but pronounced by Origen to be spurious. See 'Literary Forgeries.'

Hec'atomphon'ia. A sacrifice made to the Ithomæan Jupiter by such as had slain 100 men in battle. Aristomênês of Messênia thrice offered this sacrifice.

Hectors. Street bullies and brawlers who succeeded the 'Titÿre tu-s,' and delighted to be as rude as possible to women and the defenceless. Robbery was not their object, but simply to annoy and get talked about. See 'Street Bullies.'

To hector is to bully or treat with insolence; but the noble Hector of Troy was as unlike a bully as possible.

Hedgebote (2 syl.), or 'Haybote' in English law. The right of a tenant to cut wood on the farm to repair his hedges, gates, and fences, to make rake-handles and handles for forks, &c.

Hedonism. The system of Aristippus, the Cyrenaïtic philosopher, born at Cyrênê about B.C. 435. He said that the aim of life should be ἡδονή (hêdonê, pleasure), and he passed his life in the court of Dionysius the Tyrant amidst delicacies and indulgences.

He was very witty. One day being rebuked for casting himself at the feet of Dionysius he replied, 'Well, it is not my fault if his ears are in his feet.'

He'donists. Philosophers who placed the summum bonum in pleasure (ἡδονή), before Epicurus improved upon their teaching by the dogma that psychic pleasure is superior in degree and duration to physical enjoyments.

Hegelianism. The philosophical system of Wilhelm Friedrich Hegel of Stuttgart (1770–1831). It may be called an idealistic pantheism. In the Spinozan system God is a substance; in the Hegelian system God is spirit. In the Spinozan system God is endowed with both matter and mind—the phenomena of the material and spiritual universe may be compared to two parallel streams. In the Hegelian theory God objectifies Himself in nature, rises out of nature, and returns to Himself.

Heg'ira (The), 16 June, 622. The day that Mahomet fled from Mecca to Medina. The people of Mecca were exasperated because those of Medi'na believed him to be a prophet. From this day the Mahometan era begins.

Generally called Hegira. The Arabic word is 'Hijra,' and means the 'flight' or emigration.

Hegu'meni or Mandrites (2 syl.). Superiors of convents in the Greek Church.

Hehoo-Woo-tae, or the Five Hehoo races, being the 14th, 15th, 16th, 17th, and 18th imperial dynasties of China, called Hehoo-Lêang, Hehoo-Tâng, Hehoo-Tsin, Hehoo-Hân, and Hehoo-Chew. From 907 to 960. During this period the Tartars held the north of the empire. The 'five successions' terminated with the 19th or Tsong dynasty.

Hehoo, sometimes written in English 'Heou' or 'How'; and Chew is written 'Chow.'

Heidelberg Catechism (The), or the 'Palatinate Catechism,' 1563. A religious formulary compiled by the Heidelberg theologians—Caspar, Olivetan, and Zacharias Ursinus—at the request of the Elector Friedrich III. of the Palatinate. This catechism was sanctioned by several synods, and was revised by the Synod of Dort.

Heidelberg Confession (The), 1575, or the 'Palatine Confession.' One of the chief confessions of the continental Calvinistic or Reformed Churches. See 'Confessions.'

Heiltum (Hile-tum), or 'Heiligthum.' That is, holy relics of Nuremberg, exhibited the second Friday after Easter, and consisting of the insignia of the city; the sword, sceptre, and crown of Charlemagne; a piece of the true cross, part of the manger of Bethlehem, Longinus's spear, and portions of the respective chains with which Peter, Paul, and John were bound, with many other relics.

The church of the Holy Ghost at Nuremberg, in which the Heiltum was formerly kept, was recently restored; but Nuremberg is now a Protestant city.

Heinel (Mlle.). A famous dancer in London in the last quarter of the 18th cent. See 'Walpole's Letters,' vol. v. pp. 327, 355, 383, 431.

Dotes upon dancing, and, in all her pride,
Swims round the room, the Heinel of Cheapside.
Epilogue to She Stoops to Conquer.
Pronounce High'nel.

HEINRICH OF GERMANY.
(Heinrich, pronounce Hine-reek.)

Heinrich I., or 'Henry I. the Fowler,' surnamed 'the father of his country.' Founder of the Saxon dynasty of Germany. He succeeded Konrad of Franconia (876, 918–936). This dynasty gives five kings—viz. Heinrich I., Otto I., II., III., and Heinrich II. His father was Otto the Illustrious, duke of Saxony. His empire embraced Holland, Flanders, and Switzerland, as well as Germany. With Heinrich I. the Fowler the modern history of Germany begins, as that of France with Hugues Capet, and that of England with William the Conqueror. See 'Fowler.'

Father, Otto the Illustrious. Wife, Mechtildes. Contemporary with Edward the Elder and Athelstan.

Heinrich II., called 'The Saint' and 'The Lame.' Was the cousin of Otto III., the grandson of Heinrich the Quarrelsome, and great-grandson of the Fowler. As he died without issue, in him the Saxon dynasty of Germany came to an end. It was Heinrich II. who founded Strasburg Cathedral.

HEINRICH I. (Henry the Fowler), founder of the Saxon dynasty.
OTTO I. the Great and Heinrich the Quarrelsome, sons of the Fowler.
OTTO II. son of Otto I.
OTTO III. son of Otto II.

HEINRICH the Fowler

OTTO I.	Heinrich the Quarrelsome
OTTO II.	Heinrich the Regent
OTTO III.	HEINRICH II.

Both Otto III. and Heinrich II. were great-grandsons of the Fowler.

Father, Heinrich duke of Bavaria (late regent). Wife, Cunegunda (no children). Contemporary with Etheired, Edmund Ironsides, and Canute.

Heinrich III. the Black King. Second of the house of Franconia (1017, 1039–1056). He died at the age of 39. In 1056 he created the title of 'King of the Romans' for the heir-elect of the throne. Called 'Black' from the colour of his hair. He was an excellent king.

The kings of Germany were elective, but a father before death generally got his son elected. Heinrich III. was elected in 1026.

Father, Konrad II. Mother, Gisela of Burgundy. Wives, (1) Kunihild daughter of Canute; (2) Agnes mother of HEINRICH IV. Contemporary with Hardicanute and Edward the Confessor.

Heinrich IV. kaiser-king of Germany (1050, 1056–1106). Died at Liège of starvation at the age of 56. The whole reign was one incessant struggle with the pope for mastery. He was three times excommunicated, and once his kingdom was put under the ban of Rome. His eldest son Konrad revolted against him, and died 1101. His second son Heinrich [V.] then revolted, arrested his father, and confined him in a castle. The kaiser made his escape, and died at Liège on the doorstep of a religious house, 'clemmed with hunger and starved with cold.'

Father, Heinrich III. Mother, Agnes of Aquitaine. Wives, (1) Bertha; (2) Adelaide of Russia. Contemporary with Edward the Confessor and William the Conqueror.

Heinrich V. the Parricide, kaiser-king of Germany. Fourth and last of the house of Franconia. Son of Heinrich IV. the kaiser-king, and son-in-law of Henry I. of England (1081, 1098–1125).

Father, Heinrich IV. Mother, Bertha. Wife, Maud daughter of Henry I. of England.* Contemporary with Rufus and Henry I.

* Soon after the death of her royal husband, Maud married Godfroi earl of Anjou, by whom she became the mother of our Henry II. surnamed 'Curtmantle.'

Heinrich VI. the Cruel, kaiser-king of Germany, son of Friedrich I., called Barbarossa (1163, 1190–1197). He was poisoned by his wife Messina, Sunday, 28 Sept., 1197, at the age of 32. This was the dastard who imprisoned Richard Cœur-de-Lion in 1192, and kept him captive for two years.

KONRAD III., founder of the royal house of Hohenstauffen.
FRIEDRICH I., Barbarossa, Konrad's nephew.
Father, Friedrich I., Barbarossa. Mother, Beatrice of Burgundy. Wife, Constance of Sicily. Contemporary with Richard I. and John.

Heinrich VII. of Luxemburg. One of the promiscuous kaiser-kings of Germany (1263, 1309–1313). Said by a Dominican monk to have been poisoned by Politian (a Dominican monk), by the sacramental wine, administered to him in the House of God. The only kaiser since the time of Friedrich II. (1220).

 Horrible as this appears, it was not uncommon. At least nine other monarchs, we are told, were despatched in the same way.

Father, John count of Luxemburg. Wife, Margaret of Brabant. Contemporary with Edward II.

Heir.

I. Apparent. The eldest son is heir apparent, because he is certain to succeed if he outlives his father.

II. Presumptive. The person who would succeed under present conditions, but who may be set aside if the statu quo is altered. Thus a daughter is heir presumptive, but if a son is born later on the daughter does not succeed.

Heirs to the Crowns of Europe.

AUSTRIA-HUNGARY, Prince Imperial.
ENGLAND, Prince of Wales. The heir or heiress presumptive is the Prince or Princess Royal.
GERMANY, Crown Prince.
ITALY, Prince of Naples.
PORTUGAL, Prince or Princess Royal.
RUSSIA, Czarevich and his wife Czarevna.
SPAIN, Prince of Asturias; the heiress is called the Princess Royal.
SWEDEN and NORWAY, Crown Prince or Princess.

Helena (The Tyrian). The mistress of Simon Magus. They called themselves Jupiter and Minerva, and gave out that those who believed in them were absolved from all obligations to the moral law, seeing they would be saved by grace and not by works. Epiphanius tells us that Simon Magus claimed to be the Messiah, and Helĕna, he said, was the Holy Ghost.

Heliæa, or 'Court of Heliæa.' An Athenian tribunal, fluctuating in number, but usually consisting of several hundreds, chosen by lot from the whole body of citizens. It was before this tribunal that Socratês was brought, and by it was he condemned to death.

Heliastæ (The Tribunal of the). An Athenian tribunal which assembled at Heliæa. It took cognisance of only very grave offences. The ordinary number of members was 200, but in some cases it amounted to 500, 1,000, and even 1,500 members.

Heliogab'alus. A Roman emperor (204, 218–222), who had been from infancy high priest in the Temple of the Sun at Emissa, in Syria, where he received the title of Heliogabaal (Lord of the Sun).

It will be remembered that Samuel, like Heliogabalus, was consecrated to the Temple from infancy.

Heliop'olis. The City of the Sun. Baalbek in Syria was so called by the Greeks; so was On in Egypt, noted for the temple of Actis.

Hell. Called by the ancient Egyptians 'Amenthês'; by the Gauls 'Ifurin'; by the Greeks 'Tartăros'; by the Indians 'Patala' and 'Naraka'; by the Jews 'Sheôl'; the Mohammedans believe in seven infernos; by the Persians 'Douzakh'; by the Romans 'Avernus'; by the Scandinavians 'Niflheim.'

Hell (from the verb hélian, to cover) means a place covered over, hence a grave. 'Helings' means the eyelids or covers for the eyes; 'helliar' is a thatcher or one who covers with thatch. Chaucer calls Elysium 'Helise.' Then there is the participle 'helling' or 'heling' = hidden, 'helen' = caves; and many other similar words more or less archaic. See below.

Hell. So the cellar under the House of Commons, in the reign of Charles I., was called. See 'Pride's Purge.'

Hellenists. Those Jews who spoke the Greek language, chiefly resident in Asia Minor, Greece, and Egypt. The Jews of Jerusalem spoke Aramaic, a bastard Hebrew; whence Paul, when he was permitted to address the Jewish mob, spoke to the people in the Hebrew [Aramaic] tongue. They could hardly be called a sect, although without doubt they corrupted the pure Jewish faith with Greek philosophy and mythology. They had a temple of their own certainly at Leontopolis. (See JOSEPHUS, 'Antiquities,' xiii. 3, 1–3.)

The Hellenists were certainly looked on by the strict Jews as unsound, and were accused of 'reading the Scriptures in the Egyptian manner.'

Hell-fire Club (The), 1721. President, the Duke of Wharton, a most profligate young nobleman. The central club was in London, but it had affiliated clubs both in Edinburgh and in Dublin. The members were of both sexes, and had such nicknames as Pluto, the Old Dragon, the King of Tartarus, Lady Envy, Lady Gomorrah, and so on. Their toasts were revoltingly blasphemous, and sulphurous flames were raised at their meetings. Suppressed by royal proclamation the same year (1721).

This was the Medmenham Club, originally held in Medmenham Abbey. It consisted of wild spirits, euphemistically called 'wits and humorists,' who assumed the name of 'Monks of St. Francis.' The inscription over the club door was Fais ce que tu voudras. Langley gives an account of it. When I lived in Paris there was an important street called 'Hell Street' (Rue d'Enfer). The name is changed now.

Helluo Libro'rum (Cicero). A devourer of books; a great reader.

Charles in Fletcher's 'Elder Brother' is a mere 'helluo librōrum,' who falls in love with Angelina.

Helmets. The helmet of a king has six bars over the face. (Full faced, gold.)

The helmet of a noble has five bars over the face. (In profile, steel with gold bars.)

The helmet of a knight has the visor thrown back. (Full faced, steel.)

The helmet of a squire has the visor closed. (In profile, steel.)

The helmet is placed above the escutcheon and supports the crest.

Helvetia. The modern Switzerland, the country of the Helvetii. Helvetia is not classic Latin; the country was never so called, but Ager Helvetiorum.

Helvetic Confederation (The). I. After the battle of Morgarten, in 1315, the three cantons of Uri, Schweiz, and Unterwalden formed themselves into a perpetual league, and declared themselves free from Austria. In 1332 Lucerne joined the confederacy; in 1351 Zürich; in 1352 Zug and Glaris; in 1353 Berne. Two other victories over the dukes of Austria (one at Sempach in 1386, and the other at Naefels in 1388), made the name of Switzerland respected in Europe; and the two subsequent battles of Granson and Morat in 1476 greatly added to this renown. Five other cantons joined the confederacy in 1841; Bâle and Schaffhausen in 1501, and Appenzell in 1513, completed the thirteen cantons. In 1648, at the peace of Westphalia, the Helvetic Confederacy was declared by Austria and all the rest of the European powers to be independent of the empire.

II. 1814. The old constitution of Switzerland, restored after the banishment of Napoleon to Elba. Each canton enjoys 'home rule,' but all unite in matters pertaining to the confederacy.

Helvetic Confessions (The). Are those of Bâle in 1530, and of Bullinger in 1566. The former was an exposition of faith drawn up by Zwingli, and being solemnly sworn to at Bâle in 1534, was called the 'Confession of Bâle.' The other was the exposition drawn up chiefly by Theodore Beza and Bullinger. In this 'confession' images were proscribed, predestination was acknowledged, only two sacraments were admitted, and the eucharist was regarded as commemorative only. The phrase 'Helvetic Confession' is sometimes used to designate 'Calvinism'; and sometimes the 'Reformed Church of Germany.'

The religion of Calvin, or the Helvetic Confession, had such a hold on the Hungarians that it was soon designated . . . the Hungarian faith.—VAMBERY, Hungary, ch. xii.

Helvetic Republic (The), 12 April, 1798–1814. A kind of polyarchy vested in French officers and their partisans by Napoleon Bonaparte, who compelled Switzerland to become virtually a French province.

Heno'ticon (The), A.D. 482. A concordat published by the Emperor Zeno for the reconciliation of the churches of Constantinople and Alexandria. It was issued at the solicitation of Acacius patriarch of Constantinople. Whatever its merits, it proved no better than ecclesiastical dynamite, by exciting in the Eastern Empire angry disputes and relentless persecutions. In 484 Pope Felix III. condemned it. In 496 the Emperor Anastasius confirmed it. In 519 it was revoked by Justin I. (Greek ἑνωτικόν).

Gibbon says, xlvii.: 'The Henoticon was most pleasing to the Egyptians; yet the smallest blemish has not been descried by the jealous and even jaundiced eyes of orthodox schoolmen, and it accurately represents the Catholic faith of the incarnation without adopting or disclaiming the peculi r terms or tenets of the hostile sects.' Petavius says, Chalcedonensem ascivit, but, adds Gibbon, this proves 'he had never read it' (Greek ἕνωσις, unity).

Henri Grâce à Dieu (The). Was built at Erith in 1515. It measured 1,000 tons, had four masts, and was the first three-decked ship built in England. It carried 80 guns of various calibres.

This ship appears in a list of 1552 as 'The Edward,' and all trace of her then ceases. The next British ship of note was 'The Sovereigne of the Seas,' built at Woolwich Dockyard in 1637 by Mr. Phineas Pett. She also was a three-decker.

James, in his 'Naval History of Great Britain,' says: 'There is reason to believe that Richard III. owned a few of the ships which he employed; the rest were either hired of merchants, or supplied under a law of the state by the Cinque Ports.'

The 'Great Harry' and 'Henri Grâce à Dieu' were two entirely distinct ships.

The 'Great Harry' was built in the third year of Henry VII., 1488; the 'Henri Grâce à Dieu' was built at Erith in 1515.

The 'Great Harry' was a two-decker, with three masts; the 'Henri Grâce à Dieu' had three decks and four masts.

The 'Great Harry' was accidentally burnt at Woolwich in 1553; the 'Henri Grâce à Dieu' was renamed 'Edward' after the death of Henry VIII. in 1547, and there is no record of its destruction.

I hope this will settle the question of historians on the moot point of the identity of these two vessels.

HENRI KINGS OF FRANCE.

Henri I. of France (1011, 1031–1061). Third of the Capetian dynasty.

Father, Robert le Pieux; Mother, Constance of Arles; Wife, Anne of Muscovy; son and successor, Philippe I. l'Amoureux. Contemporary with Edward the Confessor.

Henri II. le Belliqueux, of France (1519, 1547–1559). Of the Capetian dynasty, and of the Valois-Angoulême line.

Father, FRANCOIS I.; Mother, Claude, daughter of LOUIS XII.; Wife, Catharine de' Medici, daughter of Lorenzo de' Medici; son and successor, FRANCOIS II. Contemporary with Edward VI. and his sister Mary. His mistress was Diane de Poitiers, whose colour was blue. The colour of her rival, the Duchesse d'Etampes, was lilac. Diane de Poitiers was created duchesse de Valentinois.

CHARLES V. had two sons, CHARLES VI. and Louis duc d'Orléans.

From the first came, in regular succession, CHARLES VII.; LOUIS XI. his son; and CHARLES VII. his son, who left no issue.

The second son, Louis duc d'Orléans, had also two sons, viz. Charles duc d'Orléans and Jean d'Angoulême.

LOUIS XII. was son of Charles duc d'Orléans, but left no male issue.

From the second son, Jean d'Angoulême, came FRANCOIS I., and HENRI II. was the son of François.

Henri III. le Mignon, of France (1551, 1574–1589). Third son of Henri II. (q.v.). Weaker than woman, and worse than harlot.

Father, HENRI II.; Mother, Catharine de' Medici, daughter of Lorenzo de' Medici; Wife, Louise de Vaudemont; no issue. Contemporary with Elisabeth. See 'Fatal Three.'

Henri IV. le Grand, first of the Bourbon kings of France (1553, 1589–1610). He was the tenth in descent from Robert, the sixth son of St. Louis (IX.), and was related to the last king (Henri III.) only in the eleventh degree. He is generally spoken of as le bon roi Henri.

Father, Antoine duc de Vendôme; Mother, Jeanne d'Albret, queen of Navarre; Wives, Marguerite de Valois, daughter of HENRI II. (she was divorced); Maria de' Medici, daughter of the duke of Tuscany and mother of LOUIS XIII. his successor; Mistress, La belle Gabrielle, daughter of Antoine d'Estrées, created duchess of Beaufort. Contemporary with Elisabeth and James I. Life attempted by Pierre Barrière in 1593, by Pierre Ouen in 1597, by Jean de l'Isle in 1606, and fatally by Ravaillac in 1610.

 Robert comte de Clermont (sixth son of ST. LOUIS) married the heiress of the Sieur de Bourbon, and died 1317, leaving Louis duc de Bourbon his son and heir.

The third son of this Louis was Jacques, whose son Jean (Comte de la Marche) married the heiress of the Duc de Vendôme; and their second son, Louis (Comte de la Marche), died 1446, leaving issue Jean comte de la Marche.

The son of this Jean was François (who married Marie de Luxembourg), and their son was Charles, who died 1537.

The son of this Charles was Antoine duc de Vendôme (who married Jeanne d'Albret, queen of Navarre), and these were the parents of HENRI IV.

Henri V. of France, like Louis XVII. and Napoleon II., was a mere nominal king. He was born 1820, after the assassination of his father, Charles Ferdinand duc de Berry (son of Charles X.). When Charles X. abdicated, the next heir to the throne was Henri his grandson, who assumed the title of Henri V., but the French people chose Louis Philippe for their king instead.

Charles X. died 1836; the Duc de Berry was assassinated by Louvel in 1820; and Henri V. (Comte de Chambord) died 1883, at the age of 63.

Henricians (The), 1140. Followers of Henry of Italy, called 'the false hermit,' who was given up in chains to the bishop of Toulouse, and died 1147. They rejected the Apocrypha; would have no churches; administered baptism only to adults; denied the real presence and the existence of purgatory; suppressed masses; proscribed crucifixes, adoration of saints, relics, images, and prayers for the dead; they rejected also the separate order of the priesthood and the lawfulness of oaths. The Henricians, chiefly confined to Switzerland and Germany, merged soon after 1150 in the Albigenses.

Pronounce Hen-ris'-si-ans.

HENRY KINGS OF ENGLAND, ETC.

(For those of France, see 'Henri'; for those of Germany, see 'Heinrich.')

Henry I. 'Beauclerc' (good scholar), third son of William the Conqueror (1068, 1100–1135). He married Maud daughter of Malcolm III. of Scotland, and niece of Edgar Atheling, heiress of the Saxon line. He had two children by Maud: William, who died at sea 26 Nov. 1119; and Maud, who married (at the age of 6) Heinrich V. kaiser of Germany. Heinrich died 1126, and the widow married, the same year, Geoffrey Plantagenet, from whom descend our long line of kings.

His style and title: 'Henricus rex Anglorum et dux Normannorum.' After 1106 we find 'Dei Gratia' introduced in charters.

Henry I. had three natural children; two sons, Robert and William, and one daughter. Robert's son was William of Gloucester, whose daughter Avisa married King John (Lackland).

Henry II. First of the Plantagenet dynasty (972, 1002–1024).

Father, Geoffrey Plantagenet; Mother, Matilda daughter of HENRY I.; Wife, Eleanor, the divorced wife of Louis VII. of France (she was divorced 18 March, 1152, and married Henry six weeks afterwards); Mistress, the Fair Rosamond [Clifford].

He had three sons and three daughters:—

1. William, died in infancy.
2. Henry, died before his father, without issue.
3. RICHARD [I., Cœur de Lion], died without issue.
4. Geoffrey, who married Constantia, daughter of the Duke of Brittany, by whom he had two children, Eleanor and Arthur. Arthur, heir to the English crown, was murdered by his uncle John, 1230; and Eleanor was confined in Bristol Castle for 40 years.
5. JOHN.

His style and title.—'Henricus rex Anglorum, et dux Normannorum et Aquitannorum, et comes Andegavorum, or 'Henricus rex Angliæ, dux Normanniæ et Aquitaniæ, et comes Andegaviæ.'

Aquitania is now called Guienne, and Andegavia is Anjou.

Maud the eldest daughter of Henry II. married Henry V. duke of Saxony and Brunswick, from whom our present royal family is descended. [Thus: (1) Otto duke of Brunswick and Lunenburg, her son; (2) Albert I., his son; (3) Albert II. son; (4) Magnus, son; (5) Bernard, son: (6) Friedrich, son; (7) Otto II., son; (8) Heinrich, son; (9) Ernestus I., son; (10) Wilhelm, son; (11) George, son; (12) Ernestus II., son, who married Sophia, daughter of the Princess Elizabeth, and granddaughter of James I. of England, whose son and heir was GEORGE I. of England.]

Eleanor, another daughter of Henry II., married Alfonso VIII. of Castile.

Joan, his youngest daughter, married William II. of Sicily.

Henry III of England, called 'Winchester' from the place of his birth (1206, 1216–1272).

Father, JOHN; Mother, Isabelle of Angoulême. Wife, Eleanor of Provence, by whom he had nine children, five of whom died in infancy.

The four who lived to grow up were:

1. EDWARD I., who succeeded to the crown; he was earl of Chester.
2. Edmund, surnamed Crouchback, earl of Leicester and king of Sicily.
3. Margaret, who married Alexander III. of Scotland. She had a daughter who married Eric king of Norway; and this daughter, also named Margaret, was the famous 'Maid of Norway,' who succeeded her grandfather (Alexander III.) in Scotland, but died on her passage from Norway to Scotland, Sep. 1290.
4. Beatrix, who married John duke of Brittany.

His style and title from 1216 to 1259 was: 'Henricus, D.G. rex Angliæ, dominus Hiberniæ, dux Normanniæ et Aquitaniæ [Guienne], et comes Andegaviæ [Anjou].'

From 1259 to 1272: 'Henricus D.G. rex Angliæ, dominus Hiberniæ, et dux Aquitaniæ.' He therefore dropped the titles of 'dux Normannorum' or 'dux Normanniæ,' and of 'comes Andegaviæ.'

Henry IV. of England, called Bolingbroke because he was born at Bolingbroke Castle, in Lincolnshire (1367, 1399–1413). First of the line of Lancaster, which contained the three Henrys—IV., V., and VI.—

HENRY III., son of John.
EDWARD I. and Edmund duke of Lancaster, sons of Henry III.
EDWARD II., son of Edward I.
EDWARD III., son of Edward II.
Edward the Black Prince, William, Lionel, and John of Gaunt, sons of Edward III.
RICHARD II., son of Edward the Black Prince and grandson of Edward III.
Philippa (daughter of Lionel), Roger Mortimer (son of Philippa), Edmund Mortimer (son of Roger Mortimer, and heir to the throne on the death of Richard II.)—descendants of Lionel, third son of Edward III.
HENRY IV. was son of John of Gaunt duke of Lancaster (4th son of EDWARD III.).

 Henry IV. had no hereditary right to the crown. The legal heir, on the death of Richard II., was Edmund Mortimer earl of March. Henry was duke of Lancaster in right of his mother Blanche, heiress of Edmund duke of Lancaster.

Father, John of Gaunt. Mother, Blanche, heiress of Edmund duke of Lancaster. Wives: I. Mary daughter of Humphrey de Bohun, by whom he had six children; II. Joan (daughter of Charles II. of Navarre), no issue.

His sons were HENRY [V.], his successor; Thomas duke of Clarence; John duke of Bedford, regent of France; and Humphry duke of Gloucester.

His daughters were Blanche and Philippa. Philippa married Eric X. of Denmark.

Henry IV. was first of the Lancaster line, and his usurpation brought about the War of the Roses in the reign of Henry VI.

His style and title.—'Henricus D.G. rex Angliæ et Franciæ, et dominus Hiberniæ.'

Henry V., 'Monmouth,' from the place of his birth (1389, 1413–1422), 'the English Alexander.'

Father, HENRY IV. Mother, Mary daughter of Humphry de Bohun. Wife, Catherine daughter of Charles VI. of France, by whom he had one child, HENRY VI., who succeeded him. (After the death of Henry his widow married Sir Owen Tudor, captain of the guards. Their grandson was Henry VII., first of the Tudor line).

His style from 1413 to 9 April, 1420, was: 'Henricus D. G. rex Angliæ et Franciæ, et dominus Hiberniæ.' From 1420 to his death it was: 'Henricus D. G. rex Angliæ, hæres et regens Franciæ, et dominus Hiberniæ.' HENRY V. was heir to the French crown.

 The place of his traditional riotous court and merry doings, when Prince of Wales, was Cheylesmore, near Coventry, an estate belonging to the duchy of Cornwall.

Henry VI., 'Windsor,' from the place of his birth (1421, 1422–1471).

Father, HENRY V.; Mother, Catherine daughter of Charles VI. of France; Wife, Margaret of Anjou daughter of René or Reni titular king of Naples and duke of Provence and Anjou. He had one son (Edward), murdered by the York party after the battle of Tewkesbury, 1471

Prince Edward was 18 years old at his death; he was at the time married to Anne daughter of the Earl of Warwick. Soon after the prince's death his widow married Richard III.

The regents and guardians of Henry VI. were the Dukes of Bedford, Gloucester (the good duke), and Exeter, with the Bishop of Winchester.

Henry VII. His right to the throne was shadowy indeed. He was the son of Edmund Tudor, who married Margaret countess of Richmond, daughter of John Beaufort. This John Beaufort was a natural son of John of Gaunt by Catherine Swynford, the governess of his children, expressly by law disqualified for the succession. Another shadowy claim was that his grandfather, Sir Owen Tudor, captain of the guards, married Catherine, the widow of Henry V. Neither of these, nor both together, could give Henry Tudor the slightest hereditary right. Besides, at the time of his coronation his mother was alive, who, of course, had a prior claim to her son. However, at the death of Richard III., the legitimate heir was Elizabeth, who subsequently married Henry VII. Next to Elizabeth daughter of Edward IV. came Edward earl of Warwick, then Margaret countess of Salisbury.

It is somewhat remarkable that John Beaufort, through whom the father of Henry VIII. laid claim to the crown, had been expressly set aside, and the two daughters of Henry VIII. (Mary and Elizabeth) were also expressly set aside.

Father, Edmund Tudor. Mother, Margaret Beaufort. Wife, Elizabeth of York (the White Rose). His style and title: 'Henricus D.G. rex Angliæ et Franciæ, et dominus Hiberniæ.'

Henry VII. had two daughters and two sons who lived to maturity.

His eldest daughter, Margaret, was married to James IV. of Scotland, and it is by this marriage that their descendant James VI. of Scotland became JAMES I. of England.

His other daughter, Mary, was married twice—first to Louis XII. of France, and secondly to Charles Brandon duke of Suffolk, by whom she had two daughters, Frances and Eleanor. Frances was married to Henry Grey marquis of Dorset (and afterwards duke of Suffolk), and it was their child which was the unfortunate Lady Jane Grey.

Henry VII. of Japan (The) was Iyeasu, who, in the name of the Mikado, gave peace, prosperity, and laws to his distracted country, after centuries of civil war (17th cent.).

Henry VIII. (1491, 1509–1547). Father, Henry VII. Mother, Elizabeth of York (the White Rose). Wives:

1. (1509) Catalina (daughter of Ferdinand and Isabella of Spain), widow of his brother Arthur; mother of Queen Mary. This wife was divorced. Shakespeare spells the name 'Katharine.'

Arthur survived his marriage only a few months.

2. (1533) Anne Boleyn (daughter of Thomas Boleyn, of Hever Castle, Kent, earl of Wiltshire). Mother of Queen Elizabeth. Beheaded 1536.

3. (1536) Jane Seymour (sister of Somerset the protector); mother of Edward VI. Died two days after the birth of her son.

4. (1540) Anne of Cleves. Divorced.

5. (1540) Catherine Howard (granddaughter of John Howard duke of Norfolk). Beheaded.

6. (1543) Catherine Parr (daughter of Sir Thomas Parr). Twice a widow, first of Edward Burghe, and next of John Neville lord Latimer. On the death of Henry VIII. Catherine married Sir Thomas Seymour, uncle of Edward VI. If Henry had six wives, Catherine had four husbands.

None of his children had any issue.

His style and title from 1509 to 1521 was: 'Henry, D.G., of England, France, and Ireland, King.'

From 1521 to 1534 it was: 'Henry, D.G., of England, France, and Ireland, King. Defender of the Faith.'

From 1534 to 1547 it was: 'Henry, D.G., of England, France, and Ireland, King. Defender of the Faith, and Supreme Head of the Church of England.'

Henry VIII.'s Walking Stick. A spiked mace in the Tower of London. In the head of the mace are four barrels, which could be charged with gunpowder. The spikes are formidable triangular knives.

Henry IX. of England, 1788. Henry Benedict Maria Clement (last of the Stuarts). He was the younger brother of Charles Edward, the Young Pretender. Henry [IX.] was a cardinal, but on the death of Charles Edward he succeeded to the mock dignity of king of Great Britain and Ireland, and had coins cast with the inscription, 'Henricus nonus Angliæ rex,' and on the obverse, 'Gratia Dei, non voluntate hominum.' Forgetting in such cases that 'Vox populi est Dei vox.'

Henry (Knights of St.), 7 Oct., 1736. A military Saxon order. A cross attached to a crimson ribbon.

Henry Beauclerc. Henry I. (q.v.).

Henry Fitz-Empress (The Statute of), 1172. An enactment of Henry II. and his council in Ireland that, in case of the death of any chief governor, the chancellor, treasurer, chief justices, and certain other officers should be empowered (with the assent of the Lords spiritual and temporal) to proceed to the election of a successor to that office (Ireland).

Henry 'Longsword' (1519, 1547–1559). Henry II. king of England, grandson of Henry I., his mother being Maud daughter of Henry I.

Also called CURTMANTLE and FITZ-EMPRESS. The Anjou sword was longer and mantle shorter than the sword and mantle of the Norman kings.

Henry Town-bull. St. John (Henry Viscount Bolingbroke, 1678–1751). (DR. ARBUTHNOT, 'John Bull.')

Henry of Monmouth. Henry V. of England, born at Monmouth Castle, belonging to the great estates of his mother, Mary de Bohun, daughter of the Earl of Hereford (1388, 1413–1422).

Henry of Windsor. Henry VI. of England, who was born at Windsor.

On the news of the birth of a son being brought to Henry at Meaux, he eagerly demanded where the boy was born, and on being told at Windsor, he appeared greatly vexed, and repeated to his chamberlain, Lord Fitzhugh, the following lines:—

I, Henry, born at Monmouth,
Shall small time reign, and much get;
But Henry of Windsor shall long reign, and lose all.—
But as God wills,
So be it.

Heou-Woo-tae Dynasties (The). Five dynasties of China. The 14th Imperial dynasty was Heou-Woo-tae Lëang or L'ang; the 15th was Heou-Woo-tae Tang; the 16th was Heou-Woo-tae Tsin; the 17th was Heou-Woo-tae Hân; and the 18th was Heou-Woo-tae Tche-u. These five dynasties lasted only from 907 to 960, and from 927 a warlike Tartar horde established itself in the north of China, under Tae-tsong.

These dynasties are called 'The Five Successions.' The seat of government was Kai-fong-foo.

Heptarchy (The). The seven kingdoms founded in England by seven different Saxon invaders. See 'Bretwalda.' They are:—

1. KENT	founded by	Hengist	455
2. SUSSEX	"	Ella	477
3. WESSEX	"	Cynric	519
4. ESSEX	"	Erkinwin	526
5. NORTHUMBRIA	"	Ida	547
6. EAST ANGLIA	"	Offa	571
7. MERCIA	"	Crida	584

Northumbria was divided at Ida's death into Bernicia and Deira, and Deira was absorbed into Bernicia by Oswy in 655.

Egbert, of the Wessex race of kings, united in his own person all the separate kingdoms, and called the united kingdoms ENGLAND 800.

Heraclēa (Table of), or 'Lex Julia Municipālis,' which was passed B.C. 45, discovered in 1732 at Heraclēa, in Lucania.

Heralds. I. Of England.—There are 14—viz. 4 kings-of-arms, 6 heralds, and 4 pursuivants.

The 4 kings-of-arms are Clarenceux (having power over all parts of England south of the Trent); Norroy, i.e. Northroy (who has power over all parts north of the Trent); and the 2 who serve the Orders of the Garter and the Bath: the former called Garter King-of-arms, and the latter Bath King-of-arms. See 'Garter King-of-arms.'

The 6 heralds are Somerset, Chester, Windsor, Richmond, Lancaster, and York.

The 4 pursuivants are Rouge Dragon, Portcullis, Blue Mantle, and Rouge Croix.

There are seven colours in English heraldry, and nine in French. The seven English colours are or (gold), argent (silver), gules (red), azure (blue), sable (black), vert (green), and purpure (purple). The two extra colours are tenne (orange), and sanguine (murrey).

II. Of Ireland.—Consists of 5 members. The king-of-arms is styled Ulster king-of-arms.

The 2 heralds are Cork and Dublin.

The 2 pursuivants are Athlone (the senior) and St. Patrick.

III. In Scotland.—The Lyon Court consists of 12 members.

The king-of-arms is styled Lord Lyon, or Lyon king-of-arms.

The 6 heralds are called Albany, Islay or Ilay, Marchmont, Ross, Rothesay, and Snowdoun.

The 5 pursuivants are called Bute, Carrick, Kintyre, Ormond, and Unicorn.

Heralds' College (The), or 'College of Arms.' Incorporated and chartered in 1483 by Richard III.

Herbs (The Feast of), or 'Festum Herbarum.' In German 'Krautweihe.' When women carried herbs and sweet spices to commemorate the anointing after the Sabbath of the Crucifixion week.

Hercules. Almost every nation has its Hercŭlês, or man of marvellous strength, some fabulous and some more or less historical. Diodōrus mentions three, Cicero ('De Natura Deorum') six, and Varro as many as forty-three. Thus Bel is called the Syrian Hercŭlês, Melkart the Tyrian, Chon the Egyptian, Dorsănês the Hindû, and Ogmios the Gaulic Hercŭlês. The following are well known:—

The Attic Hercŭlês: Theseus (2 syl.), who went about performing exploits similar to those of Herăklês or Hercŭlês.

The Barbaric Hercŭlês: Simeon of Bulgaria (893–927).

The Greeks were defeated, and their horn was broken by the barbaric Hercŭlês.—GIBBON, lv.

The Egyptian Hercŭlês: (1) Sesostris or Ramses II. the Great, of the XIX. dynasty. A sculptured head of this hero is in the British Museum. (2) Chon or Son, called by Pausanias 'Macĕris son of Ammon.'

The English Hercŭlês: Guy earl of Warwick.

Warwick . . . thou English Hercŭlês.—DRAYTON, Polyolbion, xiii.

The French Hercŭlês: Jean-Baptiste Klĕber, the French general, a man of prodigious strength and stature (1754–1800).

The Greek Hercŭlês: Alkīdês, i.e. Herăklês, who was grandson of Alkæos.

The Indian Hercŭlês: Dorsănês, who married Pandæa and became the founder of a race of Indian kings.

Sometimes Belus is called 'The Indian Hercŭlês.'

The Jewish Hercŭlês: Samson, the judge of Israel, who died B.C. 1118.

The Persian Hercŭlês: Rustum son of Zâl, prince of Sedjistan. Matthew Arnold has a poem entitled 'Sohrab and Rustum,' which gives an account of Rustum slaying his son Sohrab.

The Roman Hercŭlês: Commŏdus the emperor called himself 'Hercŭlês Secundus.' He was a gigantic idiot who killed 100 lions and overthrew 1,000 gladiators in the amphitheatre (161, 180–192).

The Swedish Hercŭlês: Starchatĕrus (1st cent. A.D.).

Hercules (The Farnese). A famous statue, the work of Glykon, copied from one by Lysippos; called 'Farnese' (3 syl.) from being placed in the Farnese Palace at Rome, but now at Naples. The hero is represented leaning on his club, and holding an apple in his left hand, which rests on his back. There is a copy of this statue in the Tuileries garden of Paris.

Farnese, pronounce Far-nay'-ee.

Hercules (Pillars of). Calpê and Abŷla; one at Gibraltar and the other at Ceŭta. Torn asunder (according to fable) by Alcīdes on his route to Gadês (Cadiz).

Hercules of Music (The). Christoph von Gluck (1714–1787).

Herdsman (King Alfred's). It is said that the name of the herdsman in whose hovel King Alfred was sheltered for six months was Dunulf, who was afterwards educated, ordained, and made bishop of Winchester.

Hereditary Union (The), 1540. An act by which the crown of Sweden was declared hereditary in the House of Vasa.

Heregeld, or 'Heregyld' (3 syl.). An army tax. It was first imposed by Ethelred II. under the name of 'Danegelt,' a war tax to resist the invasions of the Danes and buy them off. It was afterwards called 'Here-gyld,' from the Anglo-Saxon words here (2 syl.), an army, and gyld, a tax. See 'Danegelt' and 'Hidagium.'

Heremo'nian Line [of Kings] (The). Descendants of Heremon (3 syl.) son o' Milesius king of Ireland.

Heretical Baptism. The baptism of heretics (3rd cent.). The controversy was this: Is baptism valid only when administered in the orthodox church? If so, baptism by heretics is no baptism at all, and those so baptized must be baptized again in order to be members of Christ's Church. This was the view of the Eastern Church. The Western Church considered any baptism valid if administered in the name of the Father, Son, and Holy Ghost; so that whether performed by heretics or on heretics it mattered not if the orthodox words were uttered when the rite was administered.

The Synod of Iconium and the Synod of Synnăda in Phrygia decreed that 'heretical baptism is no baptism at all.' Some eight or ten councils confirmed this view of the question. The Western Church would not give way, and council after council decreed that heretical baptism is valid. This is still the belief of Western churches, whether affiliated with Rome or not.

Heretics are those who differ from the dominant power in some religious point or points which those who condemn them deem essential for the 'true faith.' Thus Jesus Christ was considered a heretic by the Pharisees and Sadducees. The Buddhists are considered heretics by the Brahmins. The Shiites are considered heretics by the Sunnites.

Sects are those who differ from a main religious body in some point or points less grave than heresy. Thus the Jansenists and Jesuits, the Dominicans and Franciscans, always antagonistic to each other, are virtually sects of the Catholic Church—Nonconformists of the Anglican Church—and Ismaëlians of the Shiites.

In a word, orthodoxy is the doxy of the judge; heterodoxy is the doxy of those condemned by the judge. Both change places as opinions change or the dominant power changes. Thus Mary considered Protestantism heretical, but Elizabeth called it orthodoxy. Laud condemned the Puritans, and, like Ferdinand II., would have stamped them out if he could; whereas the Puritans were every bit as intolerant during the Commonwealth. See the following in loco:—

ALBIGENSES. Condemned by the Third Lateran 906.

APOLLINARIANS. Condemned by the Council of Alexandria in 362, and the Council of Constantinople in 381.

ARIANS. Condemned by the Council of Nice 325.

ARMENIANS. Condemned by the Council of Chalcēdon 451.

BARDESANISTS.

BASILIDIANS. A branch of the Gnostics. See below, 'Marcionites.'

BOGOMILES. Condemned by the Council of Constantinople 1110.

BUDDHISTS. Called heretics by the Brahmins.

CALVINISTS. Condemned by the Council of Trent 1545.

CELESTIANS. Condemned by the Council of Carthage 412, and again by the Council of Ephesus 430.

CERINTHIANS. A branch of the Gnostics. Cerinthus denied that John was the author of the Fourth Gospel.

CHRISTIANS. Called heretics by Moslems.

CHYITES or SHIITES (2 syl.). Called heretics by the Sunnites (2 syl.).

COPTS or COPTI, the Monophysites or Jacobites of Egypt.

DOCE'TÆ. A branch of the Gnostics.

DONATISTS. Condemned by the Council of Arles 314.

DRUSES.

EBIONITES (4 syl.). Supposed to be condemned in the Fourth Gospel.

EUTYCHIANS. Condemned by the Council of Chalcēdon 451. They affirmed that Christ was one thing and the Logos another; that there were two natures in Christ before the hypostatical union, but after that the two were amalgamated into one.

GNOSTICS.

GREEK CHURCH. Condemned by the Council of Aix-la-Chapelle 809.

HERMESIANS. Condemned by a papal brief in 1685.

HUGUENOTS of France.

HUSSITES. Huss was excommunicated by Alexander V.

ICONOCLASTS. Condemned by several councils.

ISMAELIANS (5 syl.). Deemed heretics by the Sunnites (2 syl.).

JA'COBITES (3 syl.) or JACO'BIANS, of Syria. So called from Jacob, a disciple of Eutyches. In the 7th cent. the Eutychians, Copts, and Monoph'osites (4 syl.), who acknowledged but one nature in Christ, all merged in the Jacobites or Jacobians.

JAN'SENISTS. Condemned by Innocent X.

LUTHERANS. Condemned by the Council of Lyons 1528, and again by the Council of Trent 1545.

MACEDONIANS. Condemned by the Council of Constantinople 381.

MANICHE'ANS. Condemned by several councils.

MAR'CIONITES (4 syl.). Similar to the Basilidians. Perhaps the same.

MONOPH'YSITES (4 syl.). A general term for those sectaries of the Levant who believe that Christ had only one nature. See above, 'Jacobites.' Condemned by the Council of Chalcēdon 451.

MONOTH'ELITES (4 syl.). Condemned by the Council of Constantinople 680.

MON'TANISTS. Condemned by the bishops of Asia.

NAZARE'ANS (3 syl.). A Jewish sect. Acts xxiv.

NESTORIANS. Condemned by the Council of Ephesus 431, and again by the Council of Constantinople 448.

PATERINS. Condemned by the Council of Lateran 1179.

PAULIANISTS. Condemned by the Council of Antioch 270.

PAULICIANS.

PELA'GIANS. Condemned by the Council of Ephesus 418, and again by the Council of Carthage 416.

PRISCILLIANISTS. Condemned by the Council of Saragossa 381.

PROTESTANTS. See 'Calvinists' and 'Lutherans.

REFORMATION. Condemned by the Council of Trent 1545.

SABELLIANS. Condemned by the Council of Alexandria 261.

VAUDOIS. Condemned by the Council of the Lateran 1179; by the bull of John XXII. in 1332; and by Innocent VIII. in 1487.

WYCLIFITES (3 syl.). Condemned by the Council of Trent 1545.

Heresy, in Greek αἵρεσις, simply means a choice, or something chosen. A heretic is one who chooses his own religious opinions, and does not accept blindly those chosen for him by others.

Heretics (Laws against). The first laws against heretics, on which all subsequent ones were founded, originated in 1220 by the Kaiser Friedrich II. They were for the extermination of heretics, and had been dictated by Pope Honorius III. Confirmed by Innocent IV. in 1243, by Alexander IV. in 1258, by Urban IV. in 1262, and by Clement IV. in 1265 (four popes, all the IVths of the name).

'These laws' (says the pope), 'published by our dearest son Friedrich emperor of the Romans, we praise and approve, so as to be valid for all time. And if anyone attempt to infringe them . . . he will incur the wrath of Almighty God. . . . As for the persons of heretics, they are all to be burnt alive without appeal or possibility of pardon . . . all their goods are to be confiscated, and never restored to their posterity. Their children and grandchildren shall be held incapable of holding any public office, with this one exception, viz. if a son informs against the secret heresy of a father. Persons only suspected of heresy shall be put to death unless they can clear themselves within a year and a day. Repentant heretics to be imprisoned for life.'

The bull of Paul III., published in 1538 against Henry VIII., contains some new enactments against 'the accomplices of heretics.'

In Section XII. all the faithful are admonished, under pain of excommunication, 'to avoid and cause others to avoid' all adherents of the king, and to 'have no commerce, conversation, or communion' with him, his household, vassals, and subjects; they are strictly enjoined not 'to buy or sell, exchange, deal, or chaffer, in any town, fort, castle, or city' in his dominion, nor 'cause wine, grain, salt, victuals, arms, clothes, wares, or other articles of commerce, to be brought by ship, trireme or other vessel, by mule, horse, or other animal,' to any part of his dominion; and 'stoutly to refuse all assistance, counsel, or favour to those who, directly or indirectly, secretly or openly, presume to traffic with them.'

Section X. enjoined 'all who possess armed forces to set them on the king and his adherents.'

Section XVII. gives everyone full liberty of appropriating to himself all goods belonging to the king or any of his subjects.

In a word, the bull of Paul III. states:—

1. That no man who refuses to believe all the articles of the Catholic Church has any right to life or property.
2. No Christian has any right to respect the life or property of a heretic.
3. Christian governments are bound to burn alive all heretics and to confiscate all their property.
4. Children are bound to pry into the secret belief of their parents, and denounce them if heretical.
5. Error in faith is infinitely worse than moral turpitude.
6. Anyone may appropriate to himself the goods of a heretic.
7. Every heretic is virtually an outlaw, and all contracts made with heretics or debts owing to them are null and void.
8. Slavery and the slave-trade should be kept up, if the slaves are heretical.

(Abridged from a letter sent to the 'Times' from an English Catholic, and published in that journal under the title of 'Papal Infallibility and Persecution.')

Heretics (The Statute of), 1401. By this infamous act priests were allowed to arrest and imprison all heretical preachers in England, all schoolmasters tainted with Lollardry, all owners and writers of heretical books; and, on refusal to abjure, or relapse after abjuration, to send the heretic to the stake, 'to be burnt to death on a high place in the sight of the people.' The first victim of this iniquitous statute was William Sawtre of Lynn, in Norfolk. Next followed John Badbie, for denying the dogma of transubstantiation.

This statute, often called 'The Statute of Heresy,' was revived by Mary in 1555; but it was the first act of Elizabeth to repeal it. Constantine, in 326, passed a penal edict against heretics; and the Council of Laodicea, in 372, forbade marriages between heretics and orthodox Christians. But what was heresy and what orthodoxy in the 4th cent. is impossible to determine.

Heretics of Brixen. In 1486 the magistrates of Brixen refused to burn heretics, on the ground that heresy being an ecclesiastical offence, civil magistrates could take no cognizance of it. Innocent VIII. forthwith excommunicated them, 'without appeal, unless within six days they carried out the sentences of the Inquisition.'

In 1520 Leo X. condemned the proposition, 'Hæreticos comburi est contra voluntatem spiritus.'

Heretics of Périgord and Périgueux. The Waldenses were so called because they abounded in Périgord and Périgueux in the 12th cent.

Heretoga (4 syl.). A Saxon word meaning a general or commander; from here (2 syl.), an army, and toga, a leader. Latin comes, our earl, the continental count. German Herzog = duke; Graf = earl or count.

Her'mandad (The Santa), or 'Holy Brotherhood.' An association of the principal cities of Castile and Aragon, bound together by a solemn league for mutual defence. The first hermandad in Aragon was established in 1264, that of Castile in 1295. These associations were defences against the barons, whose unruly conduct and depredations were the curse of the middle ages.

Hermann the Cripple (1013–1054). One of the most marvellous of men. His body was wholly paralysed, so that he could not move without assistance, and could scarcely speak so as to be understood; yet was his society sought by men from all quarters of the globe. He has left a book of great merit behind, entitled 'A Chronicle of the Six Ages of the World,' containing a history of Germany during the 10th and 11th cents.

Paul Scarron, the French poet, was a similar cripple (1610-1660).

Herme'sian Heresy (19th cent., about 1828). The substitution of conviction for faith. By conviction is meant the persuasion which results from judgment and sound reason; by faith is meant the persuasion of authority. One is belief in what sound reason convinces the mind is true; the other is belief in what the church pronounces to be true. Hermes of Westphalia was divinity professor in the University of Münster, and thought by his teaching to amalgamate Catholics and Protestants, as well as Calvinists and Lutherans, but his doctrine was condemned by a papal brief in 1835.

Hermippic School (The). Hermippus, the Greek philosopher, placed the elixir vitæ in the health-bestowing breath of youth.

Hermit of Lathom (The). Robert Swarsbrick (1740–1824), who lived first in a one-roomed and then in a two-roomed hut at the bottom of the 'Ladies' Walk' at Lathom. He wrote a journal, and was fond of gardening.

Hernhutters, or 'Hernhutes,' 1721. The Moravians or 'United Brethren' were so called, because after the Thirty Years' War they found refuge in Hernhutt, under the protection of Count Zinzendorf. They profess to take the pure precepts of the gospel as their rule of conduct, choose their ministers by lot, wash each other's feet, celebrate agapæ or love-feasts, and address prayer to the Saviour only.

Héro de la Fable (Le). Charles de Lorraine, duc de Guise (1571–1640), the implacable foe of the Protestants. He bore arms against Henri IV., but tendered his submission; he conducted a fleet against Rochelle, but incurred the displeasure of Richelieu, and retired to Italy, where he died.

Héro de l'Histoire (Le). The Duc d'Enghien. Ever since 1485, when the house of Enghien passed into that of Bourbon, some member of the family has become historic. Amongst others we have François de Bourbon-Vendôme, brother of Prince Louis I. de Condé (1519–1544); the Grand Condé (1621–1659); Louis Antoine Henri de Bourbon, last of the Condés (1772–1804).

Hero of Modern Italy (The). Garibaldi (1807–1882). Certainly the most disinterested hero that ever lived, but treated with scant honour.

Hero of Rora (The). Joshua Janavel, who lived at Rora, and with seventeen companions put to flight a troop of Irishmen led on by Mario against the Vaudois in 1655.

Hero of the Nile (The). Horatio viscount Nelson; so called for his great naval victory over the French, 1 August, 1798, for which he was created 'Baron Nelson of the Nile' (1758–1805).

Hero of the Nine Hostages (The). Nial the Great, who was succeeded in A.D. 406 by Dathy, last of the pagan kings of Ireland. Nial was killed by a flash of lightning.

Hero of the Peninsula (The). The Duke of Wellington, who, between 21 August, 1808, and 10 April, 1814, defeated five French marshals in the Peninsula of Spain and Portugal, won nine battles, and made three successful sieges.

A rare hero indeed. Napoleon's prevailing fault was the exaltation of himself and family. Wellington's great merit was modest patriotism. Being asked in 1806 how he could condescend to lead a brigade after commanding large armies, he replied: 'I am nim-muk-wallah, as we say in the East; that is, I have eaten the king's salt, and think it my duty to serve him faithfully, wherever he finds it convenient to employ me.' This is magnificent magnanimity; more honourable to a hero than the slaughter of Austerlitz.

Herod the Great. Son of Antipăter, prime minister of Hyrcănus. He married ten wives.

1st. Doris, by whom he had Antipater.

2nd. Mariamne the Asmonæan, by whom he had Alexander, Aristobūlus, Herod, Salampso, and Cypros [Aristobulus].

King Agrippa, who put James to death, was son of Aristobulus. Agrippa's son and daughter (Agrippa and Berenice) heard Paul make his defence (Acts xxv., xxvi.). This was Herod II. of Judæa.

3rd. Mariamnê, daughter of Simon the high-priest, by whom he had PHILIP (whose wife was Herodias).

4th. Malthacê, by whom he had ARCHELA'US, Philip, and Olympias.

5th. Cleopatra, by whom he had HEROD ANTIPAS and Philip.

6th. Pallas, by whom he had Phasaël, in honour of whom he built Phasaëlis.

7th. Phædra, by whom he had Roxana.

8th. Elpis, by whom he had Salomê. (Names of the other two wives not known.)

N.B.—Italics, put to death; capitals, the tetrarchs.

At the death of Herod the Great the Romans divided the Jewish state into four parts, called tetrarchies—viz. Judæa, Galilee, Ituræa, and Samaria. The first three they gave to the sons of Herod the Great. To Herod Archelaüs was given Judæa; to Herod Antipas was given Galilee (this is the man who slew John the Baptist); and to Herod Philip was given Ituræa (he married his niece Herodias, who lived in adultery with her brother-in-law Herod Antipas). The tetrarchy was abolished A.D. 56, and Herod II. (Agricola) became sole king of Judæa. Samaria was ruled by Roman governors. For table of affinity, see 'Maccabees.' See also next article.

Hero'dians. A Jewish sect in the time of Herod. Dr. Prideaux reduces their tenets into two heads: (1) a belief that the dominion of the Romans over the Jews was lawful, and it was their duty to submit to it; (2) that, under present circumstances, they might follow many heathen usages. In fact they were trimmers between political policy and religious obligations.

Herod'otos of China (The). Ssema-Thsian, author of the Sse-ki, or Annals of China. He lived in the reign of Hân Ho-tee, who reigned 89–106.

Herodotos of Old London (The). John Stow (1525–1605), author of 'Summary of the Chronicles of England,' 1561, 'Annals of England,' 1580, and 'Survey of London,' 1598.

Heroes scratched off the Church Doors. So Sheridan called Militia officers who had served four years. An act of parliament enjoined that a list of all persons between 18 and 45 should be affixed in each parish to the church doors three clear days before the day of appeal, Sunday being one of the days. Commissioned officers who had served four years in the Militia were exempt, and their names were 'scratched off the doors.'

Heroic Age (The). The semi-historic age preceding the historic. The heroic age of Greece dates from the arrival of the first colony under Inachos, and goes to the 19th cent. B.C., the return of the Heraclidæ. China, Persia, and all other civilised countries have passed through their mythical age and their heroic age, before they came to their historic period.

England, Wales, Scotland, and Ireland have had their heroic ages. Brute, Colbrand, Guy of Warwick, Arthur, &c., will readily recur to the mind.

Herrings (Battle of), Feb. 1429. Sir John Fastolfe carrying provisions, much of which was salt fish, to the English army before Orleans, was intercepted by an allied army of French and Scotch. Sir John succeeded in vanquishing his opponents near Rouvrai and reaching the English army.

Herrying of Buchan (The). The ravaging of the country of Comyn earl of Buchan, in 1307, by Robert Bruce, in revenge for the pertinacity with which the earl had pursued him when, wasted by sickness, he had retreated before him.

Sir Alexander and Sir Simon Fraser took a very prominent part with Bruce in this expedition. To herry is to plunder or spoil.

Hertford College, Oxford, 1282. Founded by Elias de Hertford, and called 'Hertford Hall'; but the word 'college' was substituted in 1740. It was dissolved in 1805, but in 1874 was re-established. The head-master is called the Principal.

Hertford Scholarship. For Latin, value about 30*l.*, and tenable for one year only. The funds are derived from the interest of 1,100*l.* made over to the University of Oxford at the dissolution of the College in 1834. See above.

Hes'ychasts or 'Hesicastæ.' Mystics of the Greek Church, very similar to the Quietists (q.v.). They either came into being or revived in the 14th cent.

Anachoretæ dicuntur quoque hesicastæ tamquam quiescentes, ἡσυχάζω enim quiesco significat. —DU CANGE, vol. iv. p. 53, col. 2.

Hetaireia (The), 1820. The Greek confederates, whose resolve was to liberate Greece from the slavery of the Moslem. The leader of the confederates was Prince Alexander Ypsilanti.

The confederacy was formed by Rhigas before 1798, but made small progress till 1816. In 1821 it brought about the Greek Revolution.

Hexapla (The). Origen's Old Testament in six columns, each column being a different language. (1) Hebrew, (2) Hebrew in Greek characters, (3) the Septuagint, (4) the text of Aquila, (5) that of Theodotian, and (6) that of Symmachos. The book no longer exists. It disappeared in the 7th cent.

Hia Dynasty, B.C. 2205–1766. The first Imperial dynasty of China, and the first of the semi-historic period. It gave 18 emperors, and lasted 440 years. Their capital was Yang-tching.

It was followed by the Chăng dynasty. Yoo the Great, founder of the Hia dynasty, is the first monarch mentioned in the 'Shoo-king' of Confucius.

Hialmar's Ordinances for pirates. His men were forbidden to rob women of their money, or to carry them off against their consent. They were also forbidden to eat raw flesh. (BARTHOLINUS, 'De Causis Contemptæ a Danis Mortis,' bk. ii. 9.)

Hialtland (3 syl.). The Norse name of Shetland or Zetland Islands, or rather of the mainland of that group.

> Or shall Hialtland's minstrel own
> One note to rival glorious John?
> Sir W. SCOTT, The Pirate, xxi.

Hibernia. The Roman name for Ireland. Diodōrus Siculus calls it Irin; Erin is the modern name. Ire-land is Iren-land; and Hibernia is another form of Iernia or Irinia. It is called the Holy Island, and Irin or Erin is connected with the Greek ἱερός (sacred or holy), Hebrew Ira (to revere).

Hibernian Roscius (The). Gustavus Vaughan Brooke (1819–1862).

Hickesites (2 syl.). Non-jurors were so called after Dr. George Hickes, a non-juror and learned Saxonist (1642–1716).

Hicksites (2 syl.), 1827. Rationalistic Quakers; so called from Elias Hicks, spoken of by Mr. Conway, 'a sort of mystical and eloquent Thomas Paine.' Walt Whitman wrote in 1887 a life-sketch of this mystic.

Elias Hicks denied the miraculous conception, the divinity of Christ, the doctrine of the atonement, and the inspiration of Scripture.

Hidage (2 syl.), or 'Hidágium.' A tax paid to Ethelred II. for every hide of land; levied in money, provisions for the army, armour, ships, &c. By this tax every 310 hides were required to furnish one ship in defence of the kingdom against the Danes, and every 8 hides had to supply 'one jack (foot-soldier) and one saddle (horse-soldier),' fully armed and equipped, in defence of the kingdom. See 'Danegelt.'

Hieronymites (5 syl.). I. A religious society founded in Holland in 1376 by Geert Groote and Florentius Radewin, who named the society after St. JEROME. Very similar to the subsequent society known as the Moravians or the United Brethren. They owned no conventional distinctions, enjoined community of goods, ascetic habits, and the use of the vernacular tongue in religious services. In 1430 the Hieronymites numbered 130 societies.

II. Hermits of St. Jerome, founded in 1380 in Umbria by Pietro of Pisa. The austerity of these hermits is almost incredible.

III. The Hieronimites of the Observance, instituted in Lombardy by Loup d'Olmédo in 1424 under the reformed rule of Thomas.

High and Low Church, 1700. The favourers of the doctrine of divine right were the High Churchmen, and they, of course, were Jacobites. The friends of William of Orange and the Hanoverian succession, who denied the doctrine of divine right, were the Low Churchmen.

At the present day High Churchmen are those who exalt the priestly office and church rites. See below, 'High Church Principles.' The Low Churchmen are what may be called the Evangelists or Simeonites, whose creed is 'by grace are ye saved, through faith; and that not of yourselves, it is the gift of God.'

High and Mighty States (The), 20 Nov., 1789. The title assumed by the States of Brabant when they threw off their allegiance to Austria (Kaiser Joseph II.).

High Church Principles. These seven doctrines may be termed essentials. See 'High and Low Church.'

1. Baptismal regeneration.
2. The Apostolic succession of ordained ministers.
3. The power of absolution in priests.
4. The eucharistic sacrifice.
5. The real presence of Christ in the elements of bread and wine.

6. The communion of saints, militant and triumphant.
7. The authority of the Church, as a Church.

High Church and Sacheverell! So shouted the London mob in 1709, after the trial of the doctor in the House of Lords. His offence was alluding to Lord Godolphin as 'Volpone' in the sermon preached by him in St. Paul's, London. See 'Volpone.'

High Commission Court (The), 1 Eliz. c. 1, A.D. 1559; abolished by 16 Car. I. c. 11, A.D. 1641. This court was instituted to vindicate the dignity and peace of the church by reforming, ordering, and correcting the ecclesiastical state and persons, as well as all manner of errors, heresies, schisms, abuses, offences, contempts, and enormities. The commission was directed in the reigns of James I. and Charles I. to tyrannical and unconstitutional purposes, and therefore the court was abolished. There was no appeal from the judgments of this court. James II. partially restored it.

Not unfrequently called 'The Court of High Commission.' The test of heresy was the Four Gospels and first four General Councils. Dr. Alexander Leighton, for his pamphlet, entitled 'An Appeal to Parliament, or Zion's Plea against Prelacy,' was thus sentenced by Archbishop Laud, in the High Commission Court: 'To be imprisoned for life, and to pay a fine of 10,000*l.*; to be degraded from his ministry; to be whipped, set in the pillory, have one ear cut off, and one nostril slit up; then to be branded on the forehead with S.S. (seditious slanderer), and carried back to prison. After a few days to be again pilloried, to lose his other ear, to have his other nostril slit, and being whipped, again to be restored to his dungeon till his death.'

High Constable (Lord) of England. The seventh great officer of the crown. The office existed before the Conquest, when it went by inheritance to the earls of Hereford and Essex, and next fell into the line of Stafford. In 1522 it became forfeited by the attainder of Edward Stafford duke of Buckingham. Abolished 1869 (32, 33 Vict., c. 47).

High Constable (Lord) of Scotland. Keeper of the king's sword, and commander of the army. Instituted by David I. in 1147, and made by Robert Bruce hereditary in the family of Errol. The title is only honorary, but it makes the earl of Errol the hightest peer in Scotland.

High Court of Justice (The). A court formed for trying Charles I. for 'treason against the sovereign majesty of the people.' Bradshaw was the president The king was found guilty by the court and condemned to death.

High Mass, 'Missa alta.' The celebration of the Eucharist in the Catholic Church, performed musically, and alta voce, with a loud voice. Low mass is merely read, submissa voce, with a low or subdued voice. See 'Mass.'

High National Court (The), 179). A court which the National Assembly substituted for the court of justice at the Châtelet. This court was to try all treasons against the nation. Barnave was the first president of this High Court.

High School (The), of Edinburgh, 1577. Founded by the magistrates of that city.

High Steward (The). I. At one time the first great officer of the crown. Established before the Conquest, but abolished in 1265. The office is still revived at a coronation, or may be so if a peer is charged with high treason.

II. Of the Universities of Cambridge and Oxford. Adjudicates in all cases of felony charged against a member of the university if committed within the limits thereof. He is also empowered to hold a leet; but he appoints a deputy, subject to the approval of the senate in Cambridge, and Convocation in Oxford. Appointed in Cambridge by the senate; in Oxford by the chancellor. In both universities there is a deputy steward.

The limit of the university is one statute mile from any of the suburbs. Stipend of the high steward, in Oxford, is 6*l.*, and of his deputy 2*l.*

Highfliers and Moderates, 1835. In the Scotch Presbyterian Church. They were also called 'Non-intrusionists' —that is, those who looked on the veto law (q.v.) passed by the General Assembly as an illegal intrusion or interference with the patron's rights. The Highfliers were the High Church party. See 'Free Church of Scotland.'

The leaders of the Non-intrusion party were Dr. Chandler, Dr. Candlish, Dr. Gordon, and Messrs. Guthrie, Cunningham and Dunlop.

Highgereve, or 'Shire-reeve,' we now call a viscount, not meaning a count's deputy or vice, but simply the peer next in dignity to a count or earl.

Our high sheriff is of course the same word, but its modern meaning is quite different to that of viscount.

Highgate Prophet (The). William Powell (died 1803). For many years he walked from Sloane Street to Highgate Hill, then started off at a run to the top of the hill. Being asked why he did so, he replied, that if he ceased to do so, the world would be no more. Hence he was called 'The prophet.'

Highland Host (The), 1679. A scandalous raid against what was called Scotch heretics. Some 8,000 Highlanders were let loose by the English Government upon the Presbyterians, who refused to accept the prelacy which the government of Charles II. tried to force upon them. The savagery of these Highlanders was quite equal to that of the French dragonnades. Neither age nor sex was spared, and Alva or Torquemada never showed more diabolical ingenuity of torture than these 'brither Scots' did to their own countrymen.

Highland Plot (The), 1704. A plot in which Simon Fraser and Athol were deeply concerned. The plot was to raise a rebellion in Scotland, to invade England with French soldiers, and having subverted the government of Queen Anne, to bring back James, who called himself Prince of Wales, but is better known as the Old Pretender.

Bishop Burnet [being told of the plot] remarked to the queen that . . . they did not mean her to live any longer than till they thought their designs for the prince were well laid: on which the queen answered very quickly, 'There is no manner of doubt about that.'—HOWITT, Hist. of Eng. (Anne), p. 180.

Highness (His). A title given to princes not sovereigns. 'His Royal Highness' or 'His Imperial Highness' is given to royal or imperial princes. 'His Most Serene Highness' is given to the collateral branches of the blood royal in Germany. The Sultan of Turkey is entitled 'His Highness.'

Till the reign of James I. in England kings were generally addressed as 'His Highness'; so were they in Spain till the reign of Charles V. In France, the Duke of Orleans was called 'His Highness.' In 1633 the elder sons of the cadet branch of the Bourbons took the title of 'His Royal Highness.' Under Louis XIV. all legitimate princes were addressed as 'His Highness,' and the Prince of Condé as 'His Most Serene Highness.'

In addressing the Sultan of Turkey we say 'Your Highness';
Royal princes we say 'Your Royal Highness';
Imperial princes we say 'Your Imperial Highness';
The collateral branches of the blood royal of Germany we say 'Your Serene Highness.'
 The king or queen is addressed as 'Your Majesty.' See 'Majesty.'

Hil'ary Term. One of the four legal terms of England. It used to be from 11 Jan. to the end of the month. It now terminates the Wednesday before Easter. St. Hilary's day is the 13th Jan., whence the name.

The other three terms are called Easter Term, Trinity Term, and Michaelmas Term.

Hildebrand (The Hymn of), 8th cent. A popular German legend in metre, without rhymes. The story is this. Hildebrand thought his father was dead, and one day, as he was riding in full armour, he was encountered by another knight, and said to him: 'Sir Knight, tell me thy name and country, but an ye refuse to do so, ye shall not pass this way.' The stranger replied, 'Wit you well, I am Sir Hildebrand of Lombardy.' 'Knave,' cried the younger man, 'thou liest'; and so saying he let drive at him, and knocked him off his horse. Then going to unlace his helm, he discovered that it was his father whom he had thus slain.

Hill Coolies. Hindoo highland labourers.

Hill-men. The Cameronians.

The religious sect called Hill-men, or Cameronians, was at that time noted for austerity and devotion, in imitation of Cameron, their founder. —Sir W. SCOTT, Old Mortality (Introduction).

Hillside Men. Old Nationalists (about 1881). So called because they believed that one day they would be in a position to fight for their country [Ireland] on the hillside. They had, however, an utter abhorrence of assassination. They were not members of the Land League (q.v.). See 'Irish Associations.'

Hippoc'ratês (The British). Thomas Sydenham, M.D. (1624–1689). So called over and over again by Boerhaave.

Hippoc'ratês (The Roman). Aulus Cornelius Celsus (1st cent.) was so called because for the most part he followed the great father of medicine.

Hiram [exalted]. The common title of the kings of Tyre, as Pharaoh [the sun] is that of the kings of Egypt. The Hiram, in Solomon's days, was by name Abibalus.

Historic Register (The). A quarterly publication containing an abstract of historical events for three months. Begun 1716, discontinued 1738. See 'Annual Register.'

History (The Father of). Herodotus, the Greek historian (B.C. 484–408).

History of Formosa (The), 1704. By George Psalmanasar, a Frenchman, who pretended to be a Japanese, and published an 'Historical and Geographical Description of Formosa, an island belonging to the empire of Japan.'

The real name of this literary impostor is not known. It seems that he was born in France in 1679, and died in London 3 May, 1763.

His'triomas'tix. A huge volume by William Prynne, of 1,000 pages, against the stage. He says 'theatres are the chapels of Satan, the players his ministers, and that their frequenters are rushing headlong into hell.' He not only denounces theatres, but also dancing, music, village sports, and even chanting in churches.

Hobbe (King). So Edward I. called Robert Bruce. In the statutes of Kilkenny (1367) the new arrivals from England were nicknamed 'English Hobbes.' (See Du Cange, art. 'Hobellarii.')

Equi quos Hobinos sive Hobbyes vocant ob mollem gressum.—Antiquitates Hibernicæ, p. 38.

Hohenstauffen (House of). The 3rd German dynasty: 1, the Saxon; 2, the House of Franconia. It gave five kings, viz. Konrad III., Friedrich I. (Barbarossa), Heinrich VI. the Cruel, Friedrich II. and Konrad IV.

Konrad III. was the son of Friedrich of Hohenstauffen, who was son-in-law of Heinrich IV.

On the death of Heinrich VI. there were three contemporary kings of Germany. As Friedrich his son was only two years old the Ghibelline barons elected Philip, and the Guelfic barons elected Otto (son of Heinrich the Lion); but as Friedrich had been created already 'king of the Romans,' or kaiser elect, of course the other two were usurpers.

Friedrich von Buren or Stauffen, born 1015, the founder of this house, lived in the castle of Hohenstauffen, and married the half-sister of Konrad II. kaiser-king of Germany.

Pronounce Ho-hen-stowf-fen.

Holding by the Straws. Similar to the old English custom of 'holding by the verge,' i.e. by a rod or stick handed to the tenant, whereby he is admitted into the occupation of a copyhold estate. There was at one time a large number of these symbolic transfers. Thus a clergyman was presented by one of the churchwardens with a sod from the churchyard, whereby the freehold was conferred on the clergyman so long as he remained incumbent of the parish.

Holland. Was an independent country from 863 to 1433; when Philippe of Burgundy united it to his vast estates. In 1477 Mary of Burgundy married Maximilian, and Holland, with many other estates, was united to Austria. After Karl V. it passed into the Spanish branch of the house, and in 1523, under the influence of Luther, it became Protestant. In 1579 Holland united with six other provinces in the 'Union of Utrecht,' threw off the Spanish yoke, and became a republic, called 'The Seven Provinces,' with William of Orange as stadtholder. In 1621 Holland was united to France. In 1806 it was erected into the kingdom of Holland by Napoleon I. and given to his brother Louis Bonaparte. In 1810 it was again united to France, but after the battle of Waterloo (1814) it was united to Belgium and formed 'The Kingdom of the Netherlands.' In 1830 Holland and Belgium were divided into two kingdoms, called the 'Kingdom of Holland' and the 'Kingdom of Belgium'; the king of Holland still calls himself the 'King of the Netherlands.' See 'Netherlands.'

Holland. One of the three districts of Lincolnshire. Where Boston stands used to be called 'High Holland.' The other two districts are Lindsey (the highest land) and Kesteven (the western part). 'Holland' is the south-eastern part or fen district. See 'Hallamshire.'

And for that part of me [Lincoln.], which men 'High Holland' call,
Where Boston seated is, by plenteous Wytham's fall . . .
No other tract of land doth like abundance yield.
DRAYTON, Polyolbion, XXV.

Holliglasses (buffoons). A word derived from Howle-glass = Eulen-spiegel, the famous jester, the hero of a popular German tale, translated into English in the time of Shakespeare.

Mr. Black, speaking of the council, called them holiglasses, cormorants, and men of no religion.—Sir W. SCOTT, Hist. of Scotland, XXXIX.

Holstein-Gottorp (The Dynasty of). I. SWEDEN. It succeeded that of Deux-ponts, and lasted from 1751 to 1818. Adolf Frederik was of the house of Holstein-Gottorp, and was pressed on the nation by Russia. It was in this reign that the factions of the Hats and Caps arose (q.v.).

II. Russia. The fourth dynasty, 1762 ——* It has given Peter III. (assassinated); Catherine II. his widow; Paul I. their son (assassinated); Alexander I.; Nicholas I., who died during the Crimean war; Alexander II. (assassinated in 1881); Alexander III.

Holy Alliance (The). I. 1511–1512. Not holy meaning pious and godly, but holy meaning in the temporal interest of the pope. In 1509 the pope (Julius II.) had joined the 'League of Cambray' (q.v.), the object of which was to seize Venetia and divide it between the leaguers. Louis XII., being first in the field, won the brilliant battle of Agnadello, by which Venice fell into his hands. The pope, being thus outwitted, formed a new league to oust Louis, but died the following year, 1513. The holy alliance consisted of the pope, Spain, Venice, and Switzerland.

II. In 1609, formed at Würzburg, in opposition to the Evangelical Alliance (q.v.) formed by Protestant states of Germany in 1608.

III. The alliance entered into 26 Sept., 1815, between the Czar of Russia, the Emperor of Austria, and the King of Prussia. It was agreed by the three contracting parties to pursue no policy in future which had not for its object the maintenance of christianity, justice, and peace. The three crowns contracted to stand fast to each other, and to suffer no other power to touch any portion of their respective dominions. France entered the alliance 26 Sept. It was under the strength of this alliance that Austria laid claim to Italy. England held aloof, feeling the scheme to be Utopian. Only think of Metternich, Talleyrand, and Castlereagh joining hands to bring peace on earth and good-will towards men. The inconsistency became a matter of ridicule, and fell powerless and abortive.

Holy Bread. Not the eucharist, which is a wafer in the Catholic Church, but bread brought to the church to be blessed by the officiating priest on Sundays and feast-days at the time of mass. The 'pain bénit' is distributed to the heads of families and taken home with them. The custom dates from 655, and was instituted by the great council of Nice. Du Cange (vol. v. p. 122) calls it 'Panis Beatus, eulogia, panis a sacerdote benedictione consecratus'; but panis beatus is not the synonym of Eulogia (q.v.).

Hallowed Bread would be a better translation of 'Panis Beatus' than Holy Bread.

Holy Brotherhood (The), or 'Santa Hermandad.' An association which executed summary justice on all offenders without distinction of rank. It was established in Spain by Ferdinand the Catholic for the suppression of highroad robbery (1481, 1516).

Holy Cities of the Islam (The Four). Jerusalem, Mecca, Medīna, and Damascus.

Holy Coat of Trèves (The). See 'Dict. of Phrase and Fable,' p. 411. Said to be spun from the wool of a lamb by the Virgin Mary, and woven in a grey coat by St. Helēna on the Mount of Olives. Christ wore it at the crucifixion. It came into the hands of a Jew, who threw it into the sea because the blood-stains would not wash out, and a whale swallowed it. The whale being caught by a fisherman, the grey coat found in its belly was sold for thirty pieces of silver to Orendel, son of Eygel, a Christian king of Trèves. Orendel deposited the coat in a stone coffin, where, being discovered, it became a venerable relic exhibited to the faithful every twenty-five years.

Holy Constitution (The), 'La Sainte Constitution,' 817. The division by Louis I. le Débonnaire of his kingdom between his three sons. Lothaire he associated with himself in the empire, to Pepin he gave the government of Aquitaine, and to Louis that of Bavaria.

Lothaire, associated with his father, was charged with the vice-royalty of Italy. This 'holy constitution' was certainly most impolitic, and proved to be an Iliad of woes.

Holy Days observed in the Catholic Church. Some are more or less observed in the Church of England, and used to be marked in the Book of Common Prayer either with red letters or italics. Sundays are not included in this list except they happen to be fête days. (Those without a date are movable.)

Holy Directing Synod (The). A college of bishops established in Russia by Peter the Great, having supreme control and judgment in all matters ecclesiastical. The only appeal from this synod was to the czar himself.

Holy Fair (The). A Scotch custom of celebrating the eucharist in the open air. Burns has a poem on the subject. This led to such immorality that it was abolished.

Holy Ghost (Knights of the).

I. A Neapolitan Order, instituted by Louis of Anjou, king of Naples, 1352.

II. A French Order, instituted 1198 at Montpellier by Comte Guy. In 1672 it was united to the Order of St. Lazarus.

III. A French military order instituted (1578) by Henri III., who was both born and crowned on Whitsunday. Ribbon, blue moiré. Abolished in 1789; re-established in 1815, and again abolished in 1830.

Holy Island. I. Lindisfarne, about eight miles from Berwick-upon-Tweed, in the German Sea. Once the see of the famous St. Cuthbert, but now in the bishopric of Durham.

II. Ireland was so called at one time from its numerous saints.

III. Guernsey was so called in the tenth century from the great number of monks residing there.

IV. Rügen was so called by the Slavonic Varini.

Holy League (The). I. 1511–1512. Between the pope (Julius II.), Ferdinand of Aragon, Venice, and Switzerland, against Louis XII., to dispossess him of Venice and drive him out of Italy. Louis now placed a formidable army under the command of Gaston de Foix, his nephew, who gained three victories over the league in as many months, viz. at Bologna, at Brescia, and at Ravenna. In this last victory Gaston de Foix was left dead on the field, and the success of Louis terminated.

II. 1565. The league of Bayonne (q.v.).

The Holy League was directed against Scotland as well as against other heretical nations, and how ready soever the Catholic princes might be to avenge the death of the Catholic Mary, they could not be supposed to entertain much zeal in the cause of the Protestant James.—Sir W. Scott, Hist. of Scotland, xxxvii.

III. 1576. The high Catholic party of France, taking umbrage at the 'Paix de Monsieur' (q.v.), which gave the Protestants the free exercise of their religion in every part of the kingdom except Paris, formed themselves into a 'Holy League' in defence of the 'Holy Catholic Church' against the encroachments of the Huguenots. The objects of the league were (1) to exterminate the Calvinists; (2) to shut up the king Henri III. in a monastery; and (3) to crown the duc de Guise. The pope gave it his sanction, but its true strength lay in Felipe II. of Spain, who supported it with both men and money.

Holy Maid of Kent (The). Elizabeth Barton of Aldington, Kent, a religious enthusiast, executed in the reign of Henry VIII. She entered the convent of St. Sepulchre, Canterbury, and was then called 'The Nun of Kent.' In 1531 the parish priest gave out that the nun was inspired. Elizabeth Barton raved against the divorce of Queen Katharine, and threatened the king with deposition and death. She was brought before the Star Chamber, condemned, and executed at Tyburn in 1534.

Holy Mother of the Russians. Moscow; celebrated before its destruction for its number of churches and religious houses.

Holy Mountain (The). Athos, called by the Franks Monte Santo, and by the Greeks Ἅγιον ὄρος, for its numerous monasteries, convents, chapels, and other sacred edifices. It is said that above 8,000 monks reside on Mount Athos. It rises abruptly from the sea to the height of 6,349 feet. (Almost a mile and a quarter.)

Holy Office (The). The examination and extermination of heretics by the Catholic Church. The Inquisition was so called. The Holy Office existed in A.D. 382, when Theodosius I. appointed inquisitors to search out and punish heretics, and the first person put to death by them was Priscillianus of Aragon in 385. The epoch of the modern Inquisition was 1203, when Innocent III. was pope; but 'the modern Spanish Inquisition' dated from 1480, was suppressed in 1813, restored by Ferdinand VI. in 1814, and finally suppressed in 1820.

Holy Peace (The), or 'Peace of God,' 1035. An agreement of the princes and barons to cease from feuds, spoliation, and wars of aggression.

The priests read from the churches daily after the gospel this bull: 'May they who refuse to obey be accursed, and have their portion with Cain the first murderer, with Judas the arch-traitor, and with Dathan and Abiram who went down alive into the pit. May they be accursed in the life which now is: and may their hope of salvation, like the light of these candles, be put out.' So saying the lights were put out, and the people said 'Amen.' In 1040 the Holy Peace was superseded by 'God's Truce' (q.v.).

Holy Roman Empire (The). The western part of the old Roman empire, which was severed from the eastern part in 800, and was given by the pope to Charlemagne, who was crowned 'Emperor of the Romans.' When Charlemagne's empire was divided, Ludwig the German became kaiser; but on the death of Karl the Fat the title fell into abeyance for 70 years. In 962 John XII. gave the title to Otto I. the Great, and changed it into 'The Holy Roman Empire.' Francis II. renounced the titles of king of the Romans and emperor of the Romans in 1806, and Napoleon added the Italian states to France 17 May, 1809.

Holy Sabbath (The). Sabbatum Sanctum, the Saturday next before Easter Sunday.

Holy Sea (The). Ἅγιον πέλαγος, the Archipelago. This is D'Anville's etymology (vol. i. p. 281). It is, however, as old as Æschylus and Plato. Vossius says Ἅγιος is a corruption of αἰγαῖος, and that the Dorians called the bounding waves αἶγες, goats. We call them horses.

The fifty islands of the Holy Sea.—GIBBON, chap. lili.

Holy Sepulchre (Defender and Baron of the). Godfrey, first Latin king of Jerusalem. He rejected the title of king, and refused to wear a diadem 'where Christ was crowned with thorns' (1061, 1099–1100).

Holy Sepulchre (Knights of the), 328. A military order founded by St. Helĕna on the discovery of the Holy Sepulchre. Revived by Godfrey of Bouillon 17 July, 1099, again by Baldwin in 1103, and confirmed 1114 by Pascal II.

Holy Union (The), 1609. A confederation organised at Würzburg of Roman Catholics against the Protestants.

The counter league was called the 'Evangelical Union,' which was formed in 1608.

Holy Wars (The). The Crusades.

Holy Week. The last seven days of Passion Week (q.v.), or the Great Week. It begins on Palm Sunday, and ends with Holy Saturday (the day preceding Easter Sunday). The 4th day is Spy Wednesday, the 5th Maundy Thursday, the 6th Good Friday, and the last Holy Saturday, or the Great Sabbath. See 'Hebdomada Major.'

Holy Week has been called the Silent Week (Hebdomada Muta), the Week of the Holy Passion (Hebdomada Passionis), the Vacant Week (Hebdomada Inofficiosa), the Penitential Week (Hebdomada Penitentialis); also Hebdomada Indulgentiæ, Hebdomada Luctuosa, Hebdomada Nigra, and Hebdomada Ultima.

Homage was either liege or simple. 'Liege homage' implied an obligation of service to the lord. 'Simple homage' was a mere symbol of feudal dependence. VILLARET, vol. xii. p. 82; vol. xv. p. 199. Abolished in England 1660 (12 Car. II. c. 24).

In liege homage the vassal, kneeling on both his knees, and placing his two hands between those of his lord, spoke thus: 'I confess myself your man from this day forward to life and limb, and to all earthly worship. Unto you will I be true and leal, and will bear you faith for the lands and tenements I shall hold of you.' Having thus said, the king (without rising from his seat) bent forwards and kissed him on the forehead and on both cheeks.

Homburg (Synod of), 1526. The First General Reformed Synod, preceding the Diet of Augsburg about four years. It was convened by the Landgraf of Hesse to consider an order for the conduct of worship in conformity with the new religious views. By order of this synod a commission of ecclesiastics and laymen was appointed to draw up a directory for Divine worship and Christian instruction on the base of Melanchthon's 'Book of Visitation,' which formed the 'First Confession of Faith' of the reformed church.

Home Rule Federation, 1884. 'The objects of the Home Rule Federation of Great Britain were to organise the Irish vote in the various constituencies of Great Britain, and to influence the elections by the Irish vote.' Hor Secretary Frank Hugh O'Donnell. Alfred Henry Ruegg counsel for O'Donnell in the 'Parnellism and Crime' libel case, 2 July 1888 (q.v.).

Home Rule League, 1870. Projected by Mr. Butt, who stoutly opposed the repeal of the Union, but agitated for an Irish parliament which should have no power to touch upon imperial matters, but should be empowered to deal with matters of Ireland of a purely local character. On the death of Mr. Butt in 1879 his scheme passed into the hands of the Land League, and their watchword 'Ireland for the Irish' meant separation from Great Britain. The term Home Rule survived the death of Mr. Butt, and in 1886 Mr. Gladstone, then prime minister, brought in a bill to give Ireland Home Rule, and exclude Irish members from Westminster. The measure broke up the great Whig party under the leadership of Lord Hartington, supported by Mr. Chamberlain (a Radical), Mr. Goschen, and others, who called themselves Unionists, and joined the great Tory party under the government of Lord Salisbury. See 'Irish Associations.'

Mr. Gladstone's measure was to give to Ireland 'effective self-government in affairs properly and exclusively Irish, subject to the supremacy of the Imperial parliament.' In fact, it was Mr. Butt's scheme.

'The objects of the Home Rule League were to obtain for Ireland the right and privilege of managing its own affairs by a parliament assembled in Ireland, and to secure for the Irish parliament the right of legislating and regulating all matters relating to the internal affairs of Ireland.'—ALFRED HENRY RUEGG, counsel for O'Donnell, July 2, 1888 ('Parnellism and Crime' libel case).

* Imperium in imperio is proverbially a dangerous hazard.

Homer, Homêros. Everyone knows that it is somewhat doubtful if Homêros is a proper name or not. It is said that the Iliad and Odyssey were not continuous poems by one man, but ancient lays welded together under the direction of Pisistrătos. It is not a little remarkable that the Greek word Homêros [ὅμηρος] means united or joined together. The great inequality of the poems has also been noticed by critics. Thus the interview between Priam and Achilles is admirable, but the death of Hector is contemptible, and the reconciliation of Agamemnon and Achilles, which ought to have exhibited magnanimity and generosity, is absolutely puerile.

Homer and Virgil of Portugal (The). Luis de Camoens (1522–1579), author of 'The Lusiads,' i.e. the Lusitanians or Portuguese; a poetic history of the people, the hero being Vasco da Gama.

The subject of the Lusiads resembles that of the Æneid, but bears no resemblance to the epics of Homer.

Homer (The British). Milton, 1608–1674.

No more the Grecian muse unrivalled reigns;
To Britain let the nations homage pay:
She felt a Homer's fire in Milton's strains,
A Pindar's rapture in the lyre of Gray.
Westminster Abbey (Gray's Monument).

Homer (The Keltic). Ossian, son of Fingal king of Morven.

Homer (The Oriental). Firdusi (940–1020). See below, 'Homer of Khorasan.'

Homer (The Prose). Henry Fielding the novelist, called by Byron 'The Prose Homer of Human Nature' (1707–1764).

Homer (The Scottish). William Wilkie, author of 'The Epigoniad' (1721–1772).

Homer of Ferra'ra (The). 'Omero Ferrarēsé.' Ariosto is so called by Tasso (1474–1533).

Homer of Khorasan (The). Abul Casim Firdusi (940–1020), author of 'Shâh Nâmeh,' an historical romance of the Kings of Persia (from Kayomurz to Yezdijird), begun by Dukiki, who was assassinated when he had written only 1,000 lines. It was the labour of 30 years.

The chief characters in this poem are Rustem (the Persian Achilles); Feridun, the model king; Zohak, the cruel and impious tyrant; Kavah the blacksmith, an intrepid patriot, whose leather apron, set with jewels, became the banner of the empire till it fell into the hands of Kudsiah. The poem runs to 120,000 lines. The characters are bold and various, the diction polished and noble, the narrative especially perspicuous, and individual parts are of surpassing beauty.

Homer of Modern Days (The). Sir Walter Scott (1771–1832).

Homer of Persia (The). Firdusi, 941–1020. See 'Homer of Khorasan.'

Homer of Philosophers (The). Plato (B.C. 429–347).

Homer of our Dramatic Poets. So Shakespeare (1564–1616) is called by Dryden.

Shakespeare was the Homer or father of our dramatic poets; Jonson was the Virgil. I admire rare Ben, but I love Shakespeare.—DRYDEN.

Homer of the Franks (The). Angilbert, who died 814, was so called by Charlemagne.

Homer of the French Drama. Pierre Corneille (1606–1684) is so called by Sir Walter Scott.

Homer the Younger. Philiscos of Corcȳra, one of the seven poets of Alexandria, who, in the reign of Ptolemy Philadelphos, formed the Tragic Pleiad.

His six contemporary poets were Lycophron, Theocritos, Arâtos, Nicander, Apollonios, and Callimachos.

Home'rides (4 syl.), ὁμηρίδης. Those poets who succeeded Homer and either followed his style or took analogous subjects to the Iliad and Odyssey. Also called 'Cyclic Poets' (q.v.).

Homerites (3 syl.). A people of ancient Arabia dwelling in Arabia Felix. Gibbon (ch. l.) says the first silk veil of the Caaba or temple of Mecca was an offering by a pious king of the Homerites 700 years before the birth of Mahomet.

Ho'meromas'tix. Zoïlos of Amphipŏlis (B.C. 259–336). So called for his caustic criticism on Homer.

Homilia'rium. A collection of homilies. Fifty homilies of the Venerable Bede in general use for a long time. The deacon Paul Warnefried, by the command of Charlemagne, compiled into a volume homilies for every Sunday in the year (8th cent.); it was printed at Speyer in 1482, and again at Cologne in 1557. A collection of English homilies in verse was composed in the 13th cent. It contained a sermon for every Sunday and every festival throughout the year. It is still extant in MS., and a part of it was published by Mr. Small, librarian to the University of Edinburgh. See 'Homilies.'

Homilies (The). Vol. i. (1547). On 'Salvation,' on 'Faith,' and on 'Good Works' are attributed to Cranmer; that on 'Brawling and Contention' is Latimer's, as appears by internal evidence; that on 'Adultery' is by Thomas Becon, one of Cranmer's chaplains; that on 'The Misery of Mankind' is ascribed to Bonner; of the rest nothing is known. Vol. ii. published 1562; thought to be by Bishop Jewell.

Some think Latimer was the author of the homilies on the 'Nativity' and on 'Whit Sunday.'

Homme du Lit de Fer (L'). Henri Eugène Philippe Louis d'Orléans fourth son of the Citizen King (Louis Philippe of France), born 1822, died *.

Pronounce Hom deh leed-fair.

Homœopathy (The Creator of). Hahnemann (1755–1843). That is, the art of curing diseases by medicines which in healthy bodies would produce like diseases. His motto is Similia similibus curantur, or 'Like cures like.'

Homoi'an theological party allied to the Arians, before 359, founded by Acacius, bishop of Cesarēa. These Christians were called 'Acacians,' from their founder.

Homoi-ousion means 'of a similar nature, essence, or state.' Homo-ousion (q.v.) means 'of equal essence or consubstantiate.' Applied to the nature of Christ, what is called the orthodox faith is that He is homo-ousios or consubstantiate with the Father. The semi-Arians maintain that He is only homoi-ousios or of similar essence, while strict Arians affirm He is neither one nor the other.

Arius declared that Jesus Christ might be homoi-ousios (of a similar nature) to the Father; but could not be homo-ousios (of the same substance).

Homo-ous'ion (The). Consubstantial, of the same nature. According to Aristotle, the stars are homo-ousian to each other; but the word is mainly connected with a theological controversy of the 4th cent. between Arius and Athanāsius. The Arians were homoi-ousians, the Athanasians were homo-ousians. That is, the Arians believed the nature of Jesus Christ to be god-like, but not divine; the Athanasians believed it to be very God of very God. As party words the 'orthodox' were homo-ousians, the non-orthodox were homoi-ousians.

Five times was Athanasius expelled from his (archiepiscopal) throne, and almost every province of the Roman empire was witness to his sufferings in the cause of Homo-ousion.—GIBBON, xxi.

Hone (William), 1817. The trial of William Hone for publishing parodies on Scripture or church subjects was, in reality, an attempt to put down the free expression of political opinions. His first trial was 18 Dec. before Mr. Justice Abbot, and the charge was that Hone had published parodies on the Catechism, the Lord's Prayer, and the Ten Commandments. Hone showed that the editor of 'Blackwood's Magazine' had parodied part of Ezekiel; that Martin Luther had parodied the 1st Psalm; that Bishop Latimer, Dr. Boys dean of Canterbury, the author of the 'Rolliad,' and Mr. Canning were parodists, but were never accused of blasphemy. The jury acquitted Hone. The second trial was on 19 Dec., before Lord Ellenborough, and the charge was a parody on the Litany. Hone followed the same line of defence and was again acquitted. The third trial was 20 Dec., for a parody on the Athanasian Creed. Hone showed that Lord Ellenborough's own father, the bishops Warburton and Tillotson, with hosts of others, dissented from this creed, and he was again acquitted. So ended this government attempt to gag the press.

There is but little wit and little worth in these literary trifles, which often offend against 'good taste'; but the trials were an outrage on the liberty of free thought.

Honest Lawyer (The). The tablet to Edward Trelawny, in Pelynt Church, ends with these two lines:—

Here lyes an honest lawyer, wot you what,
A thing for all the world to wonder at.
(Died 7 June, 1630).

In St. Dunstan's in the West is a tablet to Hobson Judkins 'the honest solicitor,' who died 30 June, 1812.

Honest Man (The). A man of Burton (name unknown), an agent in 1586 of Throckmorton, Gifford, and Walsingham, and spy upon Mary queen of Scots.

'The honest man' was in communication with the brewer who supplied the castle of Chartley with beer, and agreed to carry letters to and from Mary. Those intended for Mary were enclosed in a water-tight bottle, which floated inside the beer-cask; the answers were deposited in a hole in the castle wall, where they were covered by a loose stone. The brewer and 'the honest man' were both in the pay of Walsingham. The letters were all broken open and read, after which they were resealed and despatched to their address.—HOWITT, History of England, ii. p. 509, &c.

Honorary Canons and honorary prebends, 1838—that is, canons or prebends without any stipend—were created by what is called the 'Oxford Movement' (q.v.). 'Canon' is now used as an ordinary title of address, as 'Canon A or B,' and on letters 'The Rev. Canon A or B.' Each bishop has the power of conferring a certain number of these honorary titles to clergymen within his diocese. Generally four.

Hono'rians (The), A.D. 408. Barbarian auxiliaries in Gaul and Britain, consisting of two bands of Scots or Attacotti, two of Moors, two of Marcomanni, Ascarii, Gallicani, and Victores. So named from Honorius the emperor.

Honourable. The younger sons of earls, and all the children of viscounts and barons.

'The Right Honourable' is added to the title of peers and peeresses below a marquis. All the younger sons of dukes and marquises, all privy councillors and ex-privy councillors, all the three lord mayors (London, York, and Dublin) are so styled.

'The Most Honourable' is added to the title of a marquis and marchioness. Not 'Most Noble.'

Dukes and archbishops are styled 'His Grace,' and addressed as 'Your Grace.'

Honours of Scotland (The). The Scotch regalia, consisting of the crown, sceptre, and sword of state, regarded by the Scotch with superstitious veneration.

Honours of War (The). The privilege accorded to a garrison surrendering after a very brave defence. It permits them to carry away their arms, and in some cases to march out with drums beating and colours flying.

Honveds (The), or 'Defenders of home,' 1848–1849. Ten battalions of Hungarian insurgents who organised themselves for the defence of house and home.

Hoods. As a badge. Red hoods the party badge of Paris. Blue hoods the party badge of Navarre. Red and blue the party badge of Charles [V.] when dauphin. White hoods the party badge of the Burgundians.

Hook-and-Eye-ers. A branch of the strict Mennonites who split off from the general body in 1554. So called because they employed hooks-and-eyes in their dress instead of buttons. See Mennonites.

Hope Professorship (The) of Zoology, in Oxford University. Founded by the Rev. Frederick William Hope of Christ Church, 1861.

Hopkins Prize (The). For mathematico-physical or mathematico-experimental science. Founded in the University of Cambridge in memory of W.

Hopkins, and adjudged every three years. First adjudged in 1867.

Horace of France (The). Béranger (1780–1857). He was called 'The Poet of St. Honoré,' from the street in which he lived, and 'The French Burns.'

The English Horace. I. Ben Jonson (1574–1637) is so called by Dekker the dramatist.

II. Cowley (1618–1667) is preposterously called by George duke of Buckingham 'The Pindar, Horace, and Virgil of England.'

The French Horace. Jean Macrinus or Salmon (1490–1557).

The Portuguese Horace, Antonio Ferreira (1528–1569).

The Spanish Horace, Lupercio Argensŏla and also his brother Bartolome are both so called.

Horatius Cocles of the Horn. John Haring, who defended a dyke against 1,000 Spaniards, till all the men under the governor Sonoy, who were put to flight, had made good their escape. After which he threw himself into the sea and effected his escape untouched by either spear or gun.

Horatius Cocles of the Tyrol. Alexander Davy Dumas, father of the novelist. So called because in 1798, while in Dumouriez's army, he alone defended at Brixen the passage of a bridge on which depended the success of the day.

Horn Fair. An annual fair granted by Henry III. (1268) to Charlton in Kent, for three days, viz. the eve, the day, and the morrow of Trinity, for the sale of winding horns, horn cups, and other vessels or implements made of horn. This fair was abolished in 1872. At horn fair it was usual for all persons to wear some horn ornament, generally on the headgear.

Horned-Cattle Session (The), 1770. So called because the first and chief item of the king's speech was in allusion to a murrain among horned cattle, though questions of enormous magnitude required attention. Earl Chatham in his speech drew a dismal picture of the domestic condition and foreign relations of the country. By the abandonment of Prussia the nation was without an ally. The internal affairs were even worse. The people were partly starving and wholly murmuring. John Wilkes was invading the ancient institutions, Spitalfields was in semi-rebellion, Ireland was netted with Whiteboys, Cork-boys, Levellers, and Hearts of Steel; America was on the verge of war; and yet, as Junius says, the ministers make the king a half-ruined grazier rather than the monarch of a vast empire.

Horse decides who is to be king of Persia (A). Cambyses was followed on the throne of Persia by Smerdis the pretender, put forward by the Magi, but he was put to death by Otânês. Otânês then called a council of the chief men to determine on a successor, and agreed to meet on horseback at sunrise next morning, and he whose horse neighed first they agreed should be king. When Æbarês, the groom of Darius Hystaspès, heard this he took a mare to the spot the preceding evening, and showed it to his master's horse, which of course neighed next morning as soon as it came to the spot. So Darius was elected king.

Horsenails (Counting). By the City officers at Westminster Hall. 'Walter le Brun, farrier, in the Strand, was to have a piece of ground in the parish of St. Clement to place a forge there, for the nominal sum of 6 horseshoes. This rent was paid every year to the Exchequer . . . and it is still rendered at the Exchequer by the mayor and citizens of London, to whom in process of time the said piece of ground was granted' (Blount, 'Ancient Tenures,' 1815).

In the reign of Edward I. Walter Marescallus paid at the crucem lapideam six horseshoes with nails for a certain building which he held of the king in capite opposite the stone cross.
A similar entry occurs in the 15 Edw. II. &c.

Hospit'allers, or 'Knights Hospitallers,' or 'Knights of St. John of Jerulem,' or 'Knights of Malta,' 1050, established to protect pilgrims in the Holy Land. Confirmed by statute in 1118. They made themselves masters of the Isle of Rhodes in 1310, but were driven from the island by the Turks in 1522, and established themselves at Malta in 1530. Their dress is black, with a white cross of eight points. Established in England in 1100. Suppressed in England in 1540, in France 1792. Dispersed on the capture of Malta by Napoleon I. in 1798.

Called Hospitallers because they built at Jerusalem an hospital for the entertainment of pilgrims. The order still exists, and its flag is still seen in Mediterranean commerce.

Hospitallers of St. Lazarus, 1119. A religious military order established at Jerusalem by Crusaders, and confirmed, in 1255, by the Pope. Its special duty was to take charge of lepers. Introduced into France by Louis VII., but in 1490 united in Italy to the order of the Knights of Malta; in Savoy (1572) to the Knights of St. Maurice; and in France (1698) to the Knights of St. Michel. There were 100 chevaliers, who might both marry and hold property. Their medallion was a cross with eight points, alternately green and purple, and adorned with images of the Virgin Mary and St. Lazarus.

Hospitals and Asylums. We have mention of hospitals in Athens five centuries before the Christian era, and dispensaries long before that time supported by the state.

The Romans had public physicians at a very early date.

The ancient Mexicans had hospitals in all their principal cities.

India, however, seems to be the nursery of hospitals. King Asoka, B.C. 325, commanded that hospitals should be built for the poor, sick, and distressed, at each of the four gates of Patna, and throughout his whole empire. Fa Hian, a Chinese pilgrim (A.D. 400), says: 'The nobles and landlords founded hospitals for the poor in all places, and thither the poor, the cripple, and diseased might freely repair. They receive every kind of help gratuitously. Physicians attend to their diseases, and order them medicine, food, and drink, according to their judgment. Even when cured they may remain till it is convenient for them to retire.'

The first Christian hospital was built by a Roman lady named Fabiola, in the 4th cent.

In regard to asylums: The Egyptians and Greeks took charge of them in their temples. The Mohammedans built asylums for the insane at Fez in the 7th cent. The first Christian asylum was built at Valencia, in Spain, A.D. 1409.

Hospodar, 18th cent. The sovereigns of Walachia and of Moldavia. In 1391 the hospodar of Walachia fell into the dependence of the Turks, and in 1536 the hospodar of Moldavia did the same, and the sultan nominated the hospodar. In 1821 the hospodars were nominated by the boïards under the investiture of the Porte. In 1829 the Hospodar of the Danubian Principalities was appointed for life by the Treaty of Adrianople. Since 1861 these provinces have formed (with the Dobrudscha) the kingdom of Roumania.

Host of Israel (The), 1681. The armed Cameronians so styled themselves. They took up arms to dethrone Charles II. and set aside James his brother.

Hostings [of the lord deputies of Ireland]. Circuits or progresses for the display of military force in terrorem. They were more precautionary than hostile. In some a collision took place, but very many were mere displays or military progresses through the Pale (q.v.). Sometimes a hosting was made into the territory of a rebellious Irish chief.

Hot Gospeller (The). Edward Underhill of Worcestershire, an ardent Protestant, but yet a devoted partisan of Queen Mary.

Hot Potatoes, 1782. So the British sailors called the red-hot balls fired from Gibraltar into the combined French and Spanish fleet sent to take the Rock from the English. This magnificent defence by Gen. Elliot is wholly without a parallel in all history, and the humanity of Capt. Curtis, in saving 350 Spaniards at the peril of his life, is an achievement which every Englishman must be proud of.

The girl Campen, daughter of a Tyrolese tailor, sent with a load of hay while the Bavarians and French were fighting against Hofer, kept crying 'Come on! Come on with ye! Who cares for Bavarian dumplings?'

Hôtel Rambouillet (L'). Very influential soirées held at the château of Charles d'Angennes marquis of Rambouillet, who married (in 1600) Catherine de Vivonne. Their daughter was the celebrated Julie [i.e. Julie Lucie d'Angennes] who married the Duc de Montausier. It was Julie who presided over these soirées, which were attended by Mme. de Sévigné and Mme. de Lafayette.

Pronounce Lo-tel Rham-boo-yea.

Houghers, 1785. Irish Volunteers belonging to the 'Aggregate Bodies' (q.v.), who went about maiming the soldiers and other persons obnoxious to them. The platform was universal suffrage. The introduction of the question of Catholic disabilities broke up the associations, and, as Plowden says, 'they disappeared like a bubble on the face of a stream.' See 'Irish Associations.'

[Houghers, pronounce hok'-kers.

House of Congregation (The), in Oxford University, consists of all masters of arts and doctors of every faculty of less than two years' standing. Called Necessario Regentes. Heads of colleges, masters of schools, and deans of colleges are called Regentes ad placitum. Duties are almost entirely confined to granting degrees and the appointment of public examiners. In Cambridge University 'The Electoral Roll' corresponds in a great measure with the Oxford House of Congregation.

House of Convocation (The), in Oxford University, consists of all persons who have taken the degree of M.A. or of doctor, provided their names remain on the boards of their college. All the business of the university as a corporate body is transacted by Convocation, and no statute is binding till it has received the assent of this house. It also confers honorary degrees and degrees of diploma, affixes the common seal to all documents, and elects all offices in the gift of the university. No proposition of legislation originates in this house, nor can it amend any proposition submitted to it; it can only accept or reject. The Council of the Senate in Cambridge corresponds to the Oxford 'House of Convocation.'

House of Keys (The), in the Isle of Man, consists of twenty-four representatives formerly selected by their own body, vacancies being filled up by the House presenting to the governor 'two of the oldest and worthiest men of the land,' one of whom the governor nominates, and he takes office for life. But since 1866 they have been elected by the people (male and female freeholders voting).

The civil government of the island is vested in three estates: the king or queen in council, the governor and council, and the House of Keys. The latter two constitute a court of Tynwald. To the 'Keys' or wardens all doubtful and important matters of law are referred.

Houses of Parliament (The Burning of the), 16 Oct., 1834 (Will. IV.). Caused by overheating the flues with old tallies with which the fires were lighted.

Household Troops (The). Those troops whose especial duty it is to attend the sovereign and to guard the metropolis. They are the 1st and 2nd Life-guards, the Royal Horse-guards, and the three infantry regiments called the Grenadiers, the Coldstream Guards, and the Scots Fusiliers.

Howard (Sister). So Queen Caroline used to call Mrs. Howard (afterwards countess of Suffolk), mistress of George II. She even employed 'Sister Howard' at her toilet, and otherwise about her person.

Howard of Russia (The). John Venning.

Howard-Arundel Collection (The), 1831. In the MS. department of the British Museum, and consisting of about 600 volumes of interest in almost every branch of learning, especially connected with the history and language of our own country.

Hubert (Knights of St.), 1414. A military order of Bavaria founded by Guerhard duke of Juliers. Revived in 1709 by the Elector Palatine.

Hubertsburg (Treaty of), 15 Feb., 1763. A treaty of peace at the close of the Seven Years' war between the Kaiser, Prussia, and Saxony.

Hudson's Bay Company (1670). A corporation chartered by Charles II. It consisted at first of Prince Rupert and certain specified associates, who were invested with the absolute proprietorship of 'Rupert's Land,' which consisted of all the regions then discovered and hereafter to be discovered within the entrance of Hudson's Bay. The great traffic of the company was in beaver furs. In 1783 was formed the North-west Company of Montreal, which in 1821 coalesced with the Hudson's Bay Company. Surrendered to the crown in 1868, and ceded to the Dominion of Canada in 1869.

It still exists as a commercial corporation.

Hugh Wolf, or 'Hugh Lupus.' Hugh d'Avranches, a near relative of the Conqueror. His device was a wolf's head, and William gave to his kinsman almost all Cheshire.

Huguenots (U-gen-oze, g hard). Members of the reformed church of France, as Protestants are members of the reformed church of Germany, England, America, and other countries. The Huguenots are called 'French Calvinists.'

Les uns font dériver ce nom d'un certain Hugues [Hugon], chef d'un parti religieux et politique à Genève; les autres, avec plus de raison, de l'allemand Eidgenossen (associés par serment), nom donné d'abord aux habitants de Genève soulevés et ligués contre le duc de Savoie.—BOUILLET.

Another derivation is Hugon, a gate in Tours, near which, it is said, the Huguenots assembled. 'Les huguenots avoient pris leur nom à cause de la tour Hugon [in Tours] où ils s'assemblaient.'—D'AUBIGNÉ, Hist. 1. 96.

Hul'sean Lecturer or Christian Preacher (The). In the University of Cambridge, 1789, established by the Rev. John Hulse of St. John's College. The subject to be on the evidence for revealed religion and exegesis of obscure texts. Four sermons.

Hul'sean Prize (The). For an essay on miracles for any member of the University of Cambridge under the degree of M.A. Value between 70*l.* and 80*l.* annually. Founded by the Rev. John Hulse of St. John's College, 1789. See 'Reg. Prof. of Divinity.'

Hul'sean Professor of Divinity (The). In the University of Cambridge, 1728. So called because it was endowed by eight-tenths of 1,000*l.* left by the Rev. John Hulse of St. John's College. The professor must print and publish six lectures in the course of every six years. Till 1860 the Hulsean Professor was called the Christian Advocate. See 'Regius Professorship of Divinity.'

The 1,000*l.* has to be divided thus: one part to maintain two scholars at St. John's College; another part to found a prize for dissertation; a third part to support the office of Christian Advocate; and the fourth part to support the Hulsean Lecturer or Christian Preacher.

Hu'manists, 16th cent. A literary set which devoted themselves to the cultivation of classical literature (litĕræ humanĭores). They not only set themselves in opposition to classical professors, they also wanted to reform theology.

Humanita'rians. I. Those Christians who deny the divinity of Christ.

The primitive Ebionites (4 syl.) and the Cerinthians were Humanitarians, but not the Arians.

II. The disciples of St. Simon, who believe in the perfectibility of human nature, and ignore the dependence of man upon supernatural aid.

Humanity Martin. Richard Martin, of Ballinabench Castle, M.P. for Galway, so called from the Martin Act (1822) for the prevention of cruelty to animals (1754–).

If all had been like me, in fact,
There'd been no need for Martin's Act.
If I had a donkey that wouldn't go.

Humble Petition and Advice (The), 1656. A petition from parliament entreating the lord protector to take a royal title. A blank was left in the petition for the exact designation, which was ultimately filled up with the word 'Protector.'

Humble Representation (The), 1647. After Charles I. fell into the hands of Cornet Joyce, the army presented to the parliament an 'humble representation,' stating: 'We desire a settlement of the peace of the kingdom, and of the liberties of the subjects. We desire no change in the civil government, but we demand toleration in religion. We demand the repeal of all acts enforcing the use of the prayer-book, attendance at church, and the enforcement of the covenant. We ask for triennial parliaments, the reform of the franchise, and the readjustment of taxes.' These petitions, with a simplification of law proceedings, constituted the 'Humble Representation.' Charles, however, resisted.

Hume, Mr. Hume's motion carried without a division, 16 Oct., 1834, by the utter destruction of the two houses of parliament by fire. Mr. Hume had been noted for his efforts to get rid of the old houses, and to have new ones more worthy of the British Legislature.

Humiles (Ordre des), 1134. A religious confraternity of both sexes, founded at Milan by St. John of Meda. It was in a great measure of the Benedictine rule, but had its own badge. Suppressed in 1571.

Hundred (A.) A county division mentioned in Domesday Book, and generally supposed to include a hundred families. Northumberland, Cumberland, Westmoreland, and Durham are not subdivided into hundreds, but wards; Yorkshire, Lincolnshire, and Nottinghamshire are subdivided into wapentakes. Yorkshire is likewise divided into three parts, called Ridings. Kent is divided into five laths, and these laths into sixty-three hundreds. Sussex is divided into six rapes, with subordinate hundreds.

Hundred Days (The). From 29 March to 22 June, A.D. 1815. From the time that Napoleon quitted Elba (breaking his parole) to his abdication.

In this period occurred the battle of Ligny (16 June); the battle of Quatre Bras (16 June); and the battle of Waterloo (18 June).

Hundred Grievances of Germany (The), 1522. Presented to Pope Adrian VI. by the Diet of Nuremberg. During the contention between Luther and the pope, Adrian sent a brieve to the Diet of Nuremberg, calling on the princes of Germany to stamp out the plague of heresy. The diet, in reply, sent to the pope a memorial of a 'hundred grievances' which they besought the holy father to redress, and that too without delay, as the nation neither could nor would endure them any longer.

Hundred Isles (The). Venice.

Hundred Years War (The), 1336–1431. Between England and France. From Edward III. to Joan of Arc. The origin of this long war was Edward's claim to the crown of France. Philippe le Bel left three sons, all of whom died without male issue, and the nearest male heirs were Edward III. (who was the nephew of the three sons), and Philippe de Valois (who was their cousin). The flaw in Edward's claim is the Salic law, which passed over women, and Edward owed his blood relationship to his mother. Edward maintained that, though his mother was cut off, being a woman, the Salic law could not apply to him, being a man; but Philippe answered, if the mother was cut off, the son was cut off also. On this dispute began the war which lasted above a century.

Hun'dreders. The impanelling of 'hundredors' on juries in civil actions abolished 1705 (4, 5 Anne c. 16).

Hung, Drawn, and Quartered. The punishment of traitors. It is an error to suppose that 'drawn' means dragged on a hurdle by a horse to the place of execution. It means disembowelled. The first instance in English history is that of David the Welsh prince, 20 Sept., 1283. He was 'hung' for causing the murder of the knights in Hawarden Castle; he was 'drawn' because he had profaned Palm Sunday by committing the murder on that day; he was 'quartered' for conspiring against the king (Edward I.). This was the precedent in cases of high treason.

It is misleading and a falsifying of history to re verse these words into 'drawn, hung, and quartered,' as some historians do, to intimate that 'drawn' means dragged on a hurdle to execution.

Hungarian Anjous (The). Succeeded the Arpad dynasty. Charles Robert was the founder (1309–1342), Louis the Great his son (1342–1382), and Sigismund, in virtue of his wife (1386–1437). Succeeded by the house of Hapsburg.

Sigismund or Siegmund was king of Hungary, king of Bohemia, and kaiser-king of Germany. He will always be remembered for violating his royal word of safe-conduct, and afterwards assenting to the martyrdom of Huss and Jerome of Prague.

Hungarian Compromise (The), Feb. 1868. Providing the new army organisation.

Hungarian National Anthem. Rakolski's March.

Hungarian Revolution (The), 1848–1849. Under Kossuth. Kossuth resigned 11 Aug., 1849.

8 June, 1867, Francis Joseph of Austria was crowned king of Hungary.

Hungarian Sea (The). Lake Balaton, forty-seven miles long and nineteen miles wide. Famous for the savoury fogas fish.

Huns (The). A people driven out of China by Vou-ti (i.e. Hiong-nu). Many left the steppes of Tartary, and made their way to the Caspian Sea. A part, crossing the Caucasus, came into collision with the Eastern Goths in A.D. 375.

Hunter's Mass. Missa Venatica.' Celebrated very early in the morning for those about to spend the day in hunting, hawking, or the chase. A greatly shortened mass, gabbled over as fast as possible.

Hunter's Moon. The moon next after the harvest moon, where, as in 'honey-moon,' the word 'moon' stands for month. The harvest moon is that immediately before the vernal equinox, and the hunter's moon that which follows after the vernal equinox. The harvest being over, hunting may begin.

Hurricane (The). Comte de Mirabeau (1749–1791). Also called 'the Demosthenês of France,' from the overpowering force of his eloquence. He was so corpulent that he was jocosely called the Tub.

Huss (John), 1376, 1415. The great charge against Huss was his insistence on faith. 'Faith, not in the Virgin, not in the saints, nor yet in the pope, nor in baptism, nor in holy water and oil, but in Christ.' He was burnt alive by order of the Council of Constance, though the kaiser himself (Siegmund) had given him safe conduct. 'I came here' (he said to the council) 'under the public faith of the kaiser, here present.' In so saying he fixed his eyes on Siegmund, 'who blushed scarlet at the just but unexpected rebuke.'

Hussite War (The), 1419–1436. Siegmund was elected kaiser 1410, and in 1415–1416 Huss and Jerome were burnt to death. The Hussites were indignant that the kaiser should have pledged his royal word for the safety of Huss and Jerome, and yet should have presided at the council which condemned them both to death. In 1419 they put themselves under Ziska the One-eyed and prepared for war. Siegmund also prepared to put down the insurgents, but was defeated over and over again. Ziska died in 1424, and Procop (both the elder and the younger) led the insurgent Bohemians, and no longer stood on the defensive, but carried the war beyond the boundaries of Bohemia with wonderful success; but at the death of the two leaders peace was made, and Siegmund acknowledged king of Bohemia (1437).

The Hussites' platform was: (1) Freedom to preach the gospel; (2) administration of the eucharist in both kinds to laity as well as clergy; (3) prohibition to the clergy to follow secular pursuits; and (4) submission of the clergy to the civil power. Their symbol was a chalice. The more moderate were called 'Calixtines' (3 syl.), and the more extreme 'Taborites' (3 syl.).

Hussites (2 syl.). Followers of John Huss of Bohemia (1376–1415), who was condemned to be burnt alive by the Council of Constance. He was a Wycliffite of most unimpeachable character, and his murder is one of the blackest stains in the history of the Roman Catholic Church.

Hutcheso'nians, 1729. Followers of Dr. Francis Hutcheson, whose 'System of Moral Philosophy' was based on the ethical notions of Lord Shaftesbury. He deduces all our moral ideas from an innate moral sense, or instinct, which leads us to perform certain acts and to avoid others.

Dr. Hutcheson, professor of philosophy at Glasgow, died 1747, aged 53.

Hutchinsonianism, 1724. The doctrines of John Hutchinson of Yorkshire, author of 'Moses' Principia,' in which he defends the Mosaic cosmogony and assails Newton's 'Principia.' He maintained that the Holy Scripture is the only divine revelation of true religion and true science, and that all science not in conformity with Scripture is 'philosophy falsely so called.' He substitutes 'a plenum and air' for Newton's 'vacuum and gravity.'

John Hutchinson must not be confounded with Dr. Francis Hutcheson.

He said that the air from the earth to the sun grew more and more rarefied till it became pure light; but from the sun to the fixed stars it grew denser and denser, till it stagnated into 'outer darkness,' the very 'blackness of darkness.'

Hutin (Louis X. of France, 1314–1316) means 'headstrong' or 'obstinate,' but applied to Louis it was a mere pun. He was sent by his father against the Hutins, a seditious set of people of Navarre and Lyons, and this expedition gained for him the sobriquet.

Hydro-parasta'tæ, or 'Aquarii.' The followers of Tatian (born 130), who forbade the use of wine even in the eucharist. (Greek, ὕδωρ, water; παρίστημι, I present.)

Hyksos (The), or Shepherd Kings of Lower Egypt. A race of Arabs which invaded ancient Egypt, and continued dominant, according to Manĕtho, for 500 years, but according to others about half that time (B.C. 1842–1591). They formed or were contemporary with the 15th, 16th, and 17th dynasties of Upper Egypt. Amŏsis drove them out and established the 18th dynasty in Thebais, contemporary with the 19th and 20th. They were driven from the Thebais by Totmosis or Thotmosis, but continued to hold certain cantons of Egypt long afterwards.

It is supposed that Abraham went to Egypt in B.C. 1806, while the 16th dynasty was regnant; and that Joseph was viceroy about B.C. 1718, in the same dynasty. (Hyk=king, Sos=shepherd.)

Hylo-idealism, 1883. A system thought out by Dr. Lewins, and given to the world in 1882–1883. It is not idealism, but objective or hylo-idealism. The fundamental principle is this: Objects or objective phenomena must be made subjective or mental concepts before they are cognisable. The object is the stimulus and the perceiving brain the response. The two are like the two clocks of a telegraphic wire. The object works one clock, sends it to the brain, and the brain works the other clock. If either clock is out of order, or the telegraphic wire is broken, no message is received, and the objective world is cut off from all cognisance or even existence as far as the person in question is concerned.

Hymnus S. Mariæ, i.e. the 'Magnificat.'

Hymnus S. Trinitatis. In Latin: 'Sanctus Deus, Sanctus fortis, Sanctus immortalis, miserere nobis.' In Greek: Ἅγιος ὁ θεός, Ἅγιος ἰσχυρός, Ἅγιος ἀθάνατος, ἐλέησον ἡμᾶς.

Hypapanti (Greek, ὑπαπαντή, a meeting together). It means the meeting of Christ in the Temple by Simeon and Anna, who had long waited for Him. The Feast of Purification is called 'Festum Hypapanti,' 'Festum S. Simeonis,' 'Festum Purgationis Mariæ Virginis,' or 'Festum Luminum.'

'Hypapanti' is barbarous Greek, and undeclinable.

Hypos'tasis, in divinity, means 'person'; as the Trinity has one essence or nature, but three hypostases or persons.

'Person' is not a good word, as it is so closely allied to a phenomenon, whereas hypostasis is mere noumenon without phenomenon. The basis or substratum of personality. The plural is 'hypostases.'

Hypostat'ic Union (An). A union of two or more natures so intimate as to constitute one person. Thus the union of man and God in Christ is an hypostatic union.

The Nestorians held that the union of humanity and Deity in Christ was a mere moral union, and not an hypostatic one.

Hypothetical Universalism. A doctrine taught by Moïse Amyraut (1596–1664), professor of Saumur: that the death of Jesus Christ was sufficient for all men, but efficacious for the elect only.

Iambic Poets of Greece (The). The three principal were Archilŏchos of Paros (B.C. 710–690), inventor of iambic verse, and father of satire; only a few fragments are extant. Simonidēs of Samos (flourished B.C. 660); the chief fragment extant is a satire on women. He says a slattern has something of the swine in her composition; a cunning woman something of the fox; a stupid one shares her nature with the ass, the headstrong with the weasel, the vain with the horse, the malicious with the monkey, &c. The third of this class of poets was Hippōnax of Ephesus (B.C. 566–520), father of parody and burlesque.

The latter Iambic poets were Nicander (B.C. 200–120), and Meleāger of Gadăra (B.C. 135–60), who wrote 130 epigrams and a collection of poems called 'The Garland,' which no longer exists.

Simonidēs of Ceos (B.C. 566–520), the great lyric poet, was quite another person.

Ibe'ria. The Latin name of Spain, the people dwelling about the river Ibārus (i.e. the Ebro).

Ica'rians. The colonists led by Cabet, a French communist (1788–1856), to Icaria, in Iowa, with a view of forming them into a model community. In this community there is no money, no buying and selling, but all work for the community, and all are provided by the community with everything required. All manufactures and industries are national property, and the executive determines what each individual is to do. In regard to religion all worship the 'unknown God,' but there are no creeds, ceremonies, or rites.

Edward Bellamy of America has a novel called 'Looking Backward' which embodies this idea.

Ich Dien (I serve). The motto chosen by the Black Prince when he was knighted by his father after the battle of Crécy. (1) It was the motto of the king of Bohemia, who fell in battle by the hand of the young prince, and served to commemorate that achievement; (2) the prince had just been made his father's 'man' by knighthood, and no words could better express his acknowledgment of service and duty to his liege lord.

Pronounce Eek-deen.

Icil'ian Law (The), B.C. 454. A law for the parcelling out the Aventine Hill among the plebeians of old Rome, proposed by Lucius Icilius the tribune.

Here the people lived in flats without any ground rent.

Icoglans. Children who attend the sultan as pages.

Ico'nia (The). A sacred ensign of the emperors of Constantinople. It consisted of a tall pole surmounted by a cross, from which, attached to a cross-bar, hung a large flag with a Latin cross. On another cross-bar on one end hung the Virgin Mary with several relics; to the opposite end a string was attached, and held in the hand of some ecclesiastic. Amongst the relics were a piece of the lance which pierced the side of the Saviour, and a tooth shed by him in childhood. It first belonged to the Cistercians, fell into the hands of the Venetians in 1204, and was then deposited in the treasury of St. Mark.

Icon'oclasts, or 'Image Breakers,' A.D. 485. A religious sect which considered crucifixes, images of saints, statues, and pictures in Christian churches as idolatrous, and went about destroying them. They became very active in the 8th cent. under Leo the Isaurian. Iconoclasts were condemned by the Councils of Constantinople held in 786, 806, 809, 812, 814, but these judgments were reversed in 815. They were again condemned in the Councils held in 842, 847, and 870. The Lombards were strenuous opposers of images and pictures in churches.

'Iconoclast' is εἰκών (image), κλάω (I break).

Iconodu'li (The). Those who advocated and reverenced images and pictures in churches. Those who broke them and discarded them were called Iconoclasts (6th and 7th cents.). See 'Iconolatrists.'

Εἰκών (image), δουλεία (an inferior reverence paid to saints, images, and relics, in opposition to λατρεία).

Iconolatrists. Worshippers of images. Applied to those Christians who admit crucifixes, material symbols of deity, and pictures into churches and houses, either for direct adoration, as aids to religion, or as 'outward visible signs of an inward invisible faith.' Iconoclasts, or image-breakers, were those Christians who opposed iconol'atry, and broke to pieces all such material symbols in churches, &c. See 'Iconduli.'

Idæan Boy (The), or Idæus Puer. Ganymede is so called because it was from Mount Ida, in Asia Minor, that Zeus or Jupiter seized on him and carried him to Olympus to be his cup-bearer.

Idæan Dactyls (The). Mythical priests and priestesses of Cybĕlê, and said to have been the original discoverers of iron. Called Idæan from Mount Ida, in Asia Minor, their hypothetical seat; and Dactyls, or fingers, because they were ten in number (five males and five females).

Idæan Judge (The), or Idæus Judex. Paris, who decided from Mount Gargărus, a part of Ida, between the rival claims of Juno, Minerva, and Venus. All the goddesses offered bribes to influence the award, which the shepherd gave in favour of Venus. Cicero calls Paris the 'Idæan Shepherd' (Idæus Pastor).

These 'dactyls,' like the 'Idæan Boy' and 'Idæan Judge,' belong more to mythology than to history, as we now understand the word.

Idealism. Two different systems of philosophy are so called:—

I. A system which considers absolutes or universals as subjective realities. Thus white, black, tree, &c., were supposed to have a subjective existence independent of any special object. Plato is the exponent of this system, supported in modern times by Malebranche, Kant, Schelling, Hegel, and others.

II. Those who deny the reality of the world, and maintain that everything is only an idea; or at any rate, so far as any individual is concerned, that his senses make his world, and if he had no senses there would be, to him at least, no external world. Bishop Berkeley, Hume, Fichte, &c. were exponents of this system.

Idle Bible (The), 1809. In which the 'idol shepherd' (Zech. xi. 17) is translated 'idle shepherd,' in the new version 'worthless shepherd,' which does not mean the same thing. An idol is a counterfeit, and an 'idol shepherd' is a counterfeit or false shepherd, who sets up himself for his people's adoration, and not God. The Pharisees of old, who did their good deeds to be seen of men, were 'idle shepherds.' See 'Bible.'

The Hebrew word is of ambiguous meaning.

Ignatian Controversy (The). Whether the Epistles ascribed to Ignatius, who died 115, are genuine and authentic. This is very important, as these writings are the battle-ground of Episcopalians and Presbyterians. They favour the hierarchical system, and therefore are strenuously defended by Episcopalians, but the present opinion of scholars such as Daillé, Semler, Hermann, Ernesti, Neander, &c., is that much is spurious, and the rest has been greatly tampered with. See 'Literary Forgeries.'

The works of Ignatius are a Liturgy, a little book called Didaché (quoted by Chrysostom), and 15 epistles (12 in Greek and 3 in Latin). The 7 following epistles—to the Ephesians, Magnesians, Philadelphians, Trallians, Smyrnæans, Romans, and to Polycarp—were long accepted as genuine and authentic, but are now suspected. Bunsen thinks three may be accepted, but condemns the rest. Probably all have been interpolated. It is a very sad thing, but too true, that no church literature which passed through the hands of the monks can be relied on.

Ignora'mus Jury (An). A grand jury was so called because they wrote Ignoramus instead of 'no true bill,' when sufficient evidence was wanting to send the case to the common jury.

If you find that anything proceeds from malice . . . you may acquit the person that is so wrongfully prosecuted, and so . . . an Ignoramus jury may be of no use.—Judge Allibon's charge at the Croydon Assizes in 1688.

Ignoran'tines (4 syl.). The 'Congregation of the Ignorantines' was founded in 1724 in France by the Abbé de la Salle (1 syl.). It was suppressed in 1789, but re-established by Napoleon in 1806.

Ik'shidites (3 syl.), 933–968. A dynasty of califs ruling in Syria and Egypt founded by Abubekr Mohammed Ikshid, a Turkish slave.

Il Regno. The half-mocking name of the kingdom of Naples. It was so called for centuries by all the republics of Italy.

Il'derim (lightning). So Bayazid I. of Turkey was called from the extreme rapidity with which he executed all his designs. He reigned 1389–1403.

Île du Palais (L'). The larger of the two little aits or islets in the river Seine (Paris); the smaller one is called L'Île St. Louis, the two are connected by the Pont de la Cité. The Île du Palais for many centuries constituted the whole city of Paris. Here a tribe of the Celtic Gauls, called the Parisii, built their mud huts o' a circular form, and thatched them with reeds from the river. Here Clovis built his palace, and here the kings of France resided up to the time of Philippe II. Auguste (1180–1223), who resided in the old Louvre. The palace of Clovis was converted by Charles V. into the Palais de Justice. Notre Dame de Paris stands on the Île du Palais, or cité.

Île du Palais is so called because of the palace built there by Clovis, and used by the early kings of France.

Iliad (The l'rench). The 'Roman de la Rose' (q.v.) by Guillaume de Lorris (1235–1265). A 'continuation' was subsequently added by Jehan de Meung (1260–1318).

One might just as well call the 'Faëry Queen' an Iliad. The 'Romance of the Rose' is a love allegory in verse: The Rose is the poet's lady-love, and the subject matter is the course of true love does not run smoothly. Fully described in the 'Reader's Handbook,' p. 842.

The 'Chanson de Roland,' containing upwards of 1,500 verses, is called the 'Iliad of France.'

Iliad (The German). The Nibelungen Lied, 1210.

The plot and tale of this epic are fully described in the 'Reader's Handbook,' p. 684.

Iliad (The Portuguese). The 'Lusiads' by Camoens. Fully described in the 'Reader's Handbook,' p. 580.

Iliad (The Scotch). The Epigoniad, by William Wilkie. Fully described in the 'Reader's Handbook,' p. 297.

Ilkha'nian Tables (The), 13th cent. The astronomical tables and observations of Nazir Eddin, the great Persian astronomer, in the reign of Houlagou Khan, son of Ghengis Khan, who reigned 1259–1265. Nazir Eddin lived 1201–1274.

Hassan Bouzrûk Ilkani did not found the Ilkanian dynasty till 1336, sixty-two years after the death of Nazir Eddin.

Ilkha'nians (The). A Mogul dynasty of Persia, founded by Hassan Bouzrûk, or Ilek-khan, who made Bagdad his capital. His dynasty only lasted 65 years (1336–1401), when it was overthrown by Tamerlane.

Illinois (U. S. America). So called, in 1809, from an Indian tribe of that name. The natives are nicknamed 'Suckers.' Discovered by the French in 1670; ceded to England in 1763; and admitted as a state of the Union in 1818.

Illiterate Parliament (The), 1404. From which all lawyers were excluded. See 'Parliaments.'

It advised the king, Henry IV. to seize the revenues of the clergy, which were more than one-third of all the land of England, and to repeal the statute 'De Hæretico Comburendo': but the king feared to offend the clergy.

Illuminated Doctor (The). 'Doctor Illumināt us,' or 'Most Enlightened Doctor.' Raymond Lully, born in Majorca (1234–1315). He entered the Franciscan order, and set himself to convert the Moslems, was stoned at Bugia [in Algeria], and supposed to be dead (30 June, 1315). Some looked on him as a saint, others considered him 'un insensé et un hérétique.'

He was the best chemist of his age, but spent his time in searching for the philosopher's stone by distillation.

Illuminati (The), 16th cent. A religious sect, founded by Jacob Boehmen, or Boehm, a shoemaker of Lusatia. He averred that he was often carried up to heaven, like the Apostle Paul. Swedenborgians and Quietists were in a great measure 'Illuminati'; that is, they professed to have an inner light which illuminated them. See 'Martinists,' 'Guerinets,' and 'Alombrados.' Also next article.

Illumina'tists (The), or The Society of Illuminatists,' 1776. A secret society founded by Dr. Adam Weishaupt, professor of canon law at Ingolstadt, his avowed aim being 'to illuminate the world with a higher philosophy.' This society was joined by Mesmer, Cagliostro, Condorcet, the Duc d'Orléans, Mirabeau, and the Abbé Sieyès. The real objects were to crush priestly intolerance and superstition, to stamp out feudalism, and to limit regal authority to the popular will. In a word, the 'Illuminatists' were the midwives of the first French Revolution, though, without doubt, the revolution far outran their programme. Suppressed in 1785.

Also called 'Illuminăti.'

Illyr'ian Conservatives (The), 19th cent. The Croatian party which sought the establishment of an independent Slav nationality (about 1847).

Illyr'ian Provinces (The), 1809. So named by Napoleon's decree. They consisted of Carinthia, Carniōla, Istria, Austrian Friūli, the Hungarian littoral, and Southern Croatia. In 1810 it was augmented; but after the battle of Waterloo (1815) the provinces were restored to Austria by the Congress of Vienna, and, in 1849, were subdivided into duchies and counties.

Image Worship, introduced into Christian churches, was condemned by the Council of Illiběris (Elvira in Granāda) between 300 and 305. Calif Yezid II. in 723 commanded the destruction of all 'religious' images. See 'Iconoclasts.'

Images were denounced in Germany by Carlstadt in 1522.

In Switzerland by Zwingle in 1523, and removed from the churches of Zürich.

In England by act of parliament 1549, and removed from all churches in England.

In Austria by Joseph II., 1782. See 'Iconduli' and 'Iconolatrists.'

In the Second Council of Nice, 787, a distinction was drawn between latreia (worship) and douleia (reverence). The adoration of God is latreia, the reverence paid to images and saints is douleia.

Imam, or 'Imaum.' The chief supreme of the Moslem faith. The Sunnites, or orthodox Moslims, use the title of 'Imam' as a synonym of calif, their spiritual and temporal head; but the Shiites maintain that the true Imam was Ali, son-in-law of Mohammed, and his direct descendants: as Ali, Hassan, Hussein [sons of Ali], Ali-Seinolabiddin, Mohammed-Bakr, Giafar-el-Sadic, and Ismael, who died 730, leaving an infant son, named Mohammed, who was set aside for his uncle Mousa. This departure created a new schism. Those who followed the direct line called themselves Ismaelites, who separated from the Shiites or followers of Mousa. The Ismaelites maintain that Mohammed, one of these days, will manifest himself, but till then they will acknowledge no one as Imam.

The ordinary ministers of the Moslims are called 'Imams.' In Arabia certain chiefs are entitled Imams, and their territory an Imamat. See 'Mahdi.'

Imaum'ians (The). One of the numerous Shiite sects. They insist that the chief point of religious observance is to distinguish who is the true imaum or head of the Mohammedan Church. The people have no will in the matter. See 'Imam,' 'Khallabians,' 'Zeyds.'

Immaculate Conception (The Religionists of the). Were a branch of the Franciscans, founded in Toledo, in 1484, by the venerable Beatrice of Sylva. They followed the rule of the Clarisses, with certain mitigations.

Immaculate Conceptionists. See under 'Franciscans.'

Immortal Principles of 1789 (The). So the French denominate the principles enunciated by the Constituent Assembly in their Declaration of Rights (q.v.), 'Déclaration des droits de l'homme et du citoyen,' 1 Oct. 1789. The chief were equal taxation for all classes; equal eligibility of all citizens to hold office in the state; unrestricted liberty to all.

As principles, these are anything but immortal. A tax of 4*s.* in the pound to all alike would be anything but equality of taxation. To a man who earns a pound a week it is a fifth of his earnings, to another who earns 40*s.* a week, it is a tenth part. To one who earns 4*l.* a week it is only a twentieth part, and so on. Equal objection lies against the other two 'immortal principles,' which would be more correctly denominated 'mortal folly.'

Impannation, i.e. 'consubstantiation.' Luther taught that the bread of the eucharist remained bread after consecration; but that by consecration the body of Christ was imparted to the bread, so that the communicants ate both bread and Christ at one and the same time. Catholics maintain that the bread is transmuted, and no longer remains bread at all. Most Protestants believe that no change takes place in the bread by consecration, but being devoted to God, like a church, it cannot be used for secular or ordinary purposes.

Krauth, in his 'Conservative Reformation,' affirms that Luther entertained the same views as the High Anglican party.

Imperial Chamber (The), 1495. The first law-court established in Germany. Instead of settling differences by the sword, the barons were commanded by the Diet of Augsburg (1495) to submit their grievances to the Imperial Chamber, which consisted of a president named by the crown, four judges, and fifty assessors.

The Aulic Council was instituted to prepare matters for the Council; but in 1654 the Aulic Council was recognised as equal to the Imperial Chamber.

Imperial Federation League (The), 28 July, 1884. For securing a permanent unity of the United Kingdom and its colonies.

Imperial Free Cities, in feudal times, were those built on the royal demesnes. In Germany they owed their origin to Heinrich I. (the Fowler), who granted them special privileges. See 'Church Cities' and 'Ducal Towns.'

No one could open a shop in these towns without a licence, which was never granted to any except 'free burghers.' Those who were not town-free could only have their shops beyond the city walls.

Imperial Parliament (The), 22 Jan., 1801. George III. so called the parliament after the union with Ireland. See 'Parliament.'

Imperialists, or 'Melchites,' 587. A party of the Monoph'ysites (4 syl.) of Alexandria, supported by Justinian and favoured by the Empress Theodōra. See 'Corruptibles.'

They have ceased to be Monophysites, and are now Orthodox Greeks. They are still found in Egypt, but are very few.

Importants (Les), 1643. A political faction formed at the death of Louis XIII., consisting of those who had been ill-used by Richelieu, in the hope of obtaining justice under the new king. The chiefs were Les Guises, Les Vendômes, the Duc d'Epernon, the Duchess de Chevreuse and the Duchess de Montbazon. Besides these there were Potier bishop of Beauvais, and the Duc de Beaufort. To break up this cabal many of them were sent into exile, Beaufort was imprisoned, and the bishop was sent to his diocese. Most of the Importants took part in the Fronde (q.v.).

In Cam'era. With closed doors, the public not being permitted to be present.

It was directed that the inquiry should be conducted in camera.—The Royal Liver Friendly Society, Jan. 1886.

In Cœna Dom'ini, 1568. The famous Bull of Pius V. anathematising everyone who dared to question, limit, or abjure the absolute authority of the Holy See. It was specially directed against the League of Schmalkalden, a German Protestant association. Next year (1569) the pope excommunicated Queen Elizabeth, and absolved her subjects from their allegiance.

Thomas Erastus wrote a book entitled 'De Cœna Domini,' in which he contended for the figurative interpretation of the words 'This is My body,' &c. This Bull was read on Holy Thursday, called 'The day of the Lord's Supper,' whence its name.

In Eminenti (The Bull), 1642. By Urban VIII. in condemnation of the 'Augustinus' of Cornelius Jansen.

The work was designed to prove that (judged by the Jesuit's standard) St. Augustine was unsound on the points of Grace, Free-will, and Predestination.

In Usum Sarum, 1078. The Salisbury Missal, drawn up by Oswald or Osmund bishop of Salisbury in the reign of Rufus. It is in Latin, and based on the Roman Missals.

There were numberless 'Uses' or Missals employed before the introduction of the Book of Common Prayer. Hence in the Introduction of that book we read: 'There hath been great diversity in saying and singing in churches within this realm: some following Salisbury Use, some Hereford Use, some the Use of Bangor, some of York, and some of Lincoln. But from henceforth all the whole realm shall have but one Use.'

Ina (Laws of), A.D. 692. Ina was king of Wessex, and promulgated a code of laws which was received over the whole heptarchy. By these laws the British proprietors were allowed to retain their lands; and alliances by marriage were encouraged between the natives and the Saxons.

Incammina'ti (The). The school of painting formed by the Carracci. The word means 'progressive,' and the Carracci school was eclectic, seeking to stamp out the exaggerations and mannerism of contemporary artists. It directed art to the study of nature and the best masters. The good taste of the Carracci is proverbial.

The Carracci were Ludovico (1554-1619), and his two cousins Annibale and Agostino; the former died in 1609 at the age of 48, and the latter in 1602 at the age of 45. Annibale was the best artist of the three.

Incas. A Peruvian dynasty (1130–1571) which succeeded the Aymara dynasty, and was reigning when (in 1533) Pizarro conquered Peru. The Incas called themselves descendants of the Sun. The first Inca was Manco-Capac 1130, and his successors were Sinchi-Roca, Lloqui-Yupanqui, Mayta-Capac, Capac-Yupanqui, Roca, Yahuar-Huacac, Viracocha, Pachacutec, Yapanqui, Tupac-Yupanqui, Huayna-Capac, Huascar and Atahualpa (taken prisoners by the Spaniards and put to death in 1533). Tupac-Amaru was beheaded in 1571.

Incident (The), 1641. A supposed plot of Charles I. to kill or kidnap the Marquis of Hamilton and the Earl of Argyll, at the instigation of James Graham earl of Montrose. Charles I. contrived to win over James Graham, Earl of Montrose; but when the Scotch Covenanters got wind of this treachery they arrested the earl and imprisoned him. While in prison he revealed to the king certain treasonable plots which he alleged were set on foot by Hamilton and Argyll, and he advised the king to summon the two Scotch noblemen ostensibly 'to a consultation'; but when they entered the ante-room armed men (headed by the Earl of Crawford) were to kidnap them, and carry them beyond the seas. If they resisted they were to be slain. The two noblemen escaped to their castles, and the king denied the scandal. The matter was privately investigated, and it was given out that the whole tale was a mare's nest; but instead of punishing the supposed traitors the king created Hamilton a duke and Argyll a marquis. This strange 'Incident' will be found in the 'Hardwicke Papers.'

Income Tax (The). Proposed by Pitt Dec. 1798, repealed 1802. Reimposed as a property tax 1803, abandoned 1816. Reimposed by Sir Robert Peel, 22 June, 1842, for three years, but continued at varying rates, from 2*d*. to 8*d*. in the pound, according to the exigencies of government.

The triennial renewals from 1842 were 1845, 1848, and 1851. In 1853 it was renewed for seven years and extended to Ireland. It was doubled in 1854, but in 1857 it was reduced, and incomes under 150*l*. a year were relieved.

Incorporated Society for Promoting English Protestant Schools in Ireland (The), 1733. Established by royal charter, for the education of the poor in Ireland in the principles of the Established Church. Grant reduced in 1824, and wholly withdrawn in 1832.

Incorruptible (The). I. Robespierre (1759, 1793–1794). Bouillet says: 'Robespierre était un homme froid, caché, tenace dans ses opinions, et dominant. Il affectait le plus pur patriotisme et tous les dehors de la vertu, ce qui l'avait surnommé par ses partisans l'Incorruptible.'

Probably called the Incorruptible from his denunciations against corruption at the outbreak of the Revolution.

II. Fabricius the Roman hero, of whom Pyrrhus said: 'It would be easier to turn the sun from its course than Fabricius from his path of duty.'

III. William Shippen, of whom Horace Walpole said, 'he is the only man proof against a bribe.'

IV. Andrew Marvell, who refused a cheque for 1,000*l*., slipped into his hand by the Lord Treasurer Danby in 1673. The anecdote is given on p. 43, under the title of 'Aristides (The British).'

Incorruptible Lucas (The). Charles Lucas, who in 1746 (George II.'s reign) tried to abrogate the law of Charles II., which took the power of choosing the city magistrates of Ireland from the Irish commons, and vested it in the aldermen, thus virtually giving the election to the crown, because the aldermen were chosen by the privy council.

Incorruptibles (The), or 'Incorruptibilists,' 537–568. A branch of the Monoph'ysites of Alexandria which arose on the death of the patriarch Timothy. The leader was Gaian, a disciple of Julian—whence his followers were called Gaianites—a party supported by the monks and senators, the city and provinces. The Incorruptibles were opposed to the Corruptibles (q.v.), and so bitter the animosity between them that Alexandria was filled with the dead bodies of the factionists. Women from housetops hurled missiles against their religious opponents, and it is said that 200,000 Christians fell by the sword when Apollinarius was installed patriarch of Alexandria.

The Incorruptibles insisted that the body of Christ was a celestial body, and not a body of corruptible flesh like ours. The Corruptibles insisted on the perfect manhood of Christ.

Incroy'ables (Les). A class of young dandies during the time of the Directory. They affected great care in their dress, a refined manner of speech, and elegance of deportment—the very opposite of the sansculotte style of dress and manner affected by the revolutionary party. The Incroyables represented the reactionary party.

Under the Regent 'un Incroyable' was called un talon rouge; under Louis XIV., un libertin; under Henri III., un mignon; under Charles IX., un raffiné; under François I., un muguet. In 1886 he was called un bécarre; in 1887 un copurchic.

Indemnity (Bill or Act of). 12 Car. II. c. 11, 1660. A bill for the indemnity of all acts of treason and all state offences committed between 1 Jan., 1637, and 24 June, 1660.

II. 2 William and Mary c. 10, 20 May, 1690. Indemnity for the adherents of James II.

III. 7 Geo. III. c. 7, 16 Dec., 1766. Indemnity for the advisers of the embargo on the exportation of corn.

IV. 41 Geo. III. c. 66, 23 June, 1801. Indemnity for protecting authorities from penalties in respect to proceedings during the suspension of the Habeas Corpus Act.

V. 21 Vict. c. 1, 12 Dec., 1857. Indemnity for the infringement of the Currency Acts.

Independence (Declaration of), 4 July, 1776. See under 'Declaration.'

Independence Day, July. The Great National Holiday in the U.S. of North America.

Independent Methodists, 1810. Separatists from the old Methodist connection. Chiefly distinguished by their rejection of a paid ministry.

Independent Order of Good Templars (The), 1852. Seceders from the 'Order of Good Templars,' whose motto is 'Faith, Hope, and Charity.' It is a total abstinence society.

Independents, 1580. Those Christians who, in the reign of Elizabeth, protested against a state church. They maintain that each congregation is independent in the selection of its own minister and the laws of church membership and government; in contradistinction to Roman Catholics, Episcopalians, Presbyterians, and Methodists, who have no such freedom.

They were at first called Brownists from Robert Brown, a clergyman, 1580, and were not called Independents till 1610; but they attracted very little attention before the opening of the Long Parliament, when Hugh Peters returned from New England. The first Independent Synod was held in the Savoy (Strand) 29 Sept., 1658. See 'Brownists' and 'Congregationalists.'

 Besides Independents (who are more or less Calvinistic), there are the Independent Methodists, the Independent Religious Reformers, the Independent Unionists, &c. In 1730 was formed the association of the Three Denominations: Independents, Presbyterians, and Baptists.

Independents and Presbyterians, 1647. Two political parties in English history which sprang up during the Civil war. The Independents were the parliamentarians, but the Presbyterians were disposed to make terms with the king and the royalists. In 1680 the Independents were called Whigs and the royalists Tories. Since the middle of the 19th cent. the words Liberal and Conservative have well-nigh superseded those of Whig and Tory.

Independents' Declaration of Faith (The). Their confession of faith, contained in 33 articles, 12 Oct., 1658.

Index. The first index to a book was by Valerius Soränus. Pliny says that he himself gave an index to his 'Natural History,' adding these words: 'Valerius Soranus, one of our Latin authors, had done the like before me.'

Index Expurgato'rius, or 'Index Librorum Expurgandorum,' 1557. Issued by Paul IV. A list of books forbidden to be read by Catholics. The books of all heresiarchs, whatever the subject, are forbidden; all books of an heretical tendency, and all versions of the Bible by 'heretics.' The list was made out originally by the Congregation of the Inquisition of Rome, but Pius V. appointed a special 'Congregation of the Index.' See next article.

Index Librorum Prohibitorum. In May 1825 Sir Robert Inglis, speaking in the House of Commons, said: 'I hold in my hand the "Index Librorum Prohibitorum" (a list of books proscribed by the Catholic Church under the penalties of the Inquisition). It was printed at Rome by authority in 1819, and I bought it there in 1821.' The first book on the list is 'Bacon, De Augmentis Scientiarum.' Then follow 'Locke, on the Human Understanding,' Cudworth's 'Intellectual System,' Milton's 'Paradise Lost' . . . 'Algarotte On the Newtonian System,' &c. This is also called the 'Index of the Court of Rome,' or briefly the 'Index.' Many of the books of Descartes, Malebranche, Fleury, Fénelon, with all Calvin's, Luther's, and Voltaire's, are in the Index—Gibbon, Robertson, Sismondi, Hallam, Goldsmith's 'History of England,' Kant, T. S. Mill, Whately's 'Logic,' Dante, Addison, &c. Some little tales for children are banned in the Index, as, for instance, 'Little Henry and his Bearer.'

Sir Robert says that Jacquier, the editor of Newton's 'Principia,' wrote on the fly-leaf 'Newtonus, in tertio libro, Telluris motæ hypothesim assumit . . . Cæterum latis a summis pontificibus contra telluris motum decretis nos obsequi profitemur. 1739.'

Indian File (In). In single file; one at a time; as North American Indians go on an attack, the one behind treading exactly in the footsteps of the man before him, the last man carefully obliterating the footprints.

Indian Mutiny (The), 1857, 1858. It began by mutinies of the Sepoys at Barrackpore and Berhampore, between 24 Jan. and 6 May, 1857; the Meerut massacre (q.v.) occurred 10 May, the mutiny at Delhi 11 May, the mutiny at Lucknow 30 May, at Benares 4 June, at Allahabad and Cawnpore 5 June. War over June 1858. Also called the 'Sepoy War.' See 'Greased Cartridges.'

In fact, the mutiny was virtually crushed in seven months, and by the close of 1857 the Bengal Army and East Indian Company ceased to exist.

India'na (U.S. America). So called in 1802 from the number of Indians who had flocked thither. A French settlement in 1702; a separate territory in 1800; admitted to the Union in 1816. The nickname given to the inhabitants of Indiana is Hoosiers.

Indiction. I. In chronology means a period of fifteen years. The Indiction of Constantinople begins 1 Sept., 312, the date of Constantine's victory over Maxentius. This epoch is still preserved in papal bulls, because then Christianity was first recognised by the state. But the Papal Indiction begins on 1 Jan., 313.

Divide the date by 15 and it will give the number of indictions, the remainder being the years over. Thus 1890 + 15 gives 126 indictions exactly.

II. In political history it means the recurrence of 15 years when the emperor of the East revised and reimposed the imposts of his empire. The word means the imperial edict.

Indolent Dick. Richard Cromwell, son of Oliver Cromwell (1626–1712).

Induction—Institution. Induction is the investing of a clergyman with the temporalities of a benefice or living. Institution is the investing him with its spiritualities. If a bishop is the patron of a benefice the two ceremonies are united in what is termed 'collation' to the living.

Inductive Philosophy (The Father of). Francis Bacon lord Verulam (1561–1626).

'Inductive philosophy' is inferring general principles from data. Deductive philosophy goes the other way about; it begins with general principles and then presumes what these principles involve. One is the à posteriori process, and the other is the à priori one. All 'science' follows the inductive or Baconian plan. 'Theology' still adheres to the deductive system.

Indulgence (An). A Papal Indulgence was a grace given or sold by the pope, or someone authorised by him, granting either partial or plenary immunity of sin for some meritorious act, on payment of a sum of money. The price of these notes-of-hand varied from 20*d.* to 10*l.* In a captured vessel 500 bales of indulgences, each containing a million, were found during the Reformation period in Germany. Tetzel, the great hawker of indulgences, went about like a cheap Jack, crying in the streets of German towns: 'The very moment the ring of the cash is heard in the basin St. Peter will throw open the gates of paradise to the buyer; and if for the dead, the soul will be instantly taken from purgatory to Abraham's bosom.' We first hear of indulgences in Nov., 1095, granted by the Council of Clermont to crusaders. Next on 2 Feb., 1300, granted by Pope Boniface VIII. to pilgrims visiting Rome at the Jubilee. Again 27 Jan., 1343, granted by Clement VI. Again in 1411, granted by John XXIII. to those who joined the crusade against Ladislaus king of Naples. But the sale of indulgences authorised by Leo X. for raising money to complete the cathedral of St. Peter at Rome was so barefaced a traffic in sin that Luther made capital out of it for his reformation plea; and no worse agent could have been employed than the charlatan Tetzel. The Council of Trent in Dec. 1563 restricted the grace by fixed laws.

Samson, a hawker of indulgences in Switzerland, roused the indignation of Zwingli the reformer, just as Tetzel roused Luther. The following is an exact translation of one of these diplomas, a few words being omitted where the dots are made for the sake of brevity: 'May the Lord have mercy on thee, and absolve thee by the merits of his most holy passion! And I, by God's authority, do hereby absolve thee from all ecclesiastical censures . . . and from all sins . . . how enormous soever they may be . . . and I remit to thee all the punishment which those sins have deserved. I restore thee to the holy sacraments of the church, to the communion of saints, and to perfect innocence of life; so that when thou diest, the gates of hell shall be shut, and those of paradise be thrown open to thee . . . In the name of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Ghost.'

The enormous impudence of this traffic almost exceeds belief. Through the Netherlands the price current of these indulgences was published in every town and village. God's pardon for crimes already committed, or about to be committed, was advertised according to a graduated tariff. Poisoning was absolved for eleven ducats (about 50*s*.).—MOTLEY, Dutch Republic, vol. i. p. 78.

Indulgence to Scotch ministers, 1668, whereby the ejected ministers were readmitted to their livings if they accepted collation from the bishop, and would attend the presbyteries and synods. This was the Earl of Tweeddale's Act.

1670. Lauderdale offered indulgence to all ministers who would take the oath of supremacy and acknowledge the bishops.

1673. Lauderdale named eighty ejected ministers, and ordered them to officiate in their own churches, but nowhere else; but one-fourth of them refused the offer See under 'Declaration.'

Indulgences (Tariff of). From 'The Tax of the Sacred Roman Chancery':—

Adultery 40*s*. (joint pardon).
Arson, or setting fire to a house, 11*s*.
Forgery 8*s*.
Fornication 8*s*.
Incest by a priest 40*s*. (joint pardon).
Keeping a concubine, a priest 9*s*.
Murder of a layman 4*s*.
Perjury or lying 8*s*.
Procuring abortion 6*s*.
Rape 40*s*. (joint pardon).
Robbery 12*s*.
Robbing a church 8*s*.
Striking a priest 11*s*.

Of this list 'Robbery' and 'Robbing a church seem the most extraordinary.

Industrial Schools. Generally means 'Ragged Schools,' in which writing, reading, and arithmetic are taught, with mechanical arts, and in which the children are clothed and fed. They scarcely existed till 1857, and were not finally established till 1866.

In Scotland they were established by act of parliament in 1861.

In Ireland in 1868.

Private enterprise opened such schools before these dates, but the first act of parliament bearing on the subject was 20, 21 Vict. c. 43.

Industrialists (The), about 1800. A school founded by St. Simon for the amelioration of the people. He taught that producers are the only aristocracy, and if men would not work neither should they eat. After the death of St. Simon in 1825 the society became political and communistic. In 1825 they called themselves 'St. Simonians,' and in 1833 were abolished by law.

Inexpiable War (The), or 'The War without Truce' (B.C. 240–236). A war which sprang up immediately after the First Punic War. It was headed by Matho, a Libyan, who had been very forward in urging the Carthaginian soldiers to demand their pay. The insurgents kept the Carthaginians at bay for more than three years, when Hamilcar reduced them to famine in Tunis; a sortie was made, Matho was taken prisoner and put to death, and the war was brought to a close.

Infallibility of the Church of Rome means the moral impossibility of the church ever sanctioning the introduction of a false doctrine, as well as perfect immunity of all errors at all times. Our Lord said (Matt. xvi. 18), 'Thou art Peter, and upon this rock will I build my church; and the gates of hell shall not prevail against it.' Not only is the church the fons et origo of doctrine, but it is deputed to carry its teaching throughout the world (Matt. xxviii. 19, Mark xvi. 15, Eph. iv. 11–16).

Of course the main question is what is meant by the Catholic Church? And the answer is the consensus of the pope and bishops either expressly delivered by ecumenical councils, or tacitly accepted on questions of doctrine or discipline, no matter from whence they originally emanated.

What is called the Infallibility of the Pope, or, in other words, whether the pope alone, as pope, is capable of pronouncing an infallible judgment, was a moot point for many hundreds of years between Gallican and Ultramontane divines. The right was first claimed in 750, but was not made an article of faith till 1870, when it caused a rift in the Catholic Church.

In the 19th Art. of the Church of England we read: 'As the Church of Hierusalem, Alexandria, and Antioch have erred, so also the Church of Rome hath erred—not only in their living and manner of ceremonies, but also in matters of faith.'

* * The Catholic Church distinctly repudiates any infallible judgment in historical and scientific matters.

Infallibility of the Pope. This dogma in 1870 was rejected by a party which termed themselves 'Old Catholics.' They also denied the ecumenical character of the Vatican Council, and rejected the Vatican decrees.

Infant Stockbroker (The). Sidney Herbert Cronmire, aged twenty in 1886, when he was charged with misappropriating cheques which had been sent him for specified investments by gentlemen residing at Bridgewater. The 'Infant' was arrested in Spain, and pleaded guilty.

Infant of Lübeck (The). Christian Heinrich Heinecken (1721–1725). If what is told us of this unhappy child is true, it is the most pitiable instance of precocity on record. His life was written by his tutor Schöneich.

We are told that he spoke when only a month old; that at twelve months of age he knew the chief events of the Pentateuch; at thirteen months he knew the history of the whole Old Testament; at fourteen months the history of the New Testament; at two and a half years he could answer any general question of history or geography; at three years old he knew French and Latin as familiarly as he knew German, although he was not then weaned (!!). He died between four and five.

* * More marvellous still, the infant prodigy John Philipp Baratier was born at Schwabach near Nürnberg the same year (!!), 1721-1740. Of this latter prodigy there is no doubt.

Infante (mas. 3 syl.), Infanta (fem.). Titles given in Spain and Portugal to all the princes and princesses of the blood royal, except the heir or heiress apparent.

The heir apparent of Spain is called the Prince of Asturias. The heiress presumptive is entitled Infanta. In Portugal the heir or heiress apparent is called the 'Prince' or 'Princess Royal.'

Infantry. Foot soldiers. 'Infantry' originally meant a particular army of foot soldiers, raised by the Infante or heir-apparent of Spain to rescue his father from the Moors, and is about equal to our phrase 'the Prince of Wales's Own.' The infantry was the Infante's own. We have applied the particular term to foot soldiers generally. Like calling all foot soldiers 'the Prince of Wales's Own.'

Infernal Columns (The), 1793. Republican detachments in the Vendëan war. So called from their diabolical barbarity. They murdered all, even children at the breasts, and as they advanced set the houses and country on fire.

Infernal Machines.

I. 21 Dec., 1800. A machine planted by the Chouans in the Rue St. Nicaise to blow up Napoleon Bonaparte on his return from Italy. As Bonaparte drew near, the barrel hung fire; but scarcely had he passed the spot when it exploded, shattered the windows of his carriage, and injured several persons in the crowd.

II. 28 July, 1835. Discharged from a window at Louis-Philippe king of the French as he was riding on horseback with his three sons down the Boulevard du Temple (Paris). Marshal Mortier, General de Virigny, and twelve others, including a child, were killed, but Louis-Philippe was uninjured. The assassin was Fieschi, a Corsican, formerly a soldier and a police spy. Fieschi, Peppin, and Morey were executed; Boireau was sentenced to imprisonment for twenty years, but Bescher was acquitted.

The projectile of Orsini thrown at Napoleon III., 14 Jan., 1858, was a species of bombshell; that which assassinated Czar Alexander II., 13 March, 1881, was a dynamite bomb, thrown at his carriage by Nihilists.

Infrancesa'dos, 1808. Those Spanish grandees who traitorously favoured the French usurpation of the Spanish crown and the appointment of Joseph Bonaparte as his brother Napoleon's viceroy king. Also called 'Josephi'nos' (q.v.).

Influenza. An epidemic catarrh. Appeared in Europe in 1510, 1557, 1580.

Very fatal in London in 1729, and in Russia in 1781, 1782.

It has appeared in England in 1782, 1803, 1831, 1833, 1836, 1837, 1889.

The word means an epidemic due to the influence of the planets; under the notion that it is connected with volcanic action.

Ing'hamites (3 syl.). Christian followers of Mr. Benjamin Ingham, son-in-law of the Countess of Huntingdon.

Injunctions (Royal), 1535. It was commanded that no lectures should be given in the Universities on the 'Sentences' (q.v.), or on Canon Law; but that Greek, Latin, and Divinity should be taught in addition to the Trivium (q.v.) and Quadrivium (q.v.).

Injunctions of Edward VI. (The), 1547. Commands issued to the Commissioners appointed by Cranmer to make a visitation of all England. They enjoined that all images, shrines, candlesticks, pictures, representations of miracles, &c., in windows and elsewhere, be removed and destroyed; that all processions and pilgrimages be discontinued; that the Creed, the Lord's Prayer, the Ten Commandments be repeated when there is no sermon; that the Epistle and Gospel be read in English; that the Litany be said or sung kneeling; that the bidding prayer be used as prescribed. Under penalty of excommunication, sequestration, or deprivation.

Injunctions of Elizabeth (The), 1559. They were fifty-three in number. Most were similar to those of Edward VI., but some new regulations were added respecting the marriage of the clergy; chanting and singing were allowed in divine services; reverence was enjoined at the name of Jesus; all were required to kneel during the Litany and all collects; the wafer in the eucharist was to be dispensed with; and the oath of supremacy was to be explained as disavowing all claim to any authority in the divine service or the sacred functions of the church.

Injunctions of Mary (The), 1554 Restoring to the ecclesiastical courts their jurisdictions; enforcing the celibacy of the clergy, and insisting that all married clergymen should put away their wives; abolishing the oath of Royal supremacy; restoring the Latin tongue in all church services; forbidding Protestants to be schoolmasters; and commanding that a new set of homilies be at once prepared to secure uniformity of doctrine and practice.

Injunctions of William and Mary (The), Feb. 1695. Under the advice of Archbishop Tenison, for the maintenance of church discipline. They were followed by 'Directions' for unity of opinion on the doctrine of the Trinity.

Innocent Papists. Those Catholics of Ireland who could prove to the satisfaction of the commissioners that they had never acted with the confederates, never adhered to the pope's nuncio, had never been absolved for taking part directly or indirectly in the Irish rebellion (q.v.), that they did not derive their title to the estates claimed from persons who had been guilty of the offences mentioned above, that they had never held any correspondence with any person who had concurred in the rebellion, that they never had taken any part in their councils, never employed any agent directly or indirectly to treat with a foreign power, never been a Tory, i.e. a marauder, &c. It was almost impossible to find such a papist in all Ireland.

Innocents. Those Irish who had been transplanted by Cromwell merely for their religion, and not for rebellion or any political offence. These Irish at the Restoration were by the Act of Settlement to be restored to their estates, and the displaced tenant was to be indemnified by some other tenement.

Innocents' Day, or 'Festum Innocentium,' 28 Dec. To commemorate the slaughter of the babes of Bethlehem by Herod the Great, with the view of killing thereby the infant Jesus.

Inns of Chancery. Ten schools between the City of London and Westminster, for law students, founded in the reign of Edward III. Originally meant for preparatory colleges for young students, and each school was attended by 100 students at least. Now they are for the most part occupied by solicitors, &c. See 'London University.'

Inquisitio Eliensis. The doomsday of the lands of the monastery of Ely, contained in the counties of Cambridge, Herts, Essex, Norfolk, Suffolk, and Huntingdon. Published by Sir Henry Ellis (1816) in the second of the two supplementary volumes of 'Domesday Book.'

Inquisition (The), or 'The Holy Office,' 1232. A tribunal erected by the popes for the examination and punishment of heretics. The chief inquisitors were the Dominicans. The Inquisition tried the suspects, and when condemned handed them over to the civil powers to be punished. Introduced into Spain in 1248; established in Portugal in 1543. Abolished in Portugal by the Cortes between 1818 and 1826. Extinguished by royal decree in Spain 1835.

Strictly speaking it originated with Innocent III., who (in 1208) granted a commission for the conversion of the Albigenses. The jurisdiction of the courts of the Inquisition were defined and regulated by Gregory IX. in 1232 or 1233. The modern Spanish Inquisition was constituted by Ferdinand and Isabella in 1480, and suppressed in 1820.

Inquisition of Goa, in the Indies (The). A very powerful tribunal for the trial of 'heretics.' Those sentenced to die were clad in much the same way as in Portugal. See 'Santo Benito.' Such as are convicted of magic wear paper sugar-loafed caps covered with flames and devils. All the 'heretics' go in procession to the church chosen for the ceremony; they go barefooted, carrying lighted tapers in their hands; the least guilty go first, then comes one carrying a cross, and then those condemned to die. The day after the execution the head of each person burnt to death is exhibited in a picture rudely executed, surrounded with flames, and underneath is written the name and quality of the person thus represented. Abolished.

Inquisition of Rome (The), or 'The Congregation of the Holy Office,' 1543. Founded by the Bull of Paul III. It consisted of twelve cardinals and some inferior officers, but the pope himself presided. Its standard is of red damask, on which is delineated a cross, with an olive branch on one side and a sword on the other. The motto is 'Exurge, Domine, et judica causam meam' (Ps. lxxiii.).

Inquisition of Venice (The). Consisted of the resident nuncio, the patriarch of Venice, the father inquisitor, and two senators. This Inquisition was nothing like so severe as the Inquisitions of Spain and Portugal. It took no notice of Greeks and Armenians, and tolerated Jews, who wore a scarlet cap as a badge. Heretics were allowed to take their degrees in law and physic, and were not interfered with by this tribunal. Abolished by Napoleon in 1808.

Inquisitor of Atheists (The). J. André Naigeon (1738–1810), so called from his intolerance.

Inquisitori del Doge Defunto (The). Three magistrates of Venice whose duty was to examine into the administration of deceased doges, to compare their acts with the provisions of their oath, to inquire into charges brought against them, and if the charges were proved, to make their heirs responsible for reparations.

Inquisitors (The State), 16 June, 1454. Three persons chosen by the Council of Ten in Venice, with dictatorial powers; two were of I Neri (the Blacks, i.e. The Ten), and one was Il Rosso (the Reds, or the Council of the Doge). These inquisitors were invested with plenary authority over every person in the republic, noble or citizen, magistrate or ecclesiastic. The penalties they might inflict were wholly optional, and the trials of offenders were public or secret. They kept the keys of the treasury, and were accountable to no one for their expenditures. All commanders, ambassadors, and governors addressed themselves to the Three. They made their own laws and rescinded them as they liked; and to prevent the inviolability of secrecy, no one who had an ecclesiastic directly or indirectly among his connexions was eligible to the office of inquisitor. It is needless to add that the history of this Inquisition exceeds in infamy and cruelty any tribunal the world ever established.

I. N. R. I. Jesus of Nazareth, King of the Jews. Inscription over the crucifix (Jesus Nazarēnus Rex Judæōrum).

Insabbata'ti, or 'Insabbates' (4 syl.), 12th cent. The Waldenses are over and over again called 'Inzabatati' in the council held at Tarragon in 1242. Probably the word means 'shoeless.' They are also called 'Sabbatati' (q.v.). Eberhard de Bethune is the first authority for the word.

In opposition to the 'shoeless' explanation, Father Natalis says, they [the Waldenses] celebrate no sabbath or feast-day, and do not abstain from work even on days consecrated to the Virgin and the blessed saints.—P. NATALIS ALEXANDER, vol. vii. pp. 94, 95.

Inspection (An). In the Lutheran communion means a synod of five consistorial churches; called a synod in the Calvinist communion. See 'Consistorial.'

Instance, in French law, means stare in judicio, to be under judgment (instantia); and a process is en instance when it is brought before a jurisdiction.

First Instance is the jurisdiction 'qui doit connaître en premier ressort de la décision d'une affaire'; whence the civil tribunals before which processes are first brought are called 'Courts of First Instance' (tribunaux de première instance).

Second Instance means the jurisdiction of the appeal, or of the second degree.

Reprise d'instance is resuming a suit which has been interrupted by the death of one of the parties, the retirement or withdrawal of the advocate, or some such cause.

We also find the phrases L'instance liée contradictoirement (qui a lieu lorsque les deux parties comparaissent ensemble); and L'instance par défaut (qui se poursuit lorsque le défendeur ne se présente pas sur l'assignation qui lui a été donnée).

Institute of France. Constituted in 1795 as the 'Institut National' by the union of the French Academy, the Academy of Inscriptions, and the Academy of Arts and Sciences. The constitution was revised in 1803 by Napoleon Bonaparte. Louis Philippe in 1832 added to it a class of moral and political sciences.

Institutes (8 syl.). The elements of Roman law, composed by Tribonian, Theophilus, and Dorotheus, A.D. 535. Divided into four books, each book subdivided into chapters, and each chapter into paragraphs.

Institutes of Ghazan or Kasan (The), 1295–1304. The 'commentary' of Ghazan, or Kasan, sultan of Persia, compiled from several sources. These Institutes are still held in honour in the East.

Institution, Induction, and Collation. Institution is investiture of the spiritualities of a benefice. Induction is investiture of its temporalities. Collation is the union of the two investitures. Thus a person collated to a living is both instituted and inducted.

Instrument of Government (The), 1653. Spoken of generally as 'The Instrument.' A new English constitution drawn up by the Council of State nominated by the Barebone Parliament (q.v.), and accepted by the Council of Officers. The house was to consist of 400 members from England, 30 from Scotland, and 30 from Ireland. The seats hitherto assigned to small and rotten boroughs were transferred to larger constituencies; all special rights of voting for members were abolished, and the franchise was given to holders of property to the value of 200*l.* and upwards. Catholics and Malignants (q.v.) were excluded. Cromwell was made Lord Protector, but his power was strictly limited. The members of the council were all named by him, but no member could be removed except by the consent of the council itself. With the council rested the power of peace and war, the choice of all officers civil and military, and the election of protectors. Parliaments were to last three years, and three years only. All taxes were to be imposed by parliament only.

 The conditions which Cromwell swore to observe when appointed the Lord Protector were as follows: (1) The legislative power to be vested in a lord protector and parliament; (2) the executive power to reside in the lord protector acting with the advice of his council; (3) no laws to be made or taxes to be levied without consent of parliament; (4) the civil list to be fixed at 200,000*l.* a year, and the army to be 30,000 men, two-thirds of which to be infantry; (5) all religious persuasions to be protected except prelatists and papists; (6) the successor of Cromwell to be selected by council.

They proceeded with the revision of 'the Instrument'; and their labours were embodied in a bill, which was read a third time 1655. — Dr. LINGARD, History of England, viii. 6.

Insulated Abbots. Abbots of independent or liberated abbeys, who acknowledged no lord but the pope. In the middle ages these abbots frequently enjoyed episcopal titles, but very few had dioceses.

Insurrection Act (The) of 1796. Giving the lord-lieutenant of Ireland power to proclaim any county or district of Ireland, on the requisition of seven magistrates; and to seize, imprison, and send on board His Majesty's fleet persons found in an unlawful assembly or in any way imperilling the public peace.

Insurrection of June (The), 23, 24, 25 June, 1848. This was a war against society, against law, against property; and was produced by the closing of the national workshops of Paris, the expense of which cost the government 40,000*l.* a week. Two million and eighty thousand pounds annually to maintain lazy, worthless operatives, who planned rebellion and diffused discontent!

Insurrection of La Vendée (The), March 1793. The Vendeans, a very primitive people, had no sympathy with the French Revolution, so the gentry and clergy organised an army to resist the dangerous innovations. They defeated every army sent against them for a time, but at length were obliged to succumb. All who took part in the insurrection were outlawed, and their property confiscated. M. Prudhomme informs us that 937,000 persons perished in this savage butchery.

Insurrection of Ragots'ki (The), 1703–1713. He declared himself protector of Poland and prince of Transylvania; but in 1713 the Austrians compelled him to retire. He died 1735.

Insurrection of the Duchesse de Berry (The), 1832. The last Chouan émeute made with a view of placing Henri [Cinq] on the throne of France. The duchess was the widow of the assassinated Duc de Bordeaux and mother of Henri V. Her insurrection was very romantic, and the duchess, being taken prisoner, would have been put to death had she not been enceinte.

Insurrection of the Yellow Caps (The), A.D. 220. Tchang-kio of China persuaded the multitude that he could cure them of a pestilential disease which was then prevalent. He thereby soon acquired a large following of some 500,000 men. These he persuaded to adopt as a badge the yellow cap, and then he assumed regal power. The whole military strength of China was sent against the rebels; and though at first the mob gained certain advantages, ere long the regular troops prevailed, and the insurgents were routed with great slaughter.

Intellectual Artist (The). Nicolas Poussin (1594–1665). Famous for his classic costumes.

Intendants Militaires. A corps charged with all things which concern the administration and 'comptability' of war. They are named by the minister of the war department. They were established in France in 1817 in substitution of the inspectors of revenue and commissioners of war. The corps consists of 28 intendants (who rank next to generals) and 140 sub-intendants.

Pronounce Ahn-tahn-dahn me-le-tair.

Intendants of a Province (The). Magistrates, administrative, judicial, and financial, who exercise their functions in each généralité (q.v.). The chamber in which they meet is called the 'Intendance.' The first intendants of a province were established by Henri II. in 1551. They were suppressed in 1790.

A 'generality' is the jurisdiction of an intendant-general.

Intercursus Magnus. The treaty made by Henry VII. with the Flemings. In 1496 Henry made a less liberal treaty, which was branded as the Intercursus Malus.

Interdiction of Fire and Water. 'Aquæ et ignis interdictio.' The form used by the Romans in their judicial sentence of banishment from Italy; the person thus interdicted might go anywhere he chose provided he left Italy.

Interim (The), or 'Formula ad Interim,' 1548. When Charles V. saw that the pope removed the Council of Trent to Bologna, he believed that he only sought time to stave off a decision on the knotty points of the day; and, in order to preserve peace in his kingdom, he made a provisionary arrangement with the Protestants appointed, which was to be in force till the council was actually summoned. By this 'Interim' or provisionary arrangement, the cup was allowed to the laity in the Lord's Supper, and the clergy were allowed to marry. This concession pleased neither party, and the Interim fell through by the 'Treaty of Passau,' which secured full and perfect liberty to all in matters of religion (1552).

Passau, pronounce Pas-sow—'ow' as in 'now.'

International Law (Professorship of), 1867. Founded by Dr. Whewell, master of Trinity College. Salary 500*l*. See 'Regius Professorship of Civil Law.'

Whewell, pronounce You'-el.

Interregnum (The English). From 23 Dec., 1688 (the abdication) to 13 Feb., 1689, when parliament assented to the accession of William and Mary.

William III. was son-in-law and Mary was daughter of James II.

Introit, or 'Introitus.' The psalm or passage of scripture chanted in the Catholic Church while the priest is entering the chancel to celebrate mass. Such terms as Reminiscere Sunday, Oculi Sunday, Lætare Sunday, Quasimodo Sunday, &c. are so called from the beginning words of the introitus.

Intrusionists and Non-Intrusionists, 1835. The two Scotch parties called into existence by the 'Veto Act,' passed by the General Assembly, whereby the nomination of a patron to a living might be voided by veto. They were also called 'Highfliers,' and 'Moderates.' Intrusionists are those who regarded the veto as an illegal intrusion or interference with the rights of a patron to present to a living. See 'Veto Act.'

Invasion of England (Threatened).

1386. Charles VI. of France was persuaded by his uncles to invade England, and a formidable army of 40,000 men was assembled in Flanders for the purpose. Every knight provided himself with a pillard, or man to collect pillage for him, and an enormous tent called a cité was constructed under the direction of Oliver de Clisson, the lord high constable. This monster tent, which took to pieces, would enclose a space of 8,000 sq. ft. and required 72 vessels to convey it across the Channel. When all was ready for sailing the king was wasting his time in dissipation. When the king arrived he had to wait for his uncle the Duc de Berry. And when the duke arrived the king changed his mind and gave up the expedition. The army was disbanded, the stores were pillaged, and the monster tent, having drifted to the Thames, became the prey of English mariners.

1803. Bonaparte, mad with England for daring to beard him, and determined to make a descent on the island, assembled a formidable army on the northern coast, where he formed his famous 'Camp de Boulogne,' constructed above 2,000 gun-boats and flat transports, and increased his military stores and munitions of war, but ultimately deferred his descent till the next spring (1804). When next spring arrived Bonaparte had changed his mind, and the invasion of England was set aside for his coronation as Emperor of the French.

The Column of Boulogne was erected to perpetuate the memory of this grand preparation. There is a wonderful resemblance in these two threatened invasions, that of Charles VI. in 1386, and that of Bonaparte in 1803. See 'Armada.'

Invention of the Cross (The). An annual fête (3 May) held in the Catholic Church to celebrate the 'discovery of the true cross' in a cave by Helĕna mother of Constantine. She was 80 years of age at the time, and was told where to find the three crosses by one Judas, a monk of Jerusalem. The true cross of the three was discovered because when a sick woman was touched by the other two the contact had no effect on her, but immediately the true cross touched her she was restored to perfect health. This 'Invention' dates from 326.

Investiture, 1052–1122. Kaiser Heinrich III. was the first to give a ring and crozier to a bishop on his consecration, as a symbol of investiture, or grant of episcopal temporalities in his dominions. The innovation was like a bombshell, and for seventy years pope and king contended about the prerogative. No pope can give away lands and buildings in another man's empire, and no king can confer office in a 'kingdom not of this world.' At last, in 1122, the moot point was settled thus: the pope was to consecrate, and then the bishop was to do homage to the king for the temporalities of his diocese. The pope invested with ring and crozier, and the king with a sceptre.

Investiture in Carinthia. This was a nominal purchase, and evidently referred to a time when the land belonged to the people. On the day of inauguration the peasant appointed for the purpose seated himself on a marble block beneath a tree, and the new duke, dressed as a countryman, approached on foot, carrying a crook, a spade, and a wallet of bread and cheese. Two noblemen on foot attended as his sponsors. 'Who are these?' asked the peasant of the crowd. 'The prince of the country,' was the reply. 'Is he a good man and true?' demanded the peasant. 'He is,' was the answer. 'Then, by what right will he push me from my stool?' asked the peasant. 'He will buy it of thee,' said the crowd. 'For how much?' 'For sixty pence.' Whereupon the peasant rose, and the duke took his place, paying sixty pence into the hand of the peasant, who also received as a perquisite the clothes worn by the duke, and was exempt from rent and taxes. Soon as the duke was seated, his vassals paid him homage, and the duke promised to deal even justice to all. The duke then proceeded to church to hear mass, and ended the day with a banquet.

Investiture of Vassals (The). The lord having received homage and the oath of fealty (q.v.) invested his 'man' with the fief by delivering to him the old banners belonging thereto. There were often several of these banners, because every large fief contained several smaller ones, each of which had its own banner. The chief threw the old banners into the crowd to be torn to pieces, and then presented his dependents with new ones emblazoned with arms of the new fief, by accepting which the dependents acknowledged the suzerainty of their new lord.

Invincible (The). Cosmo de' Medici was called 'the Great and the Invincible' (1389–1464). He was also called the 'father of his country.'

Invincible (The). The Russian general Suwarof or Suworof (1780–1800). His full name, &c. was Alexander Vassilivich Suwarof-Rymnikski, count, prince Italinski, field-marshal, generalissimo of the Russian army.

Invincible Doctor (The). 'Doctor Singularis et Invincibilis,' William of Occam, in Surrey (1270–1347), Provincial of the English Cordeliers. He was excommunicated by Pope John XXII. for writing a book against the secular power of the pope, 'Super potestate summi pontificis.' See 'Doctors,' &c.

Peter Tome was also called 'Doctor Invincibilis.'

Invincibles (The). I. The French legion, whose exploits in Italy under Bonaparte were so astounding. This legion was almost annihilated in Egypt by Abercrombie in 1801.

II. Irish sicārii. See 'Irish Invincibles.'

Invisible Commander (The). Lord Raglan commander-in-chief of the British army in the Crimēan war. The sufferings of the soldiers in the winter of 1854–5 were very great, and the anger of the nation was bitter against Lord Raglan, but somewhat unjustly so.

Invisible Prince (The). William John Cavendish Scott Bentinck 5th duke of Portland (1800–1879), famous for his enormous excavations and palatial buildings underground. At one time he employed 1,000 artificers on his estate to make himself invisible. A tunnel was made across the park for the workmen to pass to and fro without intruding on his seclusion. He also constructed tunnels in the abbey, by which he could pass from one building to another without being seen, and a tunnel leads to the riding school.

Invisible Three (The), or State Inquisitors of Venice. See 'Inquisitors,' &c. Called 'invisible' because no inquisitor was publicly known. All its citations and acts were done in the name of the Ten. All its judgments were pronounced by the mouths of the secretaries.

Invisibles (The). I. The Rosicrucians. So called because they never showed themselves in public in open day.

II. The disciples of Illyricus, Flaccus, Osiander, &c., who denied the perpetual visibility of the church.

Io'nian Republic (The). Founded 1815; consisting of the seven islands: Cephalonia, Cerigo, Corfu, Paxo, Santa Maura, Theaki, and Zantè; all placed under the protection of Great Britain by treaty with Russia. Ceded to Greece 1864.

Cerigo, pronounce Cherry-go. Corfu, pronounce Kor-foo'.

Io'nian War (The), B.C. 501–492. Began with the revolt of Aristagŏras, who obtained help from Athens and Eretria in 500. Athens and Eretria left the confederacy B.C. 499. Aristagoras was slain in Thrace B.C. 497. And in 492 Ionia was completely subjugated by Persia.

Io'nians (The). Had twelve great cities on the north coast of the Peloponnesus and twelve colonies in Asia Minor, with several islands. Ephesus, Smyrna, Milētus, and Samos belonged to the twelve confederated Ionian colonies.

Ion'ic Letters. The four added to the Greek alphabet by Simonīdês of Cos (ζ, θ, φ, χ), and the four added by Epicharmos the Sicilian (ξ, η, ψ, ω). Called Ionic, because the Ionians were the first to adopt all the 24 letters. (N.B. The other 16 are called Cadmēan letters.)

Ionic Poets of Greece (The). Those poets who wrote in the Ionic dialect or the Greek of Asia Minor.

Homer wrote Ionic Greek; but of the lyrists the two most eminent are Anacrĕon (B.C. 563–478) and Simonīdês (B.C. 556–467). The elegy of the latter on Leonīdas and his 300 has no superior in the world; and his 'Lament of Danăe' is a model of pathos. As for Anacrĕon, his odes are quite unrivalled. There never were odes more inimitable than his 'Cupid dripping wet' (Ode 8), 'To my dove' (Ode 9), and 'The Rose' (Ode 58) ('Barnes's edition').

The following is a literal translation of the elegy. 'How glorious their fate who fell at Thermopylæ! How beautiful their death! Their tomb an altar! We give them not our tears, but cherish them in immortal memory. The manner of their death is their funeral song. Rust nor destroying time shall efface the memorial of the brave. This mound is the archive of Grecian glory. Leonidas lies here; Leonidas the king of Sparta; Leonidas who left behind him a monument of praise, a trophy of glory which no time shall destroy.

 Simonīdês the lyric poet must not be confounded with Simonīdês the satirist who wrote in Iambic verse, and lived a century earlier.

Ionic Sect (The) of ancient Greek philosophers. Founded by Thālês, the sage, and father of speculative philosophy (B.C. 611–547). He taught that all bodies are compounded of atoms; that the earth is round; that the sun is a sphere of fire; and that the moon is lighted by the sun. His most noted disciples were Anaximander (B.C. 611–547); Anaximĕnês (B.C. 558–460); Anaxagŏras (B.C. 500–428); Heraclitos of Ephesus (B.C. 543–483); and Diogĕnês of Crete (B.C. 539–465).

Archelāos of Milētus joined together the two systems of Anaximander and Anaxagŏras. He held with the former that the elements of all things are eternal, and admitted with the latter the existence of a Supreme intelligence, independent of matter.

 Diogĕnês of Crete must not be confounded with Diogĕnês of Sinōpê the cynic.

I'owa (U.S. America). So called from an Indian tribe, and from a river of the same name. The inhabitants are nicknamed Hawkeyes.

Iphicra'tians. The mercenaries of Iphicrătês the Athenian general (B.C. 419–348).

Ille pedestria arma mutavit. Quum ante illum imperatorem maximis clypeis, brevibus hastis, minutis gladiis uterentur: ille, e contrario, peltam pro parma fecit, ut ad motus concursusque essent leviores. Hastæ modum duplicavit, gladios longiores fecit. Idem genus loricarum mutavit, et pro ferreis atque aeneis linteas dedit.—Nepos, Iphicrates.

Ireland (King of). Edward Bruce, brother of Robert Bruce, was crowned king of Ireland at Dundalk in 1316, but was slain by the English under Sir John Bermingham at Faughart, near Dundalk, 5 Oct., 1318. Henry VIII. was the first English sovereign who called himself 'King of Ireland.'

Ireland (Samuel William Henry). A literary impostor (1777–1835). He published in folio, 1795, 'Miscellaneous Papers and Instruments under the hand and seal of William Shakespeare, including the tragedy of "King Lear," and a small fragment of "Hamlet," from the original,' price 4*l.* 4*s.* On 2 April, 1796, he produced the play of 'Vortigern and Rowena' from the pen of Shakespeare. It was actually represented, and drew a most crowded house. Dr. Parr, Dr. Valpy, James Boswell, Herbert Croft, and Pye the poet-laureate, signed a document certifying their conviction that Ireland's productions were genuine; but Malone exposed the imposition of the tragedy, and Ireland publicly confessed that all his publications from beginning to end

wen) impositions. See 'Literary Forgeries,' &c.

For my own part I cannot imagine how anyone could be deceived.

Ireland of Austria (The). Hungary, which struggled long for home rule, and obtained it in 1867. In 1868 the empire of Austria was designated the 'Austro-Hungarian Monarchy.'

Irish American Land League (The), 1879. Organised by C. S. Parnell and affiliated with the Irish National Land League (q.v.). See 'Irish Associations.'

Irish Army of Liberation (The), 1848. The war party of Ireland, who had both commissions and uniforms to fight against soldiers of Great Britain on behalf of the Irish rebels. See 'Irish Associations.'

Irish Church (The). The papal authority in Ireland was recognised by the Synod of Kells in 1152.

The Catholic Church was abolished by Henry VIII. in 1539, and the English reformed liturgy was introduced in 1550.

Catholic priests were expelled, under penalty of death, by James I. in 1605; and the Articles of the Church of England were introduced in 1635.

Intermarriages between Catholics and Protestants in Ireland were forbidden by William III. in 1697.

Catholics were declared disqualified to sit on the grand jury in 1705.

The disestablishment and disendowment of the Anglican Church in Ireland date from 1871.

Irish Church Temporalities Bill (The). A bill to abolish the collection of tithes and firstfruits, and to substitute a rent-charge, 30 July, 1833. Amended in 1834, and again in 1836. A Sustentation Fund was originated in 1870, and its union with the Protestant Church of England was dissolved in 1871.

The Act of 1833 abolished the church-cess, reduced the four archbishops and eighteen bishops to two archbishops and ten bishops, and appropriated the revenues thus obtained to general church purposes.

Irish Confederation (The), 1845. The Young Ireland party headed by William Smith O'Brien, a split from the great Repeal party of Daniel O'Connell. The Young Irelanders were for enforcing their charter at the sword's point, but O'Connell was opposed to any such mad measure. In 1848 they sent a deputation to France craving aid for 'the oppressed nationality of Ireland,' and organised an insurrection, but just before the time of uprising O'Brien was arrested, and, being convicted, was exiled to Van Diemen's Land for life. In 1856, having obtained a free pardon, he returned home, and died in 1864. See 'Irish Associations.'

Irish Crisis (The), 1846, 1847. During the potato famine.

Potato famines have not been uncommon in Ireland: Thus in 1822 Parliament voted 800,000*l.* for relief purposes, and subscriptions to the amount of 310,000*l.* were raised. In 1831 the crop in the West of Ireland failed, and so on.

Irish Invincibles (The). An organisation started in Dublin in Dec.

1881 (organised fully in the spring of 1882), the members of which bound themselves by oath to 'remove all tyrants from the country,'—in other words, to 'assassinate the executive council of Ireland, the chief secretary, and all government officers.' McCafferty, with others, established the society. It was limited to 250 members, and was under the control of a committee of five Fenians, viz. James Mullett, Edward McCafferty, Daniel and James Curley, and James Carey, who were paid by the Land League. The first person on the list for removal was the Right Hon. W. E. Forster, chief secretary for Ireland; the second was Earl Cowper, the lord-lieutenant of Ireland. These gentlemen resigned and left the island. The first officials who fell to the assassins were Mr. Thomas Burke, perpetual under-secretary, and Lord Frederick Cavendish, who succeeded Mr. Forster, 6 May, 1882. They fell on a Saturday, in full daylight, in Phœnix Park. The trial of these 'Invincibles' took place in Dublin, 1883. See 'Irish Republican Brotherhood' and 'Irish Associations.'

Irish Land Acts.

I. An Act was passed in 1858 (21, 22 Vict. c. 72) to facilitate the sale and transfer of land in Ireland.

II. Deasy's Act, 1860, limiting the power of a landlord to the terms of his contract, but not giving a tenant any compensation for improvements on eviction.

III. The Act of 1870 remedied this, and provided that a tenant on eviction might demand of his landlord just compensation for all improvements made by himself [the tenant] during his term of tenancy.

IV. The Act 1881 set up a tribunal to fix a 'fair rent'; and legalised the tenant's interest in his holding, which was saleable in open market, so that virtually the Irish tenant by this Act was a co-partner in the soil.

V. The Ashbourne Act, 1885, placed five million pounds sterling at the disposal of Irish tenants who desired to purchase the fee simple of their holdings, the loan to be repaid by instalments in forty-nine years. In 1888 another similar sum was granted for the same object. And in 1890 Mr. Balfour introduced a bill for a much larger loan on very easy terms enough by principal and interest to buy up any number of farms which the tenants would be likely to desire.

VI. The Act of 1887, subjecting the rents judicially fixed in 1881–85 to revision, by which rents were again reduced about 10 per cent.; and to give county-court judges the power of staying eviction, and of spreading arrears over a discretionary number of years.

These several Acts give to tenants in Ireland—
(1) Compensation for improvements.
(2) " disturbance.
(3) Security of tenure, subject to payment of rent.
(4) A 'fair rent' tribunal.
(5) The right of selling their interest.
(6) The revision of judicial rents.
(7) The right of having eviction stayed on good cause shown.
(8) Facilities for acquiring the fee simple of a holding.

 Lower Beltoney, in far-off Gweedore, is now (under the Purchase Act) a real garden, while Keeldrum, on the other side of the road (under the Plan of Campaign, q.v.), is a waste wilderness! Again, the barony of Farney in Monaghan, once the most blood-stained spot in all Ireland, has, with the sale of the Marquis of Bath's property, become quite a model district (1890).

Irish Legion (The), 1803. An army of Irish refugees in Paris raised by Bonaparte, with the intention of invading England through Ireland.

Irish Liberator (The). Daniel O'Connell (1775–1847).

Irish Loan (The), 1885. Five millions sterling set apart, to be lent to Irish farmers by government at 3½ per cent., to enable them to buy their farms of their landlords. See above, 'Irish Land Acts,' No. V.

Irish Loyal and Patriotic Union (The), 1885. To unite the loyalist party into one body irrespective of class, party, or creed. This union was to counteract the 'National League' (q.v.). See 'Irish Associations.'

Irish Massacre (The), Oct. and Nov., 1641. Not the massacre of Irishmen, but the massacre of forty or fifty thousand Englishmen by the Irish secret society called 'The Confederate Catholics.' In this massacre husbands were cut to pieces in presence of their wives, children's brains were dashed out in the face of their parents, women were brutally violated, and driven naked into the woods to perish. Some were burned to death, others were drowned, and many were buried alive. Nothing like it has been known except the outrage of Cawnpore.

The instigator of this massacre was Sir Phelim O'Neil of Ulster. In July 1648 a Bull was received from the pope granting a jubilee and plenary absolution to all those who had taken up arms in the cause of the Catholic faith. Horrible and incredible as it may seem, Gregory XIII. proclaimed the slaughter of St. Bartholomew as the 'Year of Jubilee,' and went in full procession to celebrate a public thanksgiving service for the massacre.

Irish National Brotherhood (The), 1881. I. I.N.B. This was an offshoot of the Clan-na-Gael, or United Brotherhood. It began in 1880 under what was called the New Departure (q.v.). A union of the murderous violence of the Clan-na-Gael, the constitutional craft of the Land League, and the spoliation of the No Rent party.

II. I.N.B., 1886, at Chicago. An offshoot of the U.B. or 'United Brotherhood.' See 'Irish Associations.'

Irish National Land League (The), Oct. 1879–1881. The object of this conspiracy was to establish the absolute independence of Ireland as a separate nation. To effect this object, agrarian agitation against the payment of agricultural rents was resorted to, in order to secure the co-operation of the tenant farmers of Ireland, and to impoverish and ultimately drive from the country the Irish landlords, styled by the leaguers 'the English garrison.' Suppressed 1881. See 'Irish Associations.'

The confederation was called the Land League, the Irish National Land League, and the Labour and Industrial Union. There were also Ladies' Leagues, and affiliated societies in Great Britain and America.

Irish Night (The), 18 Dec., 1688, when a cry arose in London that the Irish (disbanded on the flight of James II.) were up, and were going to cut the throats of all Protestants. At one in the morning the drums collected the militia and the train bands, and 100,000 men kept the streets in a state of terror and anarchy. It was called the 'Irish Night,' though no Irish put in an appearance, the panic being created by a false alarm.

Trenchard was brother-in-law to the unprincipled agitator Hugh Speke, who by his trumped-up lies had occasioned the 'Irish Night.' —Howitt, Hist. of Engl. (Will. and Mary, p. 69).

Irish Parliament (The), or Grattan's Parliament (1782–1800). Two independent parliaments in the same kingdom being found pregnant with perpetual danger both from within and from without, the Dublin parliament, by the Act of Union, in 1800, was abolished, and a large number of Irish representatives, out of all proportion to the rest of the kingdom, were admitted to the Westminster parliament. In England and Wales it is one in 6,000. In Ireland one in 5,000.

To the Irish parliament no Catholic was admitted. To the representatives admitted into the Westminster house no such restriction exists.

The proximate cause of the abolition of the Irish Parliament was this: In 1789 the Prince of Wales was made regent. The English parliament restricted his powers, but the Irish parliament granted him the regency of Ireland without restrictions. This was a warning of the mischief which might hereafter occur from two legislatures, and convinced the British cabinet that the Irish parliament, like that of Scotland, must be united to the one general house of legislature in London. The Irish rebellion of 1798, in which the French were invited over, brought the matter to a head, and in 1801 the union was effected. See 'Parliaments.'

Grattan stated in 1793 that of the 300 members of the Irish house, 200 were nominees of private individuals, and 50 were returned by constituencies of not more than ten electors in each, and several boroughs had not more than one elector. In 1890 about 80 of the Irish deputies in the House of Commons were, for the most part, the nominees of C. S. Parnell.

Irish Rebellion. I. In 1565 occurred the rebellion of Shan O'Neal, who applied to France for soldiers. O'Neal was assassinated in 1567.

II. In 1594 occurred the rebellion of Hugh O'Neil, earl of Tyrone, who assumed the title of The O'Neil. This 'patriot' (!) offered the crown of Ireland to the king of Spain in 1597, and the Spaniards actually sent an army into Ireland to obtain the promised crown. O'Neil, with his Spanish army, was defeated at Kinsale; he surrendered to Mountjoy, was pardoned, and went to Rome, where he died in 1616.

III. In 1608 occurred the rebellion of O'Dogherty, in Ulster. James I. then parcelled out the north of Ireland to Scotch and English settlers. This confiscation is known as the 'Plantation of Ulster' (q.v.).

IV. In 1641, while the English were in civil war, the Irish rose in rebellion under Roger More and Sir Phelim O'Neil, and massacred the Protestants to the number of 40,000.

V. In 1649 Cromwell, having taken the cities of Droghĕda, Wexford, and Clonmel, left Ireton to carry on the war. Ireton reduced place after place, and soon after the death of Ireton the rebellion was quite stamped out (1652).

VI. In 1789 the Great Rebellion broke out. It was caused by the creation of numerous Irish societies hostile to England, especially that called the 'United Irishmen' (q.v.).

VII. In 1796 the Irish concluded a secret treaty with the French Directory, but the treasonable plot was utterly frustrated by the battles of Bantry Bay in 1796, and the battle of Camperdown in 1797.

1 Jan., 1801, the union of Great Britain and Ireland was effected, and since then the Irish have had no opportunity of offering 'their crown' either to France or Spain.

VIII. 1848. The nation was more or less disturbed from April to the middle of Sept. William Smith O'Brien was the chief disturber, and his lieutenants were Meagher and M'Manus. All three being arrested were condemned to death, but were transported to Van Diemen's Land. Meagher and M'Manus escaped to America, and O'Brien, in 1856, having obtained a free pardon, returned home and died at Bangor in 1864.

William Smith O'Brien was joint deputy from the Irish Confederation to the French republic, 8 April, 1848.

IX. The Home Rule faction, under the leadership of Charles S. Parnell, began in 1870, and disorganised Ireland with numberless disorderly associations, some of an anti-landlord character, others more criminal still. Boycotting (q.v.) was introduced. Shooting men through the legs, pouring hot pitch on the heads of women, maiming cattle, and the most reckless destruction of property, intimidated all who resisted the rebels. See 'Plan of Campaign,' 'Irish Associations,' &c. &c. In 1890 the disturbance was not wholly stamped out.

When Ireland had its own rulers the civil and moral condition of the country was so bad that Pope Adrian IV. authorised Henry II. to undertake the conquest of it, hoping that a strong arm might do something to settle the country.

When Grattan had his parliament he passed fifty-four coercion acts, 1782, &c.

Whatever may be said respecting 'the plantation of Ireland' by James I., one thing is certain: No part of Ireland is so wealthy, and no part of Ireland so loyal and industrious, as Ulster.

Irish Reproductive Loan Fund (The), 1822. Originated in the excess of subscription to what was expended in the relief of sufferers from the famine. The surplus was entrusted to a committee in London, and called the Irish Reproductive Loan Fund, under which small sums are advanced to industrious individuals of the working classes, to be repaid by instalments, with interest at 6*d.* in the pound, reduced afterwards to 4*d.*

Irish Republican Brotherhood (The), 1869. The Dublin contingent of the 'Irish Invincibles' (q.v.). It consisted of fifty of the most desperate of the gang. They were sworn 'to remove all tyrants from the country.' This meant they were to murder or drive out of Ireland all the constituted administrators and guardians of the law and of order, together with all owners of land The Phœnix Park murder (q.v.) was their first and most notorious achievement. See 'Irish Associations.'

Irish Revolutionary Brotherhood (The), or I. R. B. The Irish branch of the American V.C. (i.e. United Brotherhood), for the purpose of making Ireland an independent republic by force of arms. See 'Irish Associations.'

Irish Society (The), 1619. Certain London merchants incorporated by charter, who contracted for large tracts of land in Tyrconnel (q.v.), when James I. planted the territory with Scotch and English tenants. See 'Plantation of Ulster.'

Irish Tenant League (The), 1850. Pledged to oppose all Governments which did not recognise the principle of Tenant Right (q.v.) for all Ireland. The league broke up in 1858, and was replaced by Fenians (q.v.). See 'Irish Associations.'

Irish Tenants' Defence League (The), 1889. To supersede the 'Plan of Campaign' (q.v.), declared to be illegal. The object of the 'Defence League' is to supply tenants with money and legal advisers to fight their landlords and weary them out with the infinite shifts of law. During the process an evicted tenant is to be furnished by the League with a home and needful support. Mr. C. S. Parnell was the primum mobile of the scheme. See 'Irish Associations.'

Irishmen of Islam (The). So the Moors of Morocco have been called.

Irmin-sul. Herman's Column. Erected to commemorate the victory of Herman over Varus the Roman. It was long considered a palladium of the Saxon nation. Charlemagne destroyed the temple of Eresburg, and transferred the pillar to Corbey.

Iron Age (The). The era between the death of Charlemagne, 814, and the accession of Hugues Capet, 987, is so called from its constant civil wars. Also called the 'leaden age' from its worthlessness, and the 'dark age' from its barrenness of learned men.

The present has often been called 'The age of steel.' Hugues Capet, pronounce U Cap'-pay.

Iron Arm.

I. Guillaume Bras de fer (*–1046). First of the twelve sons of Tancrède de Hauteville.

II. Capt. François de Lanoue, a Huguenot, who died at the siege of Lamballe (1531–1591).

Iron Calvinist of Rosny (The). Maximilien de Béthune, duc de Sully (1560–1641), born at Rosny; chief minister of Henri IV., and the greatest of all French statesmen.

Iron Chancellor (The). Prince Otto von Bismarck of Prussia (1813), Chancellor of the North German Confederation 14 July, 1867. He retired from public life in 1890.

Iron Chest (The). A secret closet in the wall of the king's bedchamber in the Tuileries. Made by Gamain, a locksmith who had been employed by Louis XVI. to construct it. It was behind the wainscot, and so well concealed that no one could have discovered it without being first shown it. Gamain betrayed it to the Convention, and amongst other papers were several from Mirabeau which were so damnatory that the Convention ordered his bust to be removed from the hall and stamped to powder.

Iron-clad Oath (The). An act passed, in 1867, by the United States of North America, excluding from the franchise all those who had borne arms against the United States, and even all who had directly or indirectly given aid to the Southerners. It was practically the temporary disfranchisement of the Southern whites.

Iron Crown. Several examples occur of traitors or aspirants to a crown being put to death by a mockery red-hot iron crown. Take the two following:—

1. Walter earl of Athol murdered James I. of Scotland in Perth, hoping to usurp the crown; but he was crowned only with a red-hot iron diadem which ate to his brain and killed him (1437).

2. Doza or Dosa the Hungarian was put to death by a similar torture, for heading the peasant rebellion against the nobles (1514).

Iron Crown of Lombardy (The). Not an iron crown, but a magnificent gold diadem, containing a narrow iron band about $\frac{3}{8}$ths of an inch broad, and $\frac{1}{10}$th of an inch in thickness. This band was made out of a nail given to Constantine by his mother, and said to be one of the nails used in the crucifixion. The outer circlet of the crown is of beaten gold, set with large rubies, emeralds, and sapphires, and the iron band is within this circlet. The first Lombard king crowned with it was Agilulph, at Milan, in 591. Charlemagne was crowned with it in 774; Friedrich III. in 1452; Karl V. in 1530; and Napoleon I., 23 May, 1805, crowned himself with it as 'king of Italy' in Milan Cathedral. It was given up to Victor Emmanuel on the conclusion of peace with Austria in 1866. The motto on the crown is 'God has given it me; beware who touches it.'

According to a tradition Gregory the Great gave this crown to Queen Theodelinda. The first kaiser who wore it was Henry of Luxemburg in 1311.

Iron Duke (The). Arthur Wellesley duke of Wellington (1769–1852). His statue, made of bronze by M. C. Wyatt, was mounted on the marble arch opposite his house in 1846. This hideous deformity, removed in 1882, had a share in establishing the eponym of the 'Iron' duke.

An Achilles in bronze, by Westmacott, was erected in Hyde Park from subscriptions contributed by the ladies of England in honour of the duke.

Iron Emperor (The). Nicholas of Russia (1796, 1826–1855).

Iron Hand. Götz von Berlichingen, immortalised by Goethe (16th cent.), is so called from his iron hand. The hand weighed 3 lbs., and was so constructed as to grasp a sword or lance. It was invented by a mechanic of Nuremberg, and is preserved at Jaxthausen, near Heilbronn. A duplicate is in the Schloss at Erbach, in the Odenwald. Götz von Berlichingen lost his right hand at the siege of Landshut. See 'Duke with the Silver Hand'; 'Golden Hand.'

The family of Clephane of Carslogie are in possession of a steel hand conferred by one of the kings of Scotland on a laird of Carslogie, who had lost his hand in his country's service.—SCOTT, Border Antiquities, vol. ii. p. 206.

Iron Mask (Man in the). A mysterious prisoner in the reign of Louis XIV., condemned at all times to wear a black velvet mask. He was confined in 1662 in the château of Pignerol; and died in the Bastille in 1703, at the age of 63. He went by the name of L'Estang, but who he was nobody knows; and Louis XIV., when the captive was dead, commanded that his face should be beaten to a pulp and cut to pieces to prevent recognition.

Iron Tooth. 'Dent de Fer.' Friedrich II. elector of Brandenburg (1657, 1688–1713).

Iron Virgin (The). An instrument of torture. It was a hollow wooden figure representing a woman. The figure opened like a cupboard, and the front of it was studded with long sharp iron spikes. The victim being placed in the figure, the front or lid was gradually closed upon him, and the spikes were so arranged as to pierce the eyes and least vital parts. When quite closed the victim was crushed, and lingered in horrible torture till actual agony exhausted his vital powers. See 'Nabis.'

Ironside. Edmund II. king of the Anglo-Saxons was so called from his iron armour (989, 1016–1017).

Sir Richard Steele signed himself 'Nestor Ironside' in the 'Guardian' (1671-1729).

Ironsides (The). Cromwell's brigade was so called for their irresistible obstinacy in fight.

Sir Philip Warwick says: 'The regiment of 1,000 men which Cromwell raised for the Association of the Eastern Counties, and which soon became known as his Ironsides, was formed strictly of religious fanatics, for Cromwell told Hampden that the one weapon which could meet and turn the chivalry of the cavalier was religious enthusiasm.'

Iroquois. A confederation of five American-Indian States, partly in Canada and partly in the United States. They were the Mohawks, the Oneidas, the Onondagas, the Senecas, and the Cayugas. They were proud, brave, hospitable, faithful, and melancholic.

When the Tuscaroras joined them they were increased to six states.

Irrefragable Doctor (The). 'Doctor Irrefragabilis,' Alexander of Hales, of the Order of Friars Minor, Paris (died 1245). He was an Englishman, and was called Hales from a monastery in Gloucestershire where he was brought up. He wrote a commentary on the famous 'Sentences' of Pierre Lombard, and was the master of Duns Scotus. See 'Doctors.'

There was a John Hales who was called 'The Ever Memorable,' who was born at Bath (1584-1656). Professor William Hales, the chronologist, is quite another person. He died in 1831.

Irregulars (The). We have no Irregulars in the British army; but in the Indian army we have Irregulars among the black troops, such as Hodson's Horse, Probyn's Central India Horse, &c.

The Militia, the Yeomanry, and the Volunteers are not regulars (q.v.), but yet they are not called Irregulars. In France the 'troupes irregulieres are those who do not belong to the line (q.v.).

Ir'vingites (3 syl.), 1826. Followers of Edward Irving, a Scotch minister, whose most striking peculiarity was the expectation of the speedy advent of Christ and the beginning of the millennium. His followers claimed the miraculous gifts of tongues, prophecy, healing, and raising of the dead, though Irving himself never laid claim to such powers. He died in 1834.

They call themselves the 'Apostolic Catholic Church,' and have four ministries: (1) Apostles; (2) Prophets; (3) Evangelists; and (4) Pastors or Angels.

Isau'rian War (The), 492–498. Tarcalisæus, or Zeno, invited over a formidable band of Isaurians, but his successor Anastasius suppressed their pensions, banished them from Constantinople, and prepared war for their extermination. Some 150,000 barbarians, headed by a fighting bishop, flew to arms, and a war of six years' duration ensued. The Isaurians retired to their fastnesses in the mountains, but fort after fort fell; their communication with the sea was cut off; the bravest of their leaders died in arms; those who survived were dragged in chains to the hippodrome, and those of their young men who refused to submit to the Romans were banished to Thrace.

Is'iac Table (The). A flat rectangular bronze plate, about 4 ft. 8 in. long, containing three rows of figures of Egyptian emblems and deities. It was sold by a soldier to a locksmith, and the locksmith sold it to Cardinal Bembo in 1527. It is now at Turin, but it is a general opinion that the table is spurious. See 'Literary Forgeries.'

Isidore of Seville. One of the doctors of the church (570–636): his day is 4 April. Author of 'Commentaries on the Old and New Testament,' a 'Treatise on the Ecclesiastical Writers,' 'A Chronicle from Adam to 626,' &c. See 'Doctors of the Church.'

Isido'rian Decretals (The), 820–836, or 'The False Decretals.' Fifty-nine decretals palmed off as the work of St. Isidore of Seville (570–636). They aim at the exaltation of the Roman pontiff and the depreciation of the civil power, the infallibility of the pope, and the justification of certain 'Catholic' practices, such as the rite of chrism, and so on. See 'Literary Forgeries.'

The collection consists of three parts: (1) contains 61 decretal epistles from popes of the first three centuries, Clement to Sylvester (91–314); (2) canons of the councils; (3) decretal epistles from Sylvester to Deodatus (314–615). Of these 55 are certainly spurious, and yet for nearly 1,000 years they were appealed to by popes and councils as authority. In 1789 Pope Pius VI. admitted them to be iniquitous forgeries.

 Some attribute these decretals to Riculfe archbishop of Ments; others to Isidore Mercator, or 'Peccator,' as some surname him, a Canobite; others again to Benedict Levita, a Gallican monk.

Islam. The Mohammedan creed; a believer in the creed is a Moslem, Mussulman, Islamite, or Mohammedan.

Isle des Chevaux (The). The Isle of May, in the throat of the Firth of Forth. It is about a mile in length and encloses some 70 acres of pasture land much prized for grazing horses.

Pronounce Eel' da'Sha-vo'.

Isle of Destiny (The). Inisfail.

Isle of Mist (The). The Isle of Skye, its high hills being almost always shrouded in mist.

'Nor sleep thy hand by thy side, Chief of the Isle of Mist.'—OSSIAN, Fingal, i.

Isle of Saints (The). Ireland was so called after the conversion of the people to Christianity; before that time it was called the Sacred Isle. It was as distinguished for being the school of Druidism or sun-worship as it was subsequently for being the school of Christian scholars.

Isma'elites (4 syl.), or 'Ismael'ians.' Separatists from the Shiites, a Moslem sect. The Shiites believe that there have been twelve true Imams. The Ismaelites believe in only seven: Ali (son-in-law of Mohammed) and his six regular descendants. The seventh was Ismael, who died 730, leaving an infant son Mohammed. This infant was set aside, and his uncle Mousa was made kalif or imam (q.v.). This caused a split in the party, and those who followed the infant Mohammed called themselves Ismaelites. No one knows what became of the infant, but the Ismaelites assert that he will appear in the fulness of time, and restore the true faith. These Ismaelites were very influential from 730 to the 12th century, and from them sprang the Karmathians who ravaged Persia and Syria in the 8th century; the Fatimite kalifs who reigned in Egypt from 909 to 1174; the Assassins (q.v.) 1090–1258; the Druses, the Nosairis, and the Wahabites (3 syl.).

The Ismaelites were materialists, and symbolised away all those parts of the Koran opposed to their own views. Their missionaries are called 'dais,' and a good Ismaelite should pray fifty times a day.

Ismaelites of the East (The) The Assassins, an order of the Ismael'ians or Isma'elites (q.v.). Their great aim was to stamp out the Sunnites and assassinate the Sunnite kalif.

Isoc'ratês (The French). Fléchier (1632–1710). A great pulpit orator. Noted for his 'Funeral Orations,' especially one pronounced over Marshal Turenne.

Israelites' Clubs. See note after 'Circumcellians,' p. 175, col. i.

Isth'mian Games (The). In ancient Greece held in the Isthmus of Corinth every alternate spring, the 1st and 3rd of each Olympiad. The games began at sunrise with the foot-match, and the victor gave his name to the Olympiad. Wrestling was the next match, then boxing, then leaping, then the chariot race. The only prize was a wreath of parsley or green pine-leaves.

The pancration was a combination of wrestling and boxing. The combatants tried their strength first by squeezing each other's hands. Sostratos of Sicyon gained twelve prizes for crushing his opponent's hand in the preliminary grip.

Italian Architecture. Renaissance, or 'Classical Revival.' It commenced in Italy at the beginning of the 15th cent., was introduced into France about a century later, and into England 1560–70.

Italian Confederacy (The), 1526. Consisting of the pope, the Italian princes and states, and François I. of France, against Karl V. The allies engaged to raise 30,000 foot soldiers, 3,000 horse, and a sufficient fleet. Henry VIII. of England did not join the league, but he favoured it, for Wolsey hated Karl.

Italian Confederation or League (The). The eight allied nations in the Social War (B.C. 90–89).

Italian French School of Painting (The). Called the 'Sophoclês of Art,' because the exponents drew their human beings models of perfection. This school included Vouet (1582–1649), Mignard (1610–1695), Lesueur (1617–1655), Lebrun (1619–1690), Jouvenet (1647–1707), Rigaud (1659–1743), and Lemoine (1688–1737).

Italian League (The), 1511–1512. Set on foot by Pope Julius II. against Louis XII. of France. Henry VIII. of England and his father-in-law Ferdinand V. of Aragon joined the pope. Julius laid the kingdom of France under an interdict, and convened a general council at Rome (the Fifth General Council of the Lateran), chiefly for the reproof of Louis XII. Pope Julius died in 1513, and the league was dissolved.

Louis XII. and Maximilian had convened the Council of Pisa to depose the pope. The real cause of contention was this. The Pope, the Kaiser of Germany, and the King of Aragon had formed a league for seising Venetia and parcelling it out between them; but Louis contrived to be in the field first, won the battle of Agnadello, and Venice fell into his hands. This was not what the pope wanted, so he broke the league and formed a new one to drive the French out of Italy.
